[87] For an account of the Islamic movement of Iraqi Shi’as, see Joyce N. Wiley, The Islamic Movement of Iraqi Shi‘as, Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1992.

[88] Al-Azami, op. cit., p. 14On.

[89] Sayyid is the honorific for a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad.

[90] Hujja is the reduced form of Hujjat al-Islam, Proof of Islam, the title of a mujtahid, i.e., a cleric authorized to issue authoritative opinions on Islamic law.

[91] Mohammad Sadiq Bahr al-’Ulum١ “The Tragedy of the Bahr al-’Ulunı Family,” Iraqi Islamic Association of America, 1998, pp. 5—13.

[92] “U.S. Department of State Annual Report on International Religious Freedom for 1999: Iraq,” p. 4. On the World Wide Web at [[http://www.state.g0v/www/global/human][http://www.state.g0v/www/global/human]] rights.

[93] US. Department of State, “Human Rights Reports for 1999,” pp. 12–13. At http://www. state.gov/www/global/human rights/1999 hrp report/iraq.html.

[94] Ibid., p. 16.

[95] Ibid.,p. 25.

[96] Ibid.,p. 5.

[97] “Ayatollah al-Sistani,” [[http://www.najaf.org][http://www.najaf.org]]. See also “Ayatollah Sayyid Ali Sistani,” http://playandlearn.org.

[98] Ayatollah Sayyed Mohammad Baqir al-Hakim,” [[http://playandlearn.org] [http://playandlearn.org]].

[99] Bahr al-’U!um, op. cit., p. 4.

[100] Written communication from Dr. al-Alwani’s office.

[101] Written communication from Dr. al-Tikriti.

THE REPUBLIC OF IRAQ

 Chapter 5: Domestic Politics in a Post-Saddam Iraq

Laith Kubba

Trends amongst Iraq’s diverse ethnic and religious communities are critical factors for power projections and political predictions. The two devastating Gulf Wars, the March 1991 uprising, as well as the prolonged sanctions, have polarized Iraq’s communities and weakened the prospect for democracy in a postSaddam Iraq. Consequently, and for the foreseeable future, Iraq’s stability may well require an authoritarian government, even if structural reforms are essential. In fact, the provisions for a modern, secular, and national framework are not sufficient to accommodate cultural and national aspirations of Iraq’s diverse communi ties. Inasmuch as the failure of consecutive governments—to meet the aspiration of Iraq’s vibrant communities—is rooted in the constitution and state institutions, the legacy of the past few decades necessitates fundamental reforms. A strong state and effective institutions are crucial to Iraq’s stability.

* Introduction

Up until 1958, Iraq posed little threat to its neighbors, and was of little interest to policymakers and international institutions. The 1973 oil boom, and the two Gulf Wars, projected Iraq as a regional power. Still, research on contemporary Iraq is hindered by two factors. First, the Iraqi government carefully guards the flow of information and forbids independent research on its domestic affairs. The state’s annual budget, for example, has been classified information since the early 19705, and state employees who communicate general information to outsiders—without prior permission—are charged with treason. Foreign researchers who were permitted to move freely within the country faced a cautious and self-censored populace. Second, the numerous articles, papers, and books that have been published on Iraq since 1990 continue to be driven by the ongoing conflict between Iraq and the United Nations. Such material focuses mainly on the regime, its organizations and behavior, the mechanics of repression, and the impact of sanctions on the economy and social fabric. Little attention has been paid to the political impact of three decades of Baath Party rule, the two Gulf wars, and their associated sanctions on the inner dynamics of Iraq’s various communities. In an attempt to develop an insight into the future dynamics of Iraq’s domestic politics, and by relying on ongoing contacts and close association with Iraqis within the Diaspora, this chapter identifies and explores key trends for the future.

* The State and its Citizens

Iraq is predominantly Arab, with the exception of three provinces in the north (out of a national total of eighteen) that are predominantly Kurdish. Both Arabs and Kurds have strong tribal and religious loyalties that often override ethnic identities. Within these Arab and Kurdish provinces, there are cities with predominant ethnic communities that are bonded to Iraq through culture and religious beliefs. Iraqis differ amongst themselves in their many claims and counter-claims of the real percentages of the ethnic and religious composition of Iraq's population, as well as their share of its history and cultural identity. Iraq is truly mosaic in its composition, and it is not feasible to restructure a political system based exclusively on ethnic lines, or even along lines of religious belief.

Consecutive Iraqi governments sought to nurture a national identity through social development under the auspices of strong centralized state institutions. Post-Ottoman Iraq was multiethnic and tribal and lacked national identity. Nevertheless, Iraq was constituted as a unitary modern state with centralized executive, legislative, and judicial bodies. Moreover, British colonial leaders envisaged Iraq as an Arab state, headed by a constitutional monarchy, run by an elected government, and protected by a national army. In the event, Sunni elites in Baghdad, and tribal Arab Sunni leaders throughout the country, were better positioned to benefit from the new state structure. Some of Iraq's communities initially challenged consecutive governments to demand a special status and better services from the state. Prior to Iraq's independence, the Kurds, for example, pressed for a separate nation-state and later modified their demands to an autonomous region within Iraq. The Shia clergy, for their part, led the Arab tribes in challenging the British influence over the country and boycotted the government, thereby weakening their overall participation in state institutions. Initially, the state prevailed over Kurdish national aspirations and Shia demands, but the pressures of these communities for participation remained driving forces behind domestic political developments.

Iraq's stability hinged on the ability of the state to accommodate the aspirations of its overwhelming majority, the Arab and Kurdish tribes. Under the monarchy, there was an imbalance of power, in favor of the elites in Baghdad. Later, this imbalance tilted in favor of tribal Arab Sunnis. To be sure, the monarchy struggled to accommodate the politicd forces of its three main communities, and the rights and aspirations of other minority groups. There were minor conflicts and periodic tensions between Baghdad and many such entities, as state institutions were too weak to remain neutral. Few leaders could withstand the conflicting demands of Iraq's communities for political recognition and participation. The modern secular state provided key services and offered opportunities to all citizens but was not neutral in addressing communal aspirations. Eventually, the state caved to tribal Arab Sunni pressures, whose influence became dominant in the army and security organizations.

Not surprisingly, a popular military coup ended the monarchy in 1958, replacing its fragile democratic institutions with a military dictatorship. The state became the vehicle for senior army officers, mainly Arab Sunnis, to consolidate and expand their respective power bases. A decade of instability ended in 1968 with a coup that converged the Baath Party, the Iraqi army, and the tribal Arab Sunni leadership into a strong central government under the leadership of the Tikriti clan. The 19705 oil boom multiplied Iraq's income by several fold, and the state became central to the lives of most Iraqis. In turn, the regime developed full control over the state, by transferring its power structure from that of a traditional army rule into an intertwined trilateral combination of the army, the Baath Party, and a minority ofArab Sunni tribes. Within a relatively short period of time, and through complex security networks, the family of Saddam Hussein then led the regime.

The state of Iraq, as a constitutional monarchy and later as a republic, provided a national framework for the integration of Iraq's communities: Shia, Sunni Arab, and Kurdish tribes, and its other significant minorities of Assyrians, Turkomans, Caldeans, Sabians, Armenians, and Yazidis. Importantly, the state's main institutions, such as the armyjudiciary, bureaucracy, parliament, and political parties, had the potential to provide full political integration, social development, and the emergence of a national identity without threatening sub-national identities. In fact, the development of an Iraqi national identity took place through the evolution of the economy, the growth of the middle class, and the development of a welfare state. State education and the integration of Iraq's communities in national politics further provided some of the most important elements of the emerging Iraqi national identity.

Despite these institutional changes, the main fault line of the Iraqi state remained in the disproportionate participation of its two largest communities, the Shias and the Kurds, in the leadership of its institutions. Since the early 19705, it may be accurate to posit that the leadership of the army, state bureaucracy, security, and other state institutions developed in an uneven manner. Worse still, the state took sides in accommodating conflicting communal interests. Consequently, a majority of Iraqis today identify the state and government with Arab Sunnis. This perception has reinforced the reality and polarized Iraqi communities even further. In the case of a future inter-communal conflict, it is likely that the military as well as most security services—the state's main institutions—will identify themselves as the defenders of Arab Sunnis. Instead of attempting to include Iraq's two largest communities into the system, Baghdad camouflaged its narrowly based Sunni tribal power structure with national rhetoric, which played down communal sub-identities. Moreover, the totalitarian government of Saddam Hussein forced Iraqis to compromise their sub-identities in favor of an Iraqi national identity. Thus, the Iraqi state reached its peak rhetoric as a nation-state on the eve of Saddam Hussein's claim to the presidency in 1979, when Iraq had a strong welfare state and a booming oil-based economy that broadened its middle classes and enhanced its national identity. Although the system was open to all Iraqis, power remained unquestionably in the hands of a few. The government bought their loyalty through jobs, free education, health care, and other benefits.

Under normal circumstances, there should be legal and political distinctions between the state, the government, and the president of Iraq, but in reality, all have been reduced to the entity of the president. Today, Saddam Hussein and his family run a "security regime" that, in turn, manages the Baath Party, the military, and the bureaucracy. Although these power bases vary in their responsibility for initiating or implementing Saddam Hussein's policies, Baghdad is perceived by a majority of Iraqis as an extension of Saddam Hussein's regime. The ills of the policies of Saddam Hussein became the ills of the state itself. Irrespective of academic arguments about such distinctions, the end result of three decades of Baath rule brought to question not only the future of Saddam Hussein's regime but the future of the Iraqi state itself. Kurds tend to blame the state and Sunni Arabs for the emergence of the ultimate dictatorship of Saddam Hussein, while Shias tend to blame Sunni tribes for their support of the regime. So far, the problematic relationship of the Iraqi government with its communities has not led to inter-communal conflicts, but it certainly has undermined the credibility of the government in developing a national identity.

* State Relationships with Ethnic Communities

It is difficult to assess in detail the impact of the past three decades on the attitudes and dynamics of Iraq's ethnic communities without an assessment based on field research. To some extent, it is evident that Iraq's three main communities now diverge in their political perspectives, interests, and attitudes on a number of key issues and have developed different political agendas.

Shia Arab tribes, who are concentrated in relatively deprived areas of Baghdad and most southern cities, are perceived as a threat to the government. Sunni Arab tribes form the power base of the regime and, consequently, enjoy unique privileges. Still, Shia and Sunni Arab tribes are divided more by their contrasting realities than by their confessional beliefs. Indeed, the two Gulf Wars and their aftermath have divided and polarized the Arab tribes along Shia-Sunni lines, up until 1990, the Shias, who form the majority of Arabs in Iraq, had no specific political demands beyond broad national reforms. Despite their religious bonds with Iranian Shias, for example, they fought a national war against Iran. However, a serious fault line between Shias and Baghdad emerged in the aftermath of the March 1991 uprising against the regime. To quell this opposition, the regime targeted Shias through indiscriminate attacks on their religious institutions. As a result, some Shias have now joined Kurdish leaders in demanding a decentralized state structure for a future Iraq.

The Kurds have an older and a more complex relationship with the state. Kurdish national aspirations were not met after the First World War, and since then, it may be accurate to posit that the Kurds have been struggling for national recognition. They were the first to be at odds with the newly established state and demanded autonomous rule. Their demands for self-rule resulted in a March 1970 agreement, but despite the progress reached then, they fought several wars with Baghdad for the realization of an autonomous region. Given this background, Kurdish successes in maintaining a de facto self-rule in northern Iraq since 1991 have far-reaching consequences on Iraq and its neighbors. In fact, it is difficult to reconcile the autonomous Kurdish region with an authoritarian centralized unitary state with an Arab national identity. Iraqi Kurds have opened a Pandora's box on future alternatives in Iraq that will have far-reaching effects on both Iran and Turkey.

In addition to the failure of the state, Iraq's national unity has been weakened due to the effects of the UN sanctions. To be sure, sanctions increased Iraqi dependence on the state, in securing food allocations through the miserly coupon distribution system known as the oil-for-food program. On the other hand, such dependency neither compensates for the diminishing role of the state as a framework for national integration nor contributes to the development or maintenance of a national identity. Moreover, sanctions have undermined the urbanized middle classes—especially in Baghdad—who are the real product of an Iraqi national identity. The destruction of the urbanized middle classes, the lack of state services in key sectors, such as health, education, and employment, and the inability of Iraqi polity to provide national alternatives have all contributed to the fragmentation of Iraq's national identity—with dire consequences.

* The Fragmentation of National Politics

Up until recently, the Iraqi polity was neither ethnic nor confessional. The political discourse was national and reflected the main political trends in the region, which are liberal, leftist, nationalist, and/or Islamist. These diverse political trends spread throughout Iraq and among its main communities, Shias, Sunnis, and Kurds. Some ethnic and marginalized communities leaned more toward national and secular political trends that held broad appeal, while others sought radical reforms to improve intrinsic conditions. Indeed, these variations in political tendencies were complex, and could not be reduced to mere ethnicity or religious confessions. For example, the Shia Maadan in the south, and Shias in the poorer Baghdad districts, were attracted to radical leftists, as well as Islamic movements. Kurds were attracted to nationalist, tribal, communist, and Islamic movements. Although Islamic and Kurdish movements seemed to be confessional and ethnic, respectively, they were better understood in the ideological and national context. For many decades, Iraqi politics had remained national and provided a framework for the emergence of a national identity and the integration of its communities.

Recently, however, Iraqi politics was reshaped by the emergence of ethnic and religious sub-identities and tribal loyalties, which overrode the traditional national discourse. Despite claims to the contrary, the most recent meeting of these groups in New York under the umbrella of the Iraqi National Congress (INC) amply illustrated the lack of this national discourse. The various groups expressed general aspirations for peace and respect for human and community rights, but did not opt to develop a genuine national agenda. More importantly, the politics of the exiled groups indicated that there has been a clear surge in ethnic sentiments, communal loyalties, and regional agendas. To some extent, the assertion of ethnic and communal identities may be understood as a backlash against three decades of a state policy that sought to promote a uniform identity and enforce a state version of sub-identities. Expressions of strong ethnic sentiments may also be understood in view of the fear of communities being left out, if and when the state is restructured and reformed. It may also be argued that the trends amongst the ethnic exile groups are not indicative of the real communal aspirations inside the country. Nevertheless, the narrow sectarian agendas of these self-proclaimed and exiled political groups cannot be dismissed. Their failure to provide an alternative national framework, as well as their active participation in the promotion of ethnic-confessional political options, will surely undermine further Iraq’s national identity. Nowhere was this trend clearer than within the military.

 The Military

Under the monarchy, consecutive Iraqi governments used the army to quash community rebellion of Kurds, Assyrians, and Shias. The role of the military increased with its frequent interventions in politics as an instrument used to end chaos and restore order. The bloodless 1968 military coup was followed by a violent systematic campaign against dissidents. Since then, the Iraqi army has fallen under the tight control of emerging security agencies, which have become the key institutions buttressing the regime. Over the past three decades, the military's officer corps has been selected from Sunni tribes loyal to Saddam Hussein. Although the military ceased to intervene in politics, it retained its loyalty to the regime, thus becoming its ultimate line of defense.

 Prospectsfor Political Violence

The biggest threat to Iraq's long-term stability is its potential for communal and political violence. Over the years, Iraq's security agencies and the military have repressed Iraqis on a wide scale and increased their capacity for brutality, which can only lead to more injustice. Ironically, although overwhelming force succeeded in undermining armed resistance and deterred dissent, it has increased and developed the capacity for violence amongst Iraqis.

Yet, despite this tendency, there has been no inter-communal violence amongst Iraqis over the past few decades, with the exception of a few, low-key, inter-tribal confrontations in rural areas. These non-political incidents, which lasted a few days at the most, were resolved within tribal norms and did not develop into lasting disputes. In the years 1958–1963, Iraq's main cities witnessed serious political violence, the most evident of which were the infamous massacres in Mosul, Kirkuk, and Baghdad. Indeed, Iraq's short-lived episodes of political and tribal clashes drop to insignificant levels in comparison to its serious episodes of state-community violence. Although communal and political disturbances seem to be negligible—especially when compared to other countries, such as Lebanon, Somalia, and Afghanistan—the level of violence initiated and orchestrated by the state against its own citizens is one of the worst throughout the region.

In the early 1970s, the Baath government contained a major Kurdish rebellion in the north, as well as a small-scale communist guerrilla movement in the marsh areas in the south. Both operations were successful. In 1979, Iraq witnessed an upsurge of political violence triggered by the Islamic Revolution in Iran, the rise of Saddam Hussein to power, and the beginning of the Iran-Iraq War. Shia demonstrations in Baghdad were followed by an attempt on the life of Iraq’s deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, that threatened the stability of the entire regime. These events led to a government-sponsored terror campaign that specifically targeted two political parties, the Islamic Dawah Party and the Iraqi Communist Party. In the event, two Shia communities were singled out as fifth columns: the Faili Kurds, and Shias of Iranian origin. Later, Baghdad targeted the Kurdish Democratic Party, led by the Barazani clan, and then targeted the second largest Kurdish party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. Before long, the leading revolutionary council passed a capital punishment decree on all members of the Islamic Dawah Party, and public executions of opponents were ordered by special committees. Importantly, summary sentences were administrated by low-level Baath Party members, further drawing them into the regime’s nest. Extra-judicial killings and executions did not spare religious men, tribal chiefs, army officers, or academics. A vicious cycle of violence, which was led by the state and followed by the opposition, was concluded in 1989 in favor of the state. During the eight-year-long Iran-Iraq War, Baghdad carried out thousands of public executions of dissidents and army deserters. As the high toll of war casualties synthesized violence and made death a normal part of life, the invasion of Kuwait the intensity and ferocity of the second Gulf War and its widespread destruction—further diminished the value of life.

 Rating the Survivability of the Regime

If anything, Saddam Hussein has been consistent in his use of excessive and decisive force against his opponents. To date, his regime has been successful in using force and terror to secure stability, but whether it can survive for another decade through terror alone remains to be determined. Moreover, and in the event of the collapse of the regime, is it likely that violence will spread throughout Iraq and escalate through revenge, reprisals, foreign involvement, and easy access to weapons? Can the Iraqi state survive the downfall of the regime without breaking apart? In case Iraq survives the initial chaos, can this generation of Iraqis develop alternative structures based on democracy and the rule of law, or are they doomed to fail because of the many years of terror and repression that have deeply impoverished their political culture?

To be sure, Iraq's future is clouded with more uncertainties than that of any other nation of the Middle East, speculation on Iraq's future ranges from the continuation of Saddam Hussein's dynasty for the foreseeable future to a prolonged civil war and an eventual fragmentation of the country.

In the short term, observers can only speculate on a wide range of possible scenarios such as a regional misadventure by Saddam Hussein, an escalation of violence between Iraq and the United States, the assassination of President Saddam Hussein, the crowning of one of his sons, a coup from within, an uprising, and so on. Yet, despite the regime's firm grip on power, Saddam Hussein's astonishing survivability, the firmness of the United Nations sanctions, and the Iraq-US. policy deadlock, Baghdad's siege cannot be maintained over the long term. Either Baghdad or Washington will agree to a more flexible position and move beyond the current deadlock. It is also possible to envisage another future in view of two likely scenarios. Indeed, a departure from the current deadlock would lead either to the revival of the regime or to its breakdown.

The first scenario could occur if and when there is change from within the regime, and it assumes that the country would remain intact through the use of force. It further assumes both the continuity of the regime and its ability, under present or a different leadership, to meet American and United Nations requirements for lifting sanctions. Finally, it also presupposes that the regime has the capacity to administer change and reforms, which would—eventually —rehabilitate it back into the world community.

A more realistic scenario is that of a defiant Saddam Hussein who would hold on to power until the country breaks down into chaos. Under this view, a new regime would emerge, perhaps out of the remains of surviving state institutions, with the ultimate result of communal conflicts. The collapse of the regime could unleash complex dynamics of change in which both state and social institutions become the determinants of Iraq's future. Of course, it is highly speculative as to whether or not Iraq's neighbors would be directly involved in its domestic affairs, but it is fairly certain that they will be indirectly involved through proxy militias and political groups.

* Prospects for Self-Reform and Rehabilitation

Whether Saddam Hussein's regime can in fact reform itself, and whether it would survive such reforms, are key questions as well. There have always been pragmatists within the current regime who argued for reforms, as is evident in numerous public statements by some of the top officials in 1989, 1991, and 1999. To be sure, such statements may be part of a sinister ploy to engage the international community in dialogue, with the false hope of achieving modest reforms. Tariq Aziz, for example, declared that Baghdad—under the present siege—would not proceed with plans for political pluralism, out of fear that such reforms may well undermine internal stability. Members of various exiled Iraqi groups reported that indirect mediation with Qusay Hussein, the president's powerful son and probable heir, aimed to open a dialogue, but most judged these as sham and insincere. Ultimately, it is Saddam Hussein who decides the extent to which such risky policies may be pursued, and, so far at least, he seems to reject genuine reforms, openly and defiantly, the Iraqi strongman defies the Security Council in its numerous disarmament programs for Iraq, mistrusting even his closest "reformist" allies.

A good case in point is the lack of a response to Iraq's repeated "gestures" for a rapprochement with Washington. If there were to be a favorable change in the American political climate toward Iraq, then the regime would presumably posture more on reforms, engage itself with reform rhetoric, and push for normalization and a speedy suspension of sanctions. This would be a short-lived affair because the United States, even if it is under pressure to relax sanctions, is unlikely to change course, depart from its staunch anti—Saddam Hussein position, or engage itself in any dialogue with the current regime in Baghdad.

Moreover, as a time-tested leader, Saddam Hussein seems to have more faith in the effectiveness of his Stalinist-style rule, which has kept him in power— against all odds—for over 30 years. Under the circumstances, risky reforms may not be favored, especially since the ethos of the regime is based on fear and terror. For Saddam Hussein, the lessons of the Eastern Bloc clearly demonstrated that reforms weakened authoritarian regimes, and led to their meteoric collapse. Therefore, and unless reforms may be introduced at low risk—and high returns—Saddam Hussein will not allow any consideration. At present, the regime perceives the “reforms option” as a threat rather than an opportunity, and even if its benefits were to outweigh costs, Saddam Hussein will simply not permit it.

The reforms option is possible but it requires a change in the leadership. Over the past 30 years, Saddam Hussein has outmaneuvered his rivals, and hence a change from within is remote even if it cannot be ruled out. Conspirators against Saddam Hussein must not only have the capacity to physically remove him from office, but should also have certain assurances that they would be able to survive him, and retain power. Under such an outcome, the new leaders of Iraq would need Western—especially American—support to buttress their regime and allow the introduction of long-term reform programs. Moreover, the regime-reform agenda of a post-Saddam Hussein leadership would primarily focus on issues of mutual concern to Iraq and the United States, including attention to the Kurdish question, relations with Iran, the Palestinian refugee issue, regional security, oil policy, various military programs, and the rights of religious and ethnic minorities. Given this critical list of concerns, any regime in Baghdad would be reluctant to accommodate all of the American concerns, including the undefined role of the military—as the guarantor of internal stability—the power share of tribal Arab Sunnis, and the restraints on political and religious freedoms. Given the history of the country, such a leadership would surely be a softer version of Saddam Hussein’s regime, willing to fulfill some of the aspirations of the Kurdish community, but refusing to honor Shia longings.

 The Chaos Scenario

There are many scenarios of how this regime might end, but none of them would be without chaos and bloodshed. Indeed, developments immediately following the March 1991 war shed considerable light on the patterns of revolt, and their likely targets. The uprising started in Basra by retreating soldiers who shot at Saddam Hussein’s statues in anger. That symbolic act triggered groups of daring youth to take to the streets with light machine guns. In response, senior members of the Baath Party and security men, Shias and Sunnis alike, were handpicked by angry mobs before being killed in summary executions. Then local offices of the Baath Party and other security organs were destroyed. Hundreds of officers, soldiers, junior members of the Baath Party, government employees, Shias and Sunnis alike, who were fortunate to escape the onslaught of the war, joined rebel factions, assuming leadership roles when necessary. The news of the rebellion spread and triggered similar defiance in most southern cities, with identical patterns.

Over time, and as rebellious Iraqis started to believe that the regime would collapse, many more joined the armed groups, formed their own checkpoints, and searched for state targets to vent their anger. Outrage was necessary to maintain the momentum of the rebellion. Local dignitaries and tribal leaders assumed leadership roles, but by the end of the first week, ordinary Iraqis—who were dazzled by decades of harsh authoritarianism—were in search of broader-based and collective leadership. Most Shias, for example, gravitated toward known religious figures and rallied behind Ayatollah Khoi, the 90-year-old spiritual leader in Najaf. Others called for Ayatollah Al Hakim, the exiled religious leader in Iran, to assume his rightful place. Neither of them was in a position to fill the emerging leadership vacuum or lead the country on a national level. Given such uncertainties, the uprising withered at the vine and, after a few days, ended in a bloodbath.

Within a very short period of time, Republican Guard units crushed the rebellion with merciless and indiscriminate force, as the uprising in the south was crushed. Southern Shias were frightened, a phenomenon that shaped their political outlook. Since 1991, the south has not witnessed any signs of popular unrest. When Mohammed Al Sadr, a senior clergyman, was assassinated in Najaf in 1991, it was not the Shias of the south but those in the poor districts of Baghdad who rebelled. So-called emergency forces in Baghdad moved swiftly to crush the unrest, and were kept at full display for several weeks as a deterrent.

The March 1991 uprising in the predominantly Kurdish north and Shia south targeted the regime’s party and security institutions and made its men scapegoats. To be sure, the dynamics of the rebellion at the micro level were similar in both regions, although the eventual outcome in the north was drastically different from that in the south. It was days after the relatively successful uprising in the south that the Kurds mobilized against the state.

This uprising, ironically, was initiated and led by Kurdish tribal leaders known as thejohoosh, who had been, until that day, collaborators of the Iraqi regime. On balance, the Johoosh decided to switch allegiances and declared their support for the exiled Kurdish leaders, Barazani and Talabani. What followed was nothing short of dramatic, as over a million Kurds drove across the borders to Iran and Turkey. Under international pressure, the Iraqi military withdrew from the three Kurdish provinces, where Kurds have been running an autonomous region ever since.

Whether a similar breakdown scenario is likely to occur again is difficult to anticipate. Neither Operation Desert Fox in 1998 nor the assassination of a Shia leader in 1999 was sufficient to trigger a mini-uprising. But if Shias perceive a breakdown in the authority of the regime, then an uprising could occur, with a slower pace but with a pattern similar to the March 1991 uprising—spontaneous, local, and unorganized. Yet, and to secure the loyalty of its troops, Baghdad eliminated their options to switch sides by implicating them in widespread war crimes and human rights violations. Active members of the Baath Party, special elite units within the military, and the security forces know that they will not be safe if they abandon the regime, or switch loyalties at the last hour. This knowledge substantially limits the various chaos scenarios one may fathom.

 The Kurds

Inasmuch as the March 1991 events clarified certain points, Kurdish attitudes would—presumably—be very different in the event of a new breakdown. Throughout the 1990s, the Kurds lived without Baghdad’s day-to-day supervision, going so far as to declare a federal state within Iraq. Today, Kurds enjoy some international recognition, are sufficiently armed, and administer their own affairs. As a result, the prospect for another uprising in the north is not a salient issue, although it could affect politics in Baghdad. Simply stated, the Kurds could play Arab communal and political disputes to their advantage. The two Kurdish groups, led by Barazani in the provinces of Irbil and Dahuk, and Talabani in the province of Sulaymaniah, differ in their perspectives on how best to serve their long-term interests. They also differ in their immediate needs as well as narrowly defined tribal interests. In the past, they disagreed in their positions toward Iran and Turkey, the opposition and Baghdad, American covert operations, and so on. Barazani has been consistent in avoiding a confrontation with Baghdad and preserving the de facto autonomous state acknowledged by both Washington and Baghdad. Talabani, a close ally of Iran, is a risk taker who would seek more say in Baghdad, to buttress his limited influence in “Kurdistan.”

 The Northeast

In addition to the Shias and the Kurds, tribal Arab Sunni groups in three provinces northeast of Baghdad—who did not rise against the regime in March 1991—deserve attention. It may be possible to impute that no uprising occurred there out of fear that a regime breakdown would result in a takeover by Shias and Kurds, presumably not in their best interests. In return for their loyalty, Saddam Hussein shielded them from the impact of sanctions. Today, tribal Arab Sunnis enjoy a standard of living better than that found in the capital and, not surprisingly, most do not wish to alter the existing balance of power. They contribute to elite military units, lead the state bureaucracy, manage various security organs, control portions of the economy, and identify their interests with that of the state. Importantly, and although several Arab Sunni mavericks attempted to assassinate Saddam Hussein, they have not joined others to undermine the regime. Most endured the cruel reprisals after each failed attempt, but continued to be loyal to preserve intrinsic interests. They see a national agenda led and defined by the military as their best vehicle for the future. It may be worth repeating that most tribal Arab Sunni elements maintain a high degree of cohesion, form a well-defined interest bloc, are properly armed, display some experience in governance, and may be ready to defend basic interests at all costs. In the case of another Shia uprising in the south or even in Baghdad, for example, Arab Sunnis may be expected to close ranks. In the case of a breakdown of the regime, they may be expected to defend the integrity of the military and the state against all others.

 The Capital

Baghdadis, Shias and Sunnis alike, feared the impact of a breakdown in law and order and did not rise in March 1991. In the event, middle-class residents in and around the capital rejected a putative mob takeover. The most volatile district of Baghdad, Al Thawrah, which is carefully watched by the government and feared by Baghdadis (inhabited by an estimated two million deprived Shias), was relatively subdued in March 1991, sparing itself a brutal slaughter at the hands of Saddam Hussein's so-called emergency forces. Since then, conditions in Baghdad have gotten worse because of the sanctions and the overall lack of services. Importantly, middle-class elements are the worst hit by sanctions, and many seem to have little or no choice but to emigrate or wither silently.

If another uprising were to occur, Shia districts in Baghdad such as Al Thawrah could conceivably be optimal venues. Yet, the military and security forces would also fight hard to keep control over Baghdad, with or without Saddam Hussein in power. Without the leadership of Saddam Hussein, the military would find support among Baghdadis at grassroots level, but it would —conceivably—be a nightmare to imagine Baghdad without a forceful authority.

* From Chaos To Order

The demise of Saddam Hussein and the collapse of the regime would push Iraq into a new era. It would introduce a new set of dynamics and force most Iraqis to address issues other than Saddam Hussein. In fact, the new dynamics in a post—Saddam Hussein era are unpredictable, and its ultimate outcome is highly speculative. An authoritarian government supported by Iraq's main communities, or a prolonged civil war, and/or a possible fragmentation of Iraq define the upper and lower bounds of these speculations. These bounds exclude the emergence of a liberal democratic system in the short term.

Events that might follow the breakdown of the regime could be envisaged in two phases. The first phase assumes inevitable anarchy, with bloodshed, cycles of vengeance, and violent quests for power. Worse still, there is a danger that the military would disintegrate as a national institution and emerge as the spearhead of tribal Arab Sunni elements. Soldiers, who could access sophisticated weapons, including the country's chemical and biological arsenals, may well use them in their communal wars. Iraq's estimated one million men under arms might well be sucked into the cycle of violence and vengeance. It would not be surprising that violence would lead to additional conflict that would result in an orgy of inter-communal bloodshed. Extremists and provocateurs would be out of control and would lead their communities into anarchy. Tribal leaders, political groups, army officers, and foreign-backed groups would all compete to fill the void and expand their power bases. Under such circumstances, the period of bloodletting and the extent of violence are thus unpredictable, as the brutality would lead to an ongoing anarchy, especially in Baghdad. The Iraqi military, which has the capacity to "settle" military battles, would not be able to end political and communal violence without support from community leaders and political figures.

A second phase would emerge if and when Iraqis could put an end to lawlessness, control communal violence, and acknowledge the need for consensus and compromise. Outside the capital, where there are predominant and homogenous communities, there would be a quick end to anarchy. Moreover, community leaders would reach consensus on local issues but would differ on how to proceed further and address national issues. It must be clearly stated that today Iraq has no national organization, or known leaders, that could assume a leadership role on a national level, beyond existing ethnic and religious loyalties. Truth be told, the new-generation leaders lack mutual trust and political experience to conclude lasting compromises. Their exposure to regional influence would prolong the period of instability and muddy its ultimate outcome. Without a doubt, operatives from the communist, Islamic, and Baathist groups could all prove to be effective in serving others, but they would not be capable of leading the country. The least effective would be the American-backed exiled Iraqi opposition, who, ironically, may well be despised by most factions.

Nevertheless, and if all goes well, Iraqis would eventually come to terms with their collective needs, accept compromises, and develop aggregate measures to restore order. Although Iraqis could build confidence in reaching agreements on the future role of the state and acquiesce to various methods to develop the constitution, it is unlikely that they would proceed beyond law and order concerns into long-term national issues.

* An Agenda for the Future

There are no signs as of yet of meaningful dialogue or of setting a working agenda for political discourse in Iraq. Efforts to develop consensus, define an agenda, or agree on a new constitution are at their infancy. Iraq's various communities have not yet had the chance to exchange views and compromise their differences on the future.

Given that the majority of Iraqis are of tribal origins, with authoritarian leaders who acknowledge the need for consultation and consensus building but not democratic traditions of elections, accountability or participation is not impossible to fathom. Consecutive military rulers and political parties alike cashed in on Iraq's tribal authoritarian culture and discouraged the emergence of democratic traditions. Leaders often use the pretext of necessity, stability, and unity to justify the need for excess authority. A post-Saddam Hussein regime would be in real need of such stability and unity, and consequently a fresh agenda would be dominated by short-term concerns for security. Under the circumstances, few should anticipate a long-term agenda that aspires to democracy and an open society.

Still, Iraqis would attempt to reconstruct the country under a new constitution and restructure its many institutions. Naturally, Iraqis share aspirations and ideals for a peaceful country, but they lack the mechanisms to proceed on a number of key issues. So far, the debates amongst exile groups—which took place under the auspices of foreign powers and lacked credibility—clarified the need to develop consensus on a number of critical issues.

First, Kurdish demands for a federal state. Although Arabs endorse the need for self-rule and an autonomous status in "Kurdistan," they do not share with the Kurds an agenda for a federal state.

Second, the role of the army. Shias and Kurds alike will seek to limit the role of the military and broaden its base. The Iraqi army is supposed to be a national institution meant for the defense of the country, but the bulk of its officers are compromised tribal Arab Sunnis.

Third, the state structures. A decentralized structure appeals to Kurds, but some Arabs may reject it in defense of a strong central Iraq. The administration of the country from a central government in Baghdad has led to the marginalization of the regions and to fierce competition by Iraq's main communities.

Fourth, numerous foreign influences. Iraq's communities feel the need for foreign support, including demands for foreign assurances of rights and agreements. Moreover, many communities have been exposed to a high degree of foreign influence, which is perceived by leading Iraqis as undermining the country's national interest. Kurds, in particular, will insist on conducting their own foreign affairs and will seek foreign underwriting of their deals with other Iraqis.

Fifth, political participation. The main communities need to agree on an agenda concerning the principles of participation, governance, and accountability at local, regional, and central level. Although these may be agreed upon on a regional level, there are profound differences on how to proceed with respect to the central administration.

Sixth, developing the economy. The main communities need to agree on Iraq's central and regional economy, the allocation of resources, and the role of the state in providing welfare services.

Finally, civil liberties. The main communities need to agree on human and civil rights, minority status, freedom of expression and association, and other related issues and the extent to which these rights should be secured by international laws and agreements.

 The Shia Political Agenda

The 12 million Shias make up over 60 percent of Iraq’s population and over 80 percent of its Arab population. Assuming that Iraq resolves the Kurdish demand for an autonomous federal region, it would be left with a minority of Arab Sunnis in government and an increased majority of Shias who will certainly demand wider participation in the decision-making process. Consequently, the Shia political agenda is crucial to Iraq’s stability.

 Who Are the Shias?

The Shias of Iraq form neither a homogenous religious community nor a massbased society. The majority are tribal Arabs, mainly concentrated in southern Iraq. Baghdad has influential Shia families and a highly urbanized Shia population, and more than half of its inhabitants are of tribal Shia origin. They constitute the poorest and most deprived citizens. Non-Arab Shias are better understood as ethnic communities in clearly defined districts; the Kurdish Failis in northeastern provinces, Turkomans in Kirkuk and Mosul, and Iraqis of Persian origin in the holy cities of Najaf, Karbala, and Khadmiya. Most of the latter are concentrated in specific districts, and their attitudes and interests differ from the majority tribal Arab Shias. Still, the three most influential Shia communities are those in Baghdad, the Arab tribes in southern Iraq, and the religious communities in the holy cities of Najaf, Karbala, and Khadmiya.

Shias are sub-divided on class, ethnic, and tribal lines, but they are bonded through shared beliefs, initiation rituals during the month of Muharam, and leadership by the ulama and the marja’. Shia’s adhesion to religious institutions is deeply rooted in their communal traditions. These bonds, however, are not sufficient to make them a distinctive bloc like tribal Sunnis, Assyrians, or other minorities. Their religious affiliation plays little role in defining their daily interests but becomes of great significance during national crises.

The impact of Saddam Hussein's era on Iraqi Shias varied across the communities. In the 19805, Faili Kurds and Iraqis of Persian origins, for example, were prime victims of the regime. Following the March 1991 uprising, the main victims were the Arab tribes in southern Iraq and those in the holy cities of Najaf and Karbala. Shias in Baghdad have suffered too, because of state neglect of their neighborhoods, but have not been targeted by the government. Baghdadi Shias suffered from a serious breakdown in their social fabric, unlike those in southern Iraq, because most lost their religious linkages with the south. The March 1991 uprising further illustrated that the Shias rallied around the traditional marja'iyya and other ulama in Najaf. They formed local communities to reflect parochial interests but could not lead or perform on a national level, because their capacity to organize and form effective structures was weak.

In this respect, it is criticd to note that there are two important factors in defining the role of the clergy in Iraqi politics. First is the ethnic origin defined by the Arab-Persian element of the leadership. The religious hierarchy in Najaf has taken on a serious theological leadership role vis-â-vis Qom. However, Najaf has increased its Iraqi identity and enhanced its leadership amongst Iraqi Shias. Sayyed Sistani, for example, a non-Arab marja', commands influence amongst Shias outside, rather than inside, Iraq. The late Sayyed Sadr was a rising leader, and his assassination in 1999 left a political vacuum. In case of a future communal crisis, Iraqi Shias may well be galvanized toward an Arab Shia marja' from one of the known religious families, such as members of the Al Hakim family in Najaf.

The second factor is the political outlook of the marja'. As the highest religious authority in Najaf, the marja' stays out of politics, unless there is a national or religious crisis. In such times, Shias throughout Iraq tend to bypass their political and local leaders and abide by the direction of the marja'. This trend is neither religious nor political but cultural, and it is likely to continue. It is unlikely that the marja' of the Najaf school of thought will push for a political role, and if he did, Shia Iraqis would not necessarily accept his extended political leadership. Other clergymen are likely to seek a political role in conjunction with parties and alliances, and this too bodes ill for the future.

 Shia Politics

Political trends amongst the Shias reflect the national spectrum. These variations reflect class, communal, and educational pressures, as well as exposure to outside influences, the capacity of various players to accommodate regional demands, and the overall conditions within the region. For example, the Iraqi Communist Party and its members remain active and rooted in Shia communities. Fundamentalist Islamic (Shia) groups, such as the Islamic Dawah Party, are also active in secular communities throughout Baghdad. Even the Baath Party has a large Shia membership. These three parties are rooted in Shia communities and have the capacity to re-organize and re-enter the political fray as serious contenders for power. Their weaknesses, however, have led to the emergence of new leaders and alliances amongst the non-politicized sectors. New groups have emerged with local leaders, smaller groups, and social dignitaries. The clergy, tribal leaders, businessmen, and community leaders now provide a second tier of political players who can seek to aspire to national politics through broader alliances.

 Shia Sentiments

There are as many political views amongst the Shias as there are political groupings, and it is difficult to simplify the attitudes of Iraqi Shias on these matters. In a rare 1993 meeting hosted by the Al Khoi Foundation in London, more than 150 Shia intellectuals of different political affiliations met and expressed their views on a number of issues. The proceedings of these meetings have not been published as of yet, but a number of key issues were debated: the political crisis in Iraq, communal trends among the clergy, attitudes toward other communities, and those toward the state, Iran, and various Arab countries.

First, Shias—especially in the holy cities—resented the war with Iran on religious grounds. Some clergy and Islamic groups opposed the war, expressed sympathy to Ayatollah Khomeini, and sided with Iran. SCIRI continues to represent and lead that trend. Today most of the clergy and many of the Islamic groups in exile see Iran as a state that allows Iraqi Shias to advance their own interests. Shia members of the Baath Party and the ICP tend to be more hostile to Iran and cynical of its concerns about religious affairs. Iraqi Shias who took refugee in or were deported to Iran still perceive themselves as Iraqis and remain bitter over being in Iran.

Second, Shias have no religious or confessional problem with their Sunni brethren. This, they argue, is a cultural issue with Arab Sunnis. Shias feel bitter against those who held and abused power, and see their problem as being with the government, and not with Sunnis as such. They wish to foster good relations with Sunnis and seek assurances against power abuse.

Third, Shia political groups differ in their political programs, but they all agree on the need for broad political participation and call for the protection of civil rights. Islamic groups in particular call for an elected government based on Islamic referendum and seek an alliance with Sunnis and Kurds to accomplish such an objective. Liberal, secular, and leftist groups advocate a temporal democratic system with a decentralized government. Arab nationalists and Baathists see the need for a reformed centralized government backed with national reconciliation.

Fourth, Islamists do not have clear-cut views on the future of the Kurds. During the INC meetings, ten different views were expressed from amongst Islamist delegates. Shia liberals and nationalists, and even some leftist elements, saw the need for an autonomous Kurdish region and did not object to its creation.

Fifth, all Shia constituents look to Iraq’s affiliation with Arab causes and concerns, but differ to the extent that such affiliations may compromise the country’s intrinsic interests. Nationalists pursue Arab unity, Islamists pursue Muslim unity and closer ties to Iran, and liberal and leftist groups focus on a purely Iraqi identity.

Finally, there is also a strong cynicism of, and resentment toward, American policy vis-â-vis Iraq. In particular, many Shias resent the sanctions, Washington’s obduracy toward the Iraqi population, and its inconclusive measures against Saddam Hussein. Shias do not object to the American regional policy even if the majority favors positive relations with the United States. Undoubtedly, Iran will continue to influence some of the Islamic groups, which might seek power by radicalizing public opinion against U.S. policies on Arab and Iraqi issues.

 The Political Future of the Shias

Shia communities are thus vulnerable and exposed to a wide range of influences. They face tough choices with serious consequences and have neither developed a political agenda nor identified a new political leadership. The most likely outcome is that they would go through a leadership crisis, which would be fulfilled by traditional clergymen in the short term. The marja' would be in a position to lead the community and restore a sense of direction. Nevertheless, it should come as no surprise if and when extreme and radical politics would flourish amongst Shias, during the transition period in Baghdad. The ICP and the IDP, for their part, would not be in a position to lead but they could be disruptive. Tribal leaders may well fill the power vacuum during any transition period in the south, and they would have the capacity to build bridges with Sunni elements, but in the long term, Shias would find—out of necessity—that it is in their best interests to reform the state and work within it.

* Conclusion

The two Gulf Wars, the United Nations sanctions, and the ruthlessness of Saddam Hussein's regime have all polarized Iraq's main communities—the Shias, the tribal Arab Sunnis, and the Kurds—along ethnic and confessional lines. The effects of this polarization are deep and irreversible, and will probably reshape both the roles of the state vis-â-vis Iraq's main communities and the country's inter-community relationships. Saddam Hussein's domestic policies, coupled with the decade-old sanctions regime, have weakened Iraq's national unity and identity, revived ethnic and religious sentiments, raised communal tensions, and undermined the role of the state.

What is truly undeniable is that relying on state institutions to benefit a minority of tribal Arab Sunnis, at the cost of Iraq's main communities—the Shias and the Kurds—has resulted in dire consequences. Saddam Hussein may survive sanctions or be survived by a relative in power, but ultimately the regime will face violent confrontations with the Shias and will make serious concessions and compromises. Irrespective of what eventually transpires in Baghdad, the Kurds will continue to maximize their returns, push for less central government, and seek constitutional concessions to and guarantees for their de facto autonomous region. The majority of Iraqis, including Shias, will settle for a broader political system and a centralized government. And tribal Arab Sunnis will most probably retain power through the military after they resist a larger share for Shias and Kurds in state affairs.

Today, Iraqi politics have been transformed, from those of competing ideologies to those that emphasize ethnic-tribal expediency. An entire generation of Iraqis no longer relates to traditional political parties and is influenced by foreign forces, communal rather than national interests, and even narrow perspectives.

The current deadlock in Iraq will surely end by either the revival of the regime or its breakdown. Either way, the prospects are bleak. Iraq's concerns may well be limited to its immediate needs for security and stability—rather than its long-term aspirations for democracy, development, or prosperity—but much of what will occur depends on existing institutions. The military and other state institutions are critical in ensuring stability, even if they cannot lead by force alone, or implement lasting reforms without the consent and cooperation of Shias and Kurds. If the regime can survive a change in its leadership, then it can carry out only reforms that would fall short of demands made by a majority of Iraqis. If Baghdad survives the bloody aftermath of the regime's removal, then it would either accommodate far-reaching reforms or risk fragmentation. Its chances for survival would then depend on the ability of Iraqi community leaders to reconcile existing differences. Can Iraqi Shia leaders, tribal Arab Sunni officials, and Kurdish chieftains agree on constitutional, state, and economic reforms? The prospects are indeed bleak, but many may well be prodded by their constituents to compromise and chart a new direction for the country.

 Chapter 6: The Military in Iraqi Politics

Andrew Parasiliti

Iraq’s military has been and remains the final arbiter of political power, the key to a regime’s survival or its demise. A legacy of military intervention underscores the lack of democratic institutions and processes in modern Iraqi politics and complicates the prospects for a democratic transition after Saddam Hussein. In order to draw the appropriate lessons from the past, political-military relations in modern Iraq should be understood in a broader historical context that takes into account the effects of ideology, colonialism, and dictatorship on Iraq’s political development.

This chapter examines the role that the military has played in modern Iraqi politics; the influence of ideology in shaping that role; civil-military relations under the Baath, including both Gulf Wars; and some concluding thoughts about what this might mean for Iraq’s military in the future.[102]

* Ideology and the Military in Modem Iraqi Politics

Arab nationalism has played an instrumental role in shaping the interventionist bent to Iraq’s military. The problem in civil-military relations in Iraq can be understood, in part, as a result of the influence of a powerful anti-colonial and pan-Arab ideology on a developing state with weak political institutions.[103]

The first decade of independence gave the Iraqi monarchy and the traditional ruling classes no quarter from the revolutionary ideologies and movements of the day. A close association with Britain, the mandatory power until Iraqi independence in 1932, diminished the Iraqi monarchy's credibility among many Iraqi and Arab nationalists. Furthermore, the radical and nationalist ideologies that swept both Europe and the Arab world during the inter-war period contained a strong element of militarism. Iraq's education system, the Military College, and associated institutions propagated these ideas among Iraq's youth. In turn, many young Iraqi nationalists proved receptive to a way of thinking that stressed both pan-Arab identity and animosity toward a "colonial" Britain.

A central figure in introducing these ideas into Iraq's national education program was Sami Shawkat, who served as director-general of education (1931–33: 1939; 1940) and minister of education (1940). Shawkat is well known for, among other things, his 1933 speech "The Manufacture of Death," in which he argued that the ability to cause and accept death in pursuit of pan-Arab ideals was the highest calling. He was a prominent member of the Muthanna Club, which sponsored many talks and lectures on pan-Arabism. Under Shawkat's guidance, the Iraqi education curriculum introduced military-style instruction, including uniforms for both teachers and students. In 1939, he instituted Al- Futuma, a paramilitary youth organization named after a social organization of the Abbasid caliph al-Nasir al-din Allah. Shawkat's promotion of a nationalist education system and vanguard youth organization foreshadowed the Popular Army and youth organizations of the Baath Party four decades later. [104]

The curriculum at Iraq's Military College, which opened its doors in 1924, reinforced the nationalist, and anti-British, pedagogical approach of Sami Shawkat and his associates. Although British and Iraqi officers taught the classes, and used British manuals translated into Arabic, young cadets became exposed to the radical and revolutionary Arab ideologies of the time. Tawfiq Husain, a lecturer in military history, indoctrinated young Iraqi military officers into the ways of Arab nationalism, Iraqi-style. Husain, who was educated in the Ottoman military system and had served in the Turkish army, encouraged an activist role for the military in Iraqi political affairs. He soon gathered a coterie of military officers around him weaned on nationalist doctrine. He influenced, among others, officers who supported both Bakr Sidqi and the “Four Colonels” who backed Rashid Ali in 1941.[105]

Over time, the pan-Arabism of Iraq’s educational and military systems encouraged an activist worldview centered on Arab unity, anti-imperialism (read anti-British), and the Palestinian issue. Young military officers and students of the period became indoctrinated in an ideology that challenged the pro-British inclination of the Iraqi monarchy and the pre-revolutionary era’s most formidable politician, General Nouri Al-Said. The nationalist, ideological bent of Iraq’s new officer classes eventually influenced both the Free Officer movement that overthrew the monarchy in 1958 and the Baath officers who took power in 1963 and 1968.

* The Assyrian Affair and Its Repercussions

The embryonic nature of Iraq’s political institutions, the increasing restlessness of its officers and students, and the weakness of the Iraqi monarchy ushered in the era of military interventions. King Faysal Fs death in September 1933 and the succession of Ghazi bin Faysal, his only son, to the throne signaled this new period in Iraqi politics. Ghazi had attended Iraq’s Military College and identified with the nationalist spirit there. He also laid Iraq’s first public and official claim to Kuwait.[106]

Ghazi had foreshadowed his nationalist inclinations during the “Assyrian affair” in the months prior to his ascension to the throne. Despite his general indifference to his responsibilities of governance, Crown Prince Ghazi had made known his disregard for Britain’s role in Iraqi politics and thereby earned himself a following among those officers and students advocating a more independent line in Iraq’s political affairs. Ghazi was a vocal advocate of the Assyrian campaign. The Assyrians were easy targets for nationalist provocateurs in both the government and the military. The architect of the eventual massacre was General Bakr Sidqi, who, though of Kurdish origin, espoused the demagogic nationalist rhetoric of the day.[107]

The Assyrian affair is noteworthy for three precedents that it set with regard to the role of the military in Iraq's politics.

First, it provided both the precedent and the raw material for the interventionist role that the army would eventually play in Iraqi politics. The government sought to capitalize on popular support for the Assyrian pogrom to expand the size and influence of the military, in the guise of containing possible threats in both the north and the south of the country. In fact, the Iraqi parliament passed the first mandatory conscription bill in 1934, against opposition from both tribal leaders and the British government. Soon thereafter the military became a career path for a generation of young men from all classes and regions of Iraq, who, concurrently, became exposed to the nationdist ideologies of the day. The advent of conscription broke down traditional bonds of loyalty based upon tribe and religion, replacing them with secular notions of national and, especially, pan-Arab identities. The ideological indoctrination of Iraq's officer class undermined the state-building role that militaries have traditionally played in developing some societies.

With conscription, "the military" could no longer be viewed as a "unitary actor" in Iraqi politics, as the armed forces became a favored institution for those of various ideological stripes committed to an independent and nationalist path for Iraq. Nationalists within the military included both the Iraq-first and panArab currents, a tension and schism that has colored Iraqi nationalist movements ever since. In addition to the nationalist parties, the Iraqi Communist Party also had its followers among Iraq's new officers.[108]

These developments allowed Bakr Sidqi to parlay his hero status and undertake the first military coup in Iraq in 1936, beginning a period of coups and counter-coups that ended in 1941, when British forces intervened to overtake the Rashid Ali government. Not surprisingly, General Sidqi soon faced chailenges of his own from competing nationalist quarters in Iraq's military, as well as from Nouri Al-Said, who waged his campaign against Bakr Sidqi from exile in Egypt. Bakr met an assassin's bullet less than a year after seizing power.

The second lesson from the Assyrian affair was that the popular support for the campaign displayed the depth ofanti-British sentiment in Iraq, as well as the centrality of anti-imperialism in Iraq’s Arab nationalist parties and movements. Fifteen years later, in 1948, Nouri Al-Said’s re-negotiation of the 1930 treaty with Britain, known as the Portsmouth Treaty, provoked the largest anti-regime demonstrations to date, the so-called watbah, or uprising, of 1948, which brought down the new cabinet.[109]

Third, the Assyrian affair set a precedent for the military’s role as guardian of Iraqi unity from domestic enemies, rather than neighboring powers. For here is where the army would have its most notable “successes,” such as the subsequent campaigns against the tribes of southern Iraq and the Kurds of the north. In a similar vein, another tragedy of the Assyrian affair is that it foreshadowed the tactics of a later era, portraying an act of political violence under the guise of nationalism as an anti-imperialist crusade. The precedent of “foreign enemies” necessitating extreme actions at home became an unfortunate and regular feature of Iraqi, and especially Baath, politics.[110]

The role played by ideology in the pre-revolutionary era cannot be emphasized enough. Political developments regarding the formation of the state of Israel and the question of Palestine further shaped the Iraqi outlook, and offered politicians several opportunities to thwart rivals, under the guise of adherence to a pan-Arab idea or cause. The defeat ofArab forces in the 1948 War intensified calls in certain ideological circles for greater Arab unity. Nationalist sentiments grew, particularly among young Iraqi and Arab officers, who blamed the Arab governments for the defeat in the war. The situation of Iraqi Jews also became increasingly untenable, in part because they became scapegoats for the economic duress caused by the conflict, and their exodus from Iraq began. The economic and political challenges of 1948–49 forced the imposition of martial law and the return of General Nouri, who took the opportunity to move against the Iraqi Communist Party, which he blamed for ongoing strikes and demonstrations.

* Civil-Military Relations under the Baath

The relationship between the Iraqi military and the Baath Party is complex and related in ways that are often overlooked. Despite well-documented conflicts, purges, and regular coup attempts, the Baath and the military draw from an interconnected nationalist background and experience. Indeed, the Baath Party could not have pulled off two coups and two wars without the cooperation and complicity of its members in Iraq's armed forces. Hanna Batatu suggests that the rise of Baath Party members in the military hailing from Tikrit (the hometown of Saddam Hussein and Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr, among others) has to do with the positioning of Tikriti men in the Royal Military Academy, and their ability, through their Party and family connections, to outlive rival parties and clans.[111]

Foreshadowing the events of five years hence, the Baath Party allied itself in 1963 with nationalist military figures to bring about the removal of Abdul-Karim Qassem from power. Although Staff Marshal Abdul Salam Aref ruled in title if not deed as president of the republic after the Baath coup, real power rested in the hands of Baath Party figures, especially Ali Saleh Al-Sadi and his colleagues from the civilian wing of the Party. Al-Sadi sought to curtail the Aref-military power base to give more weight to the National Guard. As many officers betrayed Nasserite leanings, a popularly based paramilitary force placed under the command of Colonel Munir al-Wandawi, a trusted officer-Baathist, was rapidly created and beefed up to act as a balancer. The Guard, which grew from a force of 5,000 in February to 34,000 by August 1963, challenged military officers and their authority, and its actions and abuses earned it a nefarious reputation. When political rivalries spilled into open conflict in November 1963, Aref, who had for a time stood a middle ground, finally called out his troops and put an end to the excesses of the Baath Party and its paramilitary wing. This swift action ended the short, brutal history of the first Baath regime.[112]

In reviewing the lessons learned from 1963, the Party articulated its troubled relationship with the military by blaming the demise of the first Baath regime on "a dominant rightist military aristocracy, cut off from the army, the people and the national movement."[113] Baathist ideology gave "urgent" priority to consolidating its leadership in the Iraqi military, purging "suspect elements," and integrating the "armed forces with the people's movement, directed by the Party, and [ensuring] its effective contribution to the revolutionary enterprise."[114] Toward this end, the Party "managed ... to install its own, very substantial and effective organization in the armed forces. Supervised by the Party leadership, it has played its part as an avant-garde."[115] The Baath regime also established the General Intelligence Directorate, composed of Party members and apparatchiks, to consolidate its power over internal police and security operations.

Once in power again in 1968, the Baath Party sought to subordinate the Iraqi military to the government, and keep it out of domestic politics. Toward that end, Iraqi leaders, led by then-vice president Saddam Hussein, sought to reduce the influence of military officers in Iraqi politics. What followed was a re-ordering of the Baath Party hierarchy, including the elimination of rivals and perceived rivals, including many of the old-guard Baathist officers who had been the backbone of the Party and the 1968 coup d'etat. The new regime stressed civilian leadership of the government and the Party, and looked to strategic tribal affiliations and patronage networks when staffing senior leadership posts. Immediately after the July 1968 coup, the Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) consisted entirely of military officers. By 1986, career officers played no significant role on the RCC, replaced by civilian party officials who owed their allegiance to Saddam Hussein.[116]

In 1970, the Baath Party transformed the National Guard into the Popular Army, which operated as a militia independently of the regular armed forces.[117] Four years later, Deputy Prime Minister and RCC member Taha Yassin Ramadan took over as its commander-in-chief. The Popular Army (also known as the People's Army or Party Militia) assumed responsibility for internal security, propagation of Baathist ideology, and protection of the regime from subversion by the regular armed forces. It included the Youth Vanguard, a paramilitary organization for secondary school students founded in 1975. By 1982, the Popular Army reportedly had 450,000 "active participants," both men and women, located in towns and villages throughout Iraq.[118]

The "Baathization" of Iraq's officer corps undermined morale and professionalism. Party apparatchiks in the armed services challenged traditional military lines of authority. In the late 1970s, the regime also set about purging Communist cells in the military as part of its brutal crackdown on the Iraqi Communist Party.

The Baath Party had thus recognized and implemented a strategy to deal with the dual roles of the armed forces: as a partner in achieving and holding onto power, and as an element of potential subversion against those in power.

Batatu argues that although the civilian wing of the Party sought and achieved primacy over the officer corps by the mid-1970s, it would be a mistake to view this as a zero-sum contest. Instead, despite the clear tensions in these competing wings of the Party, he perceives the civilian wing of the second Baathi regime as more, not less, reliant on the officer corps for maintaining power. He concludes that “so long as the Baath continues to be characterized by the insubstantiality of its ideological links and the volatility of its mass support, its ultimate reliance on the army is inescapable.”[119]

* Saddam Hussein and the Expansion of Iraqi Military Power

Saddam Hussein utilized Iraq’s oil wealth to fund an expansion of the Iraqi military’s size and capabilities, seeking to make the armed forces an instrument of his strategic ambitions. Iraqi governments had historically talked a good fight regarding pan-Arab ideals and interests, but performance hardly matched rhetoric in 1948, 1967, and 1973. The second Baath regime articulated a more elaborate and refined ideological position toward Iraq’s international and pan-Arab roles and responsibilities, but this time around, with expanded oil revenues after 1973, the regime set on a course to develop the economic and military capability to undertake a regional bid for dominance.

The ideological stance of the Baath emphasized what Ofra Bengio has labeled “three cycles of hostility,” all rooted in the revisionist pan-Arab politics that have come to define Iraqi regimes since the time of the monarchy. The first cycle focused on the Arab struggle against “imperialism,” both British and عجالآ The Central Education Program

(al-Minhaj al-Thaʕajɿ al-Markaxi), الآتاه- lished by the government in 1977, included a chapter on “The Arabs and Imperialism.” This official document stressed the need for Arab strategies to thwart Anglo-American bids to frustrate Arab unity and control the region’s oil resources.[120] The second cycle dealt with the Arab struggle against Israel and “Zionism,” which is of course linked to the struggle against imperialism; and the third on the threat from Iran, including Teheran’s alleged coordination with Israel in its presumed aggressive designs against Baghdad and the Arab world.[121]

The more elaborate and externally-focused worldview of the Baath coincided with an expansive economy. By 1980, Iraq had become OPEC’s second largest oil producer, its income from oil exports exceeding $26 billion. The Iraqi economy grew apace with the rise in oil export revenues. GNP per capita increased in real terms, from $729 in 1973 to 5,639 in 1979, before dipping to $4,465 in 1980.[122] Buoyed by positive economic developments, Saddam Hussein—who believed that a strong military was essential for Iraq to play a leading role in international relations—accelerated his ambitious programs. In a June 1975 speech, he stressed both “the decisive weight of... a solid economic base and an effective military capability” in Iraq’s regional role.[123] Between 1973 and 1980, Iraq’s annual military expenditures averaged 18.4 percent of GNP. The size of the armed forces in terms of military personnel increased from 105,000 in 1971 (1 percent of the total population) to an estimated 430,000 in 1980 (3.3 percent of the total population).[124]

Iraq also expanded and diversified its arms procurement policies at this time, as Saddam Hussein orchestrated the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation between Iraq and the Soviet Union in 1972. The treaty provided Baghdad with a valuable patron for arms supplies, military advice, and training. At the same time, Iraq cultivated France, Argentina, and several other countries to diversify sources of military technology and weaponry.

Iraq’s economic and military ties with the Soviet Union, France, and other Western powers played a vital role in another military priority—the development of nuclear, chemical, and biological weapons. In 1976, Iraq purchased the Tammuz 1 (Osiraq) nuclear reactor from France, in its quest for a leading role in regional affairs. Saddam Hussein determined that a regional role required a strategic capability to challenge Israel and Iran.

Given this strategic objective, Saddam Hussein sought to complement his expansion of the Iraqi military with major political initiatives within the region and, to a lesser extent, at home. In 1975, the then—vice president of Iraq negotiated the ·iers Agreement with Iran, to end Iranian —and by extension American and Israeli—support for a Kurdish insurrection in Iraq that had been consuming the military's time and resources. While the Iraqi leader described the decision as "bitter and grave," because of the perceived injustice of Iraq's territorial concessions to Iran, he also defended the treaty as vital, at the time, to Iraq's development and reconstruction. [125]

* Saddam Hussein and the Iranian Revolution

The Iranian revolution presented Saddam Hussein with a challenge to his regime's security and an opportunity to expand Iraq's power, with implications for the course of civil-military relations in Iraq.

The overthrow of the Shah and the coming to power of Iran's revolutionary government in 1979 ended the relative peace and stability that had existed between the two neighbors since the Algiers Agreement. Iran's revolutionary leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini supported and encouraged Islamist Opposition to Saddam Hussein's regime inside Iraq. Ayatollah Muhammad Bakr Al-Sadr, a distinguished and charismatic Iraqi cleric and jurist, galvanized Shia-based opposition to Saddam Hussein in the late 1970s. Not surprisingly, the Iraqi regime responded with customary brutality, arresting, executing, and expelling thousands of Iraqi Shias. In April 1980, Saddam Hussein ordered the execution of Bakr Al-Sadr and the ayatollah's sister, the Islamic feminist Bint Al-Huda, as part of a severe crackdown on regime opponents. Simultaneously, Teheran's military and revolutionary units engaged in border skirmishes with Iraqi forces, and re-established ties with various Kurdish opposition groups in northern Iraq.

Against this background, Saddam Hussein sensed opportunity, while perceiving a threat emanating from Islamic Iran to his regime's security. He came to believe that the revolutionary government in Iran was fragile, and that a decisive military blow would end the revolutionary challenge once and for all. By attacking and defeating Iran, the Iraqi president could establish full Iraqi sovereignty over the Shatt al-Arab waterway dividing the two countries, reversing what was agreed to in Algiers. Finally, a victory over Iran would secure Iraq's place atop the Arab order, and leave it the preeminent power in the Persian Gulf. To peddle its design, the Baath regime cast its conflict with Iran as a pan-Arab obligation, claiming that Baghdad was the eastern flank of the Arab frontline against combined "Persian" and Israeli efforts to thwart pan-Arab ambitions.[126] Offering yet another justification for this ill-fated decision for war, Tariq Aziz posited that Iraq's experience in the war with Iran "providefd] the Iraqi Army with the qualitative experience needed for the next battle against the Zionist enemy."[127]

The war with Iran dramatically influenced the course of civil-military relations in Iraq. The Baath Party credited the war for the emergence of a "deep, strong and creative Iraqi nationalism ... for the first time linked to the Arab nationalist bond. "[128] That war plays a vital role in the development of nationalism is a common theme in the international relations literature dealing with state development and evolution. Raymond Aron wrote that "nations have rarely achieved an expression of their will as states without the intercession of force. "[129] In observing the situation in Iraq, Frederick w. Axelgard hypothesized that the war with Iran might have indeed contributed to a "potential transformation of political-military relations" in Baghdad because it forced the military into a newfound role: to defend the country against a foreign enemy, rather than to meddle in domestic politics. [130] Not surprisingly, the increase in the military's size and capabilities that began in the 19705 continued and expanded during the eight-year conflict. Furthermore, that Iraq's Shia community stood and fought, and did not cut and run, signaled to Axelgard and other observers that "the war has probably exerted a decisive, consolidating influence on Iraqi politics by cementing the national loyalty of Iraq's Shi'is."[131]

While the experience of war with Iran led to greater civilian control of the Iraqi military, the tension between Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi professional officer class worsened, rather than improved, as a result of the war with Iran. The Iraqi president regularly dominated the decision-making process regarding the conduct of battlefield operations, with less than glorious results, while purging and executing those senior officers deemed incompetent or disloyal. The resulting fear of retribution from above hindered the performance of the military, especially early on in the war. Reports of attempted coups and assassinations originating from the military against Saddam Hussein surfaced during and after the war, as did the subsequent purges and executions that would follow. Setbacks on the battlefield encouraged Saddam Hussein to give his generals more decision-making authority in the final years of the war, leading to some improvements in performance and adaptability in Iraq's military campaigns against Iran.[132] When celebrating Iraq's successful military campaigns against Iran, however, Saddam Hussein made sure that the final credit was his alone, reminding one of Edward Gibbon's observation that the first Caesars were not "disposed to suffer that those triumphs which their indolence neglected should be usurped by the conduct and valor of their lieutenants. The military fame of a subject was considered as an insolent invasion of the Imperial prerogative."[133]

That Iraq won the Iran-Iraq War also requires qualification. The eight-year war, started by Iraq, set back, rather than enhanced, Iraq's economic power and regional standing. The economic and human cost of the war signaled a decline in Iraq's power relative to its Gulf neighbors and rivals. This awareness of relative decline influenced Saddam Hussein's decision to invade Kuwait in 1990). After the war, Iraqi military officers and servicemen returned home to a broken economy with high unemployment. There appeared no "peace dividend" for Iraq's sacrifices. The Arab Gulf states, for example, were loath to recognize Iraq as preeminent Gulf power based upon Iraq's military sacrifices.

On another score, Saddam Hussein sought to use military power to solve the Kurdish problem in Iraq once and for all. Here, as in the Assyrian affair and the Kurdish insurgency of 1974–75, the army played its role as guardian of Iraqi unity against enemies from within the state. That both leading Kurdish opposition groups—the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan and the Kurdistan Democratic Party—had sided with Iran by 1986 allowed the regime to raise questions about the overall loyalty of Iraqi Kurds to the Iraqi state. In February 1988, the Baath government launched a brutal counter-insurgency military campaign, the Anfal (or “spoils”), against the Kurds, replete with village destruction, use of chemical weapons, and forced resettlement of Kurdish citizens.[134] Human Rights Watch/Middle East estimated that Iraqi forces destroyed 2,000 Kurdish villages and caused the disappearance of as many as 200,000 Kurds, most of them civilians. When asked about the regime’s complicity in the Kurdish disappearances, Ali Hassan Al-Majid, secretary-general of the Northern Bureau of the Iraqi Baath Socialist Party and paternal cousin of Saddam Hussein, replied: “It couldn’t have been more than 100,000.”[135]

In the context of the complicated experience of prosecuting the war with Iran, including the developments and setbacks in civil-military relations and the qualified nature of the Iraqi victory, the Iraqi military had again turned its attention to the matter of defending the state from enemies within, prosecuting the anti-insurgency campaign against the Kurds with infamous ferocity.

* Saddam Hussein and the War for Kuwait

The second Gulf War raises further questions about the position of the Iraqi military in a post-Saddam transition. First, Iraq’s professional military leaders appear to have played marginal roles in the decisions that led to the invasion of Kuwait and the subsequent confrontation with United Nations coalition forces. After the Iran-Iraq War, Saddam Hussein’s decision-making circle had narrowed even further, granting pride of place to those trusted insiders, such as Husayn Kamil Al-Majid and Ali Hassan Al-Majid, whose loyalty was reinforced by family ties and tribal networks. Professional military officers, for the most part, were on the outside looking in, although the Republican Guard, the most elite and formidable branch of Iraq’s armed forces, assumed greater prominence and, correspondingly, increased responsibility for regime security. Prior to and during the war, Iraqi generals had little opportunity for honest consultation and advice; Saddam Hussein countenanced no dissenting view. They prosecuted the war against the U.S.-led international coalition as best they could, given both the failings of Iraq’s political leadership and the overwhelming superiority of American and coalition technology and military power.[136]

Second, the actions of Iraq’s armed forces after the war both reinforces and complicates the military’s legacy. The anti-regime rebellions in 14 of 18 Iraqi provinces following the Gulf War included many bitter and aggrieved soldiers returning from the front lines. But it was the Republican Guard, the best trained and most loyal of Iraq’s military, which ruthlessly crushed the rebellions in both northern and southern Iraq. The actions of both rebellious soldiers and loyalist troops reflect the paradox of the military as both enemy and guardian of the Baath regime.

Third, whatever role Iraq’s commanders may have played in the decisions that led to war, the military suffered a devastating blow to Iraq’s sovereignty that included the loss of control over most of Iraqi Kurdistan, the establishment of no-fly zones in the north and south of the country, and the introduction of United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) weapons inspectors, who, from 1992 to 1998, documented and destroyed the major share of Iraq’s proscribed non-conventional weapons systems.

As has been documented elsewhere, the cycle of mistrust between Saddam Hussein and the military continues, with reported coups and assassination attempts coming from within the armed forces, followed by the predictable purges and executions. In 1996, Saddam Hussein foiled a u.ş.-backed coup attempt by Iraqi military officers that included members of the elite special Republican Guard, the General Security Service, and the Republican Guard. In response, and since the 1991 Gulf War, Saddam Hussein has undertaken a series of measures to make his regime as secure as possible from military coups.[137]

* Conclusion

The Iraqi military continues to be the key to Saddam Hussein’s survival and the best hope for his departure. This seemingly contradictory yet self-evident observation means that after Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi military remains the primary arbiter of Iraq’s political future, as it has been throughout the country’s modern history. Saddam Hussein’s policies of intrigue, reward, and punishment have not resolved the dilemma of all modern Iraqi governments regarding the military's role in Iraq's domestic politics.

That said, the Baath Party's relationship with the military has been interrelated in ways that are often overlooked, a kind of "can't live with them, can't live without them" approach to politics. The Baath could not have engineered two coups and prosecuted two wars in the absence of an alliance with partners in the military. At the same time, the experience of both Gulf Wars deepened the hostility and mistrust between the Baath Party and the armed forces, while increasing the degree of civilian control over the military.

The challenges of a democratic transition in Iraq are greater because of the legacy of Baath rule and the complicated role of the military in modern Iraqi politics. In thinking about any post-Saddam scenario, the Iraqi military appears as the most likely agent of political change. While it may be difficult to foresee the political dispositions of future military figures, it is not hard to imagine a post-Saddam scenario that involves a military leader, a contender for power, who portrays himself and his followers as the guardians of Iraqi sovereignty and unity. The resolution to the problem of civil-military relations in Iraqi politics will therefore come only in the context of an eventual democratic transition and with the establishment of institutions and mechanisms that allow for both popular participation in Iraqi politics and the peaceful transfer of power. The transition in Iraq from dictatorship to democracy will not take place overnight. However, once these institutions and mechanisms are in place, the military may assume its proper role as defender of the country's borders, rather than as a power broker or partner in the intrigues of regime-minded politicians.

[102] An earlier version of this chapter appeared as Andrew Parasiliti and Sinan Antoon, "Friends in Need, Foes to Heed: The Iraqi Military in Politics," Middle East Policy 7:4, October 2000, pp. 130–140. Some of the material in this chapter is also adapted from Andrew T. Parasiliti, Iraq's War Decisions, Ph.D. dissertation, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University, 1998.

[103] On the role of the military in developing countries, see Samuel p. Huntington, Political Order in Changing Societies, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1968), pp. 192–263.

[104] Samir al-Khalil, Republic of Fear: The Politics of Modern Iraq, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989, pp. 177–79.

[105] SttkteviS. Slmib, Iraq Between the Two World Wars’.Tie Creation and Implementation 0꞉ a Nationalist Ideology, New York: Columbia University Press, 1986, pp. 127–30.

[106] See David Finnie, Shifting Lines in the Sand: Iraq’s Elusive Frontier with Kuwait, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1992, especially pp. 106–13.

[107] Stephen Hemsley Longrigg, Iraq, 1900 to 195O:A Political, Social, and Economic History, London: Oxford University Press, 1956, pp. 229–37; and R. s. Stafford, The Tragedy of the Assyrians, London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd., 1935, especially pp. 159–81.

[108] See the relevant sections of Hanna Batatu, The Old Social Classes and the Revolutionary Movements of Iraq: A Study of Iraq’s Old Ided and Commercial Classes and of its Communists, Baathists, and Free Officers, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978.

[109] The events surrounding the Portsmouth Treaty and the uprising of 1948 are discussed in Phebe Marr, The Modern History of Iraq, Boulder: Westview Press, 1985, pp. 101–6; and Batatu, op. cit., pp. 545–66.

[110] Al-Khalil, op. cit., pp. 166–76.

[111] Batatu, op. cit., pp. 1088—93.

[112] On the first Baath regime, see ibid.,pp. 1003–26.

[113] . The 1968 Revolution in Iraq: Experience and Prospects: The Political Report of the Eighth Congress of the Arab Baath Socialist Party in Iraq, January 1974, London: Ithaca Press, 1979, p. 103.

[114] Ibid.,p. 103.

[115] Ibid.,p. 105.

[116] Isam al-Khafaji, “War as a Vehicle for the Rise and Demise of a State-Controlled Society: The Case of Ba’thist Iraq,” in Steven Heydemann, ed., War, Institutions and Social Change in the Middle East, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2000, pp. 267–8: and Amatzia Baram, “The Ruling Political Elite in Baathi Iraq, 1968–1986: The Changing Features of a ColXeaive ProfAe,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 2A·A١\I>,pp• لو—٢٦رە

[117] Arab Baath Socialist Party, Iraq, The Central Report of the Ninth Regional Congress, June 1982, Baghdad:January 1983, pp. 204–9 (translated by SARTREC, Lausanne, Switzerland).

[118] The estimates of active members are from Christine Helms, Iraq: Eastern Flank of the Arab World, Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1984, pp. 99—100, based upon her interview with ةاألا1لةةاأل لآةلافآ. The Central Report of the Ninth Regional Congress, June 1982, dtts ة ًلالع١لآح of “120,000 fighters” involved in the battle with Iran; see op. cit., p. 207; see also al-Khalil, op. cit., pp. 29–33.

[119] Batatu, op. cit.,p. 1079.

[120] Ofra Bengio, Saddam’s Word: Political Discourse in Iraq, New York: Oxford University Press, 1998, pp. 12734.

[121] Ibid.,pp. 134–45.

[122] U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, variOUS issues.

[123] Saddam Hussein, “The National Potential and International Politics,” On Iraq and International Politics, Baghdad: Translation and Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1981, p. 17.

[124] U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, variOUS issues.

[125] See Saddam Hussein’s speech on the eve of Iraq’s invasion of Iran in Baghdad Domestic Service, translated in Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: Middle East and North Africa, 18 September 1980, p. E4.

[126] For an official Iraqi articulation of this idea, see Saad al-Bazzaz, Gulf War: The Israeli Connection (translated by Namir Abbas Mudhaffer), Baghdad: Dar Al-Ma’mun, 1989.

[127] Tariq Aziz, Iraq-Iran Conflict: Questions and Discussion, London: Third World Center, 1981, p. 44.

[128] The Central Report of the Ninth Regional Congress, op. cit., p. 40.

[129] Raymond Aron, Peace and War: A Theory of International Relations, Malabar, Florida: Robert E. Krieger Publishing Co., 1981, p. 355.

[130] Frederick w. Axelgard, A New Iraq? The Gulf War and Implications for U.S. Policy, New York and Washington, D.C.: Praeger and the Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1988, pp. 48–55.

[131] Ibid.,p. 29.

[132] See Anthony H. Cordesman and Abraham R. Wagner, The Lessons of Modern War, Volume II:The Iran-Iraq War, Boulder: Westview Press, 1990, pp. 412–13.

[133] Edward R. Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, London: Penguin, 1980, p. 29.

[134] The best account of the Anfal is in Human Rights Watch/Middle East, Iraq’s Crime of Genocide: The Anfal Campaign Against the Kurds, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1995.

[135] Cited in ibid.,p. 230.

[136] For an account of the role of the military in Iraqi politics prior to and during the Gulf War, see Saad al-Bazzaz, The Generals are the Last to Know?, 2d Arabic ed., London: DarAl-Hikma, 1996.

[137] See Andrew Cockburn and Patrick Cockburn, Out of the Ashes: The Resurrection of Saddam Hussein, New York: HarperCollins, 1999, pp. 218–30; and Amatzia Baram, BuildingToward Crisis: Saddam Husayn’s Strategy for Survival, Washington, DC.: The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1998, pp. 47–9.

 The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia

 Chapter 7: Assessing Saudi Susceptibiiity to Revolution

Mark N. Katz

An anti-Western revolution in Saudi Arabia would have severe negative consequences for the West, as the Kingdom possesses more proven petroleum reserves than any other country in the world. Indeed, the Saudi government has closely cooperated with the West in economic, political, and military affairs, and the United States has greatly benefited from its close partnership with the Kingdom ever since the discovery of oil there in the first part of the twentieth century. In fact, the strength and duration of Saudi-American cooperation has been remarkable, considering the many anti-American political movements and governments that have risen up during this period in the Middle East.

Should the Saudi monarchy ever be overthrown and replaced by an antiWestern revolutionary regime, several negative consequences might quickly arise. First and foremost, the price of oil could rise dramatically. Second, the vulnerability of pro-Western governments in the smaller Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) states—Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates (UAE), and Oman—would increase immediately, further driving up the price of oil if they too were overthrown. Third, a prolonged dramatic oil price increase would cause a worldwide economic crisis that could give rise to instability in many countries, which an economically weakened West would be hard-pressed to deal with.

Revolution in Saudi Arabia, then, is something that Western governments—along with the Saudi monarchy itself—understandably wish to prevent. But how susceptible to revolution is Saudi Arabia? On the one hand, Saudi Arabia seems more stable now than it was during the heyday ofArab nationalism in the 19505 and 1960s, or in the wake of either the 1979 Islamic fundamentalist revolution in Iran or the 1990–91 conflict with Iraq. If the Saudi monarchy could survive all these traumatic events, why shouldn't it continue to survive, especially in calmer circumstances?

Perhaps it can. However, the history of the twentieth century showed that non-democratic regimes are inherently unstable, displaying a marked tendency to fall sooner or later. Although the Saudi monarchy has avoided this fate to date, can it reasonably be expected to continue doing so? The question appears to be especially relevant to the Kingdom considering that absolute monarchy— the type of government in Saudi Arabia—has almost disappeared over the past two and a quarter centuries, a seemingly inexorable trend if ever there was one!

Although it would be a difficult task even under the best of circumstances, assessing the Kingdom's vulnerability is an assignment made all the more difficult by the opaqueness and secretiveness of Saudi politics• One possible means to compensate for this difficulty is to apply some of the theoretical literature on revolution to what is known about Saudi Arabia.

There are, of course, many contending theories of revolution, which focus on different factors as either the most important cause or determinant of it. [138] The purpose of this chapter is not to engage in the ongoing debate among proponents of these theories about which of them should take precedence, but to examine, instead, the implications of several theories with regard to Saudi Arabia.

Among the different theories of revolution that will be looked at here are those that focus on state breakdown, the nature of the opposition, the mobilization potential of the opposition, external intervention, democratization and revolution, and the internal military factor. It is, of course, impossible to predict whether revolution will actually occur in Saudi Arabia. Still, the analysis presented here may provide some indication of the extent to which the Kingdom appears to be (or not to be) susceptible to revolution.

* State Breakdown

The most influential perspective on revolution over the past two decades has been theorization focusing on the process of “state breakdown.” According to this perspective, examining why opposition movements become strong is less important than analyzing why the power of the state declines. According to Theda Skocpol (one of the pioneers of the state breakdown theory of revolution), potential revolutionaries are always present. They are not able to achieve much, though, when the state they seek to overthrow is strong. It is only when the state becomes gravely weakened that it becomes vulnerable to overthrow by revolutionary movements. Skocpol further emphasizes that it is not the activity of revolutionary movements that leads to the weakening of the state; they are not sufficiently strong on their own to accomplish this. State breakdown results, instead, because of problems that are far more difficult for a regime to deal with effectively than the suppression of opposition movements. The breakdown of the state, then, is something revolutionaries do not cause themselves but take advantage of when it occurs.[139]

What is it that causes state breakdown? In Skocpol’s case studies, the ancien regime was drawn primarily from an elite social class. Although Marxist analysis claims that the state is the instrument of the predominant class, Skocpol observed that while individuals running the states she examined were drawn from a predominant social class, the state itself had interests separate from that class. It is when the interests of the state and the elite diverge sufficiently sharply, Skocpol argued, that state breakdown can occur.[140] Skocpol herself saw this process occurring in predominantly traditional, agrarian societies, and thus not as something likely to occur in more modern, urban ones.[141] Other scholars analyzed how this process occurred in more urban settings.[142]

What could cause a sharp divergence between the state and the social class it was drawn from? Skocpol saw international military “pressures and opportunities” as an important cause of this phenomenon for two reasons. First, the state may engage in foreign conflict to the extent that this drains away domestic resources, thus undermining the strength of the hitherto dominant social class. Second, a state may respond to threats from abroad by attempting socioeconomic reforms, which strengthen it but weaken the dominant social class.[143] Resenting the ruler already, the elite resists increased taxes to the extent they fall on it (which they necessarily must if less privileged sectors of society are already “taxed to the max”). As the situation deteriorates, disaffected elites might attempt to thwart the ruler or seize power themselves through exploiting the long-standing grievances of non-elite segments of society, which, once aroused, may be impossible for disaffected elites to control.

An alternative, and in many ways more precise, state breakdown theory of revolution was articulated by Jack Goldstone. According to Goldstone, revolution is most likely to occur in countries experiencing rapid population growth that are unable to adequately respond to the challenges this poses due to decline in state capacity, elite conflicts, and mass mobilization potential.[144] According to Goldstone, it was this combination of circumstances that led to revolution in early modern Europe and in many countries of the contemporary developing world.[145] To be sure, the rapid growth of the non-elite population has negative consequences in Goldstone’s model, but the rapid growth of the elite population has even more serious ones. In a country where it is primarily the state that employs and provides transfer payments to the elite, a crisis is inevitable when the ranks of the elite are growing but the discretionary resources available to the state are either stagnant or shrinking. If conflict erupts among the elite and order breaks down, a revolutionary situation will then emerge.[146]

Are any of the elements that the theories of Skocpol or Goldstone see as leading to state breakdown present now in Saudi Arabia?[147] Some, indeed, either appear to be present or may be in the process of developing.

Since the dramatic 1973 rise in oil prices, the Kingdom has maintained an ambitious spending program, which has included outsized expenditures on military hardware, expensive development projects, an extensive social welfare system, and massive transfer payments to the large ruling family. Riyadh has relied primarily on oil revenues to fund its expenditures, but these revenues have experienced downward pressure, due to the sustained decline in the price of oil occurring in the 1980s and throughout much of the 19905. Although it has cut expenditures, the Kingdom's outlays have been greater than its revenues for several years. Some of these stubbornly high expenditures stemmed from the heavy cost of expelling Iraqi forces from Kuwait in 1991 as well as subsequent military expenditures aimed at deterring another Iraqi attack. While cutbacks have been made, Saudi Arabia has maintained high levels of social welfare expenditure on its rapidly expanding population—a price that the monarchy appears to see as necessary for maintaining social peace.[148] Accurate figures are not available on how much of Saudi income goes to the ever-growing ruling family. Whatever amount—undoubtedly substantial—goes to the Al Saud, nevertheless, is obviously unavailable to be spent on the non-royal population, whose standard of living appears to have stagnated or even declined in recent years.[149]

As a result of its expenditures being chronically greater than its revenues for the past two decades, the Kingdom has run up a massive budget deficit.[150] Although oil prices rose dramatically in 2000, it is doubtful that these can be SUStained for long because the discovery of large quantities of oil in areas previously inaccessible to the West, such as the Caspian basin, is adding pressure on traditional oil exporters. Saudi Arabia's long-term financial situation, then, appears unlikely to improved.[151] Moreover, pumping significantly more oil for export is counterproductive in a glutted market where other producers can do the same, resulting in lower oil prices. Nor does the Kingdom appear willing to risk altering the tacit "no taxation, no representation" compact it has with its citizens, for fear that demands for the former will lead to demands for the latter.[152]

As far as conflict among the elite is concerned, there does appear to be a growing lack of "suitable positions," especially ones with real authority, for the ever-increasing number of princes. One of the reigning norms among Saudi princes is that “those with and without jobs are entitled to equal respect.”[153] As the number of royal aspirants per position increases, whichever branch of the family holds the kingship may come to have increasing significance, due to the king’s ability to favor his own branch, up to now, succession to the throne has generally passed to the “eldest able” sons of Saudi Arabia’s founder, King Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman Al Saud. Determining who this is, of course, could easily become contentious. And as Abdul Aziz’s remaining sons age, succession will, at some point, have to pass outside this group—most likely to one of the founder’s grandsons. There are many of these, however. The choice of any one could leave competing branches highly dissatisfied, especially if they fear their permanent exclusion from the succession process.[154] This is the sort of conflict among the elite that, if allowed to get out of hand, could lead to state breakdown.

This is not to say, however, that Saudi Arabia is at present anywhere near experiencing the sort of state breakdown that could lead to revolution. What is being argued here instead is that some of the factors Goldstone identified as leading to state breakdown, including rapid population growth and the inability of the state to match revenues with the mounting expenditures it has led to, are currently present in Saudi Arabia. Moreover, the conflict within the elite that Skocpol and Goldstone both see as part of this process also appears increasingly likely. The factors Skocpol and Goldstone identified as leading to state breakdown appear to be getting stronger, not weaker, in Saudi Arabia.

* The Nature of the Opposition

Some theories of revolution see opposition activity as playing a far more important role in bringing about revolution than state breakdown theories of revolution suggest.[155] Yet, even assuming that the state breakdown approach is valid, studying the role of the opposition is important, since it is the opposition—or, more accurately, some part of it—that will shape the new regime if revolution successfully topples the old one. And while the opposition to the Saudi monarchy may be weaker now than in the aftermath of the 1991 Gulf War—as a front-page article in the Washington Post enthusiastically reported in January 2000—this perspective suggests that if state breakdown occurs, a much stronger revolutionary opposition will arise.[156]

Under the circumstances, what is the nature of the opposition that might arise in Saudi Arabia, if conditions were ripe? The question is important, since it is not so much any attachment to the Saudi monarchy—whose undemocratic government is repugnant to Western values, if not Western interests—as it is fear of what might replace it that makes revolution in the Kingdom such a frightening prospect. The reason this is so, of course, is due to Western fear that, unlike several countries where a strong pro-Western democratic opposition came to power through revolution in the past two decades, revolution in Saudi Arabia would result in the rise to power of anti-Western undemocratic forces.

Indeed, this fear appears to be well founded. From what is known about the Saudi opposition, it overwhelmingly consists of anti-democratic Islamic "fundamentalists," angry with the West for propping up the Saudi monarchy and similar pro-Western Arab regimes (which they believe the West controls), as well as for supporting Israel. This is amply documented in Mamoun Fandy's thorough study on the ideology of leading Saudi opposition figures.[157]

It may be worth noting that while democracy may have replaced its nondemocratic rivals as the political system that most of the rest of the world regards as ideal, this does not appear to be true in the Arab world. There, authoritarian political ideologies, particularly "Islamic fundamentalism," appear to be genuinely popular. Still, as NazihAyubi has argued, "the more Irans and Sudans you get, the less impressive and appealing the Islamists' call will become."[158] Like their developing-world "Marxist" counterparts—fighting against colonial or rightwing regimes during the Cold War era—who ignored all evidence of the political and economic failure of Marxism-Leninism where it was in power, "Islamic fundamentalist" opponents of pro-Western (or secular anti-Western) dictatorships in the Middle East are either oblivious to, blame the West for, or otherwise explain away the glaring failures of existing "fundamentalist" regimes.[159] Whether or not one regards state breakdown theories of revolution as valid, it appears that the most active opposition movements at present in Saudi Arabia are anti-Western, “Islamic fundamentalist” ones. Nor does this appear likely to change in the foreseeable future.

* Mobilization Potential of the Opposition

Even more important than the existence of revolutionary opposition movements is, as Charles Tilly has argued, their mobilization potential.[160] It is first of all necessary to say something about the circumstances under which individuals support revolutionary opposition movements. Those who engage in revolutionary activity incur enormous risks, including imprisonment, severe injury, and death. While there may be a few risk-tolerant zealots willing to engage in revolutionary activity at any time, most people are risk averse and will not do so except under two extraordinary circumstances. The first arises when people are being oppressed so severely —that is, when they are being imprisoned, injured, or killed anyway—that engaging in revolutionary activity is either no more or actually less risky than not engaging in it. This, for example, is the circumstance that the Kosovar Albanians were placed in by the Serbs, and the Chechens by the Russians. The second such circumstance arises when the risks normally involved in engaging in revolutionary activity decline due to a reduction in the ancien regimes ability or willingness to impose these risks on its opponents. The failure of the state to use force against its opponents, of course, is one of the most important stages in state breakdown (how it can occur will be discussed below). As the success of the revolution appears increasingly likely, the potential benefits of “joining the winning side” held out by the revolutionary opposition may appear increasingly attractive to large segments of the population with grievances against the ancien regime.[161]

Neither of these two circumstances is now present in Saudi Arabia. But if either or, perhaps, a combination of both ever are, then the possibility of mass mobilization would arise. Several scholars have noted that revolutionary opposition groups frequently attempt to mobilize support by promising to improve the status of hitherto deprived groups.[162] Saudi opposition groups, of course, could seek to mobilize support in this manner too. The question, then, is: Are there dissatisfied groups in the Kingdom that opposition movements could draw upon for support?

There appear to be four such possible groups: 1) non-royal Saudis; 2) nonSaudi Arabs; 3) non-Saudi Muslims; 4) non-Muslim non-Saudis. Each of these groups has reason to resent the Saudi monarchy. Non-royal Saudis (Hejazis, Asiris, Shias) have virtually no say in their government and, undoubtedly, resent the diversion of so much of its oil income to the large—and largely unproductive—ruling family.[163] Gwenn Okruhlik has vividly described the harsh conditions endured by the non-Western foreign workforce in Saudi Arabia.[164] Furthermore, there appears to be a strong sense among many non-Saudi Arabs that this country, including the two holy cities as well as its vast oil wealth, is the common property of all Arabs and not just the Saudi ruling family.[165] Thus, elements of each of these might well see rebellion against the monarchy as both desirable and advantageous, under conditions of state breakdown.

Given the “Islamic fundamentalist” political ideology of Saudi opposition groups, the fourth group—non-Muslim non-Saudis—is not one they are likely to even try to mobilize. Indeed, the expulsion of this group may well be a goal that helps to mobilize and unite the others. “Islamic fundamentalism,” nevertheless, is an ideology that could help overcome divisions among Muslims, forging an alliance among non-royal Saudis, non-Saudi Arabs, and non-Saudi Muslims—an alliance that could potentially be quite powerful.

It must be emphasized, though, that disaffection among the deprived by itself is not a sufficient condition for revolution. Although they suffered mightily because of it, the over 750,000 Yemenis ordered out of the Kingdom in 1990 had no choice but to comply. Nor were there any other groups—Saudi or non-Saudi—that were willing to defend or champion them. Opposition mobilization is extremely difficult if disaffection among the elite and/or state breakdown has not occurred.

 External Intervention

Just because powerful revolutionary opposition movements come into being, of course, does not mean that they are destined to succeed. They can be thwarted. One possible means of doing so is through external military intervention, which could probably be undertaken in this case only by the United States, either alone or in conjunction with other Western powers.

As is well known, externally mounted counter-insurgency efforts to suppress revolutionary opposition forces have proven to be costly failures in several instances, including the French interventions in Indochina and Algeria, the American one in Indochina, the Soviet one in Afghanistan, and the first post-Soviet Russian intervention in Chechnya.[166] On the other hand, externally mounted counter-insurgency efforts have succeeded in several instances, such as the British interventions in Greece, Malaya, and Oman.[167] Furthermore, the U.S.-led military operations resulting in the expulsion of Iraqi forces from Kuwait in 1991 and Serbian forces from Kosovo in 1999 hold out the prospect of rapid successful intervention elsewhere.[168]

Despite this history, what are the prospects for a successful American-led military intervention to suppress revolution in Saudi Arabia? There are many imponderables and at least one huge assumption—namely, that revolution in Saudi Arabia will break out—that make addressing this question extremely difficult. Should revolution break out in the Kingdom, however, this is a question that policymakers will have to address despite several imponderables, and so it is worth attempting to address it here.

Besides specific circumstances that cannot be foreseen under which revolutionary activity may grow serious enough to raise the question of whether external intervention should be undertaken to suppress it, there are two related factors affecting the probable success of any U.S.-led military intervention in Saudi Arabia to prevent revolution there. These are: first, the willingness of the American public to support such an intervention and, second, the effect of such an intervention on the political dynamics of the country it would occur in.

To be sure, the U.S. experience in Indochina as well as the belief in the existence of a “Vietnam syndrome” arising from it suggests that the American publie would not be willing to support a long-term, costly intervention that does not succeed. On the other hand, the U.S. experience in both Kuwait and Kosovo illustrates that the American public would support, or at least tolerate, a short-term albeit costly military intervention that succeeds rapidly. As Bruce Jentleson put it, the American public is “pretty prudent”; it supports interventions that appear to have a reasonable prospect of rapid success (especially where it sees the stakes involved as significant) and opposes those that do not (especially where it sees the stakes involved as marginal). The type of military intervention that the American public appears least willing to undertake is an open-ended commitment aimed at propping up an unpopular dictatorial regime against its internal opponents.[169] What this implies for the willingness of the American public to support U.S. military intervention against revolutionary forces in Saudi Arabia is ambiguous. The public undoubtedly recognizes that Saudi Arabia is important to the global economy. On the other hand, the public may be less than enthusiastic about the prospect of losing American lives to protect the Saudi ruling family against its own people. And as occurred vis-â-vis Indochina,[170] initial public support for intervention can erode if the intervention is not seen to be successful.

This leads US to a consideration of the effect of external intervention on the country in which it occurs—a factor that has an important impact on whether external intervention succeeds or fails. In his comparative study of several revolutionary struggles waged by guerrilla forces, Timothy Lomperis concluded that the most important factor determining whether external intervention against them succeeds or fails is the effect of the external intervention on the legitimacy of both the regime it seeks to defend and the revolutionary forces opposed to it. Both the French and American interventions in Vietnam, for example, served to undermine the legitimacy of the regimes they sought to defend and to burnish the nationalist credentials of the Vietnamese communists. In Malaya, by contrast, the fact that the revolutionary opposition was drawn from an ethnic minority (the Chinese), combined with the promise of independence, served to legitimize British military intervention with the Muslim Malay majority.[171]

Importantly, assessing the potential impact of a U.S.-led military intervention to protect the Saudi monarchy is made somewhat easier by the fact that one has already occurred, in 1991. What was amazing about this experience was the extremely negative reaction by significant elements within Saudi Arabia to the presence of Western troops, even though they were there to defend the Saudi monarchy, whatever its faults, from being overthrown by what was widely known to be the far, far worse regime of Iraq's brutal dictator, Saddam Hussein.[172] Moreover, this experience also suggests that a U.S.-led intervention to protect the Saudi monarchy against its internal opponents would probably lead to an even more negative reaction than the one that occurred in 1990–91 against an external threat. Indeed, a strong U.S. role in defending the monarchy against "Islamic fundamentalist" revolutionaries could be expected to severely de-legitimize the former as well as legitimize the latter. Either anticipating or realizing this state of affairs, the American public is unlikely to support the initiation or continuation of U.S. military intervention in defense of a regime that the people living under it overwhelmingly appear to regard as illegitimate—unless the intervention can succeed rapidly and/or the regime can somehow be legitimized. As far as rapid military intervention is concerned, and while the U.S. and its allies have succeeded stunningly at this in Kuwait and Kosovo, in both cases this was done to remove occupying forces that the local populace clearly did not want there—a task far more amenable to rapid accomplishment than defending a government whose citizens either actively oppose or are unwilling to defend it. This is exactly the sort of military task that the American public—and Congress—appear most unwilling to undertake.

It is possible, of course, that a country other than the United States might intervene militarily to protect the Saudi monarchy. It is difficult, however, to imagine any other Western government being willing to do so except in conjunction with Washington. Military intervention by any other Western—or, for that matter, non-Muslim—state is unlikely to be considered any more legitimate than U.S. intervention by the Saudi population anyway. This also suggests that intervention undertaken by a Muslim country might be considered more legitimate, and hence have greater prospects for success. In the event, there are two problems with this potential. First, it is highly doubtful that any other Muslim government would be either willing or able to undertake this task—even with US. and Western support. Second, while troops from Western or other nonMuslim countries are unlikely to find "Islamic fundamentalism" appealing, troops from Muslim countries could well be susceptible to it, clearly reducing their reliability as defenders of the Saudi monarchy.[173]

In sum, external intervention to protect the Saudi monarchy against a revolutionary opposition would be fraught with difficulty.

There also exists, of course, the possibility that external powers could support Riyadh’s internal opponents. While this is something that the Saudi as well as Western governments fear, several studies suggest that attempts by external powers to foment revolution in another country usually fail. It is when conditions are ripe for revolution internally that external support for a regime’s revolutionary opponents can play an important role—though not always.[174] Since there are currently no strong internal opposition movements in Saudi Arabia, the subject of what external powers might support them and how effectively will not be addressed here.

 The Democratic Bypass

It was noted at the beginning of this chapter that the twentieth century showed that non-democratic regimes are inherently unstable, displaying a marked tendency to fall, sooner or later. Still, violent revolution is not the only means by which dictatorships have fallen. Some have been transformed via a fairly orderly democratization process, while others have succumbed to non-violent democratic revolution.[175] Could this happen in Saudi Arabia?

Up to now, of course, the Saudi ruling family has displayed precious little willingness to allow any meaningful democratization to occur. The appointed Consultative Council, possessing no authority to legislate and only a limited range of issues on which it may even offer advice (that the government may simply ignore), can in no sense be considered a representative, democratic body.[176] Nor does the Saudi monarchy appear willing to countenance anything like one, under current conditions. Under the circumstances, what are the prospects for democratization in Saudi Arabia if serious revolutionary activity breaks out there?

Jeane Kirkpatrick asserted over two decades ago that democratization could not occur when a regime is fighting for survival against “totalitarian” Opponents.[177] Robert Pastor, though, has shown that the democratic transformation of an unpopular dictatorship can occur even when non-democratic revolutionary forces seeking to overthrow it have grown quite powerful. He has also shown, however, that democratization efforts under these circumstances can fail.[178] What, then, accounts for whether they succeed or fail? The crucial factor, according to Pastor, is not American foreign policy. American administrations, whether Democratic or Republican, all encourage democratization when antiAmerican revolutionary opposition forces seriously threaten pro-American dietatorships. What is the crucial factor, according to Pastor, is the reaction of the middle classes to these democratization efforts. If the middle classes embrace them, then non-democratic revolution can be averted, as occurred in the Philippines in 1986 and Chile in 1988–89. If, however, the middle classes reject such efforts, and choose to ally with an anti-Western, non-democratic revolutionary opposition instead, then the prospects for democratization are poor and those for non-democratic revolution, good—as in Cuba in 1958–59 and Iran and Nicaragua in 1978–79.[179]

Naturally it bears asking, why would the middle classes embrace the nondemocratic opposition, seemingly in contrast to both their interests as well as the expectations that outside observers might have? Pastor cites the presence of a number of factors that could allow this to occur: regime resistance to democratization, middle-class mistrust of American support for democratization after years of U.S. support for dictatorship, and perhaps most important, a naive faith on the part of the middle class that if it allies with the revolutionary opposition to get rid of the ancien regimeو it will be able to co-opt the opposition and dominate the new regime afterwards.[180]

There is no way, of course, to accurately forecast how middle-class elements in Saudi Arabia would behave in the event of a revolutionary situation arising. There are, however, several reasons to suspect that they might not embrace democratization but side with the non-democratic opposition instead. To begin with, Pastor notes that the middle-class is more likely to embrace democratization in countries that have had previous experience with it, and less likely to do so in those that have not.[181] Saudi Arabia, of course, falls into the latter category. In addition, while Marxism-Leninism was a revolutionary ideology that privileged the interests of the “workers” and “peasants” above those of the middleclass, several scholars have argued that “Islamic fundamentalism” is a middle-class ideology.[182] It is well known that the Teheran merchant class—the bazaaris—were among the most important supporters of the Ayatollah Khomeini. Ervand Abrahamian has argued that Khomeini saw himself as the defender of the Iranian middle-class, of which the Shia clergy was very much an integral part.[183]

The Islamic opposition in Saudi Arabia is also a middle-class movement. As Joseph Kostiner observed, “the new fundamentalist opposition’s most important characteristic has been its educational and socio-economic base. Its members were neither lower class nor tribally identified. Instead the common denominator was membership in the new middle class: graduates ... working as professionals or administrators.”[184] It must not be forgotten that Usama bin Laden, the alleged Saudi mastermind behind various attacks against American targets, himself hails from this background.[185]

Because of Saudi Arabia’s lack of experience with democracy, the improbability of the Saudi monarchy ever allowing meaningful progress toward it under any circumstances, the resentment that non-royal Saudis undoubtedly harbor toward the U.S. for supporting the anti-democratic Saudi monarchy so firmly, and the demonstrated appeal of Islamic fundamentalism to middle-class audiences in the Middle East, there is strong reason to doubt that the Saudi middleclass would embrace whatever belated efforts to encourage democratization Washington would probably make if a revolutionary situation arose in the Kingdom.

 The Internal Military Factor

A country’s military may not be able to prevent revolutionary activity breaking out. However, its actions—or lack thereof—play a crucial role in determining whether or not revolutionary activity succeeds. In his classic book, TheAnatomy of Revolution, Crane Brinton argued this point forcefully. “No government has ever fallen before attackers,” concluded Brinton, “until it has lost control over its armed forces or lost the ability to use them effectively—or, of course, lost such control of force because of interference by a more powerful foreign force ... and conversely ... no revolutions have ever succeeded until they have got a predominance of effective armed force on their side."[186] Timothy Wickham-Crowley advanced a similar argument in his study of Latin American insurgencies. He pointed out that established militaries are almost always stronger than guerrillas fighting against them in terms of manpower, weaponry, and overall resources. This superiority, however, will not prevent revolution unless the military is loyal: "Loyalty to the government is the most critical qualitative characteristic of armed forces, for the outcomes of rebellions and revolutionary wars hinge on that loyalty."[187] Wickham-Crowley went on to describe how foreign assistance to a regime's military does not enhance its ability to prevent revolution if the military (or key elements of it) is disloyal. Foreign arms transfers intended to strengthen the government side, for example, can be either diverted to the revolutionaries or used by the army against the government. Wickham-Crowley also cites instances of Latin American officers who had received U.S. military training later defecting to rebel forces and putting their training to effective use for them.[188]

It should also be noted that an army does not have to (even partially) defect to the opposition in order for revolution to succeed. Just the refusal of the armed forces—for whatever reason—to fire upon the opposition may assure its victory. There have also been instances, such as in the period just before the Shah of Iran was driven out of power, when the ancien regime refused to allow the use of force against its revolutionary opponents for fear of its own armed forces using the occasion to seize power.[189]

It is, therefore, important to ask: Would the Saudi armed forces remain loyal to the monarchy if revolutionary activity broke out in the Kingdom? We cannot really know the answer to this question unless and until such activity occurs. There is no conclusive indication that they would be disloyal. On the other hand, there is no guarantee that they would be completely loyal either. Indeed, there is at least some reason to question whether everyone in the Saudi armed forces would be so under these circumstances. There is also reason to doubt the effectiveness of Saudi forces against a strong opposition. Toward that end, it is worth recalling that soon after Arab nationalist revolution broke out in neighboring North Yemen in 1962, nine Saudi air force pilots defected, with their aircraft, to Nasser's Egypt (which was then Riyadh's rival).[190] In 1979, some Saudi troops reportedly refused to fire on the rebels who had seized the Grand Mosque in Makkah.[191] Since then, several observers have also claimed that the Saudi army exhibited an aversion to engaging in conflict with Iraqi forces during the 1990—91 crisis over Kuwait.[192] This certainly raises the question of how willing Saudi forces would be to fire upon fellow citizens.

Besides these indications from the past—which may, or may not, have relevance for the future—there is a more important reason to question the continued loyalty of the Saudi armed forces to the Al Saud. As is well known, many of the most important positions in the Saudi armed forces are reserved for Saudi princes. Indeed, there are Saudi princes at various levels throughout the officer corps.[193] Human nature being what it is, there can be little doubt that non-royal Saudi officers must resent the fact that their own promotion prospects are limited due to the policy of favoring princes for top positions. This resentment is only likely to increase if the Saudi ruling family sees the armed forces as a convenient means of employing even a portion of the ever-growing number of young princes it is producing.[194]

Assuming the existence of resentment against the princes on the part of Saudi non-royals in the armed forces, it is not too difficult to imagine how they might actually be attracted to the ranks of a revolutionary opposition—especially if they could cut a deal with it whereby they obtain from the new regime those positions now held by members of the ruling family. Such a deal is conceivable. A revolutionary regime would, after all, need trained officers far more than revolutionary militants for managing its armed forces. And even if the revolutionary opposition had no intention of honoring such a deal once in power, making it might prove very effective in helping them seize it.

Like many other Arab armed forces, Saudi Arabia's appear to be designed less for use against external enemies than internal ones, including from within the armed forces themselves.[195] One of the principal missions of the Saudi National Guard, for example, appears to be to prevent the regular armed forces from seizing power.[196] This may serve as one more factor demoralizing the non-royal officer corps. Under the circumstances, if a leadership struggle arose in the Kingdom resulting in the army and National Guard being controlled by rival princes, this could contribute to state breakdown and the rise of revolution. On the other hand, if the non-royal officer corps feared that a revolutionary opposition force would eliminate their positions (or even their lives) once in power, it may well remain loyal to the monarchy despite whatever grievances it felt.

One possibility for the non-royal officer corps is to attempt to solve both problems by overthrowing the monarchy and seizing power itself. Still, as Michael Herb has pointed out, Saudi princes already permeate the officer corps so extensively that it would be extremely difficult for non-royal officers to organize sufficiently to mount a coup without being detected.[197] But while the Al Saud may be able to prevent disgruntled non-royal officers from mounting a coup, they may not be able to make them fight effectively against, or not defect to, internal opposition forces, should any rise up. Again, it cannot be foretold with any degree of confidence how the Saudi armed forces would react to the emergence of a revolutionary situation in the Kingdom. If a significant portion defected, this could provide a tremendous windfall in weaponry and trained military manpower to the opposition as well as serve as a catalyst for further such defections. Likewise, if the Saudi armed forces cannot or will not defend the monarchy against a revolutionary opposition, it is highly doubtful that the monarchy could survive.

* Conclusion

The above analysis suggests that several factors that various theories have identified as being strongly associated with the occurrence of revolution are either already present or could arise in Saudi Arabia. This does not mean, however, that revolution is destined to occur there—even in theory.

David Kowalewski’s macro-analysis of revolutions in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries demonstrated that while the outbreak of revolutionary activity has occurred frequently, “successes are rare and show no ‘megatrend’

-Goldstone has also argued that “state resource fail[198]”.corresponding to activity ures, elite alienation and divisions, and popular mass mobilization potential” are the three key factors that lead to revolution. The presence of just one or even two of these factors would cause problems for any government, but would not necessarily lead to its overthrow: “Only when all these conditions come together do they have sufficient force to shatter existing institutions and create a revolution.”[199] For his part, John Foran has argued that revolution is most likely to occur when five factors are present: (1) dependent development; (2) “a repressive, exclusionary, personalist state”; (3) a powerful culture of resistance; (4) an economic downturn; and (5) “a world-systemic opening.”[200] According to Foran, the absence of any two of these factors is highly likely to prevent revolution from succeeding. Indeed, even the absence of one of them may be enough to do SO.[201]

To the extent that the factors leading toward revolution—assuming they have been accurately identified in the theories examined above—are now present in Saudi Arabia, they do not appear to be so in sufficient magnitude to bring about the conjuncture of factors that both Goldstone and Foran see as necessary. On the other hand, the analysis presented here indicates that if things do start to go wrong in Saudi Arabia, the monarchy and its external supporters may not be able to repair them. Revolution in Saudi Arabia is hardly inevitable but neither is its absence.

[138] This literature is far too voluminous to cite in its entirety. Essays discussing contending theories of revolution can be found in Theda Skocpol, Social Revolutions in the Modern World, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994; Nikki R. Keddie (ed.), Debating Revolutions, New York: New York University Press, 1995;John Foran (ed.). Theorizing Revolutions, London: Routledge, 1997; and Mark N. Katz, Reflections on Revolutions, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999.

[139] ةهعاו SkocpoV, States and Social Revolutions: A Comparative Analysis of France, Russia, and China, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979, pp. 14–18.

[140] Ibid., pp. 24–33.

[141] Skocpol, Social Revolutions in the Modern World, chapter 9. Skocpol acknowledged, nevertheless, that the urban-based Iranian revolution of 1979 was an exception; ibid., chapter 10.

[142] Eqbal Ahmad, “Comments on Skocpol,” Theory and Society 11:3, 1982, pp. 293–300; Jeffrey D. Simon, Revolution without Guerrillas, R-3683—RC, Santa Monica: RAND, 1989: and Farideh Farhi, States and Urban-Based Revolutions: Iran and Nicaragua, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.

[143] Skocpol, States and Social Revolutions, p. 31.

[144] Jack A. Goldstone, “Population Growth and Revolutionary Crises,” in Foran, Theorizing Revolutions, pp. 102–20.

[145] Ibid. See also Jack A. Goldstone, Revolution and Rebellion in the Early Modern World, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1991.

[146] Goldstone, Revolution and Rebellion, pp. 24,117—19,228–32, 395—6.

[147] It must be emphasized that there are other such theories, but they are essentially variations on the same theme; see Jeff Goodwin, “State-Centered Approaches to Social Revolutions: Strengths and Limitations of a Theoretical Tradition," in Foran, Theorizing Revolutions, pp. 11–37.

[148] Rayed Krimly, "The Political Economy of Adjusted Priorities: Declining Oil Revenues and Saudi Fiscal Policies," The Middle East Journal 53:2, spring 1999, pp. 25467. See also Nawaf Obaid and Patrick Clawson, "The 1999 Saudi Budget: Reform in the Face ofAcute Problems," Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Policywatch, number 359, January 5, 1999.

[149] For just one of many recent articles on declining standards of living in Saudi Arabia, see Douglas Jehl, "Life in Saudi Arabia Is Transformed by Hard Times," The New York Times, 20 March 1999.

[150] "Analysis: Saudi Seen Keeping Most Debts at Home," Reuters, 2 September 1999.

[151] Heir Apparent Abdallah was quoted as saying, "The years of the boom are over and will not return," see Obaid and Clawson, op. cit. The recent rise in oil prices has only enabled the Kingdom to reduce its current budget deficit. See "Saudi Arabia's Deficit to Drop 66%," Agence France-Presse, 13 September 1999.

[152] While Qatar and Oman introduced income taxes in 1994, and the Kuwaiti parliament is reportedly considering them, this is not a step that the Saudi government has yet been willing to take. See Krimly, "The Political Economy of Adjusted Priorities," op. cit., p. 267.

[153] Michael Herb, All in the Family:Absolutism, Revolution, and Democracy in the Middle Eastern Monarchies, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999, p. 32.

[154] On how the Saudi ruling family has so far dealt with the succession issue, see ibid., pp. 87–108. Although Herb argues that the Al Saud are unlikely to allow succession disputes to become crises, he does note the existence of rivalry between King Fahd and his full brothers on the one hand and their half brothers, including Heir Apparent Abdallah, on the other (pp. 105–106).

[155] See Charles Tilly, From Mobilization to Revolution, Reading, Massachusetts: Addison-Wesley, 1978. See also Jack A. Goldstone, “The Comparative and Historical Study of Revolutions,” Annual Review of Sociology, 1982, pp. 192–194.

[156] Howard Schneider, “Saudi Arabia Finds Calm after Storm,” The Washington Post, January 9,2000, pp. A1,A23.

[157] Mamoun Fanny, Saudi Arabia and the Politics of Dissent, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999.

[158] Nazih N. Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World, London: Routledge, 1991, p. 238. For a similar argument, see Found Ajami, “The Summoning,” Foreign Affairs 72:4, SeptemberZOctober 1993, pp. 2–9.

[159] Mark N. Katz, Revolutions and Revolutionary Waves, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997, p. 113.

[160] Tilly, From Mobilization to Revolution.

[161] On the changing risk-reward structure individuals face with regard to supporting a revolutionary opposition movement as the latter’s influence increases, see Timothy]. Lomperis, From Peopled War to People’s Rule: Insurgency, Intervention, and the Lessons of Vietnam, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996, pp. 74—82.

[162] On the promises that were made to such groups in the Western Hemisphere’s revolutions, see Lester D. Langley, TheAmericas in theAge of Revolution, 1750–1850, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996, passim; see also Christopher McAuley, “Race and the Process of the American Revolutions,” in John Foran (ed.). Theorizing Revolutions, pp. 168–202. On the promises made to non-Russian groups by the Bolsheviks during the Russian Revolution, see Bohdan Nahaylo and Victor Swoboda, Soviet Disunion: A History of the Nationalities Problem in the USSR, New York: The Free Press, 1990, chapters 2–5. Needless to say, the revolutionary movements that made these promises did not necessarily keep them.

[163] Fandy, Saudi Arabia and the Politics of Dissent. See also Herb, All in the Family, op. cit., pp. 168–73: and Graham E. Fuller and Rend Rahim Francke, The Arab Shi‘a: The Forgotten Muslims, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999, chapter 8.

[164] Gwenn Okruhlik, “Excluded Essentials: The Politics of Ethnicity, Oil, and Citizenship in Saudi Arabia,” in Pinar Batur-Vanderlippe and Joe Feagin (eds.). The Global Color Line: Racial and Ethnic Inequality and Struggle jifom a Global Perspective (Research in Politics and Society, حهل١ة ٱ ford, Connecticut: JAI Press, 1999, pp. 215—55.

[165] I have heard this viewpoint expressed repeatedly and vehemently by Arabs from relatively poor countries.

[166] Lomperis, From People’s War to People’s Rule, chapters 4–5, 10. See also Andrew Bennet, Condemned to Repetition? The Rise, Fall, and Reprise oj Soviet-Russian Military Interventionism, 1973–1996, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1999.

[167] Lomperis, From People’s War to People’s Rule, chapters 7,9. See also John Akehurst, We Won a War: The Campaign in Oman, 1965—1975, Wilton, United Kingdom: Michael Russell, 1982.

[168] William J. Taylor Jr. and James Blackwell, “The Ground War in the Gulf,” Survival 33:3 May/June 1991, pp. 23045; and Adam Roberts, “NATO’s ‘Humanitarian War’ over Kosovo,” Survival 41:3, autumn 1999, pp. 102–23.

[169] Bruce w. Jentleson, “The Pretty Prudent Public: Post Post-Vietnam American Opinion on the Use of Military Force,” International Studies Quarterly 36:1, March 1992, pp. 49–74.

[170] For an analysis of the evolution ofAmerican public opinion on the war in Vietnam, see Guenter Lewy, America in Vietnam, New York: Oxford University Press, 1978, pp. 432–7.

[171] Lomperis, From People’s War to People’s Rule, pp. 265–87.

[172] Herb, All in the Family, p. 171; Fandy, Saudi Arabia and the Politics of Dissent, passim; and Schneider, “Saudi Arabia Finds Calm after Storm.”

[173] Nor is it clear how effective Arab armies would be at undertaking this mission. As Risa Brooks put it, the means employed by Arab regimes to maintain control over them “often undermine the combat potential of the armed forces.” See Risa Brooks, Political-Military Relations and the Stability ofArab Regimes, London: International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1998, p. 10.

[174] Timothy p. Wickham-Crowley, Guerrillas and Revolution in Latin America: A Comparative Study of Insurgents and Regimes since 1956, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992, pp. 85–91 Stephen M. Walt, Revolution and War, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1996, pp. 18–43: Mark N. Katz, Revolutions and Revolutionary Waves, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997, pp. 25’54; and Fred Halliday, Revolution and World Politics: The Rise and Fall of the Sixth Great Power, Durham: Duke University Press, 1999, pp. 94–132.

[175] On the different ways in which democratization occurred in late-twentieth-century authoritarian regimes, see Samuel p. Huntington, The Third Wave: Democratization in the Late Twentieth Century, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1991, chapter 3.

[176] R. Hrair Dekmejian, “Saudi Arabia’s Consultative Council,” The Middle Eastjournal 52:2, spring 1998, pp. 204–18; and Herb, All in the Family, pp. 169–70.

[177] Jeane Kirkpatrick, “Dictatorships and Double Standards,” Commentary, November 1979, p. 44.

[178] Robert A. Pastor, “Preempting Revolutions: The Boundaries of U.S. Influence,” International Security 15:4, spring 1991, pp. 54—86.

[179] Ibid.

[180] Ibid., pp. 77–9.

[181] Ibid.

[182] See, for example, Nazih Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in theArab World, London: Routledge, 1991, chapter 7; and Olivier Roy, The Failure of Political Islam, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1994, chapter 3.

[183] Ervand Abrahamian, Khomeinism: Essays on the Islamic Republic, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1993, chapter 2.

[184] Joseph Kostiner, “State, Islam and Opposition in Saudi Arabia: The Post Desert-Storm Phase,” The Middle East Review of International Affairs, June 19, 1997, p. 4.

[185] Fandy, Saudi Arabia and the Politics of Dissent, p. 180.

[186] Crane Brinton, The Anatomy of Revolution, 3rd ed., New York: Vintage Books, 1965, p. 89.

[187] Wickham-Crowley, Guerrillas and Revolution in Latin America, p. 64.

[188] Ibid., pp. 68–75,77–80.

[189] Gary Sick, All Fall DownzAmericTs Tragic Encounter with Iran, New York: Penguin Books, 1986, pp. 165, 198–201.

[190] Fred Halliday, Arabia without Sultans, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1974, p. 67. Halliday also reported that opposition movements were discovered within the Saudi armed forces in 1968 and 1969: Ibid.,p. 68.

[191] Herb, All in the Family, p. 171.

[192] U.S. News & World Report noted the following in regard to the late January 1991 battle over Khafji (a Saudi border town): “When the Iraqis surrendered ... the victorious Saudis swaggered through the streets shouting and waving their national flag. It was the first land battle that Saudis had fought in the modern history of their kingdom. Some observers, though, said the tough fighting was led by the Qataris (whose ground forces were largely Pakistani mercenaries).” U.S. News ١لآعا٠ٱأ١ 1لأة جع Triumph without Victory.The Unreported History of the Persian Gulf War, New York: Times Books/Random House, 1992, p. 270. Anthony Cordesman assessed Saudi military performance more positively, but in a back-handed manner: “£T]he Saudi Army did well during Operation Desert Storm—very well if its low pre-war readiness is considered.” But even after the experience of the Gulf War, Cordesman noted that the Saudi army takes “a minimum of 7–10 days to redeploy a brigade to a new front or city,” questioned the effectiveness of its organization, training, and equipment, and concluded that “the Saudi Army is still too static and defensive in character and lacks strategic focus.” See Anthony H. Cordesman, Saudi Arabia: Guarding the Desert Kingdom, Boulder: Westview Press, 1997, p. 135.

[193] Herb, All in the Family, pp. 34—5.

[194] According to Cordesman, “senior Saudi officers unrelated to the royal family have been denied promotion because of a wide range of internal political disputes.” See Anthony H. Cordesman, After the Storm.The Changing Military Balance in the Middle East١Bou\der’1es٢.\٦e\v Press, أ99آذ,٦د.

[195] ل١ادة.,ھاًأة Brooks, Political-Military Relations and the Stability of Arab Regimes.

[196] F. Gregory Gause III, Oil Monarchies: Domestic and Security Challenges in the Arab Gulf States, New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1994, p. 68.

[197] Herb, All in the Family, pp. 345.

[198] David Kowalewski, “Periphery Revolutions in World-System Perspective, 1821–1985,” Comparative Political Studies 24:!,April 1991, p. 92.

[199] Jack A. Goldstone, “An Analytical Framework,” in Jack A. Goldstone, Ted Robert Gurr, and Farrokh Moshiri (eds.), Revolutions of the LateTwentieth Century, Boulder: Westview Press, 1991, p. 40.

[200] John Foran, “The Comparative-Historical Sociology of Third World Social Revolutions: Why a Few Succeed, Why Most Fail,” in John Foran (ed.). Theorizing Revolutions, p. 228.

[201] Ibid.,pp. 259–61.

 Chapter 8: Image, Imagination And Place: The Political Economy Of Tourism In Saudi Arabia

Gwenn Okruhlik

Sandwiched in the travel brochure between advertisements for trips to the Himalayan Kingdoms of Nepal and Bhutan, a Kenyan Christmas Family Safari, and a Summer in Tuscany, the alluring teaser reads: Saudi Arabia’s recent decision to welcome select groups of travelers to the Kingdom affords a thrilling opportunity to those seeking a truly unique travel adventure. In an age of eco-tourism, adventure travel, and culturally sensitive travel, Saudi Arabia is truly one of the last frontiers in international tourism. As a latecomer, Saudi Arabia offers an especially interesting vantage point from which to observe how politics and tourism intersect. The consumption of tourist services (including the choice of sites) cannot be extracted from the social and political relations in which they are embedded.[202]

Tourism is at the nexus of global capitalism and national identity. Global capitalism, as articulated by the World Trade Organization (WTO), mandates a freer flow of information, capital, and people. A national identity is one that transcends family and region, and gives content to the idea of self. Identity, and particularly a national identity, is not simply inherent or primordial. Indeed, it can be strategic and positional.[203] Thus, what becomes important are the facets of identity that one chooses to emphasize, or de-emphasize, in the construction of a nation's image. Most interesting is understanding the variability in what is included and what is excluded from this representation.[204]

Tourism, as a dynamic of capital accumulation, is about creating and marketing experiences, in which place is commodified and reduced to an image for consumption.[205] Tourism suggests an invitation to come in and view yourself, so it prompts various questions: What image of self is offered for viewing? What representation of self is projected? These are important questions because the production of a national image has internal and external components[206] that can be negotiated and revised, even as the producers of the dominant image promote its authentic essence.

The focus of this chapter is to inquire how tourism exposes contested voices over identity issues within Saudi Arabia, where the state pursues two objectives simultaneously—it seeks, on the one hand, to accommodate global capitalism (by joining the WTO) as it attempts, on the other hand, to forge a national identity that responds to domestic struggles and voices (such as Islamism, class, gender, and region). Clearly, the pursuit of the former exposes tender spots in the pursuit of the latter. Saudi Arabia is simultaneously defining a national identity while opening itself to foreign investors, international institutions, and tourists. A particular representation of "what it means to be a Saudi" has been shaped and is being marketed to foreign audiences even before it is fully accepted (or experienced) by Saudi Arabian citizens.

Indeed, tourism in Saudi Arabia reveals much about the articulation of a truly national identity at a time of global imperatives, because it exposes “muddy edges.” These reflect the tensions that emerge from competing preferences of the state and of the tourist. In Saudi Arabia, it is the state that defines tourism (through representatives of the ruling family working with private Saudi operators), rather than independent, individual private entrepreneurial citizens. Several members of the Al Saud family spearhead the effort to promote tourism. For now, tourism is tightly controlled and the state is constructing the image to be marketed abroad, to private tourists. Thus, the itinerary is highly structured, and it is impossible to deviate from it. It is not quite containment tourism or enclave tourism, but it is very much controlled tourism. Still, there are inevitable encounters between tourist and inhabitant —encounters that can (re)shape “image.” And it is these encounters, or “muddy edges,” experienced by people paying for the privilege of observation and participation, that make it hard for the state to completely control a discourse on identity and development. The muddy edges exemplify the maneuvering and contestation over such things as photography, dress, and mobility that go on between international tourists and national voices that seek to define and protect an identity. The way in which the muddy edges play out, and the skill with which they are handled, will affect the future of tourism in Saudi Arabia; and from those edges, one may indeed learn something about the emergent national identity by examining the outcomes of such encounters.[207]

The politics of tourism are evident throughout the world; in the Middle East it is certainly so in Egypt, Israel, Jordan, and Morocco. What makes Saudi Arabia especially interesting is timing. Saudi Arabians are only now struggling to (re)construct the content of national identity (including citizenship and belonging) quite independently of tourism or the WTO. The coincidence of the two processes provides a fertile field for examining relations between the definition of self and other.

Throughout this chapter, an effort is made to analyze the politics and power of the touring experience in Saudi Arabia. How and why Saudi Arabia recently opened its gates to tourism; who participates in the experience as producers or consumers; and how Saudi Arabia is officially represented through the itinerary are together revealing of national image and international imagination.[208] An analysis of these important variables, along with a discussion of the “muddy edges” of tourism, highlights how tourism contributes to a loss of the state’s

Image, Imagination, and Place ...Tourism in Saudi Arabia 113 monopoly on discourse. Such an analysis is situated in the literatures of both politics and cultural anthropology.[209]

* The Politics of Place: Image and Imagination

Tourism has been formally introduced into a country that was previously off-limits to travelers. The only way to access Saudi Arabia was through Hajj (pilgrimage), visitation of relatives, or employment. In 1991, while still prohibiting tourism, Saudi Arabia sent abroad a fabulous exhibit of itself, entitled “Saudi Arabia: Yesterday and Today.” For some observers, it conveyed the statement “You can’t come to Saudi Arabia, so we will come to you.”[210]

To appreciate the power and significance of the tourism opening, one must comprehend the long-standing regulations against mobility and travel in Saudi Arabia. Every foreigner (approximately 6.2 million, about one-third of the estimated total population) is required to be “sponsored” by a Saudi Arabian citizen, who in turn holds legal, financial, and social responsibility for the behavior of the expatriate. This means that sponsorship is extraordinarily difficult to attain, except in the case of simple employment or to conduct the religious rituals of the Hajj in Makkah and Madinah. Expatriate workers have restricted mobility; they are not allowed to travel more than 50 kilometers from their place of residence without the written, signed, and dated permission of their sponsors. This extensive system of regulation and oversight ensures appropriate conduct while in country, and has acted in many ways as an extension of the authoritarian state. Until very recently, tourist visas did not even exist.

There has been no transition period in which individual travelers or small independent groups negotiated their way through Saudi Arabia. In Egypt, for example, individual travelers choose among their activities. They decide where to stay, what to eat, which sites are worthy of their time, what souvenirs to purchase, and how to negotiate the costs of their experience. In contrast, in Saudi Arabia, several government entities have been established to manage such dilemmas about sites, representation, costs, accommodations, and interaction between locals and tourists. There is less individual experimentation in encountering Saudi Arabia. This means that questions regarding authenticity are not going to be answered slowly and over time in a give-and-take process between tourist and local culture; rather, choices must be made up front because of the formal, structured nature of tourism in Saudi Arabia.[211]

* The Politics of Place: Conflict Avoidance

The tourist opening is purposefully slow, cautious, and targeted for social and political reasons. According to a Saudia Airlines tourism manager, “the Saudis have received religious traffic and Gulf visitors for hundreds of years. It’s not a new thing. But Saudi tourism will not be for the masses. It will be well targeted.”[212] A travel marketer in Jeddah was more explicit: “We want to be more open, but not like Dubai.” That city, in addition to serving alcohol and allowing freedom in dress and mobility, also has a significant trade in prostitution. A marketing director for a resort hotel was also cautious, “[T]his will happen in small doses in a very controlled way. It should be a gradual transition as we don’t want to shock anyone.”[213] Prince Bandar bin Khaled, who works with tourism in the Asir region, was straightforward about the political implications of tourism: “Hundreds of thousands of people from different cultures could offend the local population without even knowing it.” A public backlash “could delay (foreign) tourism for years.”[214]

For those advocates of tourism, the challenge is to gently promote tourism (and the hoped-for accompanying opening of society) while avoiding a crackdown from socially conservative forces. It is a delicate balancing act because in other Middle Eastern countries, the tourist sector has become a rallying point for opposition forces, most notably in Egypt, with serious consequences.

Saudi Arabian officials refer to their approach as “clean tourism,” travel without negative environments such as gambling, casinos, alcohol, or prostitution. There are, of course, no public entertainment venues, clubs, cinemas, or discotheques in Saudi Arabia. Rather, tour groups will visit archeological sites, historic locations, lakes, festivals, and museums. To be sure, there are plans for eco-tourism, snorkeling in the coral beds of the Red Sea, and treks in the Empty Quarter desert. In fact, bedouins are apparently “gearing up to take tourists to desert encampments.” A new hotel and golf course are planned on the sea with a private beach where Westerners can swim.[215] The latter is relevant because it expands the distinction between behavior in the private and in the public space to encompass the tourist trade. Foreign women could wear bathing suits on such a private beach that was designed and maintained strictly for tourists. Such a resort is similar to enclave tourism; but unlike enclave tourist development in much of the developing world, where separation is required by the increasing disparity between the wealth of tourists and the poverty of the countries they visit, [216] such separation in Saudi Arabia would be prompted by normative differences.

* Why Now, Why Tourism?

In a region of majestic pyramids, winding suqs, Islamic architecture, and pre-islamic ruins, the Saudi Arabian decision to finally encourage tourism was a response to domestic needs.[217] The context of the ‘90s was difficult for Saudi Arabia, both politically and economically. Begun with the turmoil of the Gulf War, the decade was a time of Islamist opposition forces on the ascendancy, King Fahd’s illnesses, succession struggles in the Al Saud family, and new social problems. Guns, drugs, and crime were increasingly reported in Saudi Arabia. The population continued to grow at an astounding rate of about 3.5 percent per year. Unemployment figures among Saudi citizens spiraled. Among recent college graduates, the unemployment rate was about 30 percent. Yet there was a continuing dependence on an imported foreign labor force, which constituted between 95 percent of the private sector force. The once-fabulous infrastructure was deteriorating; this was especially true of schools and hospitals. Oil prices hit a ten·year low in 1998. Per capita income had tumbled from $16,650 in 1981 to 86,526 in 1998. The ratio of public sector debt to GDP was more than 120 percent in late 1999, the seventeenth straight year of deficit. Clearly, Saudi Arabia needed a new source of revenues that could buffer the economy from the volatility of oil prices. It also needed a new source of employment.

By the end of the decade, Heir Apparent Abdallah bin Abdul Aziz Al Saud had introduced a series of reform measures designed to build confidence in his leadership and foresight. He continued King Fahd's program of deporting illegal expatriate workers, doubled visa fees on foreign labor, slashed subsidies on electricity and petrol, and instituted limits on princely prerogatives (use of phone, planes, and electricity). Abdallah established a Supreme Economic Council to regulate the shares market, revamp the tax code, and amend property and employment laws in order to gain membership in the WTO, for which Saudi Arabia had applied in 1993. Its membership application had been adversely affected because, as representatives of the WTO argued, the Saudi economy was too heavily subsidized and the market too protected. Troublesome issues included the lack of transparency in public procurement, intellectual property rights, investment rules, and tariff rates.

In response to these problems, Saudi Arabia announced in 2000 a series of sweeping economic changes intended to facilitate its membership in the WTO.[218] For the first time, 100 percent foreign ownership of companies is allowed; foreign companies will have access to favorable loans from the Saudi Industrial Development Fund, and foreign investors can now invest in the local bourse. To further assist the business community, the General Investment Authority (GIA) was established as a one-stop shop to issue licenses and to incorporate foreign and joint ventures, and importantly, it appears that the old requirement that all foreigners have a Saudi sponsor will be altered. There is discussion that foreigners will be allowed to own property in Saudi Arabia, that judicial protection will be strengthened, and greater public disclosure for investments will be fostered. It is into this ferment and "opening" that busloads of tourists are arriving for the first time ever in Saudi Arabia.

The state seeks to achieve several objectives through the new promotion of tourism. As a demonstration of openness, it will facilitate application to the WTO. The development of the tourist infrastructure in Saudi Arabia will also increase investment opportunities, attract select groups of foreign visitors, and encourage Saudi citizens to remain in country for their holidays. Unofficial estimates are that Saudi citizens spend more than $16 billion on vacations abroad annually.[219] Furthermore, this economic activity will not only create jobs in this growing service sector, but importantly, the jobs that are created will be acceptable positions for many unemployed Saudis. In addition to formal training, two of the primary attributes required of Saudi Arabians who are employed in the tourism trade are a) generosity of hospitality and b) a proud self-image. That is to suggest that the newly created positions will be compatible with social norms. This matters because the effort to “Saudiize” the economy has long been hindered by the fact that many positions held by foreign laborers are unattractive to citizens due to social norms and incentive structures.

A challenge for Saudi Arabia will be to keep profits from tourism in the country, and to circulate that capital throughout the various regions and economic sectors. The state and private business communities must build backward and forward linkages throughout the economy (in construction, services, agriculture, and transportation) so that Saudi citizens benefit from the new activity. In short, tourism must stimulate the local economy, develop capital-producing activity that is independent of oil cycles, and provide acceptable jobs. Unfortunately, experience elsewhere suggests that increasing international integration of the tourist industry decreases the amount of expenditure that remains in the host country. The broad-based relaxation of foreign investment regulations in Saudi Arabia, which has accompanied its application to the WTO, will further weaken local control over capital. Indeed, four of the six hotels that were utilized in a recent tour included an Intercontinental, a Meridien, a Sheraton, and a Marriott. It may well be that the economic imperatives of joining the WTO mitigate against the diversification, privatization, and Saudiization of the economy, all long sought after goals in the country.

Aware of the sector’s potential benefits, many Saudis want tourism to work, and tremendous resources are being expended. Since 1995, Saudi Arabia has invested an estimated $6.66 billion on tourism projects, mostly geared toward internal tourism (Saudis and citizens from neighboring states of the Gulf Cooperation Council, who do not require visas).[220] The tourist infrastructure is most developed in the southwestern province of Asir: in the resort town of Taif and in Yanbu on the Red Sea, both favored spots for holidays. It remains to be seen whether the needs of tourists from the Arabian Peninsula are similar to those of tourists from farther-flung origins. In the event, Saudi Arabia forecasts 3 million visitors in the next five years and, once the infrastructure is complete, expects 1 million tourists per year. A new Prince Sultan School for Tourism and Hotel Sciences opened in Abha to train Saudi citizens for roles in the tourism sector. At the helm of all of this is Sultan bin Salman—a former air force pilot who flew on the Space Shuttle Discovery in 1985—newly appointed secretary-general of the Higher Organization for Tourism (HOT). Salman al Sudairy assists him. In his capacity as minister for civil aviation, Defense Minister Sultan bin Abdul Aziz supports this venture as well, especially as Saudia Airlines serves as sponsor of tour groups. The HOT is responsible for tourism policy in the country and will evaluate infrastructure, “remove whatever obstacles might hamper tourist activity,” and survey and protect tourist sites and folklore items such as handicrafts, markets, and cottage industries.[221]

 Cultural Markers That Entice

A primary lure to tour Saudi Arabia is the sense that it is somehow shrouded, off-limits, and secretive. Pre-trip literature clearly states that all female tourists must wear an abaya and cover their hair with a scarf for the duration of the trip. Furthermore, all participants are required to sign a document that details extreme political restrictions in Saudi Arabia to which they must abide, or be held liable. To my knowledge, no tourist on the January 2000 tour expressed concerns about waiving the right to expression. Though many of the tourists complained often about the constraints that were placed on them in the country (regarding dress, photography, mobility), the restrictive quality might also have been the same reason they paid for the experience. The slightly taboo nature of Saudi Arabia is a primary attractant to tourism. Image and imagination fertilize each other here, and trips continue to fill at this time. It is not yet clear how long this can be sustained; as more tourists experience Saudi Arabia, the country will indeed be less “shrouded in secrecy.”

The “off-limits” character of Saudi Arabia is utilized as a selling point for the tour. The advertisement letter notes that, even now, no tourist visa exists for entry to the country; each visitor must be sponsored by an influential Saudi and approved by the ruling family. Saudi Arabia is introduced as “mysterious and exotic,” a “blank spot on the map for most travelers.” The pioneering opportunity to be among the first in the door of the country is heralded. In fact, the tour “offers a rare chance to explore a country before the imprint of tourism changes it forever.” Clearly, the primary draw is to be first, a pioneer traveler to a previously closed Kingdom, which has long resisted outside influence. The image of a pristine country, blessed by oil and urban centers but grounded in the desert and tradition, is articulated. The day-by-day itinerary, with a description of each day’s activities, follows the letter of introduction.

 Producers and Consumers of Place

The introduction of tourism in Saudi Arabia necessitated a major change in the long-standing system of sponsorship and oversight of foreigners in the country. In an early concession to tourism in September 1999, the state approved a plan that allowed Muslims coming to Saudi Arabia to perform umrah (minor pilgrimage) to travel around the country instead of being confined to the holy cities of Makkah and Madinah.[222] In April 2000, the state announced it would issue tourist visas that allow foreigners access to the country for reasons other than Hajj or employment.[223] While this is a major step in “opening up,” it is not as though the Kingdom will be overrun by legions of backpacking college students anytime soon. The new visa will apparently require tourists to travel in the country through a local company that will take charge of the trip in its entirety and will ensure that all tourists leave the country after their visit. The visa will be valid for one month and will be issued only for group entry rather than for individual travel. The visas are so new that during a January 2000 tour, there was still no “tourist visa” box to check off on the airline form. Yet in the first four months of formal availability, between April and July 2000, 6,546 tourist visas had been issued, mainly to tourists from Europe, Japan, and the United States.[224]

It is important to note that participation in tourism is quite selective in Saudi Arabia, and the “producers of knowledge” include a wide range of professionals. Each tour group is led by a foreign tour operator (thus far, American, German, Italian, or Japanese) who manages all logistics and organization. That foreign operator works in conjunction with local tour guides, who are critical to the success of the venture. The Saudi Arabian guides bear responsibility for negotiating, representing, and interpreting their country. They, in turn, work closely with key princes who oversee tourism. The tour I accompanied also benefited from the participation of a representative of the United States museum that sponsored the trip and two study leaders, there to provide expertise.

Participants in the tour were fairly homogenous in demographic traits, and this makes intuitive sense, given that such tourism requires two things: time and money. By and large, the 30 consumers were white, elderly, well-to-do and retired (or able to turn their business affairs over to someone else for two weeks). As a group, they were extraordinarily well traveled. The participants had walked on the Great Wall of China, wandered around Red Square in Moscow, hunted on African safaris, and relaxed on Caribbean beaches. Touring Saudi Arabia was one of many travel adventures in their lives. The price of access was $7,200 for 13 days in the country, inclusive of all travel, food, accommodations, and tips. No monetary transactions were necessary once in the country (except for personal shopping). A Saudi Arabian newspaper has already reported that tourists are complaining about the high price of trips, writing that “a large number of tourists believe that tour operators are charging exorbitant prices to arrange trips to the kingdom. Tour operators will have to bring down prices to attract more tourists.”[225]

In the event, the schedule for the January 2000 tour was highly structured, and demanding. One could not deviate from the pre-planned schedule or strike off on one’s own to explore different sites. The only exception to this was within the Aramco compound in Dhahran, where ex-Aracoms, as they refer to themselves, were allowed to search out their old homes from years past. Even there, several Aracoms had a run-in with security guards patrolling the compound. Participants were always free to stay behind in the hotel if they chose (but that too was difficult, as there are not yet swimming pools or gyms available to women travelers).

As guides always serve an important role in the success of the touring experience, the experience of this tour was no exception. They are “vilified and praised, lampooned and treated with respect and generally emerge as critical figures in the minds of tourists.”[226] Tour guides are simultaneously pathfinders, mentors, brokers, educators, and interpreters.[227] In countries like Saudi Arabia, where basic information is at a premium, the role can feel overwhelming in its power. Tour guides serve as mediators between foreign consumers and the local environment. All information is processed. The Saudi Arabian tour operators were crucial in their ability to relay explanations of behavior in a way that was often humorous and non-threatening to the tourists. Both local guides were superb in their skills; their personalities were engaging. Interestingly, one guide spoke exquisite English, but did so with an accent. He was perceived by some tourists to be not as skilled as the other guide, whom they embraced more openly.

In my role as study leader, and as an educator by profession, I sought to explain the nuance and complexity of dress, social norms, and behavior. Most of the tourists had little patience for meaningful discussion and preferred instead clear, and vastly over-simplified, answers. The risk is that cultural markers and symbols are de-contextualized. Their meaning and place become secondary to the visual image absorbed through the tourist gaze.[228] Of course, scholars always influence the construction of knowledge by the questions they choose to pursue or exclude. I was cognizant, and wary, of my own role as mediator and interpreter of knowledge about a place in which I, too, was the Other.[229]

 Representation and the Itinerary

The representation being sold to these pioneering tourists actually covers a wide swath of Saudi Arabia (see Appendix for sites). It will be important over time to observe which sites are added, or deleted, as the touring process is refined. Saudi Arabia must find the places and experiences that will, in MacCannell’s words, animate a “simultaneous caring and concern for another person and for an object that is honored and shared but never fully possessed.”[230] Toward that end, it is important to briefly discuss both the inclusions and the exclusions from the itinerary, the latter obviously being as important as the former.

The tour focused on six primary regions, each typified through the compacted lens of tourism. Riyadh, a huge, bustling city, is the foreign affairs center, the national archive, and the center of history and the origins of the state. The portrait ofDhahran in the Eastern Province was high technology, petrochemical industry, Aramco, expatriate faces, oil, and consumerism. The days up north in al Jouf, by the border with Jordan, left an impression of the importance of extended family, new central pivot agricultural lands, and the transitions that settied Bedouins make. The experience in the marvelous Red Sea city ofjeddah is difficult to typify, but likely was perceived as cosmopolitan and commercial. The image of the Asir was of traditional dance, unique architecture, and ruins. The tour group was actually exposed to a fairly broad spectrum of Saudi Arabia; they certainly experienced much more than some may have appreciated.

Among the landmarks worthy of attention was the National Museum in Riyadh—spectacular by any stretch of the imagination-which opened in 1999. Given that particular chapters of Saudi Arabian history have long been taught in the school curriculum,[231] it was important to see how history had been assembled methodically and displayed in a way that conveys a message through visual, tactile, and aural mediums. The history of Arabia has been distilled into a national narrative [232] The exhibit carefully combines religious development, economic activities, technological advancement, climate, and peoples to weave a fabric in which the threads of continuity and traditions of the past are stitched together to produce a spiritual, industrial, and educated place of the future. That is, it offers a construction of identity derived from an exemplary past, which will bring the state into the age of “modernity with meaning.” The museum constructs and institutionalizes a particular telling of history, as has been common in national museums.[233] The Saudi National Museum conveys a story about the founding of the Kingdom and its development over the decades, which emphasizes the power of Islam, the wisdom of King Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman, and the unity of peoples under the Al Saud family The official narrative presents the historical past, from which it can selectively appropriate, and an optimistic vision of the future.

This official representation of self and history is not always congruent with what one hears in private conversations. The museum does not reconstruct the many alternative tellings of history that exist throughout the country It does not recount episodes that were painful for many people during the formative years of the country, such as the massacres in the south, or the walls of bodies at Taif. It does not speak about the negative impacts of the oil boom of the 1970s that reverberated throughout the country, or about obsequious consumption.

Importantly, the museum does acknowledge a pre-Islamic history. Only a decade ago, this was not openly discussed; now a large section of the museum is devoted to it. The architecture and ambience of the museum are remarkable. An observer moves literally from the age of ignorance and darkness via escalator into the brightness and illumination of the age of Islam. To foreign tourists, this museum accomplished a great task; as I had been asked repeatedly about the impending clash between religion and science—and how a faith like Islam could possibly survive in the age of computers—the museum answered many of these questions indirectly. Indeed, the entire complex constitutes a high-technology exhibit of Islam, and Saudi Arabia. Sultan bin Salman, the new secretary-general of tourism, stresses that cultural heritage is preserved while not impeding the path of progress. He recently underscored that Saudi Arabia “believes in change for the sake of progress, and not for the sake of change.”[234]

This remarkable exhibit notwithstanding, the representation of Saudi Arabia portrayed by the itinerary excluded two important parts of the population. First, tourists did not see the underbelly of Saudi Arabia. This would be expected in any tour of any country[235]; it is just that in Saudi Arabia the underbelly is really quite large, even if hidden from view. There was no discussion of the 7.2 million foreign laborers on whom Saudi Arabia depends to staff the economy. The tourists were not exposed to the self-contained housing compounds, designed to group workers together by nationality and to prevent mobility. They did not see the sub-standard living conditions of millions. Saudi Arabian guides did, however, explain that because of the change in oil markets, the country does have different economic classes for the first time. In fact, Saudi Arabia has always been home to different economic classes; it is just that structurally the underclass has always been composed primarily of foreigners.

Second, except for pre-planned excursions, the tour group did not encounter any Saudi Arabian women, fully half of the population. Although the group visited a school for girls, and had dinner in two Saudi homes at which women were present, the absence of women on the streets, in the markets, or in the hotels, troubled several. When I lectured on the ways in which women work within and around the norm of gender segregation in order to achieve their ends, several individuals were genuinely troubled, some were offended. To others, the physical absence of women in the public realm was equated with total and complete oppression and servility. Rather than examine the ways in which women creatively negotiate their lives and empower themselves to survive and, perhaps, prosper in constrained circumstances, some participants sought reinforcement of pre-existing images.

Finally, were it not for my lectures, members of the group would not have been exposed to the myriad ways in which oil affects society, politics, and economics. The official sites trumpeted the technological glories of oil production; I discussed the ways in which oil affected urbanization, social change, and norms.

* The Muddy Edges of Controlled Tourism: Globalism and Identity

To be sure, internationd group tourism is highly structured, with every minute of every day accounted for by planners. There is lacking spontaneity, flexibility, and indigenous interaction. The most revealing moments of tourism occur, then, when the pre-planned itinerary does not proceed as scheduled, or when participants refuse to abide by the rules of the game. These “muddy edges” provide rich soil for analysis of the interplay between globalism and identity, or between the needs of tourists and the protection of domestic jurisdiction.

There are three such intersections in Saudi Arabia, at which there is some tension, but where national identity clearly has the edge—that is, globalism will accommodate identity and tourists will abide by local rules and norms. These concern prayer times, religious separation in the holy cities, and the death penalty waiver.

First, within the constructs of a tour, regular prayer time plays havoc with tour itineraries. In my role as study leader, I sought to explain the power and simplicity of community prayer, and to suggest that the call to prayer was part of the fabric of daily business. The tour operator, however, as I was cognizant of, had to time to the minute every route and every stop to work around prayer times. Two minutes late and the group would miss entering a museum on time; they would have to cool their heels inside a parked bus in a lot. Or, should a suq be closed for prayer, the delayed shopping excursion would have repercussions for the remainder of the day, since it would then be too dark to see, for example, the world's largest oasis. Therefore, tour operators will have to learn to build exciting and feasible tour schedules around prayer times; prayer will not, and of course should not, accommodate tourism.

Second, non-Muslims are not allowed into the holy cities of Makkah and Madinah. The tour group utilized a nice hotel on the outskirts ofMadinah as a departure point for a long bus ride north to the magnificent ruins of Madain Saleh. The architecture of the hotel where the group was confined was interesting, designed so that most windows faced inward toward a courtyard. Tourists could barely catch a glimpse of Madinah from their hotel room windows. The hotel, while comfortable, was silent and solitary. Again, tourism will accommodate identity. Perhaps as more international tour groups go to Saudi Arabia, the atmosphere of the hotel will become more lively and interactive—a way station for non-Muslim tourists.

Third, the state requires that all tourists sign a waiver before a visa is issued. Being asked to sign a document that you will abide by all laws of a state while you are there is acceptable. This particular document, however, stipulates as well that tourists "shall respect the morals, customs, values and feelings of Saudi society." It further stipulates that the signatory is "aware that alcohol, drug narcotics, pornographic materials, and all types of religious, political or cultural leaflets, pamphlets, magazines, books, audio tapes, video tapes, films, or other references of all sorts, contradictory to Islam are prohibited from entering the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, whether for personal use or otherwise. Any types of illegal drugs and narcotics smuggling in, and distribution inside, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is punishable by DEATH.” Although the language of this document may be revised, tourists will still be required to sign something before entering Saudi Arabia.

 “Muady Edges”

In addition to the three clean intersections of globalism and identity, there are four “muddy edges” in Saudi Arabia that are the sites of maneuvering and contestation between international tourists and national identities. These concern photography, security, social norms/dress, and foreign labor. The way in which these issues play out and the skill with which they are handled will affect the future of tourism in Saudi Arabia. The individuals who champion a very gradual opening are cognizant of the possibility of a “backlash” from socially conservative forces, which could be precipitated by such incidents.

 The Photography Muddy Edge

As stated above, the participants in the tour were exceedingly well traveled, and all were experienced at hosting travel slide shows for their friends. All had beautiful photo albums of their international adventures. It became very difficult (and taxing) to explain repeatedly, and often to no avail, why an expenditure of 7,200 for this experience did not entitle them to snap pictures freely. The trip was perceived as a transaction in which the admission price entitled them to the privilege of contravening local norms. The truth is that opening the country to tourism is one thing; reproducing images freely is quite another. Although an effort was made to carefully explain the source of constraints on photography in Saudi Arabia—which stem from considerations of religion (only God can produce a human), social norms (to protect the privacy of women and family), and security (broadly construed)—several tourists could not comprehend them. Others simply thought it was silly and chose to disregard the constraints. No matter how many cautions, prohibitions, and explanations were articulated, many tourists continued to snap photos, often with telephoto lenses. It was a constant bone of contention, and became a serious issue at a museum stop in a small town on the way to Madain Saleh. One woman, having just been told that photographs were prohibited in this town, walked to the far side of the bus and began to snap away. The mutana (loosely translated as “morals security”) approached her. She simply turned and walked away, making the situation even worse. It appeared that she not only violated the agreements, but then added insult to injury by rebuking local authorities. The Saudi tour operators were placed in a very uncomfortable position of having to negotiate themselves out of this situation. In the event, the process was long and difficult, and required the intervention of the local museum director.

In Dhahran, the men and women tourists split into groups so that each could observe a private primary school in operation, the men attending the boys’ side, the women going to the girls’ section. Not surprisingly, a male participant asked a female cohort to slip a camera under her abaya, to take a picture of unveiled females. This apparently happened on another tour as well, as recorded in a recent photo-essay.[236] Neither of the two was, apparently, successful.

On another occasion, when an older woman consented to have her photo taken by tourists, she kept her face covered as she posed by a fire in a tent. But after countless poses and photos, her scarf would fall from her face and participants would try to sneak a peek of a Saudi Arabian woman. It is not clear to me how long this kind of cat-and-mouse game can continue. Will the family put its collective foot down and forbid photos of women while still graciously hosting tour groups? Or, alternatively, was this acceptable and perhaps indicative of the beginning of photos of women outside of the family unit?

In Dhahran, the group stopped with some fanfare to see the first well in Saudi Arabia from which oil flowed in the 19305. Well #7 is a symbol of the fabulous boom of Saudi Arabia—it captures a mythology about the transformation of a country from tribal desert beginnings to bustling urban centers, from a nomadic people to a state at the heart of the global economy. Everyone disembarked to snap this fabled place, only to be told—in no uncertain terms—that photos of the well were not permitted. Clearly, one is able to explain constraints on taking pictures of women, the human form in general, and military installations, but frankly, this was difficult to spell out. A capped hole in the ground behind a fence does not appear to constitute a security installation, but, as this case illustrated, security is broadly defined in Saudi Arabia.

Yet, the real concern is less over the private memories of individual tourists and more over potential reproductions on the Internet, what if a tourist surreptitiously photographs a beheading—will tour group itineraries affect executions? What if a tourist posts on his Web site travel photo gallery pictures that were secretly snapped of unveiled Saudi women? It is not clear how long Saudi Arabia can invite foreign tourists to visit and yet restrict their memory banks. With tourism at the intersection of globalism and national identity, how long can restrictions be placed on paying tourists? Lest one conclude that these are mere academic concerns, a debate on the issue is under way in Saudi Arabia, as evidenced in an editorial in which the author searches for an explanation of the many restrictions on photography.[237] The observer argues that forbidding photography serves no real purpose, and in some cases actually creates ill will, bad publicity, and misunderstanding. He makes repeated references to incidents involving foreign tourists.

 The Security Muddy Edge

The second, and closely related, muddy edge is that of security and permissions. During the January 2000 tour, the bus arrived at the Jeddah airport Hajj Terminal—a structure that has won many awards and is striking in its open, stark beauty, with rows of white “tent peaks” arrayed against a brilliant blue sky—and tourists walked freely about the open-air facility, taking pictures even after the local guide asked them to refrain. The discussion went back and forth; tourists simply disregarded his words. Finally, exasperated and uncomfortable, he pleaded with me, “This is serious. We do not have permission. Make them stop.” Protracted negotiations took place between the local tour operators and terminal security guards. There was a good deal of running between offices and there was much permission to seek. Curiously, the tourists and the U.S. operator were blissfully unconcerned with the delicate position in which the local guides were placed. The U.S. operator assured me, “We are OK. We have permission.” Ironically, the difficulty might well be a difference in nuance, as few recognize that in Saudi Arabia, not all permissions are equal. And sometimes, one needs several permissions. This incident reinforced an earlier observation that it is neither the tourists nor the foreign operators who pay the price for such incidents. It is the local tour guides who are put in precarious positions that require social skills and negotiating abilities.

 The Social Norms Muddy Edge

The third muddy edge concerns social norms and proper covering of women. Not surprisingly, female tourists chafed constantly about having to wear an abaya and headscarf. Rather than simply assume that it must be worn (as they had agreed prior to the trip), many constantly asked, “Do we have to wear this thing?” The endeavors to explain how different styles and degrees of covering reflect differences in ideology, class, and region were not enough. Most participants never did appreciate the significant variations that exist within the general norm of covering; it was just all black and it was all hot. One foreign tour company put what they believe is a positive spin on the dress requirement in their press coverage. They suggest that rather than taking away from the experience of traveling to an exotic place, such rules on covering reinforce the exoticism. “There aren’t that many places in the world where you have to mesh yourself into the country to see it. It adds an interesting perspective.”[238]

Most women grudgingly wore the abaya; however, one woman was particularly troublesome. At the old suq in al Hofuf, where group tourism really is a new thing, she paraded through the narrow rows of stalls with her abaya unsnapped, so that it flowed open toward the back as she walked. She wore a bright white, tight T-shirt and strolled with her hands in her pockets, calling attention to herself. As if to provide a double insult, she purchased a bedouin burqa, a particular style of face veil. When she wore the burqa, her face was fully covered in black, yet her hair was uncovered and her abaya flapped open as she walked through the rows of merchandise.

Another encounter with different social norms became evident after a dinner in a private home. Interestingly, as the group boarded the bus to return to the hotel, one of the tourists was wearing something new. She had apparently walked out of the home with the personal coat belonging to a family member. One can only assume that she complimented the coat, and in turn the host insisted that she keep it. Saudi Arabians take the social norms of hospitality to new heights. When guests compliment an item, hosts may feel obligated to give the item to the admirer, even if the family is not wealthy. The tourist wore this coat proudly for the duration of the trip, in place of her abaya. But one wonders how long families can play hosts to tourists if they lose their private possessions. There is a steep learning curve involved for all participants.

 The Expatriate Muddy Edge

The fourth muddy edge is one that is hidden from the tourist gaze; i.e., living conditions of the foreign labor force. At a road security stop in the Hejaz, it became clear in watching the animated discussion between security and the local guides that the bus driver lacked a proper ikama (residency/work permit). Had the local operator not been so skilled at negotiation, the group would have had to turn around and scrap the days' itinerary. On another day, a Filipino bus driver accidentally caught the bus on a large boulder that had tumbled onto the edge of the street during construction. As he could not maneuver the bus, we were stuck, and while he followed the instructions of the Saudis to disengage from the rock, the side mirror then caught on a tree branch. It was hot and humid. The all-important closely timed itinerary was in jeopardy. Tempers flared in a quietly contained manner. The bus would not budge; the group sat inside the bus as the men tried to remedy the situation. Several tourists inquired, with genuine sincerity, "What will happen to the driver now? What will they do to him?" There was some unease that he would be deported, refused salary, or worse. When these concerns were relayed to the Saudi guide, he explained into the microphone that the firm had to fill out insurance forms in triplicate to submit their claims to get the repairs done. Hearing this, the tourists sighed with relief. This muddy edge was just barely and accidentally exposed. It cannot be hidden forever.

* Tourism and Sociopolitical Discourse: Losing the Monopoly

Nevertheless, even with such nuanced characteristics, Saudi Arabia hopes to promote old-fashioned, private, for-profit tourism. This is an important distinction to understand because it fundamentally affects control of the discourse. Saudi Arabia has long hosted visiting delegations of specialized groups, e.g., non-specialist scholars.[239] These delegations have traveled under the auspices of cultural and educational exchange; the trips are significantly subsidized, so those travelers are essentially guests of the country. In exchange for the trip, participants are normally expected to contribute different kinds of community outreach upon their return, including talks or newspaper articles on the country. Private tourism is quite different; anyone with time and money can sign up for the excursion. Since they paid a hefty price for the tour, no expectations are incumbent upon participants. They may write or evaluate the experience in whatever ways they choose. There is no pretense of scholarly or cultural exchange; these are simply tourists seeing the world. Consequently, the phenomenon fundamentally changes the dynamics of travel because the state can no longer control the discourse about its development.

Already, within this first year of tourism, the impact is clear. Two full pages of a newspaper were devoted to Saudi Arabia after a writer joined a tour and wrote an account of his experience.[240] Interestingly, these articles are not in the travel section, but comprise the cover story of the “Perspective” (editorial) section, and are headed “Foreign Affairs.” The essay opens with this rather strong sentence, “Stand the U.S. Constitution on its head, and you have Saudi Arabia,” and it continues, “Absent the oil equation, it’s a fair surmise that U.S. policy toward this desert kingdom would manifest—at least to some degree—the abhorrence aimed at such repressive regimes as communist North Korea and the Taleban fundamentalists of Afghanistan. Saudi Arabia has ample trappings of a police state.” The writer goes on to detail the absence of press freedom, constraints on women, the absence of any free expression, the absence of basic political rights, as well as the lack of movies and concerts.

The first major coverage of tourism in Saudi Arabia appeared in Travel & Leisure, a glossy monthly magazine that caters to the industry and to well-heeled tourists. The magazine sent a writer and photographer to accompany one of the first U.S. tour groups. In this instance, the table of contents reads, “Shifting Sands: One of the most secretive of the OPEC members, Saudi Arabia has finally decided to open its doors to Westerners. Hitch a ride with the first American tour group to visit a kingdom that still isn’t sure that tourists are a good idea.”[241] In reference to a brief stay on the outskirts of Madinah, the writer asks, “Since the fall of the Soviet Union, how many places are left on earth where you can be restricted to your hotel?” Newsweek, too, carried a very brief blurb on “Touring Muslim Style,” in which the author suggested rules of the road for visits to Islamic countries. The only mention of Saudi Arabia was that all female tourists would be issued a black abaya, the voluminous cloak Saudi Arabian women wear.[242]

It is apparent from these reports that the state will lose its monopoly on the discourse; permitting tourism and the construction of tourist memories, then, is actually a rather bold and risky move on the part of its sponsors.

* Identity and Tourism: On Being and Belonging In Saudi Arabia

The complexity of the political economy of tourism in Saudi Arabia is demonstrated in its muddy edges. It is also illustrated in the loss of the state monopoly of discourse, the inclusions and exclusions in representation, and the motivations of tourists to travel there. The tourist experience demonstrates how quickly things are changing in Saudi Arabia. Sites that were pristine ten years ago are now ringed in tourist villas and amusement parks. Ruins that were poignant in their worn majesty have been restored to gleaming newness. Suqs that were off the beaten track are now on international itineraries.

Yet, it is also evident that new spaces for public discourse are cautiously opening in Saudi Arabia. There simply is more discussion about more subjects in public than previously. Saudi Arabian society is opening faster than state structures. For the first time in recent memory, there is acknowledgment of differences among Saudi Arabians. That is, different regions, costumes, and customs are acknowledged and even celebrated in museums and shows. Together with a dominant narrative of Islam and Abdul Aziz, there also exists acknowledgment of diversity. In addition, there is for the first time a new comfort level in acknowledging the pre-Islamic past. Rather than denying it, it is analyzed in museums.

It must be underscored that there is a tremendous upside to the fact that Saudi Arabia is such a latecomer to international tourism and to archeology. Rich ruins that lay beneath the desert are so late in being discovered—archeology is just unfolding—that the sites are protected. Shards and monuments will certainly be documented by a new generation of Saudi archeologists. They will not be looted and taken to capital cities on other continents. The sense of self and domestic jurisdiction (vis-â-vis foreigners) is embedded strongly enough to protect national resources. Furthermore, tourism was only initiated in the year 1999, long after the jargon of "sustainable development" became a part of our lexicon.[243] Indeed, the late-late incorporation into the global tourism economy may prove to be a benefit and allow Saudi Arabia to avoid pitfalls that marred tourist development in the years prior to cognizance of sustainability.

In a tangential but parallel vein, the massive recently published encyclopedia of Saudi Arabian folklore is described as "a truly nationalist project." Its contributors claimed that such an endeavor could not be undertaken until the last decade because tribal and regional divisions continued to plague the country. One of its contributors recognized that "until Saudis spoke the same Arabic dialect and tribal and regional cultural differences diminished, a project examining the country's heritage would have been too contentious to be approved by the censors."[244] Again, the country was late in preserving its heritage, but the long delay also made preservation feasible.

"Being a Saudi" has been defined in recent years vis-â-vis the other—the other being the millions of foreign laborers who staff the economy. Identity and citizenship were about belonging to a community that was distinguished from expatriates by particular social norms and by economic privilege. Over time, the rights and obligations of citizenship have been defined in social and economic ways to encompass Islamic values, loyalty to the ruling family, conformist social behavior, and the centrality of the family unit. This construction of citizenship is being challenged as more people seek representation. Tourism, situated at the nexus of global capitalism and identity, is very much about this evolving national narrative on being and belonging. As discussed above, the muddy edges of cultural representation reflect contested voices within Saudi Arabia, about gender, religion, ethnicity, and social norms.

* Appendix: Description of Tour Itinerary

In Riyadh, located in the Central Province, participants visited the stunning new National Museum, the fortress-like Diplomatic Quarter, Qasr al Tuwaiq, al Dir’iyah (the ancestral home of the Al Saud family), Mismak Fort (where Abdul Aziz and his band of 40 men captured the Najd back from the Rashids), and a camel market. In Dhahran, in the Eastern Province, participants visited the high-tech exhibit at Aramco, Well #7 (where oil was discovered in 1938), the infrastructural wonder of the causeway that links Saudi Arabia to the island state of Bahrain, and a private school. An excursion to the old suq in al Hofufwas also on the itinerary, as was a stop at a date market. The wonderful stay in aljoufwas shaped by our experiences with the family of the Saudi Arabian tour guide. Also there, tourists saw many ruins, including Domat al Jandal, Sakaka, Qasr Zabel, Qasr Marid, the mosque of Omar, and Rajajil, a small Stonehenge-like monument of standing rocks. The group then used a hotel on the outskirts of Madinah proper as a point of departure for a trip up north to see the remnants of the Hejaz Railway and the tombs cut into rock in the dramatic landscape of Madain Saleh. In the beautiful port city of Jeddah, tourists visited the Abdul Raouf Khalil Museum (a private collection of artwork of varied quality and origin), the Greek Island Restaurant (to which Saudis would never go), the Hajj Terminal, the historic home of the Naseef family, and the old Jeddah suq. The highlight of the city was a dinner in the backyard of a private villa, complete with laser and sound show as well as a fashion show. Finally, the days in the Asir included stops at the National Park, Habala Village, Rigal al Ma, and the market of Khamis Mushayt.

[202] J. Urry, “The ‘Consumption’ of Tourism,” Sociology 24:1,1990, pp. 23–35.

[203] Stuart Hall, “Introduction: Who Needs Identity?” in s. Hall and p. DuGay (eds.) Questions of Cultural Identity, California: Sage, 1996.

[204] For discussion of identity and tourism, see Simone Abram, Jaqueline Waldren, and Donald هعحكلأيج Tourists andTourism: Identifying with People and Places, 0١99٦ ,<؟٢ل٢ة٦أحةاً؟ ل.

[205] Colin Michael Hall, Tourism and Politics: Policy, Power and Place, Chichester: John Wiley and Sons, 1994, p. 194.

[206] Susan Ossman, “Boom Box in Ouarzazate: The Search for the Similarly Strange,” Middle East Report 25:5, September-October 1995, pp. 12–14.

[207] I do not suggest that tourism has shaped identity or prompted social change; rather, that it exposes ongoing internal debates.

[208] The empirical part of this analysis is based on my participation in one of the first study tours of Saudi Arabia in January 2000. I served as the study leader for a private tour group from the United States that traveled under the auspices of a national museum. This analysis is in no way associated with the tour operators, nor does it reflect upon their performance, which was outstanding in every respect. Rather, it is an attempt to grapple with new and complex sociopolitical issues that emanate from tourism. The author is solely responsible for the views expressed herein.

[209] In the former state socialist countries of eastern Europe, Hall has suggested, tourism acted, among other things, as “a catalyst for social change, by permitting greater and closer interaction between host populations and those from the outside world, particularly as constraints on tourist accommodations and itineraries [wejre eased.” See Hall, op. cit., p. 109.

[210] Susan Slyomovics, “Tourist Containment,” Middle East Report 25:5, September-October 1995, p. 6.

[211] On authenticity, which I think will be an important question in Saudi Arabia, see Donald Getz, “Event Tourism and the Authenticity Dilemma,” in Global Tourism: The Next Decade, William Theobald (ed.) Oxford: Butterworth-Heinemann, 1996; see also s. Lash andj. Urry, Economies of Sign and Space, London: Sage Publications, 1994; Erik Cohen, “Contemporary Tourism-Trends and Challenges: Sustainable Authenticity or Contrived Post-Modernity,” in Richard Butler and Douglas Pearce (eds.). Change in Tourism: People, Places, Processes, London: Routledge, 1995;John Hutnyk, “Magical Mystery Tourism,” in Raminder Kaur and John Hutnyk (eds.). Travel Worlds: Journeys in Contemporary Cultural Politics, London: Zed Books, 1999; and Hazel Tucker, “Tourism and the Ideal Village,” in Abram, op. cit.

[212] “Saudis Seeking Tourists, Preferably the Well-Off,” Agence France-Presse, Dubai, 11 May 2000.

[213] “Hotel Operators Eye Opportunities in Saudi Arabia,” Reuters, Dubai, 16 May 2000.

[214] Eileen Alt Powell, “Saudi Tourism: Conservative kingdom is finally opening its door to foreign visitors,” Associated Press, Abha, in the Northwest Arkansas Times, 16 May 1999.

[215] Ibid.

[216] Tim Mitchell, “Worlds ApartrAn Egyptian Village and the International Tourism Industry,” Middie East Report 25:5, September-October 1995, pp. 8–11.

[217] For a critical analysis of tourism in the Middle East, see “Tourism and the Business of Pleasure,” Middle East Report 25:5, September-October 1995.

[218] “James Gavin, “Saudi Arabia: All Change,” Middle East Economic Digest 44:26, 50 June 2000, pp. 19–20.

[219] Abdullah al Shihri, “Saudis Establish Tourism Body,” Associated Press, Riyadh, 17 April 2000. Such figures suggest that Saudi Arabia is not simply a receptor destination, as is the case for much of the developing world; rather, Saudi Arabians themselves are active travelers elsewhere.

[220] “New Challenge for Riyadh,” GulfNews (editorial), 8 April 2000.

[221] “New Council to Promote Tourism,” Saudi Arabian Embassy Newsletter 17:5, May 2000.

[222] “Hotel Operators Eye Opportunities in Saudi Arabia,” Reuters, Dubai, 16 May 2000.

[223] “Saudi Tourism Will Have Slow Start,” GulfNews, 6 April 2000; see also “Saudi Minister Says Sponsorship to be Scrapped,” Reuters, 27 April 2000.

[224] (6,500 Tourists Get Saudi Visas,” Agence France-Presse, 31 July 2000.

[225] Arab News, 30 July 2000.

[226] Philip L. Pearce, The Social Psychology of Tourist Behavior, Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1982, p. 137.

[227] Ghana Gurung, David Simmons, and Patrick Devlin, “The Evolving Role of Tourist Guides: The Nepali Experience,” in Thomas Hinch and Richard Butler (eds.). Tourism and Indigenous Peoples, London: International Thomson Business Press, 1996, pp. 107–28.

[228] The phrase was coined by John Urry, The Tourist Gaze: Leisure and Travel in Contemporary Societies, London: Sage, 1990.

[229] Saudi Arabian colleagues, who have long criticized my scholarship as being too harsh, might be interested to learn that some tourists perceived me as “seeing Saudi Arabia through rose-colored glasses.”

[230] Dean MacCannell, The TouristzA New Theory of the Leisure Class, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1999, p. 203.

[231] Madawi Al Rasheed, “Political Legitimacy and the Production of History: The Case of Saudi Arabia,” in L. Martin (ed.). New Frontiers in Middle East Security, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999, pp. 25–46.

[232] As well as a 12-volume Arabic-language Encyclopedia of Folklore of the Kingdom of SaudiArabia that was published in 1999. See Judith Miller, “Encyclopedia Raises Veil on Ancient Saudi Culture,” New York Times, 20 June 2000.

[233] On museums, see Michael Hitchcock, Nick Stanley, and Siu King Chung, “The South-east Asian ‘Living Museum’ and Its Antecedents,” in Abram, op. cit.

[234] “Tourism Secretary General Praises Riyadh in London Speech,” Saudi Arabian Embassy, Washington, DC., press release, 10 May 2000.

[235] Though there now appears to be a new mode of international voyeur tourism, in which the itineraries of foreign tourists are purposely designed to bring busloads into the ghettos and shantytowns of the developing world.

[236] Ted Conover and Brown w. Cannon III, “Shifting Sands,” Travel & Leisure, March 2000, p. 228.

[237] Khalid al Maeena, “Clicking Off the Curbs of Out-dated Practices,” GulfNews, 24 May 2000.

[238] Powell, op. cit.

[239] Gwenn Okruhlik, “Bringing the Peninsula in from the Periphery: From Imagined Scholarship to Gendered Discourse,” Middle East Report 27:3,July-September 1997, pp. 36—37.

[240] Jack Schnedler, “Saudi Arabia: Our Strange Bedfellow,” Arkansas Democrat Gazette, 16 April 2000, Section J, pp. 1,8.

[241] Conover and Cannon III, op. cit., p. 154.

[242] Carla Power, “Touring Muslim Style,” Newsweek, 10 July 2000, p. 70.

[243] Peter E. Murphy, “Tourism and Sustainable Development,” in Theobald, op. cit., pp. 27490.

[244] Sa’ad al Sowayan, in Judith Miller, op. cit.

 Chapter 9: Saudi Arabia: Measures of Transition From a Rentier State

Robert E. Looney

The purpose of this chapter is to assess the extent to which Saudi Arabia's longterm economic development strategy is meeting its objectives. Early on after the 1973–74 oil boom, the government decided that a high proportion of the country's oil revenues should be spent in a manner that would encourage private sector investment and production.[245] Part of a larger political/military strategy,[246] the economic component was to diversify the economy away from oil to the extent that self-sustaining growth could occur in the major non-oil sectors of the economy. Clearly, the goal is the creation of an economy capable of functioning independently of developments in the oil sector. This strategy was intended to provide more stability to the country's pattern of economic growth and development, and while several oil-producing countries express this desire, the Kingdom's planners put together a coherent investment strategy, focused on achieving this result.[247] At least publicly, the strategy has remained in place since the early 1970s.

While goals of this strategy seem straightforward, arriving at an objective assessment of progress made to date is extremely difficult. Examining the patterns of private sector growth does not necessarily come to grips with the issue. Output can expand simply through a continuation of government expenditures or momentum from past public allocations. If one could show that, over time, a linkage from private expenditures to private output was growing stronger than that of public expenditures to private output, then one might argue that the economy had evolved a bit, but that private expenditures themselves could not be sustained without a steady infusion of government funds. Conceptually, therefore, the methods by which one defines and measures oil independence are at the crux of assessing the success of the country's development accomplishments.

The chapter is divided into several parts. The first sections provide a brief overview of the macro-economy. Trends in output and expenditure are examined, and the more relevant patterns identified. Several linkages are made to earlier studies of the country’s growth mechanisms.[248] The second part of the study develops an operational test for measuring the extent to which the private sector is replacing government expenditures as the prime mover of the non-oil sector. Relatively new statistical techniques are introduced, including co-integration and error correction, to shed light on various issues. Based on this discussion, particular statistical tests are devised to measure changes over time in the Kingdom’s economic mechanisms. Ultimately, these tools are used to ascertain whether the public sector is becoming less dominant and in what sense, and whether the private sector is showing that it is now primarily responsible for large segments of non-oil sector growth. Once these questions are properly assessed, and based on the results of this analysis, the final section discusses several policy implications.

* Patterns of Growth and Expenditure, 1964–1998

Saudi Arabia has experienced periods of remarkable growth and other periods of relative stability and even decline. For the 1964–98 period as a whole, gross domestic product (GDP) at constant prices increased at an average annual rate of 5.7 percent, but with private sector GDP and non-oil GDP increasing at an even faster 6.8 and 6.7 percent, respectively (Table 9.1). Public expenditures experienced a sharp deceleration, increasing by double digits in the 1964–80 period, but with negative rates associated in investment and non-defense disbursements during the subsequent period. Private expenditures were a bit more stable, but these too experienced a general downtrend in the latter time periods.

Several other patterns emerge out of these data. First, after an initial surge following the 1973–74 oil price increases, public sector investment/infrastructure expansion was flat, actually experiencing a fairly large (-6.4 percent per annum) contraction over the 1980–98 period. Second, public consumption was the only major category of governmental expenditures to indicate a positive rate of growth in the post-1980 period. Third, of major government expenditure categories, defense was the fastest-growing sector during the last decade (1989–98). Fourth, and in contrast, private sector investment generally expanded more rapidly than consumption over the 1980–98 time frame. Fifth, the general pattern of private sector expenditures was considerably more stable than those of the public sector. Sixth, construction was by far the most volatile sector, growing at an average annual rate of 42.5 percent during the 1964–80 period, but at a -0.3 percent rate during the 1980–98 period. Finally, and ironically, one of the fastest-growing sectors, agriculture, was the one in which the country enjoyed the least natural advantages.

Despite Riyadh’s persistent efforts to diversify the economy away from oil, the hydrocarbon industry is still dominant in several important regards. Oil production still accounts for roughly 30 percent of GDP, 90 percent of exports, and 70 percent of budget revenues. Therefore, the economy remains highly vulnerable to fluctuations in international oil markets. This is readily apparent, as in 1998, when nominal GDP contracted by 12 percent, mainly due to a 25-year low price of Arabian Light, the benchmark Saudi crude, averaging below $12 a barrel. After the early 1999 market rally, the whole atmosphere of the country has dramatically changed, from one of frustration and despair to that of confidence and optimism.[249]

Table 9.1 Saudi Arabia: Rates of Growth, 1964–1998 (average annual %)

| Sector | 1964 | 1998 | 1964 | 1980 | 1964 | 1989 | 1974 | 1998 | 19801998 | 19891998 |

| SECTOR OUTPUT | | | | | | |

| Agriculture | 5.3 | 3.4 | 6.7 | 6.9 | 6.9 | 1.5 |

| Mining | 6.7 | 12.9 | 8.8 | 3.9 | 1.6 | 1.2 |

| Manufacturing | 9.4 | 14.8 | 12.0 | 7.4 | 4.9 | 2.6 |

| Electricity, Gas, Water | 6.3 | 13.6 | 7.8 | 7.0 | 0.3 | 3.2 |

| Construction | 14.8 | 42.3 | 18.4 | 7.9 | -0.3 | 4.3 |

| Wholesale, Retail Trade | 7.6 | 14.6 | 10.1 | 6.5 | 1.7 | 1.1 |

| Transport, Communications | 11.8 | 23.9 | 15.9 | 5.7 | 7.8 | 1.3 |

| Ownership of Dwellings | 5.5 | 13.1 | 7.1 | 2.3 | -0.8 | 1.2 |

| Finance, Insurance | 5.6 | 9.6 | 7.8 | 4.5 | 1.0 | 0.7 |

| Services | 5.3 | 7.2 | 72 | 4.7 | 2.9 | 1.2 |

| TOTAL OUTPUT | | | | | | |

| GDP | 5.7 | 11.0 | 6.7 | 3.1 | 1.2 | 3.0 |

| Oil GDP | 4.3 | 10.0 | 3.8 | 0.7 | -0.5 | 5.8 |

| Non-Oil GDP | ר.6 | 11.7 | 8.5 | 5.2 | 2.3 | 1.8 |

| Private Sector GDP | 6.8 | 11.4 | 8.7 | 5.6 | 2.9 | 1.5 |

| Public Sector GDP | 6.4 | 12.5 | 7.8 | 4.4 | 1.2 | 2.6 |

| PUBLIC EXPENDITURES | | | | | | |

| Investment | 5.8 | 21.4 | 8.9 | 0.4 | -6.4 | -2.3 |

| Infrastructure | 5.7 | 19.2 | 7.6 | 2.2 | .5.0 | 0.6 |

| Consumption | 7.8 | 15.0 | 10.6 | 4.3 | 1.8 | 0.5 |

| Defense | 8.7 | 21.0 | 11.1 | 4.7 | -1.1 | 2.5 |

| Non-Defense | 5.1 | 15.7 | 8.5 | 3.2 | 3.5 | -3.7 |

| Total National Account | 6.3 | 14.6 | 8.6 | 3.9 | -0.5 | 0.1 |

| PRIVATE EXPENDITURES | | | | | | |

| Investment | 72 | 5.9 | 8.4 | 4.1 | 2.3 | 1.2 |

| Consumption | 6.4 | 12.5 | 8.6 | 5.0 | 1.3 | 0.5 |

| Total Private | 6.6 | 12.6 | 8.6 | 4.8 | 1.5 | 1.2 |

Source: Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency, Annual Report, various issues.

On the other hand, the differential growth rates noted above have created major structural shifts in the Saudi economy during the last several decades. In particular, the share of agriculture in (non-oil) GDP increased, from 8.1 percent in 1975 to 13.4 percent in 1998. This stands as a clear difference, with similar trends in most developing countries. Similarly, manufacturing showed a steady expansion, from 5.5 percent of non-oil GDP in 1975 to 9.5 by 1998. Non-oil GDP also experienced a steady expansion, increasing from 36.5 percent of GDP before the 1970 oil boom to nearly 70 percent by 1998. With regard to public expenditures, investment showed the most dramatic change, falling from 12.9 percent of GDP in 1980 to 5·9 percent in 1998. In contrast, public investment was only 5.3 percent of GDP before 1970, and public consumption increased from 16.8 percent of GDP in 1970 to 33.1 percent in 1998. As noted above, defense expenditures remained relatively high, at 12.6 percent of GDP. This was up from 7.4 in 1970 but down from 16.0 in 1990. Non-oil revenues were still quite low, accounting for only around 8.7 percent of GDP, although this was up from 0.9 in 1970. Private investment showed good progress, increasing from 5.1 percent of GDP in 1970 to 12.6 percent in 1998. Still, compared with countries in the same income range, Saudi Arabia has a higher share of GDP allocated to consumption and a lower share to investment when private and public expenditures are combined (Table 9.2).

The public sector budget has also undergone considerable structural change, with detailed and consistent budgetary data available starting in 1979 (Table 9.3).

The most dramatic gains in budgetary share were in the area of human resource development. This expenditure category increased its budgetary share from around 8.5 to over 23 percent by 1998. Health and social development expanded faster than the overall increase in budgetary allocations as well, increasing their share from 4.6 in 1997 to 8.4 in 1998. Interestingly enough, these two categories were the only ones averaging a positive growth rate (2.8 for human resource development and 0.6 per annum for health). The biggest budgetary declines were in transport and communications (-7.3 percent per annum), economic resource development (-6.8), and infrastructure (-7.7). Other major contractions were in government lending institutions (-20.2 percent) and public administration (-4.3 percent). Defense, although growing at an average annual rate of—0.3, still increased its share from 26 percent in 1979 to nearly 40 percent by 1998. Given these patterns, and together with the fact that the total budget contracted at an average annual rate of 2.5 percent, several sectors were clearly more “protected” than others. According to reliable studies, the manner in which countries protect selected components of the budget during periods of austerity indicates that defense and civil service sectors are far more vulnerable.[250]

In fact, the average decline in the growth of real government expenditures was 13 percent.[251] Associated with this decline was a contraction of only 5 percent in the social sectors (producing a vulnerability index of 0.4). By contrast, the index was 0.6 for the administrative and defense sectors, and over 1 percent for production and infrastructure. In short, the various social sectors were less vulnerable to cuts than defense and administration, which, in turn, were considerably less vulnerable than production and infrastructure, contrary to the generally accepted view.

The fact that social sectors and defense were both relatively protected suggests that there were high political costs associated with reducing them. On the other hand, several countries in various case studies appeared to have been more willing to cut spending on infrastructure and production, which, of course, is likely to have adverse implications for longer-term growth, but few early direct and immediate costs.

Saudi Arabia appears to fit this pattern fairly well, although some of the Kingdom’s budgetary categories do not overlap with the standardized International Monetary Fund (IMF) categories used by Hicks and Kubisch. In the Saudi case, three groups of budgetary items emerge, starting with highly favored categories, including those in the bottom part of Table 9.3 (in brackets), which actually expanded in real terms while the budget contracted; second, sectors that contracted at a slower rate than the overall budget and had an elasticity of less than 1; and finally, sectors that contracted at a rate more rapid than the overall budget (having an elasticity of greater than 1).

Table 9.2 Saudi Arabia: Economic Structure, 1970-1998 (average annual %)

| Sector | 1970 | 1975 | 1980 | 1990 | 1995 | 1998 |

| SECTOR OUTPUT (% NON-OIL GDP) | | | | |

| Agriculture | 12.7 | 8.1 | 6.1 | 13.9 | 13.6 | 13.4 |

| Manufacturing | 6.0 | 5.5 | 6.0 | 8.6 | 8.8 | 9.4 |

| Mining | 0.6 | 0).7 | 0.5 | 0.5 | 0.5 | 0.5 |

| Refining | 16.9 | 9.0 | 6.2 | 9.1 | 12.9 | 13.0 |

| Electricity, Gas, Water | 3.7 | 2.3 | 3.9 | 3.3 | 3.7 | 3.85 |

| Construction | 11.9 | 21.9 | 20.0 | 9.1 | 8.8 | 9.0 |

| Wholesale, Retail Trade | 13.1 | 15.4 | 22.4 | 20.5 | 20.2 | 20.1 |

| Transport, Communications | 18.3 | 10).4 | 11.9 | 11.6 | 11.5 | 11.3 |

| Ownership of Dwellings | 8.6 | 12.88 | 11.5 | 6.6 | 66 | 6.6 |

| Finance, Insurance | 4.5 | 4.5 | 5.0 | 4.2 | 4.0 | 3.9 |

| Services | 3.1 | 2.4 | 2.1 | 2.3 | 2.2 | 2.2 |

| TOTAL OUTPUT (%/ GDP) | | | | | | |

| Oil GDP | 63.5 | 71.1 | 69.6 | 385.0) | 37.2 | 30.2 |

| Non-Oil GDP | 36.5 | 28.9 | 30).4 | 62.0 | 62.8 | 69.8 |

| Private Sector GDP | 25.9 | 17.3 | 17.1 | 36.1 | 36.5 | 40.6 |

| Public Sector GDP | 107 | 11.6 | 13.3 | 25.9 | 26.1 | 29.2 |

| Public/Private Output (% non-oil | GDP) | | | | | |

| Private Sector GDP | 102 | 59.8 | 56.3 | 58.3 | 58.1 | 58.2 |

| Public Sector GDP | 29.80 | 40.2 | 43.7 | 41.7 | 41.6 | 41.8 |

| PUBLIC FISCAL (%/ GDP) | | | | | | |

| Investment | 5.3 | 10.7 | 12.9 | 11.0 | 5.3 | 5.9 |

| Consumption | 16.8 | 17.6 | 15.8 | 31.2 | 26.1 | 33.1 |

| Defense | 7.4 | 9.1 | 13.3 | 16.0 | 10).5 | 12.6 |

| National Account Expenditures | 22.2 | 28.3 | 288.7 | 42.2 | 31.4 | 39.1 |

| Budgetary Expenditure | 26.9 | 19.5 | 36.4 | 46.7 | 31.8 | 34.9 |

| Oil Revenues | 24.2 | 57.5 | 36.5 | 288.7 | 21.5 | 28.9 |

| Non-Oil Revenues | 0.9 | 3.6 | 4.2 | 12.4 | 7.1 | 8.7 |

| PRIVATE EXPENDITURES (%/ GDP) | | | | |

| Investment | 5.1 | 6.5 | 5.5 | 7.0 | 11.4 | 12.6 |

| Consumption | 28.4 | 14.6 | 222 | 40.5 | 411 | 42.2 |

| Total Private | 33.5 | 21.1 | 21.1 | 47.5 | 52.5 | 54.8 |

Source: Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency, Annual Report, various issues.

Table 9.3 Saudi Arabia: Public Sector Budget, 1979–1998 (average annual %%)

| Sector | 1979 | 1985 | 1990 | 1995 | 1998 |

| BUDGETARY SHARES (%/ TOTAL BUDGET) | | |

| Human Resource Development | 8.46 | 12.27 | 15.58 | 17.94 | 23.21 |

| Transport & Communications | 11.31 | 7.25 | 4.70 | 4.13 | 4.35 |

| Economic Resource Development | 6.89 | 4.54 | 2.56 | 2.57 | 2.97 |

| Health and Social Development | 4.55 | 6.45 | 6.82 | 6.17 | 8.36 |

| Infrastructure Development | 3.13 | 3.46 | 1.37 | 0.93 | 1.1 |

| Municipal Services | 5.88 | 5.95 | 3.31 | 3.25 | 3.34 |

| Defense and Security | 26.12 | 31.98 | 34.32 | 33.00 | 39.91 |

| Public Administration | 18.04 | 19.29 | 27.96 | 26.47 | 12.79 |

| Government Lending Institutions | 11.46 | 4.65 | 0.59 | 0.32 | 0.26 |

| Local Subsidies | 4.16 | 4.17 | 2.8 | 4.61 | 3.71 |

| BUDGETARY GROWTH (% AVERAGE ANNUAL RATE) | | |

| Human Resource Development | 2.8 | 2.6 | 3.1 | -4.1 | 3.3 |

| Transport & Communications | -7.3 | -10.5 | -9.0 | -9.2 | -21 |

| Economic Resource Development | -6.8 | -10.0 | -13.2 | -6.1 | 0.1 |

| Health and Social Development | 0.6 | 2.2 | -1.5 | -6.9 | 0.8 |

| Infrastructure Development | -7.7 | -1.9 | -19.1 | -13.7 | -4.3 |

| Municipal Services | -5.4 | -3.4 | -13.4 | -7.1 | -1.6 |

| Defense and Security | .0.3 | .0.3 | -1.2 | -7.5 | 0.2 |

| Public Administration | -4.3 | -2.5 | 4.9 | -7.8 | -10.9 |

| Government Lending Institutions | -20.2 | -17.0 | -35.5 | .17.7 | 0.0 |

| Local Subsidies | -3.1 | -3.5 | -10.1 | 3.0 | 1.8 |

| Total Budget | -2.5 | —3.6 | -2.6 | -6.8 | -1.7 |

| BUDGETARY GROWTH (ELASTICITIES) | | |

| Human Resource Development | 00.511 | 00.72] | [1.19] | 0.60 | [1.94] |

| Transport & Communications | 2.92 | 2.92 | 3.46 | 1.35 | 1.59 |

| Economic Resource Development | 2.72 | 2.78 | 5.08 | 0.11 | [0.06] |

| Health and Socid Development | [0.24] | [0.61] | 0.58 | 1.01 | 00.471 |

| Infrastructure Development | 3.08 | 0.53 | 7.34 | 2.01 | 2.53 |

| Municipal Services | 2.16 | 0.94 | 5.15 | 1.04 | 0.94 |

| Defense and Security | 0.12 | 0.08 | 0.46 | 1.10 | [0.12] |

| Public Administration | 1.72 | 0.69 | [1.88] | 1.15 | [6.41] |

| Government Lending Institutions | 8.08 | 4.72 | 13.65 | 2.60 | 0.00 |

| Local Subsidies | 1.24 | 0.90 | 3.88 | 10.44 | [1.06 |

| Source: Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency, Annual Report, various issues. |

For the period as a whole, and for most of the sub-periods, human resource development, health, and social development fall in the highly favored category. Defense is usually favored, and in the 1990s it, along with public administration, was highly favored. Most of the economic sectors were not favored, with contradictory budgetary shares.

The patterns reported above are consistent with an earlier study of Saudi Arabian budgetary allocations using regression analysis.[252] That study concluded that only several sectors were able to increase their budgetary shares during periods of unintended budgetary deficits. These were: human resource development, health, and social development. They were also the only sectors to have their budgetary shares increase during periods of increased actual (realized) budgetary deficits. Moreover, human resource development and health did not have their shares expanded with increases in expected revenue. This finding is consistent with the notion that their funding levels were assured just because of high priority. Thus, marginal increases in revenue could be safely used by the authorities to fund lower-priority projects.

Equally important, the deficit-related expansion in human capital seems to have come in part at the expense of longer-term investment in economic capacity. Specifically, transportation and communications, economic services, and infrastructure all had their budgetary shares contract during periods of unexpected and actual deficits. In general, the main findings of this study confirm the high priority granted human resource development by Saudi authorities. Resources allocated to this sector have been preserved, relative to competing sectors, during periods of austerity. To be sure, budgetary cuts have occurred in Saudi Arabia, but education has been spared. The long-term nature of this commitment is further evident by the fact that it appears relatively safe from budgetary cuts when overall disbursements cause deficits. The same could be said for health and social expenditures. Finally, while defense has regained its leading share of the budget during the recent period of relative fiscal austerity, Riyadh does not appear to have fallen into the guns versus education syndrome. In fact, both types of expenditures appear to complement each other in the minds of Saudi budgetary authorities.

Because of its importance to the economy, budgetary dynamics and tradeoffs associated with defense expenditures have received special attention. In particular, the impact of defense expenditures on the economy revealed that budgetary tradeoffs were often more complex than those associated with other categories.[253] In part, this simply reflects differences in budgetary priorities across countries. However, this complexity also stems from the fact that increased levels of government deficits can offset or reinforce the impacts that expanded defense expenditures have on other budgetary shares. Further analyses indicate that defense/socioeconomic tradeoffs varied considerably depending on whether the country had an environment characterized by high or low levels of military expenditures. This usually occurs in both the central government budget and in relation to the overall size of the economy. During the 1980s, for example, defense expenditures in these two environments had a differential impact on economic growth as well. In high defense expenditure countries, increase in the share of resources allocated to that sector did not provide any appreciable stimulus to the economy. For those countries, defense increases in central government budgets actually tended to reduce the overall rate of growth. In low defense countries, however, defense increases did provide a positive stimulus to economic growth. Furthermore, increases in the share of defense did not retard that growth.

There are several explanations for these patterns. In the Middle East at least, high defense countries appear to cut economic expenditures, to free up resources for further expansion of the military. This may occur because of the political costs in cutting non-defense expenditures, particularly over long periods of time. Again, with several exceptions, low defense countries seem to have more flexibility in accommodating increased levels of military expenditure. As a result, economic programs may not be as susceptible to cuts in these instances. Long-run costs, associated with the manner in which Middle Eastern countries alter budgetary shares—to accommodate increased military expenditures—may also be a key factor. For high defense countries as a whole, increased budgetary shares throughout the 1970s had a positive impact on growth in the 19805. Yet, increased shares to defense in the ‘80s impacted negatively. Given the observed lagged nature of many negative impacts in these countries, this may indicate the neglect of economic services, infrastructure, and the like. If that is the case, countries like Saudi Arabia may be finding that high defense burdens are starting to take a heavy toll on economic growth. If these lagged impacts are stable, one can expect non-oil GDP growth to expand at rates somewhat below its long-run growth path. Indeed, for the Kingdom, a reorientation of budgetary priorities may not provide an immediate stimulus to the economy.

Although a leading Saudi political economist has painted a slightly brighter picture than the one summarized above, our findings are consistent with each other.[254] In the Saudi analyst’s own words,

What was surprising in Saudi Arabia’s response to the challenges of the past decade is not merely the relative effectiveness of the state’s responses but the minimum political costs they entailed. This suggested a degree of resiliency by the Saudi state that was much greater than could be expected for rentier states.

The author also noted that three areas in particular required further attention, including,

(1) The domestic extraction capabilities of the state, [which] are still insufficient [and] almost entirely dependent on indirect taxation. Other Gulf states have already taken the important step of introducing personal income taxes to much demands; (2) the legal system and the official statistical base need[ed] urgent reforms if official plans to invite external investments [we]re to be realized; and (3) there [wa]s a need for the privatization program to proceed at a quicker rate and with greater transparency.”[255]

Clearly the Saudi budget has changed considerably over the years. While the fall in expenditures is the most dramatic manifestation of this phenomenon, the more subtle and less publicized shift in the composition of expenditures is perhaps just as significant in our understanding of the country's growth dynamics. If, for example, a decline in the ability of governmental expenditures—to stimulate the non-oil sector—was recorded, it would be logical to ask whether this occurred because of some sort of diminishing returns to public expenditures. Equally important, was the cause of such a decline the result of changes in the composition of specific expenditures?

* Criteria and Tests of Non-Oil Development

To examine the possible linkages between public and private sector expenditures on non-oil production in Saudi Arabia, a co-integration error-correction analysis was undertaken. While mathematically technical, this method has a straightforward intuitive appeal.[256] Co-integration/error-correction formulae are attempts to determine whether two series (such as private expenditures and sector output) move together over long periods of time.[257]

The analysis accepts the fact that short-run shocks can occur, whereby rapid increases (i.e., public sector investment) in one variable cause movement in the other (i.e., construction). However, if the two variables have developed a long-run linkage, whereby an ongoing stable set of links have been established, then equilibrium will be restored, with the speed of adjustment affected by the deviation from that long-run pattern, specifically, the speed of the longer-term adjustment will be dependent on the magnitude of the deviation from the long-run equilibrium pattern, as well as the strength of the linkage between the two variables. In short, the year-to-year growth of a sector such as non-oil manufacturing can be divided into two parts: the first associated with a short-run shock (increased public-sector consumption), and the second drawing on the longer-term linkages established with the causal variable (here public sector consumption).

The technique has been used successfully to assess several other facets of Gulf economies. For example, Al-Yousif s study of exports and economic growth in the region found that in the case of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the UAE, and Oman, there are no long-run relationships between exports and economic growth.[258] On the other hand, the study found that exports have had a positive and significant shorter-run impact on growth in all four countries. No doubt, one reason the long-run relationship did not hold up is because the significant relationship is not between exports per se, but how receipts are spent (invested) by respective governments. Moreover, and while highly dependent on oil, these Arab Gulf countries have been engaged in efforts to diversify their domestic economies and the structure of their trade. Apparently, these efforts have been successful in the sense that the economies are now capable of some measure of growth, independent of developments in the oil sector.

In another study of Saudi imports, the duration of import volume adjustments to changes in the explanatory variable was determined to be approximately two years.[259] This interval seems to be longer than that obtained by others. In one leading analysis, the long-run money demand function of GCC countries, using Johansen’s co-integration methodology, was determined to have a nominal effect.[260] However, this occurred only in the Saudi case. In contrast, the results indicate the presence of a long-run demand function for broad money for Saudi Arabia and the UAE, when real GDP, interest rates, price levels, and nominal effective exchange rates are included in the system. Thus, the modeling of money demand in Saudi Arabia and Bahrain, should be done in real terms. In other words, the additional international interest rate variable plays an important role in determining the demand for money in Saudi Arabia, the UAE, and Bahrain.

In general, these studies demonstrate that the technique is capable of yielding insights not often captured by the more conventional regression methods. A common theme is that economic development in the Gulf is becoming a more complex process as the economies mature and begin to diversify away from a complete reliance on oil revenues and associated public sector expenditures. For the purposes of this study the technique appears capable of developing a new, operational way to assess the extent of diversification from a rentier state.

In the early phases of economic development in oil-based countries, the expansion of many types of sectoral growth is highly dependent on government expenditures. One sign of achieving a diversified, self-sustaining economy should therefore be the severing, or at least the weakening, of the longer-term linkage with public expenditures. Ideally, these would be replaced by a similar linkage to the expansion of private sector production, specifically, when and if the Saudi non-oil economy develops to the point at which its growth can occur independently of government expenditures, then one may conclude that it has graduated from a pure oil economy. Conventional regression analysis would not be able to make these distinctions, because short-run growth spurts associated with government expenditure shocks often mask the possible weakening of its longer-term links to the non-oil economy.

Accordingly, a proposed development classification scheme for non-oil sectors in Saudi Arabia may include four specific constants: first, beginning stages, when weak or non-existent long-term links with public and private expenditures affect non-oil output (short-term links may be present in this constant); second, a partial integration stage, when development of longer-term links with public expenditures, and possibly short-term links with private expenditures, further affect non-oil output; third, an integrated stage, when strong links are established with private expenditures (in this instance, possible government involvement with strong links to one or more major expenditure categories may be present. The result would be a possible weakening of short-term links); finally, a mature stage, which weakens long-term government linkages and maintains long-term linkages with private sector production.

To these we might add a final self-sustaining stage in which all long-term links to the public sector have been broken, while at the same time strong long-run links have been forged with private sector demand and/or output. As with all stage theories of economic development, a major area of controversy might center on how one moves from one stage to another. Is economic reform a key element? Is the composition of private sector investment critical, and if so, in what way? While these questions are largely beyond the scope of this study, the results below do shed some light on the subject.

* Results

The first step in the analysis was to examine the impact that various types of public expenditure, including investment, consumption, defense, and total budgetary allocations, have had on private sector GDP (Table 9.4).[261] The main findings revealed that:

- patterns have varied over time, with a general weakening of links to public expenditures;

- in particular, and with the exception of public investment, no type of public sector expenditure was statistically significant (at the 95 percent level) in the most recent (1974–98) time period;

- in contrast, public investment, defense, and total public expenditure’s shortterm link with private GDP had been statistically significant at the 95 percent level in the earlier (19641989) period;

- the long-term impacts also show a weakening. This is evidenced by the declining size of the coefficient on the error-correction term (the size of the coefficient indicates the strength of adjustments to the long-term pattern). For total public expenditures, the 1974–1998 coefficient was over half (0.33 vs. 0.15) of its 1964–1989 value. Moreover, long-term private investment gross domestic product was barely significant at the 95 percent level, while it had been highly significant in the earlier period;

- coinciding with the weakening of longer-term public sector links (a major source of private sector demand), private consumption was strengthened, increasing the statistical significance of its long-term adjustment with that variable from 90 percent in the first period to over 95 percent in the second.

Table 9.4 Saudi Arabia: Influence of Public Expenditure on the Private Sector Economy

| | Short-Run Impact | Error-Correction Term |

| Variable | 1964--1989 | 1974--1998 | 1964--1998 | 1964--1989 | 1974--1998 |

| Private Sector GDP | | | | |

| Public Investment | † | † | -0.03
(-4.74)† | -0.04
(-4.10)† | -0.03
(-2.12)† |

| Public Consumption | ★ | ins | -0.10
(-3.59)† | -0.24
(-6.93)† | -0.10
(-3.03)† |

| Defense | † | ★ | -0.04
(-2.61)† | -0.11
(-7.28)† | -0.07
(-5.12)† |

| Total Public Expenditures | † | ★ | 0.14
(-2.50)† | -0.33
(-7.26)† | -0.15
(-2.37)† |

| Private Consumption | ★ | ★ | -0.11
(-2.10)† | -0.15
(-1.95)★ | -0.15
(-2.50)† |

Notes: Data from Saudi Arabian Monetary Authority, Annual Report, various issues. All variables in constant 1969 prices. Error-correction estimations equilibration performed using Pesaran, M. H., and B. Pesaran. Microfit 4.0: Interactive Econometric Analysis. Cambridge: Camfit Data Ltd, 1997.

() = t-statistic; ins = statistically insignificant; ★ significant at the 90% level; † = significant at the 95% level.

To assess the extent to which this general pattern held up across various non-oil sectors of the economy, a similar analysis was undertaken for the various sectoral components of GDP, including agriculture, mining, construction, manufacturing (non-refining), transport, power, finance, services, and the like. For purposes of classification, our examination also focused on whether or not public expenditures were losing their stimulating effects on output, as well as whether these expenditures were being replaced by private expenditures. In the latter case, which type of private expenditure proved most effective was also deciphered. Of course, if private sector expenditures themselves remain highly linked to government disbursements, then the economy is not really becoming all that self-sufficient. Hence, a final set of error-correction tests were performed on the links between public and private expenditures, to assess the extent to which private sector expenditures have become less dependent on public expenditure allocations.

 Agriculture

For the agricultural sector, the analysis suggests a general weakening of public sector expenditures with time. This is evidenced by the statistically significant short-term impacts of non-defense expenditures and total budgetary expenditures in the 1964–89 period, giving way to statistically insignificant impacts in the 1974—98 period. In fact, in no case did any of the major categories of public sector expenditures have a statistically significant impact on short-run output during the 1974–98 period.

The longer-term pattern was even weaker. While consumption and defense appear to have a stable long-term pattern for the period as a whole, their links with the pattern of long-term agricultural growth during the 1974–98 period is only marginally (90 percent level) significant.

Anyone remotely familiar with Saudi Arabia knows the extent to which government subsidies and other supports have helped expand the Kingdom’s agricultural sector. As noted in Table 9.3, there is a good chance that many of the government’s initial programs have been scaled back. It is safe to conclude, therefore, that public expenditures are currently playing only a tangential role in stimulating further agricultural output. This may have been the case for some time.

A very different picture emerges for private expenditures. Here, all of the major categories—investment and consumption as well as total expenditures — increase their statistical significance with time. This is particularly true for short-term impacts in which all three categories had a statistically insignificant jolt on agricultural production in the earlier period. This changed to a positive and highly significant impact in the latter period. In addition, the long-term coefficients of adjustment did not decline with time, indicating that output in this sector has maintained a fairly constant expansion in line with private expenditures.

It is not clear whether this is a success story for the government. One interpretation might be that the declining government short-run (subsidy) impact is no longer necessary, after accomplishing its original objectives. These programs have hence been cut back and are no longer necessary to assure that sector’s continued expansion. Looking at expanded non-oil output as a source ofstimulus for the agricultural sector, it appears that none of the major categories—non-oil GDP and its components, private GDP and public GDP—have had a short-run impact on agricultural output. Yet, all three have established a longterm relationship with the sector. The coefficients on the error adjustment term suggest however that the links with private sector GDP are much stronger than those associated with increases in public sector GDP. In addition, the private sector coefficients have strengthened over time (increasing from 0.10 in 1964–89 to 0.15 in 1974—98), while public sector links have remained rather constant (at 0.03 to 0.04).

 Nn-OU Manufacturing

A fairly clear picture unfolds for the critical non-oil manufacturing sector. Here, a general weakening of links between public expenditures and output was observed. The pattern has developed in both the short and the longer term. For the short term, only defense remained statistically significant (95 percent level) in the latter period. For the longer-term patterns, consumption, defense, nondefense, and total budgetary expenditures formed a statistically significant longterm relationship with non-oil manufacturing in the 1964–89 period. By 1974—95 these patterns had broken down, with no statistically significant (95 percent level) links remaining.

The role of defense is hard to explain. Links may be associated with the Kingdom’s defense procurement offset program and might account for the short-run impact, but with little carry-over to a stable long-term connection.

A totally different picture emerges for the private sector. Not only were the three main expenditure categories—investment, consumption, and total expen- ditures—statistically significant in both short-term periods, they were also statistically significant in the long term as well. Here, however, it should be noted that there was a general weakening of the longer-term links with time, supported by the decline in the value of the error-correction coefficient. Again speculating, the very limited impact of public sector investment in affecting growth of the non-oil manufacturing sector may, in turn, be a reflection of the limited role of this type of expenditure in increasing the productivity of private sector investments. This being the case, the productivity of private sector investments in this sector may be declining. For the major components of GDP, another picture emerges, with increases in private sector GDP providing a short-run stimulus to non-oil manufacturing output. Yet, private sector GDP has failed to establish any long-term stable pattern of expansion with non-oil manufacturing. Given manufacturing’s stable long-term relationship with the private sector, one must conclude that the Saudi Arabian non-oil manufacturing sector largely caters to final demand, with little output entering into intermediate stages of private sector production. This pattern is fairly common at early stages of industrialization. No doubt the true test of the success of the country’s industrialization program will be whether or not activity spreads into the intermediate and capital stages of production. There is little evidence of this occurring to date.

 Minerals and Mining

Saudi Arabia’s mineral and mining sector is still a negligible segment of the non-oil economy. However, it does have the potential for rapid growth, as new mineral and ore discoveries are beginning to attract considerable attention. Historically, the public sector has had strong ties to this area, although there are signs that these may be weakening. Public investments, for example, which had statistically significant links to the sector in the 1964–89 period, found these disappearing in the more recent 1974–98 period. There were also fairly considerable declines in the size of the error-correction coefficient over time for both public consumption and defense expenditures. Private expenditures, on the other hand, appear to have strengthened their ties to the mineral and mining sector. Both private consumption and total private expenditures evolved from no short-run statistical links in the early period to highly significant ties in the latter. In contrast to the general pattern experienced by public expenditures, the size of the error-correction coefficient increased considerably in the case of private consumption and total private expenditures.

 Construction

No other sector epitomizes oil-fueled expenditures more than construction. Few can forget the images of 24-hour crash building programs in the years immediately following the 1973–74 oil boom. There is no doubt that in these initial years, output was driven almost exclusively by government infrastructure expenditures. This is clearly confirmed by the error-correction analysis indicating a strong link between public sector investment and construction activity. Still, contrary to what one might imagine, this association appears to be strengthening with time, as indicated by the fact that the size of the coefficient— on the error-correction term—nearly doubled during the latter 1974–98 period. Moreover, government consumption formed an extensive, albeit weak, long-term link in the latter period, where one was not present earlier.

An even more interesting situation arises with private sector expenditures. Here, it appears that for the first time, construction activity was not just fueled by government expenditures. Private investment, consumption, and total expenditures shifted from a strong long-run statistical link with the construction sector in 1974–98, where none had existed previously. Construction’s links with real output also appear to have strengthened over time. Both public and private GDP formed no strong long-term links with the sector during the 1964–89 period. Nevertheless, both developed these patterns in the subsequent period. Based on the size of the error-correction coefficient, the link with private sector GDP was considerably stronger than that associated with public sector output. In addition, both public and private sector GDPs maintained strong short-term links to construction activity during both time periods.

Summing up, construction is not dominated by public sector activity, as in the past. Yet, it is apparent that in many ways the sector is still quite closely tied to the fates of government expenditures. On the other hand, there are clear indications that important links are being forged with the private sector. In the future, greater diversification of sources of stimulus should provide the sector with more stability than it has had in the past. While the boom-or-bust days are not completely over, it is apparent that the private sector is now able to pick up some of the slack when government expenditures contract sharply.

 Wholesale and Retail Tale

The trade sector also shows the declining influence of government expenditures. During the 1964–89 period, public investment, consumption, defense, and (at the 90 percent level) total budgetary expenditures all formed long-term relationships with the sector. By 1974–98, however, only consumption retained its links, and, based on a decline in the error-correction coefficient from 0.25 to 0.10, at a considerably weakened amount. Still, several public sector expenditures, including investment, defense, and total budgetary expenditures, were able to affect output in the sector over the short run.

Surprisingly, private sector patterns did not strengthen with time. This is an area in which one might anticipate that increased incomes and spending patterns throughout the Kingdom would be reflected in a rapidly expanding demand for retail goods and services. While it is true that the private sector did create ties to this sector early on, there is little evidence that they have strengthened with time. In fact, the long-term links between private sector investment consumption and total expenditures actually weakened during the latter 1974–98 period, though not quite to the extent of those expenditures associated with the public sector. Similar patterns occurred with real output. Both private and public GDP formed short- and long-term links with the sector, but there was a decline in the strength of the long-term relationship with the passage of time.

 Electricity, Gas, and Water

This sector is currently experiencing great changes with privatization, together with plans for increased investment and output. A complicating factor is that investment in the sector has lagged in recent years. Indeed, Riyadh now estimates that this industry alone will require an investment of $80 billion over the next 20 years, to cater to the country’s rapidly growing population,[262] meaning that demand factors per se have been modified by capacity constraints.

As with several of the other sectors, public expenditure appears to be having less and less of a long-term effect on the sector’s fortunes. Early on, the sector had formed statistically significant long-term bonds with government investment, consumption, defense, non-defense, and total budgetary expenditures. By 1974–98, only consumption maintained this link at a 95 percent level of confidence (and then at greatly diminished strength).

Private expenditures also formed early links with the sector. While these declined slightly in the second time period, they are currently much stronger than those derived from public expenditures. In recent years, private consumption has also forged a strong short-term bond with the sector. As for production links to the sector, the pattern is clearly one of strengthening longer-term ties with time, for both the non-oil economy as well as public GDP. Non-oil GDP lost its short-term link with the sector, even if this was clearly offset by the dramatic increase in the sector’s long-term coefficient (0.22 to 0.73). The power sector stood out as the most promising for private investments. While public expenditures still play a role in stimulating output, private sector demand, along with non-oil GDP, appears to provide a capacity to rapidly control the pace of expansion.

 Transport and Communications

The patterns of expenditures/output on the transport/communications sector resemble those characterizing the power sector. Both public and private expenditures have played and continue to play an important role in affecting their expansion. There are several subtle differences, however. The short-term links associated with public sector expenditures have been consistently strong and are present more or less across the board. With the exception of defense expenditures in the earlier period, every type of public expenditure has had a strong short-term link to the sector's output. The long-term impact of public expenditures has somewhat weakened with time, in the sense that fewer categories have retained their statistical association with the sector's output. By 1974—98, public investment was no longer statistically linked with the sector's long-run movements. Also, in the latter period, non-defense expenditures declined in statistical significance. Offsetting these developments has been the slight increase in public consumption's long-term impact on the sector's growth.

Private sector links to the transport/communications area have, in general, strengthened over time. While the long-term link to private investment has weakened in recent years, both private consumption and total private expenditures have strengthened their long-term links to the sector's output. The latter two expenditure categories have also maintained their strong short-term links to the sector. Output links also appear to be strengthening. Non-oil GDP, public GDP, and private GDP have all experienced increases in the size of their long-run coefficient. At the same time, public GDP no longer has a short-term impact on the sector's output. The transport and communications field is another sector that appears to be undergoing a gradual shift from public sector demand-led growth to that associated with developments in the private sector. This development is occurring both in terms of expenditures as well as in terms of the strong links being forged with private-sector GDP.

 Financial Sector

Since the end of the 1991 Gulf War, the consolidated balance sheet of Saudi Arabia's banks has grown steadily, at an average annual rate of around 6.2

percent. Balance sheets grew by about 6.6 percent in 1997, and a further 2.9 percent to mid-year 1998, in line with the long-term trend. Leading this growth was the expansion of capital accounts, which increased at an average annual rate of more than 14 percent. The Bank for International Settlements (BIS) estimates that the capital adequacy ratios of Saudi banks as a group are upward of 16 percent, more than twice the BIS minimums.

The Saudi Arabia stock market is by far the largest in the Middle East, with a capitalization exceeding $50 billion. The World Bank has given the Saudi market high marks for its efficiency, transparency, and quality of regulation. Except for investment by GCC nationals in selected shares, and a single closed-ended fund, the Saudi market is largely closed to foreign investors. New measures to open the market are under review. Clearly, even small steps in that direction would buoy investor confidence. An even more aggressive opening could bring about the re-rating of the market, where investors come to evaluate share prices in terms of their relationship to earnings growth expectations, as opposed to the prevailing approach that focuses on dividend yields.[263]

This is an interesting sector in that expenditures associated with both the public and private sectors are highly significant in the longer term. Furthermore, and based on the expanded size of the long-term coefficient, there is clear evidence that these links are increasing with time. The short-run effects of publie and private expenditures are also generally quite strong, especially the aggregate figures of total budgetary expenditures for the public sector and total private-sector expenditures for the private sector. Several of these patterns carry over into the sector’s link with non-oil output. In particular, private-sector GDP has achieved strong links to the sector, in both the short and the long term. These links also appear to be strengthening with the size of the long-term coefficient, more than doubling (0.18 to 0.38) between 1964–89 and 1974–98. Still, there is evidence that links with public-sector GDP, while strong, are weakening a bit. Although public-sector GDP had a statistically significant short-run impact in the earlier period, the latter period showed no such link. Moreover, the long-run impact of the sector on public-sector GDP declined, with the size of this coefficient falling from 0.38 to 0.21.

Summing up, the sector as a whole appears to be gradually more dependent on private-sector activity, in terms of both direct demand and output. While the public sector still plays a major role, there is no reason to expect a reversal of these patterns in coming years.

 The Service Sector—Community, Social, and Personal

This is a diverse sector that has experienced relatively rapid growth in recent years. Like the finance sector, it has established a number of links with the public and private areas. The public sector's immediate expenditure stimulus appears to be weakening a bit. In recent years, public consumption, investment, total nondefense allocations, and, possibly, total budgetary allocations have all lost their respective abilities to provide a short-run stimulus to the sector. Yet, defense expenditures have maintained their strong short-run ties to the sector, while longer-term linkages are strengthening, specifically, there has been an increase in the statistical importance of the long-run coefficient associated with public consumption, non-defense expenditures, and total budgetary allocations. At the same time, there has not been a significant change in the value of the long-run coefficients relative to the earlier (1964–98) period.

In contrast to the public sector, private sector consumption and total expenditures have maintained their strong short-run links to the sector. In addition, they have experienced the same stability over time in their long-run coefficients. It should be noted that the size of these coefficients are considerably larger, expenditure category by expenditure category, than those associated with public sector expenditures. This suggests, of course, that "riyal-for-riyal" private sector expenditures have a considerably greater long-run impact than those associated with public sector activity. This same pattern carried over to the links between the various categories of non-oil output and the service sector. As with private expenditures, all major categories of non-oil output experienced strong and continuous short-run links with service output. Output's longer-term impacts also showed considerable stability, with the size of the public sector's coefficient increasing significantly (0.13 to 0.23). It should be noted, however, that as with expenditures, the private sector appears to be considerably more efficient in stimulating longer-run output.

Summing up, the various components of non-oil GDP have shown considerable change over time. Each sector has moved up the scale of integration (Table 9.5). These patterns confirm the hypothesis that the government’s development strategy to date has been successful in creating an environment conducive to SUStained growth in the non-oil portions of the economy (Figure 9.1).

* Factors Affecting Private Sector Expenditures

While the previous sections have documented the increasingly important role of private sector expenditures in stimulating sectoral output, it is not completely clear, as noted earlier, that the private sector itself is all that independent of a steady infusion of funds originating from various government budgetary categories. Clearly, if the source of private expenditures is largely from public rather than private output, the ability of the private sector to provide adequate purchasing power independently of developments in the oil sector would be greatly reduced.

 Total Private Expenditures

Combining private consumption and investment provides a summary figure for private sector activity. Without a doubt, public sector expenditures have had a great influence on the pattern of private sector expenditures. Yet, it is quite apparent that that linkage is weakening.

Between 1960 and 1989, the main categories of public expenditure included investment, defense, non-defense, and total budgetary expenditures, which provided a strong short-run stimulus to the private sector. Over time, however, several of these short-run linkages (defense/non-defense and investment) have weakened to the point (1980–98) where they have ceased to operate. More importantly, the longer-run linkages between public and private expenditures are weakening. In 1960–89, public investment, defense, and total public expenditures had formed long-term linkages with private expenditures, and in turn these weakened considerably in the 1975–98 period. By 1980—98, none were statistically significant at the 95 percent level. Surprisingly, changes in oil's contribution to total GDP has not had a significant short-run impact on total private expenditures, even if oil has formed a stable long-term link with private expenditures. Based on the increasing size of this long-run coefficient, this link may well be increasing in importance. Nevertheless, private-production GDP has maintained strong short-run links to expenditure, and in addition, the longer-run links are highly significant and are strengthening with time.

Table 9.5 Summary of Results

| Sector | Time [Classification] Period | Public/Private Linkages |

| Agriculture | | |

| 1964–89 | Slight public sector short-run impact, no long-run impact
Weak private sector long-run expenditure links, no short-run link
No non-oil short-run production link, established long-run production link | [Beginning Stages] |

| 1974–98 No public-sector expenditure impact
Creation of strong short- and long-term private expenditure links
Strengthening of long-run non-oil production link
Non-Oil Manufacturing | [Partial Integration Stage] |

| 1964 89 Strong public sector short- and long-term links Strong private expenditure, short- and long-term links
Strong non-oil output, short- and long-term links | [Integrated] |

| 1974–98 Significant weakening of public short- and long-term links
Slight weakening of private sector demand links
Slight weakening of long-run non-oil production links | [Mature] |

| Mineral/Mining |

| 1964–89 Several long- and short-run public sector links
No short- or long-run private sector links
Weak short- and long-run non-oil production links | [Initial Integration Stage] |

| 1974–98 Slight weakening of public short- and long-term links
Development of private short- and long-term links
Strengthening of production short- and long-term links | [Integrated Stage] |

| Construction |

| 1964–89 | Strong long- and short-run links to public investment
Short-run link to private investment, no long-run links
Strong short- and long-run links to non-oil output | [Initial Integration Stage] |

Table 9.5 Summary of Results (continued)

| Sector | Time [Classification] Period | Public/Private Linkages |

| Construction (continued) |

| 1974–98 | Strengthening of public investment linkages, weakening public non-investment links Development of private long-term links, weakening of short-term links
Strengthening of non-oil short- and long-term production links | [Integrated Stage] |

| Trade Sector |

| 1964–89 | Strong long- and short-run links to public expenditures
Strong long- and short-run links to private expenditures
Strong short-run link to non-oil production | [Integrated Stage] |

| 1974—98 | Weakening of public sector’s short- and long-term links
Slight weakening of private sector long-run expenditure links
Development of non-oil production links | [Mature Stage] |

| Power Sector |

| 1964-89 | Moderate short-term, strong long-term public expenditure links
Strong long-term, moderate short-term private expenditure links

Strong short-term non-oil production links no long-term links | [Integrated Stage] |

| 1974–98 Weakening short- and long-term public expenditure links
Slight weakening of private long-term/ short-term links
Development of long-term non-oil production links, loss of short-run link | [Mature Stage] |

| Transport/Communications |

| 1964–98 | Strong short- and long-run public expenditure links
Strong short- and long-run private expenditure links
Strong short- and long-run non-oil production links | [Integrated Stage] |

Table 9.5 Summary of Results (continued)

| Sector | Time [Classification] Period | Public/Private Linkages |

| Transport/Communications (continued) |

| 1974-98 | Weakening of long-run public expenditure links
Strengthening of private expenditure long-run links
Strengthening of non-oil long-run production links | [Mature Stage] |

| Finance/RealEstate |

| 1964–89 | Strong short- and long-run public expenditure links
Strong short-, no long-run private expenditure links
Strong short- and long-run non-oil production links | [Integrated Stage] |

| 1974—98 | Strengthening of public long-term expenditure links
Strengthening of long-run private expenditure links
Maintenance of short- and long-term production links | [Mature Stage] |

| Service Sector |

| 1964–89 | Strong short-run public expenditure links, Weak long-run links
Strong short- and long-run private expenditure links
Strong short- and long-run non-oil output links | [Integrated Stage] |

| 1974–98 | Weakening short-run public expenditure links, strengthening long-run links
Maintenance of long-run private expenditure links
Maintenance of short-, slight strengthening of long-run non-oil output links | [Mature Stage] |

It should be noted that the relative size of the private sector output coefficient dwarfs that associated with the oil sector. This suggests that while developments in the oil sector continue to have an important impact on private sector expenditures, they may account for a fairly low percentage of the year-to-year movement in this series.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-2.jpg][Figure 9.1 Saudi Arabia: Evolution of the Non-Oil Economy, 1964-]]

* Private Investment@@@

Following Hirschman’s unbalanced growth strategy,[264] the Kingdom’s planners have attempted to stimulate private sector activity through developing and extending major infrastructure projects.

Between 1960 and 1989, this strategy appeared to be paying high dividends, with a strong short- and long-term link to private capital formation. Over time, however, this link has been severed to the extent that by 1980–98 no statistically significant links existed between the two forms of investment. This weakening is not really related to the sharp decline in public investment in recent decades. Rather, it simply signifies that public investment has become much less effective in stimulating follow-on private sector activity. A somewhat similar pattern has occurred with defense, non-defense, and total public expenditures. These began (1960–89) with strong linkages and finished (1980–98) with little influence on private capital formation decisions. The links between output (oil GDP and private sector GDP) and private investment are interesting in that oil GDP has not had much of an effect on the private sector’s pattern of short-run investment. Again, and over time, private investment has adjusted to developments in the oil sector. In contrast to its links to the oil sector, private investment has been stimulated by short-run movements in private GDP, as well as adjusting to the expansion over time in that series.

As noted earlier, it should be clear that based on the size of the long-run coefficient, private investment responds much more dramatically to changes in private sector GDP than to changes in oil GDP.

 Private Consumption

Since private consumption is the major component of private expenditures, the observed patterns are similar to those described above. Initially, public-sector expenditures across the board provided a strong short- and long-run impetus to this expenditure category. With time, these links have weakened to the point that, with the possible exception of short-run shocks associated with total budget allocations, private consumption patterns are affected by developments outside those controlled by the pubhc sector. Therefore, private sector GDP appears to be a major factor determining the extent to which private sector consumption evolves over time. Yet, it is apparent that these lines are not nearly as strong as those associated with total private sector expenditures.

* Conclusions

The findings of this study have a number of implications for Saudi Arabia’s future growth. In a sense, the results suggest that the Kingdom’s development strategy of diversification has been a success. The private sector appears to be playing a more productive role with time in that many of the non-oil sectors appear capable of sustained growth without a steady infusion of government expenditures. More importantly, it is clear that the private sector is not just filling a vacuum left by the contraction in government expenditures.

However, there are several negative sides to these findings. First, if the private sector stumbles, it is not clear that the public sector will have the ability (even with increased funding) to jump-start the economy and sustain growth until private activity recovers. That growth will have to rely more and more on private sector activity and less on fiscal stimulus provided by the various types of government allocations. While effective in the past, these expenditures, with several exceptions, appear to no longer have a major impact on many of the key non-oil sectors of the economy. The underlying causes of the shifts in relative economic power are difficult to pinpoint, at least within the scope of the present study. Several plausible explanations exist for this development. As noted above, Middie Eastern countries with high (and sustained) levels of defense expenditures are beginning to pay the price for cutting back on economic expenditures to fund their military burdens One might speculate that the defense-driven shift of Saudi expenditures away from economic to non-economic allocations has weakened the direct economic strength of public expenditures.

Another possibility is that the changing domestic and world environment requires a different composition of policies/expenditures and that perhaps many of the ongoing programs have simply hit diminishing returns. For example, it is clear that recent technological revolutions and the importance of rapid exchanges of massive amounts of information are incompatible with a state-led economy. In addition, the diversification of the economy has reached a point where Riyadh must consult with private sector leaders on the breadth and depth of any policy or—as was the case with the failed 1988 attempt to tax foreign businesses—suffer public embarrassment as well as the potential loss of valuable investment/technology.

A variant of this explanation is that while there has been a shift away from direct subsidies, in favor of an attempt to rely more on market-driven solutions, it is not apparent that Riyadh has fundamentally altered the manner in which it designs and carries out its economic programs. Ideally, as the private sector evolves from one stage to another (beginning stages, partial integration stage, integrated stage, mature stage), government policies would also shift in a manner designed to capitalize on their capability to tap private sector resources.

The second negative aspect of these results is that once the mature stage is reached, there is no assurance that the private sector, on either the expenditure or the production side, will be able to maintain established links. Weakening ofprivate links has apparently occurred in the non-oil manufacturing, trade, and power sectors. Again, the co-integration/error-correction analysis cannot pinpoint the exact cause of this phenomenon. Still, there is no doubt that government regulations may have stifled investment and limited the ability of firms to adapt to changing circumstances. Over time, restrictive government programs might well weaken ties between private sector demand and non-oil sector output.

In particular it is safe to say that with a freer flow of international investment and market access, non-oil output might have performed even better than it did. An encouraging sign are a series of economic reforms initiated in 1998.[265] First, telecommunications was corporatized in spring 1998 as a prelude to a sell-off; a decision to merge all electricity companies as the first step in a similar process was approved in November of the same year. The electricity reforms included tariff increases that will reduce consumer subsidies and help limit the huge losses run up by the electricity companies. Operations at the ports and some local services were turned over to the private sector as well. A revised, less restrictive foreign investment code has been enacted.

Clearly, the key to the country’s economic future is the manner in which economic reforms proceed. One observer has noted that the “dance” of Saudi economic reform often resembled a waltz—slow, slow, quick, quick, slow.[266] Yet, the numerous announcements made since mid-October 1999 suggest that reforms, such as the foreign investment initiatives noted above, are now well into the implementation phase. The mutual fund market has been opened to foreign investors, and non-Saudis will be allowed to own real estate and take unpenalized majority stakes in local joint ventures. The sixth round of negotiations for membership in the World Trade Organization (WTO) is moving forward, privatization is seen as a strategic choice, and, most importantly, the tax regime is under review for radical change.[267]

Expanded inflows of foreign investment are critical. Levels of foreign investment in the Kingdom have been very low in recent years. In 1996 and 1997, there were net foreign capital outflows of $1,877 million and $1,129 million respectively. Cumulative inflows in 1984–87 totaled a mere $4,317 million, compared to $36,020 million in Malaysia or $51,412 million in Singapore—both countries with smaller GDPs than Saudi Arabia's. Analysts who point to the punitive Saudi tax system and a restrictive regulatory environment as the main factors responsible for this poor performance agree that recently promised reforms could do much to reverse the trend and attract capital to the country.[268]

The empirical results presented above show that the private sector is capable of forging strong links to the non-oil economy. However, the results also indicate that in the mature phase into which some sectors (manufacturing, trade, power, for example) are moving, these links may also be weakening. What Saudi Arabia needs to do is draw on the progress made to date through developing a virtuous cycle. Specifically, the Saudi share market is already well managed, but it currently lacks the necessary depth or liquidity. A virtuous circle needs to be developed in which open capital markets, with a strong regulatory framework, can support the rapid growth of private sector investments. Higher levels of foreign direct investment (FDI) will be facilitated and will encourage further growth, of markets as well. It is through mechanisms like this that the process of increased private sector integration can be strengthened and extended to the next stages of self-sustained development.

Perhaps most importantly, the error-correction results noted above, together with the distinct possibility of developing a virtuous cycle, allow one to be much more optimistic about the Kingdom's economic prospects. Several years ago, the conventional wisdom was that the oil boom years produced an economic expansion that was not sustainable. The key components of this line of argument are laid out in Figure 9.2, which shows the close links between government expenditures and private investment, with non-oil output strongly linked to government consumption. The key element here is the declining effectiveness of government expenditures in stimulating output. Still, with high levels of government expenditure, the economy was able to expand during this period, with many of its structural weaknesses masked behind expanding budgetary allocations. Falling profitability of private investment and an apparent increase in capital outflows were ominous signs of what was to follow the end of the boom.

As noted, the conventional interpretation (Figure 9.3) of the economy during the post—oil boom years was quite pessimistic. Here, the focus has been on budgetary cutbacks, the seeming inability of the government to push through economic reforms, increased public sector debt, the drying up of credit to the private sector, capital outflow, and declining rates of private sector capital formation.[269] The conventional wisdom usually concluded that nothing positive was occurring in the non-oil economy. Furthermore, the non-oil economy would not be able to overcome mounting obstacles and constraints impeding its growth. The end result of this process were few accomplishments in terms of economic diversification and self-sufficiency. Instead, the economy was said to face years of increased unemployment, declining incomes, and eventual political and social instability.

The error-correction results noted above paint a somewhat different picture. Despite the decline in government expenditures, and the relatively slow pace of economic reforms, the private sector was still able to evolve in a positive manner, forging a complex set of links to key non-oil economic segments. At the same time, the private sector appears to have reduced its extreme dependency on governmental expenditures and direct subsidies. These developments and their possible causes are summarized in Figure 9.4. As for the future, a possible virtuous cycle model (Figure 9.5) may well allow the Kingdom to take advantage of rapid growth patterns.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-3.jpg][Figure 9.2 Development Model 1: Saudi Arabian Development during the Oil Boom Years
Source: Looney (1997, p. 49)]]

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-4.jpg][Figure 9.3 Development during the Post—Oil Boom Years: Pessimistic Assessment
Source: Looney (1997, p. 50)]]

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-5.png][Figure 9.4 Development during the Post-Oil Boom Years: optimistic Assessment]]

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-6.jpg][Figure 9.5 Saudi Arabia: Future Virtuous Cycle]]

[245] Robert E. Looney and p. c. Frederiksen, “The Evolution and Evaluation of Saudi Arabian Economic Planning, ”Journal of South Asian and Middle Eastern Studies 9:2, winter 1985, pp. 3–19.

[246] Joseph A. Kechichian, “Saudi Arabia’s Will to Power, ” Middle East Policy 7:2, February 2000, pp.

[247] Robert E. Looney, “Saudi Arabia’s Development Strategy: Comparative Advantage versus Sustainable Growth,” Orient 30:1, March 1989, pp. 75–96.

[248] Robert E. Looney, “Real or Illusionary Growth in an Oil-Based Economy: Government Expenditures and Private Sector Investment In Saudi Arabia,” World Development 20:9, September 1992, pp. 1367–76. See also, idem, “The Budgetary Impact of Defense Expenditures in the Middle East,” The Middle East Business and Economic Review 5:2, July 1993, pp. 39—49: idem, “A PostKeynesian Assessment ofAlternative Saudi Arabian Austerity Strategies,” Kuwait Universityjournal of the Social Sciences 23:3, autumn 1995, pp. 251–73; idem, “Saudi Arabia’s Economic Challenge,” JIME Review; autumn 1996, pp. 37–563 and idem, “Diminishing returns and Policy Options in a Rentier State: Economic Reform and Regime Legitimacy in Saudi Arabia,” Political Crossroads 5:1–2,January 1997, pp. 31–50.

[249] Moin A. Siddiqi, “Saudi Arabia: Financial Report,” The Middle East Magazine, number 294, October 1999, pp. 23–26.

[250] N. L. Hicks and A. Kubisch, “Recent Experience in Cutting Government Expenditures,” Finance and Development 21:3, September 1984, pp. 37–39. See also N. L. Hicks, “Expenditure Reductions in Developing Countries Revisited ”Journal of International Development 3:1,January 1991, pp. 29–38.

[251] Hicks and Kubisch, ibid.

[252] Robert E. Looney, “Budgetary Priorities in Saudi Arabia: The Impact of Relative Austerity Measures on Human Capital Development,” OPEC Review 15:2, summer 1991, pp. 133–152.

[253] Looney, “The Budgetary Impact of Defense Expenditures in the Middle East,” p. 48.

[254] Rayed Krimly, “The Political Economy of Adjusted Priorities: Declining Oil Revenues and Saudi Fiscal Policies,” The Middle Eastjournal 53:2, spring 1999, pp. 25467.

[255] Ibid.,p١ 256.

[256] Robert E. Looney, “Defense Expenditures and Macroeconomic Stabilization in Pakistan: A Test of the Military Keynesianism Hypothesis,” Rivista Internazionale di Scienze Economiche e Commerciali 95:3, September 1998, 599–614.

[257] Ibid.,p. 612.

[258] Yousif Khalifa Al-Yousif, “Exports and Economic Growth: Some Empirical Evidence from the Arab Gulf Countries,” Applied Economics 29:6, June 1997, pp. 1356–68.

[259] K. Doroodian, Rajindar Koshal, and Saleh ALMuhanna, “An Examination of the Traditional Aggregate Import Demand Function for Saudi Arabia,” Applied Economics 26:9, September 1994, pp. 1357–69.

[260] Nelson Perera, “The Demand for Money in the Members of the Gulf Cooperation Council: Evidence from Cointegration Tests,” The Middle East Business and Economic Review 6:2, July 1994, pp. 10–26.

[261] Detailed statistical data for all sectors, including agriculture, non-oil manufacturing, minerals and mining, construction, wholesale and retail trade, electricity, gas and water, transport and communications, the financial sector, and the service sector (community, social, and personal) are all available from the author ([[mailto:relooney@nps.navy.mil] [relooney@nps.navy.mil]]).

[262] “Saudi Arabia on the Dole,” Economist, 22 April 2000, pp. 47–48.

[263] Kevin Taecker, “Saudi Arabia and the GCC: Exploring for Growth in a Troubled Global Economy,” Middle East Policy 6:2, October 1998, pp. 29–35

[264] A. O. Hirschman, The Strategy of Economic Development, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1958.

[265] Kemp, Peter, “Hard Times: No Easy Way Out,” Middle East Economic Digest 43:2, 8 January 1999, p. 2.

[266] Tom Everett-Heath, “The Saudi Quickstep,” Middle East Economic Digest 43:46, 26 November 1999, p. 4.

[267] Ibid.

[268] Ibid.

[269] F. Gregory Gause III, “Saudi Arabia Over a Barrel,” Foreign Affairs 79:3, May/June 2000, pp. 80–94.

 The Arab Gulf States

 Chapter 10: Domestic Politics in the United Arab Emirates Social and Economic Policies, 1990–2000

Fatma al-Sayegh

The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is at an exciting crossroads in its short development. Thirty years since its establishment as a federation, its leaders have spent considerable energy to foster a unified and stable political system, support traditional yet modernizing social and economic structures—capable of adapting to dramatic and fast changes—and fund a diversified economy that is less dependent on fluctuating oil prices. Since 2 December 1971, two significant steps have marked the development of this country—first, a political union of the former Trucial States against some odds, and second, the genuine development of the less fortunate Northern Emirates. [270]

This chapter traces the UAE’s domestic policies, as well as its tribal, social, and economic development paths, and identifies the transformation of the Emirates from a purely tribal system into a modernizing venture. Having constructed a remarkable infrastructure and shaped an impressive economy, the UAE is reassessing its experiences to ensure that its citizens are adequately prepared for the new millennium. The chapter further explores internal forces that might hinder unity. Factors such as domestic cohesion, proper planning, and economic integrity are of major concern to policymakers. Although the UAE is still a fairly new experiment in federation, the circumstances of its emergence, its economic prosperity, and its social structures define its unique environment. To be sure, UAE leaders relied on much of their traditions to forge union, but they also contributed much to its current success. It is through a historical perspective that current achievements are best appraised.

* Historical Background

The seven Emirates, prior to their independence and federation, had undergone a long history of British occupation dating back to 1820.[271] Though fundamentally of imperial nature, the British control in the lower Gulf differed in many respects from that exercised in Africa or India.[272] Britain, for the duration of its protective status in the area, showed no interest in the internal and tribal structures of the Emirates, except in cases where British interests were directly threatened. Although this policy resulted in a great measure of autonomy for the individual Emirates, it isolated the area from any form of internal progress and non-British external influences. Britain assumed full responsibility for foreign affairs, even if it promised not to intervene in the internal affairs of the Emirates.

Economically, the vast majority of the population of the Trucial States (a mere 180,000 in 1971) lived at subsistence level, virtually indistinguishable from that which they had reached centuries earlier. Pearling was important to the economies of the Trucial States before oil was discovered. Whereas pearl diving allowed most to survive on meager subsistence levels, living very modestly with few “luxuries,” the direct benefits from oil income—distributed rather well and fairly rapidly—made a substantial difference. Overnight, the subsistence economy, based principally on pearl diving, the cultivation of dates and a few other locally consumed vegetables, as well as the raising of livestock, was literally transformed into an Eldorado.

The development of the pearl trade created a group of merchant entrepreneurs, some of whom utilized their innate skills in other businesses when the market for pearls collapsed.[273] This was especially true in Dubai, which built an entrepot trade at the end of the nineteenth century, diverting traffic from the Persian port of Lingah after high customs duties were imposed there. Dubai, thus, became a major Gulfport, enjoying a rather considerable pre-oil prosperity from exports and re-exports. The contrast with its neighbors, whose economic eclipse was reversed only with the advent of oil income, was noticeable.

When the pearl industry fell on hard times during the early 1930s, as a result of the worldwide economic depression and the Japanese cultured pearl innovation, the Trucial States slid backwards in their progress. Reduced demand for pearls from key markets in Europe and the United States translated into substantial losses. The fatal blow came in 1946, when India, until then a large market for pearls, imposed heavy taxes that crippled the Gulf pearling industry. As a result of this overall decline, the number of boats proceeding to the pearling banks gradually decreased. The Trucial States' contacts with the rest of the world began to shrink at an ever-increasing rate, as the industry faltered and World War II entered its crucial phases.

It is important to emphasize that Britain played a key role in this respect. As British commitments—at least prior to World War II—were limited to the enforcement of a "maritime truce and peace at sea," London was not concerned with the implications of this decreasing source of income at the local level. To be sure, Britain avoided interference in the area's social and economic development, but, equally important, it demonstrated a lack of interest that bordered on negligence. It was almost a century after they first occupied the Lower Gulf, in 1939 to be precise, that British officials favored the opening of the first medical dispensary in Dubai. Wretched living conditions would then improve, at least for a few, as the rate of development progressively improved.

Abu Dhabi was the largest and strongest of the seven Emirates. Tribal and somewhat less cosmopolitan than Dubai, the Emirate had a smaller population, and experienced slower development. Ruled by the Al Nahyan family, Abu authorities were adamantly opposed to the idea.[274] Economically, life in Abu Dhabi at the turn of the twentieth century was virtually the same as it had been a hundred years earlier. Shipping, trading, and seafaring capabilities had been gravely crippled by the world economic depression, and by the absence of a major economic resource. With trading prospects severely curtailed, people were forced to rely upon meager earnings derived from the pearl industry.

Dhabi harbored the ambition to unify and rule the entire Trucial Coast for decades. These aspirations never developed, in part because British

Essentially a commercial city-state, Dubai was less affected by this economic depression. With its harbor facilities and its sophisticated merchant community, the Emirate quickly developed its entrepot facilities and earned a key position in the overall Middle East transit trade. Less tribal and, perhaps, more urbane than the others, Dubai largely depended on trade and re-export of goods to Persia and the Indian subcontinent. In fact, the majority of its merchants were of nonArab origin, coming largely from Iran or the Indian subcontinent, though most had been longtime residents.[275] These merchants played critical roles in helping the Al Makhtoum shape the Emirate’s political and economic judgments. Guided by their consideration for the state’s trade links with the outside world, many of these merchants added value to the emerging vision in Dubai and, if most benefited from their associations with the Al Makhtoum, the rewards were evenly divided. Sharjah, on the other hand, enjoyed a high level of intellectual and cultural life guided by the legacy of the Al Qawasim. Its inhabitants were— and remain—very proud of their history, especially their opposition to British military incursions. Still, although Sharjah was once the seat of the British political and military authority in the area, its modern development occurred well after independence.

The other Emirates, including Ras al-Khaimah, Fujairah, Ajman, and Umm al-Qiwain, were once part of the Qasimi empire. Most of the ruling families, as well as their populations, exhibit a delicate balance within the various Qasimi branches. Their infrastructures reflect poorer conditions that have dictated smaller, even simpler, governments and administrations. In these instances as well, federation benefited many, creating vital links with the larger Emirates of Abu Dhabi and Dubai.

* The Birth of the UAE

On 2 December 1971, the UAE was declared independent following three years of extensive negotiations among the nine Emirates of the Gulf: the seven Trucial shaykhdoms, along with Qatar and Bahrain. As the latter two opted for separate independence, a federation of the remaining seven was declared after considerable discussions.[276] A historic first meeting of the Supreme Council of the Federation of the UAE was then convened. During the meeting, Shaykh Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, ruler of Abu Dhabi, was elected president. It was also announced that Shaykh Rashid bin Said Al Makhtoum, the ruler of Dubai, would be the country's first prime minister. Equally important, the Supreme Council declared that a provisional constitution would be drafted without delay.[277] Abu Dhabi was ostensibly identified as the capital of the state, although that decision would not be finalized for several years.

Since its establishment as a federation, the UAE has forged a distinct national identity through consolidation of its federal status, and now enjoys an enviable level of political stability. The UAE's political system, which is a unique combination of both traditional and modern laws, has underpinned this remarkable political success, enabling the country to develop a fresh administrative structure while at the same time ensuring that the best of its traditions are maintained, adapted, and preserved.

Given that the seven members of the federation vary in size and in economic resources—while Abu Dhabi, Dubai, and, to lesser extent, Sharjah have oil, the other four Emirates live virtually on subsistence economies—unification required certain adjustments. It was enough that the Emirates shared historical, sociopolitical, and cultural ties, as what was needed was a fairer distribution of wealth, development, and political power. Since 1971, and notwithstanding inevitable political skirmishes, Emirati leaders have amply demonstrated that their development and modernization paces were, indeed, fair and comprehensive. The first five-year plan, like the initial development schemes, was deemed a success. That the UAE has grown and prospered as a federation in the face of internal rivalries, external threats, and antipathies is clearly due to Shaykh Zayed's commitment to the concept of federal union, and his generous dispensing of Abu Dhabi's financial support to those less fortunate. On 20 May 1995, the Supreme Council of the Federation, at its historic meeting under the presideney of Shaykh Zayed, approved an amendment to the provisional constitution that deleted the term “provisional” from its clauses. The amendment also identified Abu Dhabi as the permanent capital of the state. During the meeting, Shaykh Zayed declared that “since the income of the UAE’s citizens was among the highest in the world, no one in the Emirates should be in need.”[278] Even in its simplest meaning, this statement identified the core of the UAE’s domestic policy, namely that the country’s resources would be shared across the board throughout the land. Few found fault in its premise. Even fewer could offer alternatives. Zayed’s bold initiatives ensured that the legacy of the UAE would be rooted in economic fairness and justice for all UAE citizens.

Yet, despite this unique legacy, the UAE is undergoing rapid socioeconomic changes, with various strains and stresses that such phenomena entail. This process, along with the non-plurality of the social structure, as well as the low level of political participation, gives the UAE a special status.

* Economic Development

Until a decade ago, the structure of the Emirates’ income, which mainly depends on oil, made it one of the least economically diversified states in the world. Unlike other developing countries, the UAE relies on a single resource, oil, whose value is determined by international markets. In other words, Abu Dhabi, along with its fellow oil-producing states, cannot control all three aspects that make a cartel, namely, production, prices, and markets. To be sure, the UAE’s proven crude resources are estimated at around 98 billion barrels, representing 9.5 percent of world reserves and placing it in third position in terms of reserves—not an enviable spot. Capacity is currently estimated at around 2.5 million barrels per day (bpd), which will rise to 3 million by the end of 2000.[279] However, building a healthy and stable economic base requires the diversification of economic resources. Therefore, over the past decade, much has been made of the UAE’s need to reduce its economic dependency on oil. In fact, officials drew sharp lessons from the mid-to-late 1980s period, when oil prices crashed to as low as $8 per barrel. Rates of growth domestic product (GDP) since 1988 confirm that the UAE’s diversification plans are now paying dividends. Since 1988, there has been a steady increase in contributions from the non-oil sector to the GDP, estimated at around 64 percent in 1996, which is a far cry from the 1972 rate of 36 percent.[280]

The nature and structure of the economy suggests that the UAE's economic integration largely depends on federal rather than local policies. While Abu Dhabi, Dubai, and Sharjah are oil-producing Emirates, their smaller partners have no major economic resources. Still, the latter have benefited from federal development initiatives. For example, in the field of education, the Northern Emirates have hired federally funded and trained personnel to satisfy local requirements. Another area in which federal assistance was concretely displayed was tourism. Yet, much of these initiatives were the result of Abu Dhabi's financial largesse, which in turn dragged the Northern Emirates out of their pre-independence levels. In exchange for this largesse, Abu Dhabi secured substantial political power. Indeed, it might not be an overstatement to assert that Abu Dhabi has paid in the past—and is paying today—to stabilize the federation. By subsidizing the federation, Abu Dhabi helps the socioeconomic and political settings of the Emirates and asserts for itself a powerful role as a leader of the federation. From a purely financial perspective, nevertheless, the sensitive question of financing the union has only recently been settled, when each Emirate agreed to contribute a specific percentage of its national income to the federal budget. In 1995, the Federal National Council (FNC) endorsed a proposed 1996 expenditures bill, in which individual Emirate allocations were specified. The FNC advised that each party's share be based on estimated annual incomes and, in accordance with past provisions, that federal authorities make up deficits.[281]

In line with this general trend, development projects were designed to serve several Emirates, to further consolidate the nascent federation. Etisalat, the Emirates Telecommunications Company, for example, is a good illustration of this phenomenon. Over the years, Etisalat has become one of the strongest service companies in the UAE. A similar endeavor is the Water and Electricity Company, which has earned various accolades across the country. In 1997, it was announced that work would commence on the construction of the electric power grid that will connect various cities throughout the country, to prevent power shortages.[282] Meanwhile, privatization in public services is well under way. Greater involvement by the private sector in all aspects of the UAE's continued development remains a key plank of government policy.

In fact, the move toward privatization of state-owned utilities forms an important element in this strategy. Privatization could enhance the quality of service to consumers, give a tremendous boost to domestic and foreign investors, and unburden the state from routine responsibilities. Having ensured viable institutions, the state is eagerly looking forward to distributing responsibilities on as many of its citizens as possible. The strategy is nothing short of gradual empowerment.

Local governments have also taken a number of key steps aimed at stimulating the economy. In Abu Dhabi, the development of the Saadiyat Free Zone, envisaging investments in excess of $21 billion over a ten-year period, was an imaginative step that is expected to play a significant role in business development in the future.[283] To be sure, Abu Dhabi's own expenditures exceed those of the federal budget, but that was primarily the result of how the Emirate's substantial revenues were dispersed. Abu Dhabi financed massive public service projects such as water resources, electrical power plants, and petrochemicals, which literally transformed the barren desert into a developing economy. Dubai, for its part, was equally clairvoyant, and invested in ambitious projects. Even if its methods differed, often securing necessary funds by borrowing from international and domestic sources, the end results were clearly illustrated in the massive expansion of several sectors, ranging from industry (Jabal Ali Free Zone) to tourism (luxury hotels and annual festivals).[284] Two of Dubai's projects, well under way in 1999, are Project Millennium and the expansion of the airport, vital to further attract international investors. But by far the most ambitious project in Dubai, which is hoping to transform the small Emirate into a regional technology hub, is the Dubai Internet City initiative that began in October 1999. This project aims at making Dubai the technological center of the entire Middle East. It is hoped that technology will provide a unique platform for the UAE, to further diversify its economy away from heavy dependence on hydrocarbon exports, and provide employment for nationals. Dubai already plays a powerful role in the information technology field, having been selected by almost all major international companies as their Middle East headquarters. To fulfill these ambitious initiatives, local authorities created the Dubai Technology, Electronic Commerce and Media Free Zone Authority, to draw up strategies and polices and encourage the business community to implement all projects in a timely fashion. Clearly, the purpose is to promote Dubai as a center for technology, electronic commerce, and media.[285] Diversifying into such ventures is further testament to the urgent needs—especially in the Northern Emirates— that local economies may face, especially after 2010, when both Dubai and Sharjah will receive very limited oil income.

Meanwhile, the smaller Emirates of Ras al-Khaimah and Ajman, with even fewer resources at their disposal, have drawn up equally ambitious domestic plans, even if more suited to their needs. Ras al-Khaimah authorized the construction of a cement factory to produce an estimated 200,000 tons per year. Ajman, famous for its fine marble, plans to enlarge its marble manufacturing plant. More modest activities are under consideration in both Emirates. Importantly, a new federal law has been proposed that would require every new industrial scheme of any type or size to obtain a federal license before it can be implemented. The main objective of this law is to ensure that new schemes serve the interests of the federation as a whole rather than those of an individual Emirate. The law would also prevent unnecessary duplication of industrial projects within the federation, as was the case in the 197Os.[286]

In the event, government intervention in connection with business development has been directed toward diversification, making the economy less dependent on oil. Toward that end, attracting international investors is high on the agendas of the rulers, who must approve most transactions.[287] The market in the Emirates has bent toward modernization in which keen competition has evolved, a mixture of traditional mercantilism and rapid adjustment to vastly widened business horizons.[288] Toward that end, free trade zones provide a significant impetus to further accelerate the process. Jabal Ali, for example, opened for business in the mid-1980s, and was an immediate success. Since then, free zones have been created at ports across the UAE: in Sharjah, Fujairah, Ajman, Ras Al-Khaimah, and Umm al-Qiwain.[289] A similar effort was made to promote the tourism industry. If the idea of a tourism industry in the UAE seemed farfetched in the 1980smore of an aspiration than a real possibility—much has changed since then. In less than a decade, tourism has taken center stage in the country's economic development. In fact, in the case of Dubai, where greater efforts have been applied to this sector, revenues from tourism will overtake those from oil within a few years. Tourism's contribution to the UAE's GNP was expected to reach 10 percent by the end of 2000.[290]

This strategy of economic diversification, coupled with an upturn in oil prices in the latter half of 1999, has pushed the UAE GDP by 10 percent to 190.4 billion dirhams (Dhs) in 1999 (it stood at 173 billion Dhs in 1998).[291] The economy's strong performance led to a jump in reserves to 13.4 billion in 1999 against 3.5 billion in 1998. National savings reached 34.4 billion Dhs in 1999, up from 26 billion Dhs in 1998. The rate of inflation remained flat at 2 percent. However, inflation was projected to rise to 2.5 percent in the year 2000.[292]

These figures do not begin to decipher the complexities of the UAE economy. For example, while the majority of developing countries are confronted with a shortage of skilled manpower, in the UAE the problem assumes quantitative as well as qualitative dimensions. In an attempt to redress the imbalance in the workforce, the government adopted an "Emiratization" of certain professions, to encourage citizens to assume key posts. In line with government policy on increased participation of UAE nationals in the labor force, the Abu Dhabi Investment Authority (ADIA) endorsed the recommendations of the human resources development committee on the proposed phased increases in national banking personnel. It was agreed that from 1998, national participation in the banking sector would be increased to 4 percent annually, with the objective that in ten years, nationals would constitute 40 percent of the banking sector labor force. A number of well-planned training programs have been put in place to achieve Emiratization of almost half of the workforce by the year 2020. To date, however, these efforts have not produced the desired results, although special emphasis is placed on reducing the overall percentage of expatriates (from an all-time high of over 85 percent of the population).

To be sure, the active promotion of capital-intensive industries may somewhat ameliorate the quantitative shortages of unskilled labor but will certainly exacerbate the shortage of skilled workers so necessary to the efficient operation of such industries. Clearly, the encouragement of skilled or capital-intensive enterprises will rectify the labor imbalance, but only in the long run. In the short term, the adoption of a liberal immigration policy is a feasible, even if partial, solution to the labor shortage. In fact, various Emirates have chosen such a policy and are prepared to confront the risks it entails to the small indigenous population. This influx of foreign workers has and probably will continue to encounter political as well as social constraints, which will eventually place limits on immigration and diminish its effectiveness in this regard.[293] New regulations were necessary if for no other reason than to limit substantial state expenditures.

During 1998, the UAE economy benefited from continued government spending, which supported domestic economic activities. Meanwhile, the country's economic policy, which aims at diversifying sources of revenues and increasing growth rates for non-oil sectors, resulted in noticeable fluctuation. Inasmuch as improved oil revenues helped increase income and reduce deficits, the UAE could raise liquidity and support credit expansions. In doing so, Abu Dhabi matched the ongoing expansion within the non-oil sectors with significant GDP growth rates, which resulted in reducing local prices for goods and services.

Finally, it is also important to briefly discuss the UAE's agriculture policy, given remarkable achievements for a country that is physically inhospitable. Despite unfavorable soil and extremely difficult climatic conditions, the UAE has made major strides in developing a thriving agricultural industry, which defies all fallacious preconceptions. By using modern technology, the agriculture sector has made considerable progress in the past two decades, producing 2.64 billion Dhs worth of goods in 1995. Compared to an output of a mere 116 million Dhs in 1972, this reflects a growth rate of almost 15 percent per annum. Significant achievements in the field of agriculture continue to play a key role in securing the UAE's declared objective of full self-sufficiency in food production. In attempting a greater balance through economic diversification, the state is obviously encouraging the sector, not only for financial reasons but also for national security purposes. During the past three decades, the UAE's citizens have displayed a deep interest in agriculture, especially in Abu Dhabi. This has been reinforced by the personal attention that Shaykh Zayed showed to this field. Plots of land were distributed to citizens of Abu Dhabi, in addition to satisfactory loans to help farmers irrigate and manage their farms. In Liwa and Buraimi, plots of land were distributed freely, for both economic as well as political reasons.[294] Shaykh Zayed was greatly aware that UAE citizens needed to place “markers” throughout the country, to foster a sense of belonging and of strengthening existing roots. As a bonus to these initiatives, the progress that was achieved, according to various estimates, not only met basic local consumption needs but those of neighboring countries as well. From a situation of subsistence in the early 19705, the agriculture sector has grown rapidly to become one of the most sophisticated in the region, in the process transforming the country into a fruit and vegetable exporter. In 1995, the UAE produced almost 720,000 tons of vegetables, worth 1.14 billion Dhs, which was indeed a significant accomplishment.[295]

* Social Development

Although social changes in the UAE are less visible than economic changes, the country is considered one of the key Arab Gulf crucibles for social change. Less than half a century ago, the area that comprises the ٨1٢ـ was one of the least developed areas in the whole region. Tribalism had been a feature of this land since time immemorial. Of the many different tribes that made up the country’s population, very few were ever wholly nomadic, as the bulk were settled. The tribe has traditionally served as a cultural and ethnic frame of reference for the individual and often provided him with identity and social security. This was true then and it is true today.

Still, the country has one of the world’s fastest growing populations and, even if most of the increase is due to foreign immigration, the land is now home to over 2.5 million people (1996 estimate) hailing from over 100 countries. The UAE, like most of the Arab Gulf, has a youthful population, of which almost 40 percent are under 25 years old. Those in the older age groups, who often require more health care, are the UAE nationals, given that labor permits restrict residence in the Emirates only while employed. As with most Arab Gulf countries, the UAE relies heavily on foreign manpower, and as discussed above, the government is making a concerted effort to reduce the imbalance. In addition to financial considerations, the purpose of boosting the national percentage and improving citizen participation in the workforce is to address the country’s various social needs. A committee formed to address demographic issues, such as loopholes in the immigration laws, recommended a number of legislative changes to achieve these ends.[296]

Since independence, government investments in social development projects took on a semi-sacred role. UAE leaders emphasized various social issues that required rapid attention, including education, social security, health, and housing. Over the years, these sectors received the lion’s share of the total federal budget, thus rivaling all other Gulf states in this field.[297]

To be sure, rapid improvement of human capital is a crucial element in the development process. The long-held notion that capital is the engine of growth has given way to the idea that investment in education and training—both formal and informal—is also a precondition for successful development. Indeed, many Emiratis consider that education is their best investment, for themselves and the community at large. Importantly, until independence, Kuwait had provided funding for educational facilities to several Emirates. Indeed, lack of resources had prevented the “dependent” shaykhdoms from establishing formal educational systems. The idea was virtually inconceivable. Indeed, not until 1955 was there a modern school in the area again, it may be worth repeating, despite over a century of British presence in the Lower Gulf. The marginal status of education in the former Trucial States was accurately reflected in the illiteracy rate, which exceeded 90 percent in 1968 among men and almost 99 percent among women.

However, since independence, education has been made a key priority. At first, only a tiny number enjoyed access to formal schooling, and of those the majority were boys. The great importance placed by the UAE government on building a system that would provide education for all is amply reflected in the fact that education allocations within the budget have increased 23-fold since 1973. In 1997, education consumed 3.19 billion Dhs, constituting more than 16 percent of the federal budget. The number of public schools in the UAE rose from 132 in 1972 to some 668 in 1997–1998, and the number of students increased from 40,115 in 1972 to 312,000 in 1997–1998.[298] The process of bringing the modern educational system in line with the requirements of the new millennium is supervised by the Ministry of Education, which is preparing a “2020 plan,” to re-evaluate the existing educational system and introduce changes suitable for the requirements of the economic market and whatever challenges may arise in the twenty-first century. Indeed, it may be safe to conelude that education has become a far more important commodity in the Emirates, reflected in annual capital outlays—to remedy physical shortages for appropriate facilities and to fully eradicate illiteracy—that, without a doubt, reflect UAE leaders’ vision for the future.

Following the successful establishment of the ﻝﺎﺤ University in 1977, the Higher Colleges of Technology in 1988, and Zayed University a decade later, the UAE government is now re-evaluating their curricula to ensure that they meet with the country’s requirements. With female students numbering almost 75 percent of these institutions, certain social and economic changes are on the horizon. Until 1997, the UAE University awarded more than 17,267 diplomas to both genders, but only 800 graduates of the Higher Colleges of Technology joined the workforce.[299] Meanwhile, a number of private universities opened their doors in 1997–1998, among which the American University in Sharjah, Sharjah University, and the American University of Dubai stand out. These universities are considered as significant additions to existing educational facilities, but, unlike state universities, private institutions have open-door policies toward non-nationals. Consequently, they can attract certain students who, in turn, may contribute in different ways to the Emirati labor pool.

Housing is another area of social services in which the federal government is visibly active. Housing for UAE citizens has been a major concern of the government, believing as it does that it is one of the essential requirements for a stable family life and for society as a whole. Toward that end, and to meet various housing needs, federal and local departments as well as individuals and private firms jointly implemented an ambitious plan.[300] The plan extended to rural and urban areas in a bid to help Emiratis remain in their localities and to create balanced social and economic links between the regions.

For example, in Dubai, and aside from long-term no-interest loans provided by local authorities, the federal government initiated a new housing project to provide complimentary housing. The establishment of the Shaykh Zayed Housing Program in June 1998 was intended to address significant difficulties in the housing market—further complicated by premium rates on local facilities—to help UAE citizens improve their living standards. Besides low-income housing, the program provides no-interest loans for nationals for the purpose of building their own homes, repayable over a 20-year period. Meanwhile, the government of Abu Dhabi has launched a program of its own called the Social Services and Commercial Buildings Office, whose purpose is to build and manage the commercial buildings granted to citizens of the Emirate. In 1995, this program funded 230 commercial buildings, at a cost of 202 billion Dhs.[301]

If several generations ago there was an overwhelmingly rural population in the Lower Gulf, the UAE population has been mostly urbanized by the qualitative changes that have occurred since 1971. By 1995, almost 90 percent of the population were urban. In the span of a few short decades, the greater part of the population has been displaced from traditional rural modes of existence, to artificial urban settings. In like fashion there has been an equal acceleration in the everyday movement of people. Easy access to technology has made those distant places and foreign ideas familiar to Emiratis whose parents never ventured more than a few miles from their place of birth. Universal education, the availability of domestic and foreign goods with relative ease, and the constant exposure to foreign media outlets have all provided a constant barrage of new ideas, images, and tastes.

Although the basic elements of UAE society remain intact, several signs of the disruptive forces of accelerated modernization are visible. One index is the noticeable change in social habits, behavior, and values, with serious implications for the future, that is affecting the young and the old. It has been necessary in recent years to establish homes for the elderly and rehabilitation centers forjuvenile delinquents, two phenomena that are necessary but alien to the culture. These developments are, thus far, modest in scope, but they represent, in a society as profoundly family-centered as the UAE, a disturbing sign.

While tribal values are fading fast in Dubai, they still play a strong role in Abu Dhabi and some of the Northern Emirates. Meanwhile, changing attitudes among the UAE's youth should provide one of the obvious indexes to anticipate variations in social behavior patterns. Many young Emiratis who studied in Western countries are returning with a palpable appreciation for Western values and culture. In addition, the opening up of UAE society—in which, it may be worth repeating, most cultures are well represented and interaction is inevitable— has created a taste for such forms of social behavior. Others vociferously object to such behavior and call on UAE officials to curtail available freedoms. Why some Emiratis are drawn to the teachings of militant Islam while others partake in more tolerant social behavior is certainly a key development for the country's future stability. In fact, such potential social confrontations cannot be ruled out, further illustrating current dilemmas.

To be sure, most Emiratis value and respect traditional forms of authority, familial and governmental. Yet, it seems certain that deference to the past paternalistic ways is slowly becoming less pervasive.[302] In any event, what has perhaps been most surprising in the course of the UAE's greatly accelerated development is the capacity of traditional society to absorb massive change. Social institutions and cultural patterns have preserved their essential vitality. Perhaps more important is the role of Islam, which continues to serve as the stable foundation of society. Islam both provides the essential explanation of the meaning of individual and collective existence, and serves as a safety valve.

It cannot be doubted, nevertheless, that significant social changes are occurring that will greatly alter the basic values of UAE society. Unlike developed and relatively wealthy countries, there is little connection between wealth and work in the UAE. The message is clear: "Without efforts of self-denial, one can expect nothing in return." To remedy this lacuna, Dubai authorities initiated a scheme to help young people start their own businesses and taste the rewards of incrementalism. Designed to help young nationals stand on their feet, the program— which is called "Tamouh," or "enterprise"—has helped hundreds of young Emiratis. Any young national with experience but lacking capital can indeed benefit from the program. As a result, many small businesses have sprung up in Dubai during the past few years. This vital project helped to ease pressure on the public sector by channeling the growing pool of talent to the private sector. In addition, training courses for nationals are being offered to educate young Emiratis in their new responsibilities.

Parallel to the education, housing, and labor initiatives adopted by the UAE within its Emiratization program, Abu Dhabi introduced a unique new agenda in 1993 to encourage citizen matrimony. The Marriage Fund Program provides national men with a grant to enable them to meet the high cost of marriage to national women. It is also designed to limit UAE males' marrying foreign women. Between 1993 and 1995, the fund benefited over 3,084 citizens, with a 20 percent increase in 1995 over 1994. The 3,084 "grants" amounted to a total of 220 million Dhs, certainly a significant investment in the citizen population, and yet another illustration of the state's plan.[303]

One of the most noticeable changes in the UAE is the position and status of women. This is amply evidenced by the United Nations Development Program's Human Resources Development Report for 1997, which pointed out that women in the UAE have achieved the highest rate of development in all Arab countries. Indeed, the expanding role of women within UAE society over the past 30 years is largely due to a fundamental commitment made by senior government officials to promote women in all fields.

In the past, while some women were active outside of the home, most were primarily homemakers. Their contributions had never been considered as "organized employment." Since independence, the UAE constitution has granted women equal employment opportunities and equal wages, and those with marketable skills were encouraged to participate in the public sector. Government national policies helped bring women out of their seclusion and into the modern market. Once women attained the right to equal educational opportunities, they became further aware of the importance of their social roles and their contribution to the economy. As a result, women's participation in the UAE workforce has risen from 29,548, or a mere 5 percent of the total labor force of 577,521 in 1980, to 79,971, or 8 percent in 1994 (out of 994,844). By 1995, the figure stood at 119290, or 12 percent of the UAE's total labor force.[304] As the country enters the twenty-first century, many UAE women are employed in the government sector, particularly in traditional areas such as education and health, although they are now spreading across the federal civil service. Nevertheless, schoolteachers still account for around 40 percent of the total women's workforce.

It is important to note that within the civil service, women have reached the rank of ministerial undersecretary and assistant undersecretary. Women are also breaking new ground in the police forces, with a growing number of officers performing various functions, from criminal investigations to customs control. In addition, hundreds of women are working side by side with their male compatriots in the armed forces, filling all types of posts except those involving front-line combat. If substantial progress has been accomplished in this area, credit must be given to the UAE First Lady, Shaykha Fatima bin Mubarak, wife of Shaykh Zayed, and chairwoman of the UAE women's association. Although women's societies have played a major part in galvanizing society at large, the role and influence of the First Lady proved critical. To their credit, dozens of specialized associations throughout the country helped reduce illiteracy among women, which dropped to just 11.3 percent in 1995 from a high of 77.6 percent in 1980. In particular, the Abu Dhabi Women's Federation, chaired by Shaykha Fatima, has led a strong campaign to help women fight illiteracy, and along with appropriate state resources, it aimed to achieve total literacy among women by the end of 2000.

Naturally, a near-future political role for women would be the obvious reflection of this increasing position within society. Following calls by Shaykha Fatima that local women be encouraged to join the Federal National Council (FNC), women began to prepare themselves for parliamentary life. As equal opportunities are safeguarded within the constitution and there are no articles that prevent women from parliament, or discriminate against them in their duty for political participation, it will not be long before the UAE adopts ventures similar to the ones under development in Oman, Qatar, and Kuwait.

* Conclusion

Three decades after independence, what are the UAE's prospects for political survival, and hopes for stability and prosperity?

In 2000, the seven Emirates and their rulers were more committed to the suecess of the federation than when the “experiment” first began. Steps to preserve the unity of the country have been taken in a multitude of ways. Wealth distribution, social security, and economic prosperity, all vital factors for political stability, are ensured. UAE citizens have seen progress in all aspects of development, from the burgeoning economic sector, through social and cultural initiatives, to international ties. In fact, the country’s functioning development programs have provided UAE citizens with all the benefits of modern society. At the same time, both the government and Emiratis in general are determined that their political experience should be preserved. There is a widespread belief throughout the country that by holding on to their unity, they will be able to survive in a world that does not encourage small entities.

There are, without a doubt, formidable challenges ahead, including external threats to the UAE in particular and to Gulf security in general. The issue of unbalanced social structures is also perceived as major threats to the UAE. Nonetheless, the UAE is still holding on to its “experiment.” Internally, the degree of mutual suspicion and distrust has diminished considerably, and the perceived benefits of federal union far outweigh fears. Emiratis are keenly aware of their “interests” that can best be preserved through union. What is a problem, however, is the difficulty in overcoming individual Emirates’ prerogatives and preferences. As discussed above, immigration is one such concern, with each لاط federation member adopting a separate policy to satisfy local labor needs.[305] Surely the day will come when immigration rules will be regulated across the board.

In the end, the UAE has an international stature far greater than its physical size, population, and breadth of resources would seem to indicate. Like many other traditional states, it is facing the dilemma of combining its rich cultural heritage with elements of modernization, and despite evidences of success, only time will tell whether the “experiment” will evolve. Much like the country’s first provisional constitution, which eventually became a permanent political document, the Union may yet surprise many by growing in stride.

[270] Although the development of the country was planned in Abu Dhabi, and because the largest Emirate was the wealthiest, many assumed that the poorer Northern Emirates would be neglected. To be sure, Abu Dhabi stood to gain more, but, to their credit, its leaders shouldered federal responsibilities with aplomb. Even if the standards were uneven, the Northern Emirates benefited from Abu Dhabi’s largesse, a record that compared well within similar federal set-ups.

[271] Ali Mohammed Khalifa, The United Arab Emirates: Unity in Fragmentation, London: Croom Helm, 1979, p. 9.

[272] Ibid., p. 9.

[273] Both town dwellers along the coast and Bedus from the interior manned the hundreds of ships that put out to sea to harvest the pearl banks. Expeditions were harsh and lasted almost six months, starting in May and ending in October each year. This was a significant resource and literally defined the area’s economic life. Pearl diving benefited few, even though a large number of locals were thus “employed.” See Hassan M. Al-Naboodah, “From a Traditional Society to a Modern State,” in Joseph A. Kechichian (ed.), A Century in Thirty Years: Shaykh Zayed and the United Arab Emirates, Washington, DC.: Middle East Policy Council, 2000, pp. 9–30.

[274] Mohammed Al-Fahim, From Rags To Riches.A Story of Abu Dhabi, London: The London Centre of Arab Studies, 1995, p. 34.

[275] Malcolm Peck, The United Arab Emirates:A Venture in Unity, London: Croom Helm, 1986, p. 127.

[276] Ras al-Khaimah did not join the union until 10 February 1972. There were several reasons for Ras al-Khaimah’s early decision, including Iran’s occupation of the Tunb islands, the question of representation within the Federal National Council, as well as the role played by Saudi Arabia. A few months after the UAE was created, Shaykh Saqr Al Qasimi was persuaded by his own subjects to join the nascent federal entity. See Frauke Heard-Bey, From Trucial States to United Arab Emirates:A Society in Transition, 2nd edition, London: Longman, 1996; and Fatma ALSayegh, Al-Imarat al-Arabiyyat al-Muttahidat: Min al-Qabilat ila-daudat [The United Arab Emirates: From Tribalism to Statehood], Dubai: Markaz al-Khalij lil-Kutub, 1997.

[277] Ibrahim Al Abed, Paula Vine, and Abdullah Al Jabali (eds.). Chronicle of Progress, 25 Years of Development in the United Arab Emirates, London: Trident Press for the Ministry of Information, 1996, p. 14.

[278] Al-Abed, op. cit., p. 412.

[279] Ibrahim Al Abed, Peter Hellyer, and Paula Vine, UnitedArab Emirates, Yearbook 1998, London: Trident Press for the Ministry of Information, 1998, p. 72 (hereafter Yearbook 1998).

[280] It is also important to note that the gap between the UAE’s oil production and exports, as in most Arab Gulf states, is extremely narrow. This is an indication of how little oil was consumed locally. While total UAE oil exports in 1976 were 710 million barrels, the figure for 1996 reached 2.23 million bpd. Moreover, oil exports reached 54 billion Dhs in 1996 against 44.6 in 1995. Oil provides for approximately 75 percent of the UAE’s public revenues. Meanwhile, UAE national economic policy, which took shape roughly in 1973, has endeavored to introduce some sense of balance between the oil-producing Emirates and the less fortunate ones. In addition, the UAE operates a very open trade policy and is committed to trade liberalization as a means of encouraging industrial growth. See Ibrahim Al Abed, Peter Hellyer, and Paula Vine, UnitedArab Emirates, Yearbook 1997, London: Trident Press for the Ministry of Information, 1997, pp. 66, 78 (hereafter Yearbook 1997).

[281] Al-Abed, op. cit., p. 411.

[282] Al-Abed, op. cit., p. 410.

[283] Yearbook 1997, p. 97.

[284] Khalifa, op. cit., p. 70.

[285] GulfNews, 6 February 2000.

[286] Kagaei El Mallakh, The Economic Development of the UnitedArab Emirates, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1981, pp. 58–9.

[287] While it is not a requirement to choose a local agent (kafi) in every transaction, the practice is widely followed, to limit foreign exposure to a minimum.

[288] El Mallakh, ibid., p. 160.

[289] Yearbook I997,p. 103.

[290] Yearbook 1997, p. 108.

[291] GulfNews, 30 January 2000.

[292] Gulf News, 31 January 2000.

[293] El Mallakh, op. cit., p. 60.

[294] This step has political implications, since Saudi Arabia claims this land.

[295] Yearbook 1997,p. 117.

[296] The perceived political and security threats from the huge numbers of migrant workers in the UAE (around 1.13 million in 1997 and predicted to increase by 2 percent annually) is a widely discussed subject. For example, a fairly typical editorial in Al-Khaleej, a leading UAE daily, described the issue as a serious threat to external and internal security, and called on the government to take major steps to solve it. In a country where foreigners outnumber natives by more than one to five, such fears are natural. See Al-Khaleej, 17 April 1999.

[297] Khalifa, op. cit., p. 75.

[298] Yearbook 1997,p. 178.

[299] Ibid.,p. 179.

[300] Every UAE male national is entitled to a free house. However, only females in need are given free housing. See Yearbook 1998, p. 124.

[301] Al-Abed, op. cit., p. 404.

[302] Peck, op. cit., p. 73.

[303] Al-Abed, op. cit., p. 405.

[304] Yearbook 1997, p. 194.

[305] Peck, op. cit., p. 132.

 Chapter 11: Kuwait and Bahrain: The Appeal of Globalization and Internal Constraints

May Seikaly

Political observers and economic analysts on the Gulf are agreed that the whole Arabian Gulf region is undergoing a crisis demanding basic changes that should impact the basic fabric of Gulf society. Although such voices, and often the same ones, have been giving these premonitions of impending disasters and the urgent need to remedy them for a long time, their quest seems more desperate and their fears substantiated at this stage. Economic but also political and social indicators of this condition are clear and spell serious repercussions for the near future. The most recent literature on the subject, internationally and from the Gulf region, clearly emphasizes the theme that this condition, spawned by the nature of the regimes in the region and now sparked by regional and international events, has accelerated its pace, reaching irreversible proportions. The threat to the stability of the region and its societies has become serious. This “crisis in slow motion,” as Gary Sick calls it, has reached full bloom.[306]

One Kuwaiti writer portrayed the region as a fragile oasis of relative tranquility that has become the eye of the storm, surrounded by a turbulent sea of demographic explosion and mobility. In this he was referring to the economically poor human masses encircling the region. He estimates that in one decade, population in the Indian subcontinent will reach a billion; at the same time, that of Iran will swell to 120 million, in Egypt to 100 million, and in Yemen to 50 million. Yemen alone would have a population exceeding that of all the GCC countries put together.[307] Today the estimated total number of Gulf nationals is below 18 million, and even with the very high demographic growth of 3.5 percent per year, the region will need much more than a decade to catch up with its neighbors. Such statements express deep-seated vulnerability and insecurity about what the future holds for the Gulf nations, but also significantly telling is the awareness and sense by people in the region that their nations are demographically small, perceived as wealthy, and targeted by the waves of globalization.

Today the region finds itself part of a world that is growing smaller, where resources are fewer, where inequities are contested, and where human rights are internationally approved and proclaimed. Taking into consideration the phenomenal social and material achievements that societies of the Gulf states have accumulated during the last 50 years, this feeling of claustrophobia, threat, and impending disaster is understandable; especially when these nations are pressed to change and to open their societies and economies to the waves of global change.

Since the 1991 War for Kuwait, the Gulf states as a whole, including Kuwait and Bahrain, the subjects of this chapter, have survived under an umbrella of two conflicting pulls: externally the hegemonic Western impact toward globalization, and internally the increase of ripples and roars within these societies calling for economic and social rationalization, cautious liberalization, and even introversion. These internal pulls have triggered a process often ambiguously expressed by domestic religious, traditional, tribal, familial, and economic reactions.

The military advent of Western powers into the region, particularly that of the U.S., in 1991 brought home the reality of the new world order. While CNN introduced every home to “American-style and slanted” media information on the war, it also informed about U.S. culture and lifestyle. The people in the Gulf were not immune to the technological revolution and all its implications; however, at that time it reached all and affected all aspects of their lives. The dramatic impact of the war, its expense, and their entanglement in it became a reality. In addition to the trauma of war, Gulf governments and societies had to squarely face the possibilities of economic loss and indebtedness, and the need to reassess resources, achievements, and challenges. Khaldoun al-Naqeeb in his latest article entitled “The Gulf... where to?” does exactly that in his usual trenchant style, however with clear tones of exasperation and desperation.[308] He repeats and endorses the opinions and concerns of a growing number of Gulf writers and intellectuals, now a second generation of Gulf nationals calling for change.

While the war and its legacy shook the basic pillars of the state systems in Kuwait and Bahrain, it also awakened and gave life to historically present but muted and diverted popular demands. Today the voices coming from these two countries reflect the exact nature their two regimes have evolved into, the freedom they accord their citizens, and their response to the situation. While Kuwaiti analysts boldly criticize and demand fundamental changes, Bahraini voices, on the other hand, are ambivalent and use riddles and allegories to propose the same changes. However, there is a consensual view on the roots of the crisis and the overall outline for its remedy.[309] The foremost demand is for accountability of national economic management. Demands are for rationalizing development by balancing projections for future growth with diversified investment, balancing military expenditures with realistic strategic and security needs, and balancing national wealth distribution with a gradual phasing out of the pervasive welfare system. Under discussion are employment policies to take into account the demographic balance between Gulf nationals and foreign workers, thus involving labor legislation and enforcement. Another concern has been with education and the need to promote a modern generation with social and political consciousness, ready to assume an active role as responsible citizens.

All these needs, while recognized on the official level as expressed through government promises and statements, have been impossible to implement; although some half-hearted, partial attempts have been noted. Such demands challenge the fundamentals on which these family states are based and the type of relationships they have forged with their subjects. It is clear that the problem rests in the structural foundation of these states, within which their societies have been nurtured for the last 50 years. The Gulf state formation depended on two basic structural pillars: first and foremost, a wealthy rentier economy leading to a rentier societal “ethos” (if we could use the term in this way), and second, the gradual evolution of the regimes into authoritarian, mostly militarist/police-state apparatuses that fully controlled all resources, their distribution, and channels of power. These two pillars complement each other and feed upon each other.[310] Furthermore, this type of economy has been instrumental in altering the value system of Gulf societies, creating a mentality and attitude of dependency that explain the reaction to the crisis today. Resistance to facing the realities of this crisis is not only by the regimes who are reluctant to apply obviously unpopular economic policies as solutions, but also by the people, who have come to expect welfare benefits as their birthright.

This is the situation that both Kuwait and Bahrain find themselves in. The oil sector dominates revenue of both countries in the form of royalties or rents to cover the major part of their national income. For Kuwait, over 97 percent of revenue comes from oil sales and investment of oil money. Bahrain, the poorest of the oil-producing countries, depends on oil for 50 percent of its immediate national income. Other revenues come from domestic investment in industries and in services and from Saudi subsidies, again all indirectly dependent on the same commodity. Oil prices fluctuated from over 40 to less than 810 a barrel from the 1970s to 2000, and with them the economies and fortunes of these countries swayed. Oil prices hit record lows in the mid-to-late 1980s and in the late 1990s.[311] There are no indications that the present low prices can attain the boom levels of the 1970s or will change in any drastic fashion for the foreseeable future. Furthermore, both countries have been operating at a deficit since the 1991 war and have depleted their reserves as well as taken out loans. Albeit, it should be noted that due to some improvement in oil prices in 1999, this budget deficit has been reduced from $5.5 billion to $3 billion as specified by official government reporting.

Kuwait bore the heaviest load of the war drama and its repercussions, such as the violence of occupation, of flight, and of human and economic loss. It is estimated that the GCC countries paid heavily to cover the expenses of liberating Kuwait, at least $65 billion in 1990 and $70 billion in 1991.[312] The Kuwaiti share in the war was approximately $65 billion. This, along with various expenses as a result of war ramifications, has sliced Kuwait's national reserves by over 60 percent. Out of $100 billion in reserves in 1980, the value has dwindled to $35 billion in 1995, with $30 billion in outstanding foreign debt.[313] Furthermore, the immediate economic consequence of the war has held the Kuwaiti economy hostage to increasing demands for arms and security and protection expenses, as well as the burdens of innumerable expenses for the sake of recovery. The social and political developments in Kuwait during the last decade have been colored by these consequences and explain the complex accommodations, adjustments, and achievements that Kuwaiti society is undergoing.

Bahrain too, similar to the whole region, experienced many immediate realities and results of the war—in the form of Kuwaiti refugees and U.S. forces and maneuvers as well as Iraqi Scud missiles. Along with other Gulf governments, Bahrain's had to tighten its belt, which meant constricting the welfare benefits of society while at the same time pursuing a race to purchase arms and tighten security. But the long-range economic effects were tremendous on Bahrain, the worst hit of the Gulf states; it took the form of unemployment, social and political unrest, and a serious environment of malaise.[314]

Thus in Bahrain, the poorest and least endowed of the Gulf states and the one that suffers most from economic distress, this malaise has been most vocally illustrated. It has translated into a violent sustained uprising that has claimed lives and property and pitted a population demanding economic fairness against a political system projected as withholding equality and justice.[315] Within the Gulf system, Bahrain's condition is the most intense case, but there are signs that opposition demanding economic fairness, equitable sharing in the wealth of the country, and a say in its fate has emerged in other areas too.

* Historical Background

While it is beyond the purview of this paper to detail the development of political society in these two states, it is pertinent to briefly review the historical precedents for sociopolitical development in both. It should be noted that in both Bahrain and Kuwait a movement of nationalist consciousness started earlier than in any other region of the Gulf, and their societies have been strongly impacted by that. The political discourse in Kuwait and Bahrain still reflects a legacy of nationalist activism, experience of some democratic life, and undercurrents of opposition to the ruling regime.[316]

We can distinguish two developmental stages in the two states where economic and social structures were directly affected by the oil industry: The first started in the 1950s and culminated in the late 1970s, and the second unfolded in the 1990s. While the first stage was the founding period for the economic basis of society and molded its sociopolitical character and direction; the second stage has been and still is the period in which these societies search for an identity and grounding within a regional and a global settmg.[317]

Particularly in the 19705, the tremendous growth in oil wealth successfully built up the infrastructure and other manifestations of the state along modern lines and provided citizens with a wide range of services such as education, health, social services, even entertainment. These were centralized projects by the state, the supreme employer and provider of benefits to this welfare system. Therefore the ruling institution played the major role in creating and withholding opportunities. It also rationalized its legitimacy through these achievements and by building a network of alliances based on tribal, sometimes religious, and/or economic interests.[318] Economic favors in the form of money or land

Kuwait and Bahrain ... Globalization and Internal Constraints 181 donations or control of power-generating posts have been some of the means by which these alliances were and are cemented. During this period, the state evolved into a powerful apparatus with the technology and measures of control and coercion.

This process created modern-looking societies without solving the dilemmas of rapid Western modernization and the persistence of traditional cultural values with political tribal/sectarian relations. All modernization techniques introduced into Kuwait and Bahrain since the inception of the state have been tailored to endorse this relationship and confirm these roles. Modernization also meant the creation of departments and an apparatus to ensure control and order, such as the Central Statistics Department. This system successfully kept taps on every citizen and resident in the state through a sophisticated computerized network linked to police surveillance. The police/internal-control and security systern became closely identified with the ruling institution and its apparatus.

On the social and political levels, the 1960s and 1970s were decades of nationalism, liberation, and enthusiastic development. They were the boom years in the oil economies, affecting the whole region: both producers and benefactors of oil economic growth. This put in motion many societal developments that were to affect all sectors of society: mass education, employment, protective legislation and organized lobbying for labor representational rights. Most achievements were state sponsored and were considered essential when the state was forming its power bases. This period also witnessed urbanization/sedentarization, high fertility, and mobility.

By the 1980s the economies of the Gulf as a whole, including those of Bahrain and Kuwait, had become incorporated into the global capitalist structure and were affected by the general drop in real prices of primary commodities, including oil. When oil prices fell in 1986 (from $28 to $7), the whole region was adversely affected, and this was reflected in economic and political difficulties. The region had become indebted to international lenders. Austerity measures were instituted and social upheavals became common; also, repression intensified.[319] The governments of both states found themselves in the position of balancing and accommodating their survival on the basis of the demands of the various sociopolitical forces that these societies had produced in the decades of oil wealth.

During the late 1960s and the 1970s—a period of sharp economic prosperity—a large middle class, mainly urban, concentrated in the metropole, and Sunni, emerged. The late 1980s saw these developments, in varying degrees, reach the rural and tribal sectors of society, both Sunni and Shia as well as those of some of the ethnic minorities (the Beduns, the Balushis, and the Persians). Educational, health, and other services to both rural and urban areas were built, along with high-rise office buildings and other modern outlets. The local economic market expanded, as various corporations (monopolies by certain families of established status and wealth) were set up and employment in the service sector increased. It was a period of major material expansion that raised the economic and social expectations of people; however it also happened at a time when signs of econornic contraction as well as class and sectarian differences were felt.

Gradually in the 1980s and 1990s, the social structure in both states began coalescing into two economically homogenous classes with a growing gap between them. This was more pronounced in Bahrain than in Kuwait due to higher resource wealth in the latter and a historical legacy that permitted a somewhat more equitable wealth distribution in Kuwait than in Bahrain. Nevertheless, a stratum of glaringly wealthy merchant and technocrat families and high government officials, mostly from traditional merchant families and a few newly elevated families, particularly Shias of Arab or Persian origins, grew. These made up the upper middle class. Also, a conglomerate of various ethnic groups coalesced into a professional salaried and broker merchant stratum whose power was dependent on income from government-sponsored services or economic opportunities.

The lower middle class developed from another very large combination of mostly ethnic/religious groups with minimal education whose standard of living had been forcibly raised and who found themselves constantly in search of more income while anxiously protecting what they had already acquired. This class was more closely aligned to the lowest economic stratum, with little substantial difference in their economic or conservative structure. This poorest stratum, having benefited from the enlarged education and health services of the state, acquired more political awareness and expectations for development, with no corresponding opportunities.

Similar to what occurred in other Arab and Gulf states, the oil revolution of the 1970s in Kuwait and Bahrain left a very conservative social order characterized by a laissez-faire capitalist, open-door economic policy; a policy that did not democratize opportunity and had no contingencies for the period of reversed fortunes. While the business community, the upper classes, and the upper middle class merchant strata experienced a boom with proliferation of visible accumulated wealth—palatial houses, residential compounds, spectacular business centers, and a wealthy lifestyle—as well as the mushrooming of Western enterprises (Kentucky Fried Chicken, McDonald's, Woolworth's, etc.), by the 19805 the lower middle class was experiencing a contraction in its purchasing power, and vulnerability in its employment. It was worst among the lower classes, whose expectations had been whetted through education and through the obvious signs of prosperity at its doorstep,[320] a prosperity denied to it by the contracted resources, growth in population, heightened expectations, and demand for employment. This situation was more pronounced in Bahrain than Kuwait. However, by that date, the political order in both states, with its paternalism, welfare policy, and limitation of popular participation, had become the norm and only sporadically contested.

Nevertheless, the reversal in the fortunes of the oil-producing nations and the Gulf War brought contractions in the economic strength of Kuwait and Bahrain and the available funds for state-sponsored projects. By this phase, state budgets had to heed the danger signs and limitations imposed by their global financial liabilities while at the same time temper demands and sensibilities of the citizens. For the last decade, the economic crisis, detailed at the outset of this paper, has intensified and reluctantly pushed the regimes and their citizens into new forms Kuwait and Bahrain ... Globalization and Internal Constraints 183 of relationships and accommodations. While economic constraints are being defined by the incorporation of local economies into the wider global financial networks, their application on the ground has to accommodate sociopolitical realities on the national, i.e., local, level.[321]

It should be noted that Western influence and the infiltration of Western social behavior and economic presence, as well as the unfolding of a lesser Arab nationalist discourse and an implied acceptance of the American sponsorship for normalization with Israel, all promoted socially and morally laden controversies and elicited the anger of the conservative and religious sensibilities in both countries. The quiet endorsement by officials of Western projects, their presence, and influence deepened popular anti-Western and anti-government feelings.[322] All this had been festering and circulating even before the war in 1991 and the peace initiatives (the Oslo Accords) that followed. Such moods hit a basic chord particularly within the economically depressed strata and those who felt the impact of official restriction and monitoring.

It was in these conditions and through the feelings of frustration and discontent they generated that the Islamist movements found adherents and support. The Islamist discourse provided the opposition with refuge and response to its outcry against conceived injustices as well as the unresolved dilemma of reconciling tradition to the flood of Westernization. Furthermore, with the complete absence of legal political channels for expressing grievances, revitalized popular Islam filled the vacuum. All through the 1980s the Islamic idiom was inching in on all levels of life and most particularly among the lower middle classes and the lower strata of society. The religio-political thrust of these movements stimulated a discourse of hope and redemption induced by the modern crisis on the moral, economic, and political levels.[323] In view of the previously mentioned transformations in society, the social implications of revived Islam gradually became pervasive and it acclimatized itself to the particular grievances of the moment and the dilemmas of identity that these societies were undergoing.

It was the 1991 Gulf War, with its dramatic impact of occupation, flight, fragmentation of Kuwaiti society, and Kuwaitis’ sense of extreme dislocation, vulnerability, and disarray, that finally initiated a new stage in the process of introspection, analysis, and reaction among Gulf societies. The war and its aftermath brought to the fore pre-existing societal controversies, intensified and compounded economic hardships, and provided an outlet for popular reaction. Kuwait and Bahrain became the platforms for the most intense reactions, one as the scene of the war and the second as the scene of an ongoing popular uprising. In both, the legitimacy, sovereignty, and legislative power of the tribal/familial government has been challenged by the growing calls for accountability and economic rights, and the demands by Islamists for power sharing. In both states, the movement for women's empowerment as well as the move toward freedom of expression, democratization, and human rights have become the stage in which society faces its history, its traditions, its social evolution, and its relationship to the political establishment and ultimately to the new economic forces impacting its future.

* The Unfolding of the Current Crisis in Kuwait and Bahrain

Economic and political indicators make it clear that Kuwait and Bahrain are in the front line of all the Gulf states facing economic problems, but more clearly both are facing the inevitability of political change and possible explosions. National revenue has reached a ceiling and both governments have already dipped into their reserves. The welfare bill is growing and is weighed down by demographic increase and a new generation of graduates ready for employment. At the same time, these countries are continuously urged by international monetary commitments to streamline their budgets and expenditure and to balance their finances by involving their citizens in both revenue generation and decision making. Although these are the obvious necessary steps in the process to fall in line with global economic systems, such a formula of action would entail drastic revision of the basis and the status quo on which these societies have been remodeled since the discovery of oil. In other words, a change in the economic relationship between the ruling institution and the citizens means a fundamental reassessment on the part of the ruling families and the people of these Gulf states; a reassessment of the power system that governs their lives, its permanence and continuity. This is the crux of the dilemma that both the society and the regimes are facing, a situation that is hard to accept and harder to apply.

While the regimes are hard-pressed to lower the welfare bill, they are very reluctant to give up their prerogatives of absolute control over the sources of wealth and power. Citizens of these states, for their part, seem to expect a more open political system, with authoritative and institutionalized legislature as a basic right for their involvement in the economic burdens of the state. While voices of criticism and demands are loud and more persistent from within these societies, there has been no consensus on issues of fundamental significance to their future, whether that concerns the future and nature of the welfare system or the ideological identification of society. The issue of identity, the pull between tradition and modernity and the obsession with authenticity are of particular concern, in view of Western economic hegemony and influence. In both Kuwait and Bahrain these issues are the focus of debate that is shadowed by the controversy of state economic dependency on the global/Western economic system.

What will the future character of these states and these nations be? Is it Islam or secularism? The debate is particularly intense between the Islamists and the secular liberals. These are concerns that are debated in the Kuwaiti parliament, in the professional clubs, in the streets, diwaniyas, and mat’ams of Kuwait and Bahrain as well as among the opposition camps abroad. Nevertheless it is important to reinforce the point that these debates, whether Islamist or liberal, do not demand the drastic change of the political system, or the overthrow of the ruling families; at least that is what they officially declare; nor are they agreed on the principle for changing the welfare system or the form it should take.

 The Sh^khdom of Kuwait

In Kuwait these debates have acquired serious tones in recent months, indicating a more intense stage in the socioeconomic crisis. Since the war, Kuwaiti society has been consumed by recovery from the trauma and making good on the opportunity to institutionalize democratic politics. Armed with previous parliamentary experience and a relatively open political atmosphere, Kuwaitis valued that right and established it as the most precious national recompense after the war. Thus a return to the constitution was universally demanded during the hottest period of the conflict, making the return of the ruling family contingent upon it. As promised by the ruler, though reluctantly, at his meeting with Kuwaiti citizens in Jeddah, which has been held to be the new covenant between the government and the people for the post-war era, the constitution and free elections were re-established.

The first elected parliament brought representation of all political currents, with a strong deputation of Islamist groups. Although the numerical strength of the elected Islamists in the parliament of 1992 was large, there was no coordination among the various groupings representing Islamic ideological currents then. During the sessions of that parliament, energies were devoted to the many problems and vendettas left over from the occupation, with pitched battles against the ruling family, particularly over their financial role and accountability during and after the war. On the whole, achievements of the parliaments since 1992 have not been very significant, and their efforts have been taken up with petty squabbles among members and no substantial results.[324]

As for the latest parliament, elected in July 1999 with 80 percent turnout, and coming after six years of inertia, it promised a lively political life with more seriOUS debates and actions.[325] This was at a time when the economic and political crisis had intensified and its ramifications had become more commonly discussed. Unlike its predecessor, in this parliament three Islamist groupings were able to form a coalition with the tribal blocs, thus controlling one-third of the Majlis al-Umma (the parliament). Soon after that and through a deliberate policy of muscle flexing, the Islamists were able to plunge the country into a state of political excitement by challenging public secular liberties.

By the end of the year 2000, infringements on publically accepted social norms attributed to the Islamists had accumulated and reached explosive dimensions. These had come in the wake of various incidents of physical attacks, supposedly by Islamists, on video shops considered to be upholders of loose morals and non-Islamic propaganda, as well as legal attacks on women writers and publishers accused of immoral and irreligious views, up to February 2001, the Islamists vigorously pushed their moral-laden agenda by demanding control of socioeconomic activities, as in the banning of entertainment activities associated with the traditional trade festivals mounted during the month of February. Such ideological platforms were and are meant to convey to the public the new image the Islamic currents in Kuwait wish to project; that is, their role as custodians of moral and social behavior, whether on public dress, comportment, lifestyle, or thought. In this challenge, the Islamists have opened wide the door of debates on identity, authority, and democracy within the framework of the economic situation and its constraints.

This situation has raised the fear of a powerful Islamist bloc using its position in the new parliament, and the democratic process, to impose its own social and cultural definition of society on all citizens. Since liberation, Islamists have attracted popular support; however, these more recent activities have incited fears among the secular liberals and others. These events have shown that the Islamists have become the strongest political bloc in the parliament and are capable of imposing their definitions and solutions to the ills of society. It was within this challenge that the Islamic bloc took a stand to defeat the Amiri decree of October 1999 that gave women the right to vote and run for office. On one hand, the blocking of that law was meant to prove the application of constitutional power over that of the ruler—in other words, that the ruler's decree could no longer be held above the constitution—and, on the other hand, its defeat was to confirm the ideological line of the Islamic current. In fact this exhibited their capacity to impose their religio-cultural interpretation upon social development and women's rights.[326]

In view of the very feeble and lukewarm reaction from the ruling family, it is clear that that partner in the political process took a backstage position, that of an observer more than that of a participant. Again, this role has evolved gradually since the end of the war and the family's less than courageous stance then. Furthermore, rumor has it that the Al Sabahs are, similar to other Gulf ruling families, undergoing dynastic competition and the emergence of younger members with ambition and more modern projects. The ruler himself, Shaykh Jaber, has been absent from the scene for a long time; the crown prince—prime minister is reportedly seriously ill; and Sabah al-Ahmad Al Sabah, who has been running the affairs of governing, has also kept a low profile. The family is facing a growing popular demand to separate the role of the prime minister from that of the heir apparent, clearly with the intention of having the future prime minister come from the nationals and not from the ruling Al-Sabahs, thus gradually confining them to a more nominal political role.

Since June 2000 the situation has galvanized political life in Kuwait in reaction to the growing Islamist influence and control of the democratic process. Al-Quds newspaper of 1 May 2000 reported, from the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Ra’y alAmm that a group of intellectuals, writers, and politicians (30 of them) representing Kuwaiti liberals and old politicians, among whom were Jasim al-Saqr, Yacoub Jani, Awad Al-Humoud, Khalifa Loujian, and Muhammad al-Rumaihi, met and declared their pessimism, despair, and opposition to the growing atmosphere of political regression and religious fanaticism within the parliament (Majlis). These views have also been transferred to the newspapers, where they have expressed the public loss of confidence in its elected body—the parliament—as well as fears for the future. This group of 30 called for a popular committee to represent all national elements opposing what they consider the coercive trend in the parliament.

Within the folds of this struggle, however, is the matter of power that all currents of the political society covet. It is the power to define the direction of social and economic development at this stage when economic strains and reduced resources have become a threat to all. Although liberal politicians started fighting back against the growing Islamist influence and power, this will probably trap society into a protracted struggle that will only detract from facing the serious economic crisis and its social repercussions. Furthermore, these latest events of confrontations with the Islamists are bound to trigger negative results for the constitutional movement as a whole, and undermine efforts within that work toward transforming the economy and hopefully society. Nevertheless, there are new voices from within the Islamist currents expressing more moderate views concerning gender issues and women’s voting rights.[327]

In the latest events unfolding since the New Year, Kuwaiti political life has been slightly shaken out of its inertia and paralysis. While the absence of royal family leadership has become an accepted reality, the popular voice has coalesced between moderate Islamists and some of the traditional liberal symbols to form an active opposition front. The demand for change by this front resulted in the dissolution of the government in late January 2001 and has now raised the hopes that the new government will embody serious and essential changes, such as distancing the royal family from executive power and giving credence to democratic demands.[328] However, only time will tell how such a front, made up of discordant ideological elements, will fare when and if reforms for socioeconomic transformations are finally put on the table.

 The Shaykhdom of Bahrain

As for Bahrain, where a grassroots anti-government protest uprising (an intifada) has been going on since the summer of 1994, the economic crisis has been translated into this explosive situation. The socioeconomic history of Bahrain is testimony to the role that economic property, distribution of wealth, and the emergence of sharp economic differences have played in creating an opposition. The basic motivation for this movement is economic, and the common solution demanded by the protestors is a return to the constitution, to the democratic process scrapped by the ruling family in 1975.[329] a constitutional rule is seen as the panacea that would heal the evils of an absolutist, self-interested regime. Thus the implications of these demands are that in times of economic depredations, the political contract with a paternalistic, authoritarian rule becomes null and void.[330] Although the articulation of these demands has come from various currents, elements, groups, and strata of the Bahraini society—Shias and Sunnis, liberals, leftists and Islamists, workers, professionals and intellectuals, men and women—it is the Islamic currents that have given cover to the largest and strongest thrust of this opposition movement.

Today there are some signs of innovative measures to alleviate the tense atmosphere in the country resulting from the crisis it has been enduring for the past decade. While the outward impression has been that of a state of political paralysis where nothing seems to be happening, more recently there have been feeble indications of shifts and alternative propositions. Nevertheless, as is usual in countries where the police machinery is overly oppressive, one has to observe the unimportant and the trivial in order to get at the underlying currents and signs of political and social stirrings; furthermore, official proclamations and proposals should be seriously but very critically analyzed.[331]

Information from the opposition still claims continued brutal police treatment, arrests, imprisonment, and infringement of basic human rights. These happenings are rarely commented upon officially, especially concerning the claims from the Shia rural opposition. Although a good number of political prisoners have been released and some who had been exiled have been pardoned, the opposition still claims continued police supervision and re-internment of some of those released. Every now and then, Sunnis renew their voices of Opposition, complaining of economic and social deprivations. These have come from the pulpit of the mosques in Muharaq, a traditional stronghold of the ruling Al Khalifah family. Clerics are taking exception to the life of luxury and entertainment that some sectors of the society live by and have access to, such as car and horse races, golfing and surfing, art and trade exhibits; while, as they claim, peopie go hungry and economic conditions are worsening. Furthermore, secular professional unions, such as the General Union of Bahraini Workers, in the hope of a more open political environment under the new ruler, Hamad bin Isa, attempted to reorganize, but opposition reports indicate that they were immediately threatened and silenced.[332]

On another level, many of the younger members of the Al Khalifah family are actively sponsoring and hosting cultural and trade programs, all part of an obviOUS campaign to drive home their role and staying power. Succession has been confirmed in the Amir’s son, a graduate ofAmerican schooling but fully steeped in the political culture of the family. Other sons, cousins, nephews, and even nieces are promoted as carriers of the banner for the ruling family and its role in the country. The younger generation of educated family members are awarded the most prestigious positions: women as ambassadors, all the key ministerial roles, as well as the sensitive military posts. Most of the deputy ministerial positions, the second in line commanding the executive power of these ministries, have been assigned to young Al Khalifahs. Since his accession a year ago, the ruler has also increased the monthly stipends doled to each family member, approximately 3,000 of them. Such a clear policy of “Khalifahization” ofjobs is meant, on one hand, to consolidate the new Amir’s position vis-â-vis his family, the main supporters of the regime, to score internal political victories against his uncle, the prime minister, but even more significantly in order to confirm and entrench the position ofAl Khalifahs as the ruling institution in Bahrain.

A few measures of appeasement have been introduced by the new Amir, such as bestowing Bahraini passports upon and giving naturalized status to some 850 Beduns, people who had been living in Bahrain for generations with no legal documentation. This had been long due and its implementation now does not threaten the state or the demographic balance between Sunni and Shia, and therefore is politically acceptable. Other signs of opening up, and what the government considers liberalizing measures, included the promise by the ruler, during the National Day celebrations, to initiate municipal elections giving even women the right to vote, but not to run for office, as was the case in Qatar; this, when Bahraini women had been among the earliest and most active in the nationalist and constitutional movements of the 1960s and 1970s. In this latest uprising, women have also been active in petition writing and demanding constitutional rights. However, in order to placate an insistent demand by women for participation, it is ironic that a few of them were appointed to the latest Consultative/Shura Council.

In an attempt to appease and divert the demands for reinstating the constitution, in line with other Gulf states and following the war in 1992, the government has appointed this Shura/Consultative Council. However, this council as well as the proposed municipal elections did not measure up to the demands for real democratic political rights, and opposition remained adamant in its demands for a constitutional parliament similar to that of Kuwait. While there have been a few official announcements in the international media promising the return to constitutional life and a more democratic political atmosphere, this has not been translated into reality yet.

The final and most recent stage in the proposed reforms by the Amir was the call for a referendum to be held on February 14–15, 2001, on a national charter (;mithaq) meant to change the suspended constitution. In this charter, a bicameral assembly is proposed that is made up of two bodies: an appointed upper house and an elected house, both with equal legislative powers. Also an independent judiciary is accounted for as well as full suffrage for all citizens, including women. As for the ruler, his powers remain above all authorities, the legislative, executive, and judiciary. Furthermore, the “Charter describes Bahrain as a hereditary monarchy,” implying transforming Bahrain into a monarchy[333] presumably on the model of Jordan, which the Amir is known to admire. Such measures, and at this time, fall in with the general trend adopted by most Gulf ruling powers, which are grappling with the dilemmas posed by global demands for democratization, human rights, and recognition of women's rights but looking on these demands through the prism of their dynastic rule.[334]

The opposition has expressed its serious misgivings over the proposed charter and its generalities and ambiguities, especially concerning the powers assigned to the ruler and the Shura Council. Such a proposal imposed from above is seen as circumventing the sovereignty of the people as the base of authority specified in the original Bahraini constitution. Furthermore the lack of transparency attributed to the government in the initiation, elaboration, and plans for execution of this proposal exacerbates the situation and adds to the list of grievances against the government. These overtures seem to be measures to buy time and procrastinate a democratic resolution of the crisis.

* Conclusion

It is clear from all this that both the regimes and the public in Kuwait and Bahrain are aware of a developing economic crisis and that the solutions have to be both economic and political. The public outcry for change has taken many forms, mostly sharp and forceful because of the intense effect of conditions in both countries, one still reeling from the war and the other from strongly felt poverty. It is also clear that while the problems are recognized, there is no consensus on solutions, and whatever these are, they are acknowledged to be difficult, painful, and therefore easier to be ignored for a little while longer. Demands for remedy, however, have been colored and tempered by conservative as well as liberal views and concerns. In the competition that these two discourses generate, the public is confused and a solution is delayed. In the last decade the public reaction to the crisis has been reflected sometimes in indecisiveness and domestic squabbles, as was the case in Kuwait for a few years after the 1991 war, and in Bahrain in a violent reaction bordering on revolution.

The nature of the crisis demands a revision of the structural base on which power and society rest. Because this crisis ultimately threatens all components of these societies, the ruling institutions and the people, solutions have to be comprehensive. All changes of political and social norms are difficult, especially if the process endangers the status of the power that needs to carry it out. But also the uncertainties involved in its application play on the fear and concern of all. An essential part of the process is to bring about change in the meaning of citizenship, which needs to be reinvested with rights and responsibilities: a new definition to belonging and identification.[335] In spite of a growing awareness by the regimes that resolving the malaise in their societies has become urgent, they still look for solutions that perpetuate their dynasties and power bases. At the same time, the new generation of young Gulf nationals who aspire to a modern meaning of citizenship have become more forceful in demanding change. Political and social analysts continue to press for recognition of the enormous, slow crisis that is unfolding and the need to meet its challenges. Maybe it will need much more drastic shocks than just the war to bring about the realization that to survive it will be necessary for both the people and the regimes in the region to cooperate in transforming the economic and political structures of society.

[306] Gary G. Sick, “The Coming Crisis in the Persian Gulf,” in Gary G. Sick and Lawrence G. Potter, eAs., The Persian Gulf at the Millennium: Essays in Poiitics, Economy, Security, and Religion, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997, pp. 12–13. See also the latest literature coming from Gulf intellectuals published mainly in Arabic periodicals and publications, such as Al-Arabi, Al-Mustaqbal Al-Arabi, Majalat al-Dirasat al-Ijtima‘ya. In particular see: Abdul-Khaliq Abdulla, ed., Al-Khaleej al-Arabi wa-Furas wa-Tahadiyat al-Qarn Al-Wahid wal-Ushrun [The Arabian Gulf and the Chailenges of the Twenty-first Century], annual meeting of the Muntada al-Tanmiya, Abu Dhabi, 1 099909.

[307] Muhammad al-Rumaihi, Al-Khaleej al-Arabi wal-Furas, wal-Tahadiyat al-Hadariya wal-Ma riftya hi-Qarn al-Wahid wal-Ushrun [The Arabian Gulf: Opportunities and Cultural and Informational Challenges for the Twenty-first Century], in Abdulla, ed., Muntada Al-Tanmiya 1999, op. cit., pp. 112–113.

[308] Khaldoun Hasan al-Naqeeb, “Al-Khaleej ... ila-Ayn?” [The Gulf... where to?], Al-Mustaqbal al-Arabi 22:253, March 2000, pp. 4–22.

[309] Abdul-Khaliq Abdulla, ed., Al-Khaleej al-Arabi wa-Furas wa-Tahadiyat al-Qarn al-Wahid wAl-Ushrun. This book published the deliberations of the twentieth annual meeting of the Muntada al-Tanmiya, in 1999, in Abu Dhabi, and was dedicated to the study and analysis of the crisis facing the Gulf states and proposals for its solution. The Muntada is a forum of Gulf thinkers who have been meeting yearly for the last two decades, in different cities of the Gulf states, in order to discuss and share their concerns and proposals for the future of their region. Five prominent Gulf scholars—-Abdul-Khaliq Abdulla, Adnan Shihab al-Deen, Hasan Hamdan Alkim, Muhammad Al-

Rumaihi, and Abdulla Ibrahim al-Quwaiz-—contributed to this publication’ Each scholar dealt with one angle of the challenge facing the Gulf states and suggested solutions for its remedy. See also Khaldoun al-Naqeeb, Al-Mujtama‘ wal-Dawla fil-Khaleej walfazira al-Arabiya [Society and State in the Arabian Gulf and Peninsula], Beirut: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 1987؛ Baqer Al-Najjar, Sociologia al-Mujtama‘fil-Khaleej al-Arabi [Sociology of Arabian Gulf Societies], Beirut: Dar al-Kunouz al-Adabiya, 1998.

[310] For a thorough and interesting discussion of this relationship and its significance to the development of the Gulf societies see Khaldoun al-Naqeeb, “Al-Khaleej ... ila-Ayn?,” op. cit., pp. 4, 9–11: see also: E Gregory Gause III, Oil Monarchies: Domestic and Security Challenges in the Arab Gulf States, New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1994, pp. 42–44؛ al-Rumaihi, in Muntada al-Tanmiya, op. cit., pp. 106—109.

[311] Gause, op. cit., pp. 44–58. See also The Economist, 14 March 1998, and 6 June 1998.

[312] See graph showing military expenditures for the GCC countries for the period 1990–1998 at [[http://www.defenselink.mil/pubs/allied_contrib2000/allied2000-chp3.pdf] [http://www.defenselink.mil/pubs/allied_contrib2000/allied2000-chp3.pdf]] Saudi Arabia alone has paid an estimated $70 billion as contribution to the coalition allies and $10 billion for the oil spill. See John Thomas Haldane, Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, December/January 1991–1992, p. 89.

[313] Sick, “The Coming Crisis,” in Sick and Potter, op. cit., p. 14; and Gause, “The Political Economy of National Security in the GCC States,” in Sick and Potter, op. cit., p. 68.

[314] The discussion in the two articles referred to in the previous note (Sick and Potter) on belt tightening in the whole Gulf region applies to Bahrain too. See May Seikaly, “The Economy ofPolitical Opposition in Bahrain: The Post-Gulf War Period,” unpublished lecture presented to the MESA Conference in Providence, Rhode Island, 22 November 1996. Reports on the negative economic conditions in Bahrain come from various sources, from international scholarship and organizations as well as from local opposition groups.

[315] Munira A. Fakhro, “The Uprising in Bahrain: An Assessment,” in Sick and Potter, op. cit., pp. 167–88.

[316] For the history of this development, see Fuad Khoury, Tribe and State in Bahrain, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985; see also Muhammad al-Rumaihi, Al-Betrol walTaghayur al-IJtimTifi al-Khaleej al-Arabi [Oil and Social Change in the Arabian Gulf], Kuwait, 1984; Abdulhadi Khalaf, “The New Amir of Bahrain: Marching Sideways,” in Civil Society 9:100, April 2000, and Fakhro, op. cit.

[317] The Gulf states produce a tremendous amount of materials to stress the issue of identity, loyalty, and belonging to the region. This takes the form of literature, educational materials, films, propaganda, and floods of television programs. More recently Al-Jazeera, the Qatari-based satellite channel, has also televised some talk shows in which inter-Gulf relations and contentions are debated.

[318] Baqer al-Najjar, “Ma’uqat al-istikhdam al-amthal lil-Qiwa Al-’Amila al-wataniyya fl al-khaleej Al-Arabi wa-imkaniyat al-Hall [Drawbacks to the Proper Utilization of National Manpower in the Conjerence of Experts on PoUdesfor Arab Labor Mobility and ؟>٢ذالآةذالد١ا e\vةأ١ة ٠١٥ £\Gu ل٢ة١ه١ة٣ا Utilization, Kuwait: Economic and Social Commission for West Asia (ESCWA) and Kuwait Institute of Planning, 1985: Muhammad al-Rumaihi, “Athar al-naft ‘ala wad’ al-mar’a alArabiyyah fl al-Khalij” [The Effect of Oil on the Condition of Arab Women in the Gulf], in al-Mafa wa-Dawruha fi Harakat Al-Wehda al-Arabiyya [Woman and Her Role in the Arab Unity Movement], Beirut: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 1982; May Seikaly, “Women and Socio-Political Change ’١ممفاًلأةذآم١ International Journal of Middle East Studies 26٦2١K١fA. ١126١لآلآ. ه١ج.

[319] Under the subtitle “The Myth of Wealth,” Gary Sick details the unsubstantiated mirage of wealth that the Gulf states find themselves in today. See Sick, “The Coming Crisis,” pp. 15–22.

[320] Particularly in Bahrain, what exacerbated conditions for the lower classes and rural communities was the encroachment of“garden residential compounds” onto the heart of the villages. In those ultra-luxurious living compounds, mostly foreign communities resided, oblivious to the squalor and poverty surrounding them and insensitive to the conservative traditional lifestyle of the villagers. The current intifada was ignited by an incident in these villages when some foreign residents were taking part in a running marathon and crossed these villages wearing what was perceived as indecent sports clothes.

[321] Sick, “The Coming Crisis,” pp. 16–21: see also Gause, op. cit., pp. 42–118.

[322] The anti-Western feeling is quite pervasive among the poorer strata and the more conservative strata of the middle classes. It is also a clear political stand of the intellectual circles, mainly the progressive currents among them. This is endorsed by overt expressions as well as attitudes of these elements vis-â-vis the wealthier and more powerful strata of society and the policies of their governments. Very recently a new association has been set up by groups of progressive thinkers in the Gulf to oppose the policies of normalization with Israel. The religious currents in both states, as well, see the signs of Western economic and educational influence as a threat to religion, culture, and the future identity of their societies. Furthermore, in places where Western presence is directly associated with the government’s repressive machinery, such as in Bahrain, this adds to popular complaints against the West. The fact that Ian Henderson is a British subject but was also the commander of the police in Bahrain did not sit well; he is still seen as the person responsible for building and training the system of brutal investigation of internees. There has been direct references to his role in the protest petitions sent to the Amir during this uprising.

[323] Eqbal Ahmad, “Islam and Politics,” in Haddad, Haines, and Findly, eds., The Islamic Impact, Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1984, p. 25;A1-Naqeeb, “Al-Khaleej ... ila Ayn,” p. 15: Gause, op. cit., pp. 31–41.

[324] Roy p. Mottahedeh and Mamoun Fandy, “The Islamic Movement: The Case for Democratic Inclusion,” in Sick and Potter, op. cit., pp. 34—35; see also The Economist, 6 June 1998.

[325] For the development of Islamist groups in Kuwait, see Falah al-Mudairis, Jama ‘: al-Ikhwan al-Muslimeen fil-Knwait [The Muslim Brotherhood in Kuwait], Kuwait: Dar Kurtas, 1999; and Falah al-Mudairis, Al-Jama‘a al-SalaJiya Jil-Kuwait [The Salafiya Muslim Group in Kuwait], Kuwait: Dar Kurtas, 1999. See also The Economist, 10 July 1999.

[326] The Economist, 22 May 1999, 27 November 1999; see also Al-Naqeeb, “Al-Khaleej ... ila Ayn,” p. 15.

[327] A special report from Kuwait aired by CNN news on 5 August 2000 reported that women will be given their democratic rights to vote and run for office. It was also reported that this move was heralded by Islamist women as a right within the precepts of Islam.

[328] See Al-Quds, January 30, 2001; Hasan Omar reporting from Kuwait.

[329] Khalaf, “The New Amir,” in Civil Society; Ahmad al-Shamlan, ed., Al-Haraka al-Dusturiya: Nidal Sha‘ab al-Bahrain min ajl al-Dimokratiya [The Constitutional Movement: The Struggle of the Peopie of Bahrain for Democracy], Beirut: Dar al-Wihda al-Wataniya, 1997; Seikaly, “The Economy of Political Opposition” (unpublished).

[330] Since the beginning of this uprising, it has been widely reported in the press, regionally and internationally. See Rose al-Yusif, 16 January 1995; Crescent International, 16—31 January 1995; Le Monde Diplomatique, March 1995; Al-Sharq al-Awsat, last week of April 1995 (series of five articles by Fouad Matar); The Wall Street Journal, 12 June 1995; The Washington Post, 13 June 1995; The Economist, 6 April 1996, 12 April 1997, 23 January 1999; to name a few only. In all the articles reporting on this crisis, the economic factor is attributed to be the major cause, as well as the worsening condition of the poorer strata of society. The Shia population, especially the village dwellers representing the more economically depressed elements with particular grievances against the government, became associated with the most vocal and, gradually, the violent aspects of the protest. Sunnis have also taken part in this protest movement since its inception, although haltingly at different stages of its development.

[331] One of the methods used by the opposition to publicize its case and propagate its grievances has been through fax and audio recording. In fact this has informed supporters and sympathizers abroad of events as they were happening.

[332] Human rights abuses have been reported by international human rights organizations such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International and reported in their annual reports and in the press. Furthermore, the Voice of Bahrain, the mostly Shia voice of the opposition based in London, has been active in disseminating information on what they consider as infringements on the democratic and basic human rights of the Bahraini people, both Shia and Sunni.

[333] Amy Hawthorn, “Bahrain’s National Charter and Political Reform in the Gulf,” in PolicyWatch, number 514,25 January 2001.

[334] Khalaf, op. cit.; accounts of these happenings in Bahrain are also circulated orally among people in Bahrain and abroad. For a fresh analysis of the role of monarchical rule in the Gulf states, see Michael Herb, All in the Family, New York, SUNY Press, 2000.

[335] For insightful discussions and analyses of this necessity, see Sick, “The Coming Crisis,” pp. 24–25; and al-Naqeeb, “Al-Khaleej ... ila Ayn,” p. 11.

 Chapter 12: Kings and People; Information and Authoority in Oman, Qatar, and the Persian Gulf

Dale F Eickelman

For the Arabian Peninsula, the substantial growth in mass education over the last three decades, the proliferation and accessibility of new media and communications, and the increasing ease of travel make it increasingly difficult for state and religious authorities to monopolize the tools of literary culture. The ideas, images, and practices of alternative social and political worlds have become a daily occurrence. They enter domestic space through satellite and cable television, and are better understood than in the past. Rapidly rising levels of literacy and familiarity with an educated Arabic formerly restricted to an elite facilitate this better comprehension. They also rehearse viewers to respond to those in authority in the common language of the Arabic of the classroom and the media.

Mass education was important in the development of nationalism in an earlier era.[336] In recent years, the proliferation of media and means of communication have multiplied the possibilities for creating communities and networks among them, fragmenting religious and political authority, dissolving prior barriers of space and distance, and opening new grounds for interaction and mutual recognition.

To be sure, the power of new media to challenge and fragment claims to religious and political authority had become evident at the time of the 1978–1979 Iranian revolution. Audiocassettes—easy to smuggle and duplicate—were then the subversive media of choice. Since then, the accessible nature of newer media and rising levels of education have increasingly blurred the boundaries between producers and consumers. Fax machines, desktop publishing, photocopying machines, the Internet, and new uses of older media make communications more participatory and create new audiences. The greater ease of travel—for education, pilgrimage, tourism, labor migration, and emigration—also accelerates the flow of ideas and practices.

More important, some new media seen as innovative in the early 19805 are now almost taken for granted. In countries such as Saudi Arabia, the same fax machines that rapidly disseminate criticisms of the regime from opposition groups abroad are also essential to the conduct of business. The state is powerless to limit their use without disrupting the economy, and attempts to counter “faxed criticisms” in other media—such as the press—by warning readers against disseminating them further, merely draws subsequent attention to their existence.[337]

Since Iran’s May 1997 presidential elections, some Iranian intellectuals and Western observers have gone so far as to speak of a new era of “post-Islamism,” in the Islamic Republic in particular and the rest of the Muslim world in general.[338] Clearly, this post-Islamism is defined by the widespread awareness of alternatives to existing dominant ideologies and institutional arrangements. Fariba Adelkhah, for example, argues that this transformation is as significant as the original revolution. It is fueled by the combination of rising levels of education and the coming of age of a new generation of Iranians—now the majority of the population—not even born at the time of the 1978–1979 revolution. This new generation, she argues, is creating an Iranian “religious public sphere” (·espace public confessionel). In spite of resistance from conservatives, many in this generation employ the public use of reasoned argument, which, even if developed primarily in private or semi-private settings, “also has repercussions on the political scene.”[339]

In most of the Arabian Peninsula Gulf states, discussions concerning the nature of just and appropriate governance and the role of religion in politics is not as foregrounded and public as in Iran. Kuwait is a partial exception, although the legitimacy of royal authority in Kuwait is not a subject for public debate. Other matters, even legislative initiatives by Kuwait’s ruler, have been hotly contested, including women’s right to vote in parliamentary elections.[340]

Nevertheless, the rapidly expanding range of public discourse about politics and religion within the Arabian Peninsula is rapidly outdistancing the pace of change in formal institutions. A public sphere is emerging throughout the region in which messages and images in face-to-face conversations, newspapers, books, magazines, anonymous leaflets, video and audiocassettes, and satellite and regular television criss-cross, overlap, and build on one another. When censored or suppressed in one medium, such messages recur in another. Images of alternative institutions and practices, once on the periphery of the social imagination of much of the public, are now concrete and foregrounded. Even silence contributes to the public sphere, when some topics are avoided because of real or imagined penalties for direct public expression. Authoritarian limitations on participation in discussions and debate over public issues are resented and increasingly easy to evade. These discussions are not confined to immediate locality but increasingly include attention to wider, regional, and transnational issues.

Not surprisingly, some critics downplay the emergence of the public sphere in the Arabian Peninsula, as well as elsewhere in the Arab world. Seymour Martin Lipset, for example, asserts that Muslim, “particularly Arab,” notions of political authority are especially hostile to democracy because Islamic political doctrines are “alien” to political freedom.[341] The result is to assume that Muslims, more than the followers of other religions, are guided by religious doctrines that inhibit a shift to democratic rule. Others argue that expectations of authority throughout the region are pervaded by “cultural schemas” that have hardly changed over centuries. These schemas supposedly privilege hierarchical master-disciple relations in the religious and political spheres, severely limiting alternative political and institutional styles.[342]

This chapter challenges such bleak assumptions. It compares the changing context in which “information”—political and religious—is managed in two contrasting Gulf states, Qatar and the Sultanate of Oman. The emphasis is less on formal political institutions than the commonly shared, often implicit, ideas of what is right, just, or religiously ordained—those taken-for-granted ideas upon which any community or group of individuals form cooperative relations.

Qatar and Oman show marked dissimilarities in state attitudes toward information, the media, and control over public expression. Qatar abolished censorship in 1995 and its Ministry of Information in 1996, although a high degree of self-censorship continues in Doha. Qatar’s Al-Jazeera satellite television has emerged as the flagship for uncensored news and discussion throughout the Arab world. Media market forces oblige other satellite media, sometimes with reluctance, to emulate Al-Jazeera’s lead.

Oman has no such unfettered media. Its 1996 Basic Charter allows freedom of opinion expressed in words and writing, but in the circumspect 1999 State Department report on Human Rights Practices, “these provisions have yet to be implemented.”[343] No fewer than three government agencies censor books and magazines in the Sultan Qaboos University library. Nothing controversial or critical of the government or religiously controversial appears in the local print or broadcast media. Unabashedly, Muscat practices an older form of control and supervision over what is said in public. Yet, even if formal Omani information practices change at a glacial pace, Omanis, like the citizens of other Gulf states, have ready access to alternative sources of information. As elsewhere, anonymous faxed messages and photocopied leaflets have emerged to contest the ruling elite and state decision making. Such developments point to basic transformations in the collective imagination of religion and politics that permeate the entire region, regardless of specific government policies.

* Mass Higher Education, Language, and Community

Mass education is a more recent development in the Arabian Peninsula. Elsewhere in the Middle East, it began only in the 1950s—1952 for Egypt and 1956 for Morocco, for example. In Kuwait, the commitment to universal education began shortly after 1961, and in Oman only in the early 1970s. In all cases, it was only 15 to 20 years after the introduction of mass primary education that large numbers of students began to complete the advanced cycles of secondary and post-secondary education. It was only at this point that the consequences of widespread education could be clearly discerned. [344]

Omani figures offer a sense of the compressed period in which the rise of mass education occurred. In 1975–76, a mere 22 students attended secondary school. Little more than a decade later, in 1987–88, 15,500 did. In 1997, there were 77,000, and there were more than 8,000 students in post-secondary institutions, including the national university, which opened in 1986.[345]

A major distinction between the Arabian Peninsula Gulf states, blessed with oil wealth, and the rest of the Arab world is that educational expansion has kept up with population growth in quantity if not always in quality As a consequence, large numbers of citizens, especially those born in the last three decades, speak the common language of formal Arabic, the language of schoolrooms, newscasts, political and religious discussions, and other public speech. There often is a great divide in Arabic between the colloquial speech of everyday use and the formal, standard language of newspapers, radio, and educated public speech. Education, especially higher education, in the language of formal, literary Arabic, allows people to “talk back” to religious and political authorities in this public language.

Education, like mass communications, also makes citizens more conscious of their political and religious beliefs and practices and encourages thinking of them as a system, allowing for comparison with other ideas and practices. Education and the greater ease of communication also erode intellectual and physical boundaries and enable connections to be made across formerly impenetrable boundaries of class, locality, language, and ethnic group.

* Satellite Television: Qatar

Even if political institutions in the Arabian Gulf are slow to change, Qatar’s ruler, Shaykh Hamad bin Khalifah Al Thani, takes almost the attitude of Prussia’s Frederick the Great (1712–1786) in fostering open information and debate and offering a model for what might become prevalent in regional and local contexts. Thus, as a leading television commentator in the Arab Gulf recently observed, “Satellite TV has become as important a symbol of sovereignty as having a flag or a national airline.”[346]

Indeed, satellite television has contributed to creating new public spaces in the Arab Middle East, especially when unimpeded live televised debates are combined with call-in questions and comments. Today, such uses of the media bring speakers and listeners closer together, allowing authorities to be questioned. Uncensored satellite television in Arabic creates ready and open alternatives to the “official story” promulgated by state-controlled broadcast and print media, challenging other media, obliging them to respond with editorials or rebuttals, and entering many different domains of discussion.

In short, satellite television is playing an increasing role in redefining public space in the Gulf and elsewhere, contributing to the emergence of a “network” society.[347] Only 10—15 percent of Middle Eastern Arabs regularly watch satellite broadcasts,[348] although the issues and commentaries on uncensored satellite television increasingly shape regional discussions and debate, linking these discussions to those held among Arab professionals in Europe and North America.

It must be emphasized, nevertheless, that distinguishing between ideas of the public sphere and civil society facilitates the understanding of the rapidly changing “background” significance of politics and religion in Arabian Peninsula societies.

The idea of the public sphere implies a space separate from the formal structures of religious and political authority and the space of households and kin. Ideally, in this space, ideas are presented on their own merits, rather than as emanating from such authoritative intermediaries as preachers, judges, and rulers. Although this notion can be traced back to Immanuel Kant, it currently is closely associated with the work of Jürgen Habermas. His development of the idea of the public sphere is largely based on the historical emergence in Europe of “rational-critical” discourse within bourgeois society.[349]

Habermas, like others who have developed the notion of the public sphere, downplays the role of religion in its development and expansion. Yet, one of the most important developments in the contemporary Arab world and other Muslim-majority states has been the increasingly open contest over the authoritative use of the symbolic language of Islam and its implications for religious and political authority.[350]

The term civil society is used in a narrower contemporary sense. In fact, it has rich connotations dating back to the sixteenth century in Europe, when it was contrasted to “fanaticism.”[351] As used by political scientists and policymakers since the 1980s, however, the term refers to the creation of organizations subject to the state’s “rule of law” and recognized by the state but otherwise independent of state initiative and control. By most measures, the status of civil society in most of the Arab world, including the Arabian Peninsula, remains precarious. Nonetheless, the public sphere is rapidly expanding.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-7.jpg][Figure 12.1. Egyptian religious conservative Safinez Kazim (standing, right) accuses Toujan Faisal (left), the first woman member ofjordan's parliament, of blasphemy during a live broadcast of The Opposite Direction on Al-Jazeera satellite television in 1997. Moderator Faisal al-Kassim (center), thrives on open, uncensored debate, which has made The Opposite Direction one of the most successful television formats in the Arab world.]]

As a contributor to the expanding public sphere, Qatar's Al-Jazeera satellite channel remains almost unique in the Middle East. The announced April 2000 move of some of its operations to Egypt's "free media" zone indicates the volatility of contemporary communications, and also suggests how "market forces" place significant pressure on existing government restrictions.[352] There are numerous Arab satellite channels, but most stick to entertainment because of political constraints. Al-Jazeera began broadcasting in November 1996. The core of its personnel were imported from a failed BBC effort, backed by a Saudi company, Orbit Communications, to expand into satellite broadcasting. The BBC effort failed in part because the satellite dishes and decoders needed to receive its signals were prohibitively expensive, thus limiting its potential audience.[353] Additionally, the BBC's Saudi backers objected to its unflattering news coverage of Saudi Arabia and wanted content control. Not surprisingly, the BBC refused, so Orbit cancelled its annual $35 million payment, and BBC Arabic programming stopped after 20 months of broadcasting. Twenty of the BBC's Arab editors, reporters, and technicians were quickly hired by Qatar and formed the core of Al-Jazeera's team.[354])

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-8.jpg][Figure 12.2. In recent years, reliable public opinion polling has become possible in some Middle Eastern contexts, as with this survey of Palestinian views of the most "independent" television news reporting.]]

The Al-Jazeera formula resembles the one pioneered by CNN, although its discussion programs are more vigorous and controversial. One example is the weekly program Al-Ittijah al-MiTakis [The Opposite Direction], moderated by Dr. Faisal al-Kassim. A Syrian by origin, al-Kassim graduated top of his class in English from the University of Damascus in 1983, and won a scholarship for graduate studies in Britain. His doctoral thesis at the University of Hull was on political iconoclasm in modern British drama. He began working part-time for the BBC in 1988 and made the shift from BBC radio to television in 1994, a position that lasted until the collapse of the BBC's Arabic satellite transmissions in May 1996.

In The Opposite Direction, two guests with contrary views square off in the studio in Qatar, although occasionally the program broadcasts from elsewhere in the Arab world. With al-Kassim moderating, the guests talk to one another for about an hour, followed by telephone call-ins. The program is live, including the telephone calls, which are not pre-screened or subject to the "time delay" technology common in American broadcasting. The topics and the broadcasts join the central debates of the Arab world—the Arab-Israeli crisis, the state of the economy, Iran and the Gulf, Kuwait-Iraq animosity, polygamy, Turkey-Israel relations, human rights and Islam, Syria's negotiations with Israel over the Golan Heights, and democratization. At least one program dealt with Qatar's municipal elections.

As an example ofAI-Jazeera's style, an early program on Islam and secularism featured a heated discussion between Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a leading religious conservative, and Syria's Sadeq Al-'Azm, a committed secularist. For many in the audience, al-'Azm's presentation was the first time they heard a spirited "secularist" argument. Another program featured a debate on polygamy between Toujan Faysal, the first woman in Jordan's parliament and a secularist, and Safinaz Kazim, a religiously conservative Egyptian. When Faysal said at one point that Qur'anic doctrine was out of date, the Egyptian accused her of blasphemy, ripped off her microphone, and got up to leave. Al-Kassim reminded her that she was on live television. She shot back:" I don't care if we're on Mars. I'm not tolerating this blasphemy," and left the studio. The incident also suggests how satellite television is allowing women to join public religious discussions, albeit cautiously, as The Opposite Direction never pairs women with men. In October 1999, a former Algerian prime minister, Reda Malek, unhappy with a particularly sharp telephone question, asked al-Kassim to stop the tape. Al-Kassim replied, “I can’t. We broadcast live. You’re not in Algeria.” Furious, the Algerian cursed on air and stormed out of the studio.[355]

Al-Jazeera programs also focus on regional issues. Thus Sudan’s Hasan Al-Turabi, paired with Saudi Arabia’s Turki Suhaili, the editor of a Riyadh newspaper and a member of the ruling family, described the Saudi political system as a “plague” (bilwd). Abdallah Nafisi, in a program discussing economics, blurted out an attack against the then head of Saudi Arabia’s Supreme Council of Ulama, Shaykh bin Baz (1912–1999), when he declared:

I defy bin Baz to say something about royal corruption in Saudi Arabia. His country is infested with corruption. He can do fatwas on Viagra, but not mention [regime opponents like] Safar al-Hawali, people languishing in prison. We cannot separate politics from money in the Arab Gulf. The rulers [he used the insulting phrase “the shopkeeper rulers” cal-hukkam Al-tujjar)] only care about opening bank accounts in the West.[356]

Such comments sometimes draw strong reactions from official circles outside of Qatar, and Al-Jazeera has been denied membership in the Union of Arab Broadcasters because it violates the “brotherly” code of conduct in which political opponents are never allowed to criticize incumbent rulers. Although accused of bias against the Saudis, a Saudi specialist in media studies recently published a program-by-program analysis of The Opposite Directionو concluding that it showed no political or religious bias.[357] The publication of such a book in Saudi Arabia itself suggests the rapidly evolving public sphere, as the “craft” of censorship becomes increasingly public.

Undoubtedly, the contribution of Al-Jazeera to the public sphere is manifested in the speed with which videotapes of its programs circulate freely in the shops and private homes in Damascus, Casablanca, Muscat, Amman, Riyadh, and elsewhere, among those without direct access to satellite television. For many viewers, its Arabic news broadcasts have become the standard against which other broadcasters are judged. Given that reliable surveys of viewing habits and trust in the televised media are lacking for the Arab Gulf states, the evidence is largely anecdotal. Yet, dependable figures for Gaza and the West Bank place Qatar's Al-Jazeera TV as the most reliable source for information (33.7 percent), followed by other satellite channels (26.0 percent), with local television from the Palestinian National Authority (14.0 percent) and Israeli television (8.9 percent) lagging far behind, but still ahead of MBC, Egyptian, and Jordanian broadcasts.[358]

Moreover, satellite television tilts the balance of public argument in favor of ideas and practices that can be explained, defended, and foregrounded.[359] The speed and intensity with which it facilitates the circulation of ideas, images, and practices also distinguishes contemporary public spaces from those of the past. Likewise, journalists and newspaper editors can comment almost simultaneously on events because they can read any of the 34 Arabic-newspaper Websites for reactions to current events. Uncensored satellite television enables a wider publie to participate in such discussions.

Arabic-language satellite channels, like the other "new" media, have had profound consequences for the political and religious imagination. First, they create and sustain a new public. Modern mass education not only means more widely spread skills than prior patterns of elite education, but also offers wider, competing repertoires of intellectual techniques and authorities and the erosion of exclusivities that previously defined communities of discourse, extending them also to women and minorities.

Second, viewers can now watch religious and political authorities and commentators explain their views and answer questions more as equals than as distant orators who cannot directly be challenged. Moreover, it is not just religious specialists who debate religion, but other educated persons and public figures. The distance between authorities and their audiences is diminished, and claims to the mantle of authority become more open. Finally, satellite television introduces audiences to new ways of thinking, in favoring effective and reasoned presentations.

Satellite television thus plays a major role in creating and sustaining a new public sphere. It expands the space of public dealings beyond one's face-to-face consociates to those whom Alfred Schutz called contemporaries.[360] Satellite television and other new media contribute to turning anonymous or unknown contemporaries into consociates that share common assumptions of civility and morality. Not everyone can telephone guests on politically and religiously sensitive talk shows, and the number of callers from outside the Arab world still outnumbers regional callers. But even this fact reminds people of the limits to expression in their immediate locality. The viewing public, however, is no longer mass and anonymous, but defined by mutual participation—indeed, by performance. In this sense, which Benedict Anderson refers to as a growing sense of reading together, the public sphere emerges less from associations, more strictly the domain of civil society, than from ways of dealing confidently with others in an expanding social universe of shared communication.[361]

* Religious and Political Expression in Oman

Oman, after virtually no publicly expressed political dissent since the early 19705, began in 1996 to witness public expressions of discontent in the form of occasional student demonstrations, anonymous leaflets, and other rather creative forms of public communication. Only in Oman has the occasional donkey, as in coastal al-Suwayq in spring 1998, been used as a mobile billboard to express anti-regime sentiments. There is no way in which police can maintain dignity in seizing and destroying a donkey on whose flank a political message has been inscribed.[362] Oman is in no imminent danger of being swept away on a tide of radical Islam. Nonetheless, Oman has an elaborate state apparatus that attempts to control religious expression. A review of Omani efforts suggest how states have lost the ability to control the public sphere, even if they have retained control of the formal communications media.

The rapid rise of mass education over a short time span in Oman has already been noted. Nearly 80 per cent of the population has basic literacy skills, with near-universal literacy for the younger generation.[363] The exposure of large numbers of young Omanis to a written, formal, "modern standard" Arabic through schooling and the mass media has altered the style and content of authoritative religious discourse and the role this discourse plays in shaping and constraining domestic and regional politics. One sign of this shift has been the re-emergence of sectarian discourse.

In Oman, like most other countries of the Arabian Peninsula, explicit controversy over political and religious issues does not form part of the standard fare of local newspapers or the broadcast media. The ruler's National Day speeches, the major annual occasion on which he addresses the Omani people, scrupulously avoid religious issues except to invoke "our heritage" (ٱturathuna) and to pray to God "to guide US for the glory and prosperity of our dear countrymen."[364] Likewise, Islam forms part of the school curriculum at all levels, but the mention of sectarian differences is carefully avoided, as is also the case for the model Friday sermons that have been distributed for the guidance of preachers in Oman since 1985.[365] Reticence in articulating sectarian matters would at first appear to be prudent in Oman. Roughly 50—55 percent of its citizen population is Sunni, 40–45 per cent is Ibadhi, and less than 2 percent is Shia.

Direct, state-sanctioned discussion of sectarian issues occurs only rarely. A pivotal instance was a two-hour television "lesson" (dars) by Oman's Grand Mufti, Shaykh Ahmad bin Hamad al-Khalili, on 2 February 1987.[366]

To emphasize the event's significance, it was broadcast live from Sultan Qaboos University at "prime time," nine in the evening. The mufti's appearance on weekday television—his Friday sermons are broadcast regularly—was an unusual event, signaling approval at the highest levels of the state. The subsequent distribution of videotapes of the mufti's "lesson" to Omani student communities throughout the Arab world, Europe, and the United States further suggests the significance attributed to it. The content, context, and style of his lesson offer an exemplar of contemporary authoritative religious discourse and its role in domestic and regional politics. It also indicates the limits of state-authorized discourse.

Basically, al-Khalili was responding to a Saudi religious opinion ءfatwa) issued 12 December 1986 (8 Rabia II 1407) by a senior Saudi religious scholar and member of the Saudi Supreme Council of Ulama, Abdulaziz bin Abdallah bin Baz. The issue at hand is obscure to secular modernists—whether or not the faithful would see God on Judgment Day. In essence, bin Baz argued that those who say that God will not be seen on Judgment Day—the Ibadhi perspective— deserve to be put to the sword.[367] Bin Baz wrote that the "mufti of the Ibadhis [a derogatory way of referring to the mufti of Oman] told me personally that the Ibadhis do not believe that God will be seen on Judgment Day. I tried to advise the Ibadhis to abandon this belief' In his televised lesson, al-Khalili read bin Baz's virulently anti-Ibadhi decree in full, even though it doubled as a personal attack on his scholarly integrity. The result was an unprecedented act of religious drama on Omani television that has not been repeated since.

Throughout his lesson—broadcast 15 years ago—Shaykh al-Khalili shifted between two levels of Arabic: a classical Arabic, full of citations from theological treatises, which even members of his audience educated in modern, secular Arabic admitted that they could not readily follow, and an Omanized but correct modern standard Arabic. Unusual for an Omani public appearance, the mufti used gestures, and his voice registered anger as he recounted his visit with a delegation of other Omanis to the office of Shaykh bin Baz on 13 January 1986 (2 Jumada I 1406), their second day in Saudi Arabia:

We were anxious to benefit from [Shaykh al-Baz] and to listen to his advice and to learn from his words, but we were taken by surprise.... Immediately upon entering his office he took US to a narrow place and began ...to shout [about] what he had heard [of my fatwas]... . He referred to Ibadhism as astray and far from the truth that was brought by the prophet from God. I replied first by thanking him for his advice and then said:

"Truth is claimed by everybody, and everyone who opposes his Opponent claims that he is right and his opponent is wrong. But truth is not arrived at through presumptions but through correct proof. It is therefore our duty to reveal the truth through quite objective discussion to be transmitted to the people through the voice of the Quran in Makkah, and through the Saudi Television. Also other radio stations and television stations....

The Shaykh strongly refused this suggestion. I asked him what he wanted and he said he wanted US to abandon our [beliefs] ... and to adopt their [beliefs].... I told him that if a Christian or a Jew or a Magian came to you and criticised Islam, would you refuse to discuss with him before listeners and viewers? He replied that Islam obliges such discussions only with non-Muslims.[368]

As one Shia Omani commented: “All Omanis stood with the mufti after his televised address. Before it, we heard rumors of what happened between him and bin Baz. The attack on him had nothing to do with sects in Islam. He was attacked as an Omani, and that is how we understood bin Baz’s words. It was a national issue.”[369]

The mufti repeated this dramatic confrontation many times in public appearances over the next two years, until the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait silenced virtually all public religious expression.[370] One such repetition of his controversy with bin Baz was an audiocassette subsequently translated into English and published in booklet form as Who Are the Ibadhis? Like the televised address, the booklet demonstrates a strong sense of an oppositional Ibadhism, elaborated in the explicit context of beliefs challenged by other Muslims. For the first time in modern Oman, the booklet offered a comprehensive account of contemporary Ibadhi belief, practice, and history.

The cassette/booklet responded to a letter from an Omani student in the United States. He wrote the mufti that some “Sunni brothers” in America warned against allowing Ibadhis to lead prayers or participate “in the administration of our mosques and Islamic Centers in this place on the claim that they are a section of the Khawarij.”[371] The student asked for guidance in responding to such claims and “the reason for not circulating [Ibadhi] books and references in the libraries and in the Muslim Universities.”

The mufti’s televised address, like the pamphlet in English, is part of a more widespread movement throughout the Muslim world compelling the objectification of religious thought and practice. It is no longer sufficient to practice Islam; one must now be able to explain beliefs. Hence the utility of catechism-like documents such as Io Are the Ibadhis?

Clearly, mass education has had a major impact upon the style of religiosity of younger Omanis, even as state authorities seek to use education to preserve “traditional” values and to distance education from the political sphere. An unintended consequence of making Islam a part of the curriculum is implicitly to make it a subject alongside others that must be “explained” and “understood.” However, treating Islam as a system of belief and practice implicitly highlights differences within the Muslim community. Before 1982, students from many of Oman’s provinces had to complete the final years of secondary education in dormitories in the capital area. Moreover, outside of the classroom, students who were engaged in long discussions and debates on sectarian differences—however generic the formal curriculum may have been—were under pressure “not to convince the others to change their sect (,madhhab), but to maintain our side (tarafina)”[372] Such discussion requires participants to emphasize the distinctive features of their respective beliefs. As the student’s letter to Shaykh Ahmad indicates, the awareness of sectarian differences is accentuated even more when Ibadhi Muslims are juxtaposed with their counterparts from other Muslim groups, sometimes perceived as hostile or misinformed outside of Oman.

Participation in Muslim societies and study groups, and exposure to video and audiocassettes and the books and literature of various groups, shifts shared perceptions of Islamic thought and the context in which it is shaped. Although a seemingly obvious point, it should be kept in mind that ready access to the printed word, or to expositions of Islamic doctrine in a modern standard Arabic, again largely derived from modern education and radio and television, is a recent development for most Omanis.

* The Limits of State Guidance

In Oman, a significant shift in religious and political sensibilities began in the early 1980s, when young Omanis throughout the country began to ask for such seemingly apolitical amenities as libraries in the youth clubs associated with every major town and village, and for provisions to be made for Friday sermons. The move to open libraries was often met with suspicion, as those most interested were university students active in various Islamic community organizations outside of Oman. Permission was often denied under various pretexts.

The movement to institute Friday sermons at mosques throughout the Sultanate constituted a more subtle challenge to state authority. The reasons given for the movement are impeccably Islamic. As one of Oman's first generation of village schoolteachers observed of the northern Oman interior in the mid-1980s, "People here do not know Islam; they pray and sacrifice, but they do not know why."[373] Before the mid-1970s, such a statement would have been almost incomprehensible in most of the towns and villages of the Omani interior and coast. By the late 1980s, however, such statements had become common.

When the movement to institute Friday sermons began, persons with a sufflcient command of formal Arabic to engage in public speaking sought access to the pulpits in some communities. Such uses of the minbar (pulpit) aroused considerable concern in official circles. As one official explained, if access to the minbar is not controlled, then the "uneducated," who are not aware of what is and is not appropriate to sermons, will take anything said in the sermon to be authoritative. Because a good preacher can sway emotions, it is all the more important to ensure that what he says is based upon "sound" religious knowledge: "The preacher (khatib) can draw upon his own experience for his sermons, but he must elaborate only the ideas of Islam, not other ideas, so no mention of television programs, of AIDS, or of political issues."[374]

Friday sermons now fall under state supervision, albeit usually through the adroit use of local kinship and community ties so that this supervision does not appear entirely alien or intrusive. In the process, state authorities are becoming aware that their actions can shape religious discourse but not control it. In many regions, the consequence of state intervention has been to shift more radical religious discourse away from mosques and into informal discussion groups among trusted peers. In this respect, the proliferation of teachers' training schools and other forms of education have played an important role in creating cross-regional ties of village teachers and others who influence events in their respective communities and share information on implicit government policies and personalities.

Formal political authority in Oman remains as it was before the coup: an absolute monarchy—the Omani state encourages modernization, renewal, and transformation in all other spheres except that of selection for rule at the top. Even in this sphere, the rhetoric of modern legitimacy requires a commitment to change. The Sultanate's slow progress through State Consultative Councils, initiated in the early 1980s and gradually expanded, gives a semblance of transparency to governmental actions.[375] Since 1997, limited protests have taken place in Oman, the first since the early 1970s. These serve as a reminder that even when the state controls expression in the formal media, the movement of ideas and people means that state authorities are losing their hold over people's imaginations. Indeed, even if consultative councils such as Oman's are regarded by some of the newly educated as "talking shops" with no real decision-making authority, their very presence suggests an awareness on the part of the government of the need for greater transparency.[376] Televised questions to ministers are never spontaneous, and most members of the audience are aware of this limitation. These broadcasts, contrasted with what is known of comparable bodies elsewhere, remind viewers of the differences between their consultative council and similar bodies in the region.

As Oman's ruler has said, "It will be a very happy day for me when more people will take responsibilities from my shoulders. But we have to take into consideration the situation of our culture, our religious heritage and guidance, our traditions."[377] At another level, there is blunt and open criticism of the state and its key personnel, in the form of anonymous pamphlets and leaflets circulated by fax and left throughout the capital area.[378] Such documents show the raw edges of the "new era" of unfettered information.

Another less sensational but equally significant indicator of change beneath the surface is exemplified in such documents as a modest booklet by an Omani municipal judge, What Knowledge of the Law Means toYou. [379] In a catechism-like question-and-answer format, the first of its kind for Oman, the booklet sets out a citizen’s basic rights, and the limits of police authority. Such a document requires judges who can write accessible prose and assumes a readership. Such initiatives are becoming more common throughout the Gulf, and presage a change in ideas of rule and authority both profound and far-reaching, implying the growth not only of the public sphere but also of civil society.

* Conclusion

In the end, these shifts in background understandings of religion and politics may not always appear dramatic, but they suggest sea changes in understandings of legitimate authority. Until the eighteenth century, most of the world’s population was subject to royal authority. Since then, the number of ruling monarchs has steadily declined, with their replacements claiming authority directly from “the people.”[380] However, with the exception of the Yemen Arab Republic, the states of the Arabian Peninsula remain monarchies. Unlike earlier times, however, both rulers and their subjects are profoundly aware of competing principles for justifying authority, and the shifting contexts in which royal authority is asserted, thus creating new and significant challenges.

Ruling monarchs have not become an endangered species on the Arabian Peninsula. Yet, in sharp contrast with past epochs, their subjects are profoundly aware of alternatives to dynastic rule. Even if some monarchs privately assert a divine mandate, publicly they stress their unique vocation to guide the nation’s destiny. The late Shah of Iran went so far as to assert that Persian kingship was based on the will of the people, and that Iran would never be devoid of a monarch because of his people’s “customs, habits, history [and] religion.”[381] Slogans such as the late Shah’s “Revolution of the Shah and the People” and Hassan H’s (Morocco) “Revolution of the King and the People” may have been considered banal by some subjects and hypocritical by others. Still, the existence of these slogans a quarter century ago implicitly acknowledged that claims to legitimacy increasingly intimate the ability of monarchs and ruling families to self-transform and widen the base of participation in government.

Consultative councils and national assemblies, both appointive and elected, have proliferated throughout the Arabian Peninsula as a result of changing domestic attitudes and the need to persuade Western supporters of local regimes that they are capable of self-transformation. Nevertheless, the pace of institutional change may not match that of the background understandings of civil society and democracy now current in the public sphere of the Gulf states, but both rulers and subjects are increasingly aware of the disparity between the publie sphere and the current prospects for civil society.

[336] Ernest Gellner, Nations and Nationalistn, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1983, pp. 28–29.

[337] “Shaykh Muhammad al-Utayman, “A Discussion of Incendiary Publications: Whoever Publishes These Leaflets and Pamphlets, Copies Them, or Distributes Them Commits a Major Sin and Bears Responsibility for His Own Crime and for the Crime of All Those Influenced by Them,” (in Arabic), Alsharq aLAwsat, 20 November 1994.

[338] Olivier Roy, “Le Postlslamisme,” Revue des Mondes Musulmans et de la Mediterranee, numbers 85/86 (1999),01.11–30.

[339] Fariba Adelkhah, Being Modern in Iran, New York: Columbia University Press, 2000, p. 177.

[340] Mary Ann Tetreault, “Just Say No: Women’s Rights in Kuwait,” Current History 99: 699, January 2000, pp. 27–32.

[341] Seymour Martin Lipset, “The Social Requisites of Democracy Revisited,” American Sociological Review 59:1, February 1994, p. 6.

[342] For example, Abdallah Hammoudi, Master and Disciple: The Cultural Foundations of Moroccan Authoritarianism, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1997, p. 8; see also Hisham Sharabi, NeopatriarchyzA Theory of Distorted Change in Arab Society, New York: Oxford University Press, 1988

[343] U.S. Department of State, “1999 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices: Oman,” at <[[http://www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/1999_hrp_report/oman.html][http://www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/1999_hrp_report/oman.html]]>

[344] Dale F. Eickelman, “Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies,” American Ethnologist 19:4, November 1992, pp. 643–55.

[345] Sultanate of Oman, Ministry of Development, Statistical Year Book, 1996, Muscat: Ministry of Development, 1997, p. 541, and prior editions.

[346] Interview with Dr. Faisal al-Kassim, Doha, 20 March 1999.

[347] Manuel Castells, The Rise of the Network Society, Malden, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1996.

[348] John B. Alterman, New Media, New Politics? From Satellite Television to the Internet in theArab World, Washington, D.C.: The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1998, p. 15.

[349] Craig Calhoun, “Introduction,” in Habermas and the Public Sphere, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1991, p. 7.

[350] Dale F. Eickelman and Jon w. Anderson, “Redefining Muslim Publics,” in New Media in the Muslim WorldzThe Emerging Public Sphere, Dale F. Eickelman and Jon w. Anderson (eds.), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999, pp. 1–28.

[351] Dominique Colas, Civil Society and Fanaticism: Conjoined Histories, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1997.

[352] Andrew Hammond, “Al-Jazeera to Set up in Egypt,” Reuters, 17 April 2000.

[353] Alterman, New Media, pp. 26–29.

[354] John F. Burns, “Arab TV Gets a New Slant: Newscasts without Censorship,” New York Times, 4 July 1999, pp. A1,A6.

[355] DFE interview with Faisal al-Kassim, 30 October 1999.

[356] DFE interview with Faisal al-Kassim, 20 March 1999.

[357] Sulayman bin Jazi’ al-Shamri, Barnamij al-Ittijah al-Mu‘akis: Dirasa ‘Ilmiyya Akadamiya [The “Opposite Direction” Program: An Academic Study], Riyadh: Department of Information, King Saud University, 1998.

[358] Jerusalem Media and Communication Center, Palestinian Opinion Pulse 1:33, November 1999, p. 9 based on JMCC polls carried out on 21 and 22 October 1999.

[359] Charles Taylor, “Modernity and the Rise of the Public Sphere,” in The Tanner Lectures on Human Values, volume 14,1993, p. 213.

[360] Alfred Schutz, Collected Papers I: The Problem of Social Reality, edited by Maurice Natanson, The Hague; Martinus Nijhoff, 1967, pp. 15–19.

[361] ئكاةحلاًحلاًة Anderson., Imagined Communities: Rejections on the Origin and Spread ofNationalism, Lon- don; Verso, 1991, pp. 37–46.

[362] An incident reported to have happened in al-Suwayq, an oasis in the Batinah region, March 1998.Interview, Muscat, 19 June 1998.As economic conditions improved in Oman, donkeys became redundant to the local agricultural economy, and increasingly were set free to forage on garbage and other “found” sustenance. Hence their availability for displaying political messages inscribed on their flanks. An Iraqi colleague challenges the uniqueness of this Omani initiative, saying that the same vehicle was earlier used in southern Iraq, following the Iraqi defeat in Kuwait in 1991.

[363] U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, World Factbook 1999, “Oman,” at <[[http://www.cia.gov/cia/publications/factbook/mu.html][http://www.cia.gov/cia/ publications/factbook/mu.html]]>.

[364] Text of the seventeenth annual National Day speech, 15 November 1987, as reported in the Times of Oman, 19 November 1987, p. 2.

[365] For textbooks, see, for example, Sultanate of Oman, Ministry of Education, Al-Tarbiyya Al-Islamiyya [Islamic Education], 1st intermediate level, 4th ed., Muscat; Ministry of Information, 1985.The 1983 sermons have been collected in a book, Al-Muwahab al-Sunniyya fil-Khutab Al-fam ‘iyya [The Sanctioned Traditional Gift of Friday Sermons], part 1, edited by Ahmad bin Hamad al-Khalili, Muscat; Ministry of Justice, Awqaf and Islamic Affairs, 1983.Later sermons have been issued in monthly booklets.

[366] Videotape supplied by the Embassy of the Sultanate of Oman, Washington. For a detailed analysis of this talk and its significance, see Dale F. Eickelman, “Identite nationale et discours religieux en Oman,” in Gilles Kepel and Yann Richard (eds.), Intellectuels et militants de ITslam contemporain, Paris: Seuil, 1990, pp. 103–28.Part of this account is a revised version of this earlier analysis.

[367] Shaykh Ahmad identified bin Baz’s fatwa as number 772, dated 8/3/1407.

[368] Ahmed bin Hamed al-Khalili, I Are the Ibadhis? translated by Ahmed Hamoud al-Maamiry, Zanzibar; Al-Khayira Press, n.d. [1988?]), pp. 23—24.This pamphlet repeats the passages of the videotape almost verbatim.

[369] Interview, London, 16 June 1987.

[370] Harith al-Ghassany, “Kitman and Renaissance; Domination and the Limits of Development,” doctoral dissertation presented to the Departments of Middle Eastern Studies and Anthropology, Harvard University, 1995, p. 2.

[371] The letter is reproduced on p. 1 of the pamphlet. The charge that the Ibadhis are part of the Khariji movement originating in the first Islamic century is standard in sectarian polemic. Actually, the Ibadhis originated as a breakaway sect from the Khariji movement and rejected the Khariji tenet that all non-Kharijis were infidels who merited death. Except for strict Ibadhi adherence to the early traditions of the Muslim community and the Sunna, and Ibadhi views on religious and political leadership, Ibadhi and Sunni doctrine coincide in most major respects. Other minor differences include the required movements during the obligatory prayers, the lack until recently of minarets in Ibadhi mosques, and the absence, again until recently, of Friday sermons (khutbas). See Dale F. Eickelman, “Ibadhism and the Sectarian Perspective,” in B. R. Pridham (ed.), Oman: Economic, Social and Strategic Developments, London: Croom Helm, 1987, pp. 31–50.

[372] Interview with an Omani student, New York, 20 May 1985.

[373] Interview, Nizwa region, 9 March 1988.

[374] Interview, Ministry of Justice official, 22 March 1988.Many younger officials have studied in Europe and the United States and are fully aware of competing Muslim discourses.

[375] Dale F. Eickelman, “Kings and People: Oman’s State Consultative Council,” The Middle East fournal 38: 1, winter 1984, pp. 51–71.Initially appointive only, the Council was later relaunched, with limited suffrage, which continues to expand.See “Oman Widens Council Ballot, More Women Get Vote,” Reuters, 15 April 2000.

[376] Interview, 21 June 1998.

[377] “How the Sultan Sees the Tasks Ahead,” The Financial Times, Oman Survey, 13 January 1983.These comments are identical to ones published earlier in Arabic in “Sultan Qaboos to Al-MajallaAl-Majalla (London), 1 May 1982, p. 17.

[378] Undated, anonymous leaflet beginning (in Arabic) with “The fury is unleashed, o Qaboos, and the time has come for the people to rise up ...”

[379] Khalifah bin Muhammad bin Abdallah al-Hadhrami, Ma Yuhimmak Ma‘rifatihi Min al-Qanun [What Knowledge of the Law Means to You], Muscat: privately printed, 1999.

[380] Reinhard Bendix, Kings or People: Power and the Mandate to Rule, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1978.

[381] Cited in E. A. Bayne, Persian Kingship in Transition: Conversations with a Monarch, New York: American Universities Field Staff, Inc., 1968, p. 61.

* Part II: Regional Concerns

 Border Disputes

 Chapter 13: Down to the Usual Suspects: Border and Territorial Disputes in the Arabian Peninsula and Persian Gulf at the Millennium{1}

Richard Schofield

{1} This paper was written in the spring of 2000. Since that time, there have been important developments, such as the conclusion of a Saudi-Yemeni boundary treaty in June 2000 and, more recently still, the issue by the International Court ofjustice of an award for the Bahrain-Qatar maritime boundary in March 2001. These developments are covered in the conclusion to this chapter.

Many of the contemporary headlines dealing with Arabian land boundary issues (with the exception, perhaps, of the Saudi-Yemen boundary question) should be seen in a regional context in which states are striding actively to finalize the political map. It should be remembered that the majority of Arabian states have experienced full independence only very recently and that, in most cases, territorial limits have had to be negotiated and finalized. Indeed, the relevance of the postmodern discourse on territory and boundaries to this area seems spurious at best. Never mind de-territorialization (as some would argue is occurring within the European context) or re-territorialization (as has clearly occurred with the collapse of empire and the rise of ethno-nationalism in the Caucasus and the former Yugoslav federation); the prerequisite process of territorialization has not yet been completed among the states of the region. While four GCC states have fully implemented that regional organization's customs union agreement—in a sense, a step toward de-territorialization—the eastern three-quarters of the boundary between Saudi Arabia and Yemen has only just been established, and the Oman—United Arab Emirates land border remains to be absolutely finalized.

In many ways, another set of considerations applies to the seemingly intractable set of disputes surrounding or lying across Gulf waters. Arab-Iranian rivalry has often found expression in territorial disputes, and in this respect, it is probably little coincidence that the Shatt al-Arab dispute between Iraq and Iran and the Lower Gulf islands dispute between Iran and the United Arab Emirates (UAE) remain alive to varying degrees. Cynics in the region and elsewhere tiring of a half-decade of stalemate in the latter dispute might ultimately question the desire of each party to see it settled. After all, there is an element of safety and convenience in channeling regional rivalries through island sovereignty disputes and therefore, some might argue, a possible value in keeping them less than fully settled. As Victor Prescott commented in 1987, an international boundary always represents the potential for both conflict and cooperation,[382] though its utility will normally be greatest in this respect if it is not subject to a binding agreement that has been signed, sealed, and delivered.[383]

When considering Arab-Iranian boundary and territorial disputes, it is well to recall Jacques Ancel’s perennially applicable observation that “there are no problems of boundaries, only problems of nations.”[384] In other words, disputes over boundaries and territory are frequently little more than the physical manifestation of wider but perhaps less tangible differences and rivalries between states. While this view might be accurate when looking at these disputes in isolation, it does little to explain Iraq’s long-established dissatisfaction with its narrow shoreline and its lack of access to Gulf waters, a geostrategic predicament that has clearly been a factor in recent decades of conflict in the northern Gulf. Here, the positioning of its international boundaries with both Iran and Kuwait has given rise to a negative Iraqi mentality concerning access and communications, even if most of the problems historically may have been more perceived than real. Stephen Jones’s rather gory imagery of 1945 helps shed more light on this perspective, whereby “a boundary, like the human skin, may have diseases of its own or reflect the illnesses of the body.”[385] Boundaries can therefore be both the source and the symbol of disputes.

* Behind the Headlines in 2000

A brief tour d’horizon is necessary to establish the contemporary importance of territorial questions in the Gulf (Map 13.1).

 The Saudi Arabia—Yemen Border

Serious incidents continued recently to occur along the Saudi-Yemeni borderlands, most notably and recently the military clash of january 2000 in the mountains of Asir, which resulted in two Yemeni fatalities.[386]

Before June 2000, one could make a strong case for arguing that, of all Arabian territorial issues excepting the Iraq-Kuwait boundary, the Saudi-Yemeni boundary question presented potentially the greatest challenge to regional stability. It may still (see conclusion). Bilateral negotiations have been ongoing (if intermittently) since the summer of 1992 toward finalizing Arabia's last indeterminate territorial limit. Although progress toward nominating the last missing fence in the desert has been painfully slow, there have been some notable developments, especially in the half-decade since the 1994 Yemeni civil war. First, the February 1995 memorandum of understanding (MoU) recommitted the two sides to the existing 1934 Treaty of Taif line in the west, while establishing a procedural framework for addressing the remainder of the border to the east. In the summer of 1996, during a session of the joint committees introduced by the 1995 MoU, Yemen forwarded a traditional boundary claim, the first occasion upon which a Sanaa government had ever issued a cartographically depictable claim to the indeterminate borderlands. The result was a considerable overlap in Saudi and Yemeni territorial claims (Map 13.2). There were reports that the basis of an agreement had been reached on the shores of Lake Como in late 1997, which would apparently have seen a line introduced to effectively bisect the area of overlapping claims. This would have been a delimitation that would have run in a straight line westward from the Saudi-Yemeni-Omani tripoint in the east to a point to the northeast of jabal al-Thar (the eastern terminus of the 1934 Taifline) in the west.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-9.jpg][Map 13.1 Territorial and Maritime Boundaries in the Gulf Region]]

Yet, with time, it seems clear that the Como agreement was not the breakthrough that it portended to be. Serious incidents continue to occur along the length and breadth of the borderlands on land and sea. Furthermore, these incidents have been violent, with significant losses of life —best illustrated by the Duwaima island episode in the summer of 1998, and the renewed hostilities along the Taif line in January 2000. Though all the right diplomatic signals are issued about progress having been made in sessions of the boundary delimitation committees, the reality confirms that a negotiated settlement of the boundary is still some way off. Hence the surprise generated by the June 2000 agreement (see conclusion). Noticeably, in the half-decade since the 1995 MoU, a pattern has emerged of impasse, incident, and high-level patch-up. Impasse will be reached in the routine sessions of the boundary committees. This will typically be broken by a violent flare-up somewhere along the borderlands, after which senior political figures from Riyadh and Sanaa will convene to address the immediate negative political fall-out and to re-inject some momentum into the border negotiations. It is to be hoped that this largely negative and unproductive cycle can be broken in the future.

 The Iran-UAE Islands Dispute

There continue to be occasional reports of possible initiatives to free the Iran-UAE dispute over the Lower Gulf islands of Abu Musa and the Tunbs from its current stalemated status. Just as often, the war of words associated with this dispute periodically becomes heated, though this is hardly a new phenomenon.

Soon after its resurrection following Iranian heavy-handedness on Abu Musa island in 1992, the Iran-UAE dispute over the sovereignty of the Lower Gulf islands crystallized into a stalemated war of words. Support lent to any peaceful efforts the UAE might undertake to restore its sovereignty over the three islands (typically by the GCC at year-end summits) would ordinarily be greeted in Teheran by trophic blasts of defiance. The assertion that the UAE would have to “cross a sea of blood” to recover the features has been an almost standard Iranian counter-statement, albeit a particularly graphic and symbolic one designed predominantly for domestic consumption.

In the mid-1990s the UAE enjoyed real success in internationalizing the Lower Gulf islands dispute, but, ironically, its chances of regaining full control over the islands probably diminished. For the UAE’s very success would engender a defensive posture in Iran, and the adoption of the islands question as a national issue, one inextricably linked to regime legitimacy. Indeed, for much of the 1990s, the Lower Gulf islands dispute would play a symbolic role as the focus of Arab-Iranian rivalries across Gulf waters. This was a position traditionally experienced by the Iran-Iraq dispute over the Shatt al-Arab river boundary, but with Iraq’s regional and international isolation since 1990, the gaze moved southward.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-10.jpg][Map 13.2 Saudi-Yemeni Boundary]]

To be sure, there has always been a strong “window of opportunity” aspect to the resurrected Lower Gulf islands dispute. In the medium term, presuming Iraq’s eventual re-integration within the Arab fold, it seems likely that the Shatt al-Arab dispute (currently dormant rather than resolved) will resume its traditional symbolic role as a barometer of Arab-Iranian relations, and the current concentration on the islands dispute will dilute. The focus on the islands dispute is already blurring, however, as a consequence of a tentative but tangible shift in the power dynamics of the region—best illustrated by the emerging Saudi/Iranian entente of the last two years. It is within this bigger regional picture that the ٢JA٨ط has charged Riyadh with failing to fully support its claims to the islands. Notwithstanding the creation of a special GCC subcommittee (that includes Qatar and Oman), whose task is to promote a peaceful settlement of the dispute, there is a feeling amongst some UAE officials that the window of opportunity is narrowing and that, after eight years in the limelight, the islands question is not the regional issue it once was.

 The Bahrain-Qatar Row

In December 1999 Bahrain and Qatar pledged to conduct full diplomatic relations for the first time and, since that time, have made encouraging noises about trying to reach an “out of court” settlement of their dispute over the sovereignty of the Hawar islands, the Dibal andjaradeh shoals, and the locality of Zubarah.

Since December 1999, at least on the formal level, relations between Manama and Doha seem to have improved dramatically. While this has led some to speculate that the long-established and intransigent dispute over the Hawar islands might be settled bilaterally, it is probably more accurate to assert that these are moves typical of states whose disputes are about to be decided upon by international courts. Though many verdicts passed down over the years by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) have been characterized by a degree of fudging, every case—to a lesser or greater extent—has a winner and a loser. The recent “breakthrough” in Bahraini-Qatari relations should be seen, therefore, as an acknowledgment that each side realizes that it may lose, and that it is prepared for such an outcome. Court hearings in The Hague were scheduled for late May 2000 and ran for five weeks. The ICJ verdict would ultimately be issued on 16 March 2001 (see conclusion).

Importantly, the dynamics seemed to have changed in this boundary dispute as well. For the three years before the ICJ ruled—in July 1994—that it did, after all, possess jurisdiction to try this dispute (and for at least a year thereafter), Bahrain stalled. As the court was about to rule on ownership of the features—while the Hawar islands (save for Zubarah) were occupied by Manama—which Britain had previously recognized as belonging to the island state, Bahrain had everything to lose and Qatar everything to gain. Indeed, Bahraini perceptions were clarified when, in February 1995, a senior government official commented that the features in question would be relinquished to Qatar (should the ICJ have ruled in its favor) “over our dead bodies.” Yet, recent developments have given Bahrain a greater appetite for the fray, notably Qatar’s request that the ICJ “disregard” 82 pieces of documentary evidence contained within its memorial and counter-memorial, after their provenance had been questioned by Manama. Never before has the authenticity of evidence played such a prominent role in the history of boundary cases before the ICJ.

 The Oman-UAE BorderAccord

In the last week of March 2000, Oman and the UAE announced the ratification of the May 1999 Oman-UAE (Abu Dhabi) boundary agreement and added that the territorial limit would be demarcated in the near future. [387]

This development should be seen in the context of the great strides made to finalize the Arabian territorial framework during the last decade. It represents part of the process of rounding off sharp edges that has continued since the mid-1990s, following the large-scale material progress achieved through the conclusion of international boundary agreements in the first half of the decade. There are other recent developments that can be placed in this “icing on the cake” category. For instance, there were relatively lavish celebrations during 1994 and 1995 to greet the completion of the demarcation of the Oman-Yemen land boundary and the production of a detailed series of maps by a joint Omani-Saudi survey team of the delimitation agreed back in 1990. Further north, it would not be until June 1999 that the demarcation of the Qatar—Saudi Arabia delimitation would be completed, despite this measure having been agreed upon seven years earlier (December 1992), in the context of Egyptian mediation of the Khafus incident in September of that year.

As for the Oman-UAE boundary, it must be stated that while there are no major issues in dispute between the two states, the delimitation has not yet been wholly finalized. It has evolved in a piecemeal fashion since the late 19505, with agreement having been reached at various stages on various parts of the boundary, especially during the period before the proclamation of the UAE in Decernber 1971. The May 1999 agreement concerning the Abu Dhabi-Oman border was in itself a delayed implementation of the announcement, made some six years earlier by the Omani government, that this delimitation had been settled as the result of”a lasting agreement” between the two states. A final agreement has apparently still to be reached on delimitation between Oman and the Qasimi emirates of Sharjah and Ras al-Khaimah, after which time one might expect to see a further and final Oman-UAE agreement, ratifying all the earlier agreements and understandings reached since the late 19505.

 The Iraq-Kuwait Boundary

In recent months, there have also been a number of comments in the Gulf media recognizing that the question of Iraqi access to the Gulf may well resurface, notwithstanding the May 1995 United Nations award for the Iraq-Kuwait boundary.

Understandably, given its hugely traumatic experience at Iraqi hands, Kuwait adopted—at least officially—something of an ostrich mentality with respect to its northern neighbor for much of the 1990s. Yet if Baghdad considers itself a geographically disadvantaged state with its meager shoreline in the northern Gulf, Kuwait, too, can claim to be locationally challenged, surrounded as it is by the dominant regional powers of Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia.

Exceptionally, the Iraq-Kuwait boundary is guaranteed against physical infraction by the United Nations, as Baghdad accepted—without equivocation—the UN ruling in November 1994. In terms of international law, this territorial limit is finalized, but the degree to which it can therefore be considered as a “solved” regional problem is open to question, especially since Iraqi claims on Kuwaiti territory had such a vexed history before they culminated in the disastrous 2 August 1990 move.

Moreover, and despite a history of dispute and conflict, Iraqi-Kuwaiti relations have also been characterized by limited functional cooperation in the economic sphere. Consequently, a much greater measure of regional economic integration in the northern Gulf than has hitherto been achieved seems the best means to ensure against future conflict. This is the emerging consensus among Gulf intellectuals addressing the question of Iraqi access to the Gulf.

* Finalizing the 1990s Arabian Political Map

Having undertaken this regional review, it is important to underline the degree and nature of progress made toward finalizing the Arabian political map during the 1990s.[388]

 Bilateral Boundary Agreements

Through the conclusion of bilateral boundary agreements, especially within southeastern Arabia—Saudi Arabia—Oman (1990), Oman-Yemen (1992), and Oman-United Arab Emirates (1999)-Muscat, Riyadh, and Abu Dhabi have gone a long way to finalizing their boundary delimitation. Oman’s recent boundary agreements have also rightly been lauded for their sophistication in providing for free trans-boundary movements for the nomadic populations of southeastern Arabia. Likewise, the Iraq-Kuwait boundary has been settled in international law, while the ICJ will probably deliver its verdict in the Bahrain-Qatar case by the end of 2000. Meanwhile, Saudi Arabia and Yemen continue to negotiate their respective territorial limits astride the Rub al-Khali. As discussed above, the progress of the late 1990s consisted of tidying up loose ends following the conclusion of bilateral treaties earlier in the decade, or rounding off key sharp edges created by boundary incidents (e.gKhafus in September 1992) that had occurred during the process of finalizing limits to state territory.

Compared to this momentum toward finalizing Arabian land boundaries, there has been nowhere near as much progress in completing the maritime political geography of the Gulf. Excluding the 1993 United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission award of a median line along the Khor Abdallah (which, for some reason, was not extended fully to the mouth of that water inlet proper), there have been no continental shelf boundary agreements concluded since 1974 (Map 13.2). Although there are a number of reasons for this state of affairs, the existence of territorial disputes over three groups of islands (Umm al-Maradim and Qaru in the northern Gulf between Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, the Hawar islands and shoals dispute between Bahrain and Qatar, and the Lower Gulf islands dispute between Iran and the UAE) is clearly preventing the conclusion of maritime boundary delimitation between these states. Indeed, after their eight-year long war, Iran and Iraq have failed to conclude a maritime boundary agreement of their own.

Still, there is (and has been for some time) the promise of progress. The International Court of justice would not only adjudicate on the ownership of various insular formations lying between Bahrain and Qatar, but would also announce a maritime boundary delimitation between the two states, later in 2000. For their part, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait have repeatedly stated that the announcement of a maritime boundary delimitation is imminent. It was back in October 1995, in point of fact, that delegations from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia began the latest round of discussions toward this end, though it would seem that the two sides have so far failed to reach agreement upon how the sovereignty of Umm Al-Maradim and Qaru should be broached in advance of the drawing of any maritime delimitation. Importantly, in May 1995, the Iranian ambassador to Kuwait also announced Teheran’s preparedness to tackle the problem of finalizing maritime boundaries in the northern Gulf. In the fall of 1995, the Kuwaiti government confirmed that an agreement had been reached in principle to commence negotiations toward this end. The onset of these agreements is dependent upon a successful conclusion of the ongoing (and seemingly stalled) negotiations between Kuwait and Saudi Arabia on national maritime limits.[389]

When discussing existing maritime boundaries within Gulf waters, the point also needs to be made that the agreements that introduced them are dated by modern standards. There is no single agreement in which a geodetic datum set is specified. Datums in all cases are spheroidal/ellipsoidal, reflecting Britain’s long influence and continuing presence in the region. In fact, the crudity and paucity of the information that comprises the datums used to draw charts upon which maritime boundary delimitation have been drawn indicate that there is, in practice, a huge error factor in physically locating exactly where these limits lie in Gulf waters.[390] This is a problem that is distracting oil companies when identifying seismic lines or drilling for oil. Where exactly is the boundary? In short, it is currently impossible to determine. Since the conclusion of maritime boundary agreements in the Gulf, the advent of global positioning systems has made possible the realistic relation of national datums to an appropriate global reference within acceptable limits of accuracy. Thus, the margin for error in trying to physically locate a maritime delimitation has potentially been reduced from hundreds of meters (as is now the case with the region’s agreements) to a matter of centimeters. There is a strong case, therefore, for suggesting that all existing maritime boundary agreements be modified in light of these technological advances.

 Norms of International Law

The texts of agreements reached in the early 1990s (and some agreed at a much earlier stage, e.g·, Saudi Arabia-Qatar [1965]) have increasingly been registered at what the international legal community regards as the appropriate international institutions—typically the United Nations Secretariat in New York. This is, indeed, a recent phenomenon. One observer commented as early as 1991 that the Saudis, for example, had been “reluctant to finalize their agreements according to those international rules which would entitle them to consider that their arrangements constituted a permanent feature of the international map.”[391] The position has now changed to the degree that Riyadh can now point to the fact that it has renegotiated or modified all of the territorial understandings concluded between Ibn Saud and the British (or frequently imposed by the latter) during the early part of the century. This is doubtless of importance to the Kingdom. The growing evidence that the territorial framework has evolved to a point of no return should also reassure Saudi Arabia’s small but historically mindful neighbors along the western/southern Gulf littoral. Iraq has not been the only territorially acquisitive state within the region!

 Regional and Institutional Considerations

GCC states have been preoccupied, since 1991, with the further entrenchment, institutionalization, and, where appropriate, finalization of the Arabian territorial framework. GCC policy toward the resolution of Arabian disputes, and the finalization of the political map of the region, has not been proactive but reactive. In fact, it has been, and will probably continue to be, a response to regional instability. Moreover, GCC states have focused on the need for the tidy appropriation of natural resources.

Against this background, the March 1991 Damascus Declaration (concluded among the six GCC states, Egypt, and Syria) remains an important statement of policy, principle, and intent, as far as the regulation of state territory in the region is concerned. To further strengthen their rapidly evolving positions, the following measures were explicitly promoted: greater regulation of existing borders; the peaceful resolution of disputes; respect for international law, mutual non-interference and good-neighborliness. In the aftermath of the “resurrection” of the Lower Gulf islands dispute in 1992, a further principle was added to these: the “inadmissibility of the acquisition of land by force.”[392] Noticeably, the fifteenth Manama GCC summit meeting (December 1994) was not so clear on the enunciation of any new principles regulating limits to state territory, reitera ting the apparent keenness of the Supreme Council to see territorial disputes between member states and neighbors settled peacefully. Yet, and significantly in relation to the ICJ’s recent treatment of the Bahrain-Qatar territorial dispute, the GCC appeared to favor bilateral negotiations, as opposed, for instance, to arbitration or judicial settlement. With time, however, these developments would prove to be less significant than they had initially appeared. This had everything to do with the discernible tendency for statements of GCC territorial policy to reflect the immediate and foreign policy concerns of the states hosting annual summit meetings. Thus Bahrain's "interest" in keeping the Hawar dispute from being treated in The Hague had been instrumental in late 1994.

It should also be stressed that pragmatic considerations have been fueling much of the progress toward finalizing the political map during the last decade. Beginning in the early 19905, several Arabian states embarked upon exploration drives for hydrocarbons in border regions, many of which were still indeterminate. Because of their politically sensitive location and general remoteness, these fields had generally been ignored prior to this point, but the economic imperatives of maximizing production in a flat oil market and of compensating for the maturing of older fields were now to outweigh such considerations. In such circumstances, the need for precise and unambiguous boundary definitions was clear, so that states could safely prospect and develop resources right up to the limits of their territories. This process has also produced boundary incidents (e.g., the 1992 Khafus border post incident between Saudi Arabia and Qatar) and disputes over how existing treaties cater to trans-boundary resources—best illustrated by the UAE's boycott of the opening of the trans-boundary Shaybah (Saudi Arabia) oil field in 1999. Only four-fifths of this field lies within Saudi territory, but the 1974 boundary treaty between the two states specifies that the Kingdom has the rights to all of its resources.

* Down to the Usual Suspects

The disputes that confront the region in 2000 are generally the ones that have lingered, which Britain recognized to be problems during its rule over the region, yet ones for which it could apparently find or broker no effective and lasting solution. Thus, the usual suspects under discussion here are Iraq’s boundaries at the head of the Gulf, and the Lower Gulf islands dispute, while some might add the Bahrain-Qatar island and shoal disputes to such a category. While no one can downplay the continuing violence of repeated Saudi-Yemeni border incidents, it is difficult to characterize this dispute as a “usual suspect,” since bilateral negotiations toward establishing a boundary in the desert wastes of the Rub al-Khali have been ongoing, and then intermittently, only since 1992.

Moreover, to classify the Iraq-Kuwait boundary as a “usual suspect,” in a category of ultimately unresolved disputes, is also contentious and technically wrong. Given that the United Nations Security Council unanimously approved the secretary-general’s demarcation team’s award for this territorial limit in May 1993—while the governments of Iraq and Kuwait had effectively lent their approval two years earlier to any arrangement that would ultimately be arrived at—it must clearly be placed in a unique category. The fact that Iraq formally and fully accepted the UN award without equivocation in November 1994 and that the integrity of this demarcation is physically guaranteed against infraction by the Security Council reinforces the notion that this boundary has been finalized and is here to stay Certainly it has now fully evolved in international law. Yet, to assume that a historically explosive regional problem has thereby been removed is dangerous. How many experienced observers of northern Gulf affairs could confidently predict that the last has been heard of a plea by successive Baghdad governments for greater access to Gulf waters at the expense of Kuwait?

Historically, therefore, what has made this persistent group of usual suspects so resistant to permanent and final settlement has been their cyclical nature. Until very recently, it has often seemed that however these boundaries or territorial questions were regulated in international law at various points in their history, and whether or not the territorial limits introduced have been delimited and/or demarcated, they have tended to move from long periods of dormancy to much shorter and intense periods of activity. Often, the principal determinant or trigger that activates these disputes from dormancy has been intrinsic or perceived shifts in the regional balance of power. Where the history of the Lower Gulf islands is concerned, as well, this would also seem to have been proven right, as illustrated by:

1. The 1887 assertion of more direct control by the Persian Qajar government over the eastern Gulf littoral, and the banishment of the northern flank of the Qawasim (the ruling families of Sharjah and Ras al-Khaimah) from their semi-autonomous base in southern Persia at the port of Lingah and the nearby Sirri island;

2. The British government's advice to the Qawasim in 1903 to emplace flags on Abu Musa and Greater Tunb. The Belgian-run Persian customs police, who hoisted the Persian flag instead on the features, then removed these. When it finally realized what had happened—some months later—Britain used the threat of force to get Persia to climb down, with the result that in 1904 the Al Qasimi flags were re-hoisted on the islands;

3. Iran's move on the islands on the last day of November 1971, the day before Britain departed Gulf waters as protecting power. Prior accommodation had been reached with Sharjah (reluctantly but voluntarily on behalf of its ruler) for the shared administration of Abu Musa, though the Tunb islands were taken forcibly from Ras al-Khaimah;

4. The period from 1992 to the present, which has witnessed the reactivation and internationalization of the Abu Musa/Tunbs dispute. Iran's clumsy reactivation was almost certainly attributable to its frustration at its regional isolation and its exclusion from post—Gulf War plans for regional security.

 Long-established and appreciated nature of disputes

The crux of each dispute within this "usual suspect" category has long been recognized by those who have been involved in efforts to try and resolve them. As far as the protecting power, Britain, was concerned, certain of these disputes presented different problems, ranging from territorial questions that genuinely posed a potential threat to regional stability, to those that were regarded as, above all, tedious spats between neighboring ruling dynasties. Several quotations from British government records illustrate this point.

In 1939 the Foreign Office commented in the following manner upon Iraq's desire for greater access to Gulf waters, placing this dispute firmly into the former, more serious category:

It is understandable that the state which controls the Mesopotamian plain should desire to have undivided control of at least one good means of access to the sea and [British foreign secretary] Lord Halifax thinks that on a long view, it is likely that, if Iraq were given this access, it would make for steadier conditions in that part of the world for years to come.[393]

The irritant caused by the persistence of other disputes, however, is the most distinctive feature of the following comments:

Having been involved at various levels in efforts to resolve the Lower Gulf islands dispute while serving as a diplomat along the Western and Southern Gulf littoral, Sir Glen Balfour-Paul would comment in his book of 1991 that the dispute had, by the turn of the 1970s, assumed a scale in Anglo-Iranian relations "grossly disproportionate" to the islands' size and importance.[394]

Likewise, former British resident Sir William Luce, having been brought back at around the same time specifically to broker a settlement of outstanding issues with Iran in the face of Britain's imminent departure from the Gulf, allegedly uttered, in a moment of obvious exasperation:

The Persians took Sirri while we weren't looking in 1887. I sometimes wish they had taken the Tunbs and Abu Musa as well.[395]

In his heavily anecdotal account of his years as "Adviser to the Ruler of Bahrain," Sir Charles Dalrymple Belgrave would recall the enduring symbolic significance attached by the ruling Al Khalifah family to the locality of Zubarah, little more than a set of ruins lying on the northwestern coastline of the Qatari peninsula. Claims were maintained with a conviction and intensity that completely baffled him:

When Shaykh Hamad died in 1942,1 remembered the words which were attributed to Queen Mary Tudor: “When I am dead ... you shall find Calais lying on my heart,” but in this case the word would have been Zubarah.[396]

A candid, recently declassified Foreign and Commonwealth Office memorandum by Donal McCarthy was equally revealing. The 1969 memorandum reviewed the status of various unresolved boundary questions that Britain would bequeath to the region when it left in December 1971. Following in similar vein to many of the above observations was the remark that:

[t]he mentality of these rulers is such that they are prepared to dispute a barren sand dune till judgement day, while tribal views on e.g., access to wells are pressed with an urgency which does not comprehend Western ideas on rigid frontiers.[397]

In a sense, of course, this last quote was a bit rich. Having introduced a Westernstyle consciousness of territoriality to Arabia (or at least to its rulers), it ought not really have been a cause for complaint when the ownership of specific localities became the subject of fierce contention, albeit usually for reasons best explained as personal or dynastic rather than national rivalries. All of this is interesting and informative, but in the end, however Britain and others since have characterized the conflict potential of these cyclical disputes, it does not necessarily make any of them easier to settle.

 Limitations of International Law

Observers of the Gulf region were jolted when a prominent American international lawyer asserted in New York that, owing to the deliberations of the UN demarcation team and the Iraqi government’s unequivocal acceptance of its findings, the Iraq-Kuwait boundary had been “settled for all time.”[398] While it is to be hoped that peace and stability will characterize these borderlands in decades to come, there is clearly a danger of creating hostages to fortune for the future. A few miles to the northeast, the Shatt al-Arab dispute has proven resistant to its own supposedly final settlement in international law.

Nowhere were the limitations of international law more accurately illustrated than with the fate of the 1975 Algiers Accord and follow-up bilateral treaties between Iran and Iraq of the same year. The package of agreements that defined and regulated the Shatt al-Arab river boundary was, by common consent, the most sophisticated ever to be concluded for a divided river boundary in international law, containing every conceivable safeguard against future disputes over the alignment and status of the territorial limit. Yet it demonstrably failed to prevent conflict, when Iraqi president Saddam Hussein graphically tore to pieces—before an Iraqi television audience—the original he had signed as vicepresident. That was the prelude to the invasion of Iran in September 1980. Within a few weeks of the onset of the Iran-Iraq War, the wreckage of abandoned or burnt-out vessels blocked the Shatt al-Arab, and Iraq was effectively landlocked. It seems likely that the Iraqi president had calculated (wrongly as it turned out) that circumstances were favorable for the restoration of the Shatt Al-Arab to its “rightful owner.” This served to demonstrate that no comprehensive territorial settlement is a panacea if one of the signatories remains unconvinced of what it has committed itself to, and is ultimately prepared to use force to change the geographical facts that the legal instrument has introduced. The whole episode provides an important and painful lesson of which Kuwait must be only too aware.

Thus, a reflection upon the convoluted history of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary and sovereignty disputes in the period before 1990 identifies a number of critical factors and constants. Indeed, the future treatment and management of the dispute may well determine whether or not territorial stability will characterize the borderlands of the northwestern Gulf, notwithstanding the recent accomplishment of the لت٢ demarcation team. What do these critical factors and constants mean?[399]

First, that the Iraqi access to the Gulf is limited. Iraq is classifiable as a geographically disadvantaged state. Its meager coastline is largely undevelopable, and the state was effectively landlocked during the recent wars of its own making in the northern Gulf. It has consistently sought territorial concessions from Kuwait that might improve this access, typically involving requests for Kuwait's cession or lease of the islands ofWarbah and Bubiyan and a strip of land territory south of Iraq's second dry-cargo port, Umm Qasr.

Yet the politics of access have been equally important, engendering from Iraq a certain historical restlessness, or negative consciousness. Baghdad has always believed itself to be squeezed out of the Gulf. History affords partial if indirect support for such a viewpoint inasmuch as it was the genesis of Britain's treaty relationship with Kuwait at the turn of the century, and its urgency not to allow imperial rivals a foothold upon what it regarded as a British lake at this time, that would result in a fairly explicit policy of minimizing the Ottoman shoreline in the northern Gulf.[400] Britain's success in squeezing out the Ottomans from the Gulf has certainly contributed to Iraq feeling squeezed out ever since.

Historically, too, there has been some sympathy for Iraq's arguments for greater access to Gulf waters. This extended at various stages to the British government itself, while it was responsible for the conduct of Kuwait's foreign affairs. Lacy Baggallay's important 1939 quote has already been presented, but a Foreign Office telegram wired to Bahrain in 1957 would make much the same point:

In my view it would be in Kuwait's interest to make an earlier frontier setdement at the cost of ceding the territory necessary to provide Iraq with a deep water channel to Umm Qasr under Iraqi sovereignty.[401]

Amazingly, international sympathy did not totally disappear, even with Iraq's disastrous move on Kuwait on 2 August 1990. Leaving aside whatever Ambassador April Glaspie did or did not say in the immediately preceding weeks, Thomas Pickering, the then U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, apparently relayed the following message on 6 August 1990 for delivery to the Iraqi government via the ٢.5. Ambassador to Jordan:

We acknowledge your need for an opening to the Gulf, and the issue of access to the islands is one we could look upon favorably.[402]

Ironically, international sympathy for Iraq's arguments for greater access would certainly disappear once the Baghdad government announced the annexation of Kuwait a week into its occupation. For this Iraq obviously had only itself to blame.

Second, the Iraq-Kuwait territorial disputes are inter-related with the Shatt al-Arab question. There is a proven historical pattern, with the triangular relationship usually expressing itself during those periods in which Iran has held the upper hand in the Shatt al-Arab dispute. Inasmuch as Iraq has looked south to Kuwait to compensate itself for its geostrategic misfortune, four historical phases are particularly noteworthy to establish the linkage.[403] In 1938, Iraq requested port facilities outside the Shatt al-Arab for the first time, and Britain decided that its gaze should be focused upon the Khor Zubair rather then Kuwait Bay. Iraq argued several reasons for the request, including that the Shatt al-Arab was becoming unreliable, because of its status as a disputed international river boundary; that the waterway was becoming congested, because of river traffic levels (a debatable charge at this point); and that Iraq wanted to extend its railway beyond Basra to the coast. Moreover, Iraqi troops advanced a few miles into Kuwaiti territory south of Umm Qasr in 1969 (and would remain there until the thaw in Iraqi-Kuwaiti relations of 1977) following the Shah's abrogation of the 1937 Teheran treaty. During the 1980–1988 Iran-Iraq War, with the Shatt Al-Arab blocked and the planned large-scale expansion of Umm Qasr postponed, Iraq twice requested the use ofWarbah and Bubiyan islands even if Kuwait did much to bolster its own presence on the features during this time. Two weeks into its occupation of Kuwait, Iraq surprised many observers by apparently abandoning territorial claims to the whole of the Shatt al-Arab river when accepting Iranian terms for a final settlement of the Iran-Iraq War. This understandably raised questions as to how, if at all, the two events were related.[404]

Third, the Iraqi government had abrogated supposedly final international boundary agreements, as discussed above.

Fourth, the Iraqi state and population have developed a sense of “territorial consciousness.” That Kuwait “rightfully” belongs to Iraq is almost certainly a prevailing view on the streets of Baghdad and elsewhere within Iraq. Ironically, it was probably much easier for Saddam Hussein to recognize the UN verdict on the boundary than it would have been for Iraqi opposition groups ultimately desirous (but obviously incapable) of replacing the current Iraqi regime. The UN decision on the course of the Iraq-Kuwait land boundary, when first announced in April 1992 (albeit not in its final detail), was denounced not only by the current regime but also by these exiled opposition groupings.

Fifth, the (in)ability of Iraq, Kuwait, and Iran to cooperate in the management of the borderlands of the northwestern Gulf has created certain undeniable conditions. Occasionally, Iran and Iraq have agreed to boundary delimitation along the Shatt al-Arab river, but never have the two sides managed to agree upon a sustainable joint program for the conservancy of the waterway. Earlier, Britain and the Basra Port Authority had found such a goal elusive as well.

While effective cooperation in the management of the Shatt al-Arab has always eluded Iran and Iraq, the treaties, protocols, and annexes of 1975 ironically provided elaborate guidelines in this direction. With some irony, Iran and Iraq had also agreed upon a scheme for clearing and cleansing the Shatt al-Arab just a few weeks before the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. Clearly, if one accepts that in the medium term, the thalweg has to be regarded as the definitive boundary, Iran and Iraq will have to cooperate in the conservancy of this shared river.

To make matters worse, the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission (UNIKBDC) award of 1993 for the Iraq-Kuwait boundary has left the navigation channels along the Khor Abdallah dredged, cut, and deepened by Iraq since the early 1960s, entirely within the Kuwaiti territorial sea.[405] Despite statutory rights of passage for Iraqi vessels, the need for cooperation in the future management of this stretch of the borderlands would seem all too clear. As things stand, for instance, Iraq cannot maintain its navigation channels along the Khor Abdallah.

Importantly, a history of sporadic though significant functional cooperation has been highlighted between Iraq and Kuwait.[406] In the twelve-month period before the 1990 Iraqi invasion, the two states had agreed to integrate their electricity grids, while the go-ahead was given for a limited supply of Iraqi freshwater from the Shatt al-Arab to be supplied to Kuwait via a pipeline traversing the Faw peninsula. This admittedly small-scale level of limited functional cooperation had paralleled the two traditional Iraqi claims on Kuwait and its territory before 1990. Since there is a certain logic to it, it should come as no surprise if and when it is resurrected in the future.

 Legal Dilemmas and Political Realities

States of the Arabian Peninsula/Persian Gulf region have displayed a particular penchant and determination in recent years for concluding boundary agreements that affect precise divisions of sovereign territory. Yet, with the apparent intractability of the “usual suspects,” as identified above, it might be worth considering whether there is no greater scope for looking at arrangements that might fall short of a full sovereign solution of the territorial dispute in these cases. Furthermore, in the 1971 Iran-UAE and the 1934 Saudi-Yemeni cases, arrangements along these lines were already in place. The 23 November 1971 Iran-Sharjah memorandum of understanding regarding Abu Musa was an imaginative agreement that reflected the regional realities pertaining at the time of its conclusion but which, while introducing the shared administration of the small island, deliberately ducked the question of its sovereignty. The May 1934 Taif treaty (or the Saudi-Yemeni “Treaty of Islamic Friendship and Brotherhood”) remains in force, largely because it is an agreement that provides sufficient grey areas for each party to maintain divergent interpretations about the status of the boundary it introduced.

 The 1971 Ivan-Sharjah Moll

The essentially pragmatic Iran-Sharjah MoU was most notable for the manner in which it accommodated the full sovereign claims of both Iran and Sharjah to the island. Its preamble stated that “neither Iran nor Sharjah will give up its claim to Abu Musa nor recognize the other state’s claim.”[407] In other words, the question of sovereignty was completely fudged in the agreement —·it merely provided for the divided administration of the island. The MoU, nevertheless, provided for the positioning of Iranian forces in key strategic areas—basically, around the hill called Mount Halvah in the northern reaches of the island— defined on a map attached to the text of the agreement. Within this designated area, the Iranian flag flew and Iran possessed full jurisdiction, but outside, the Sharqawi flag remained hoisted and jurisdiction fell to Sharjah as before. Iran and Sharjah each recognized a territorial sea for the island with a breadth of 12 nautical miles in which nationals of both parties would enjoy equal fishing rights. The Buttes Oil Company (which succeeded Occidental as holder of the Sharjah offshore oil concession) would continue to exploit hydrocarbon reserves from the nearby Mubarak oil field (now operated by Crescent of Sharjah) under the conditions specified in its existing concession agreement with the ruler of Sharjah—for as long as these were acceptable to Iran. Lastly, Iran was to give Sharjah ‘1.5 million annually in aid until such time as its oil revenue reached ‘3 million annually, which in practice would take about three years. Given the previous impasse in this dispute, an arrangement that allowed for the flying of each party’s flag on the island seemed, on the surface, a fairly logical and sustainable compromise.

 The 1934 Saudi-Yemeni Taif Treaty

The 20 May 1934 Saudi-Yemeni “Taif’ accord was a peace treaty following the Saudi-Imamate war earlier that year. It introduced boundary delimitation from the Red Sea margins in the west to Jabal al-Thar in the Asir Mountains in the east. The “grey area” provided in this treaty is the rather bizarre obligation contained within its text to renew it every 20 lunar years, operative again since 1995, this provision allows the Yemeni government to argue to this day before its own domestic constituency that no boundary line can be considered “permanent and final” if the treaty that introduced and governs the said territorial limit itself requires renewal. Despite this, Saudi Arabia can argue that the agreement to physically brick up and re-demarcate the Taif line contained within the February 1995 Saudi-Yemeni memorandum of understanding will, when it is finally implemented, give the said line a physical permanence on the ground.[408]

To be sure, neither of these agreements is particularly meritorious, and they are certainly not models for the governance of international boundaries or territorial disputes. Rather, the premise that lies behind them is worth noting, however. These agreements are obviously deficient in terms of international law, but they do, in sum, seek to govern or manage disputes rather than resolve them, while both were clearly the product of the regional realities pertaining at the time of their conclusion.

 Shared Political and Economic Space

Thus, not only is the precedent of existing boundary/territorial agreements that are short on law clearly established, but these are more geared to regional realities than many of their more legally sophisticated counterparts. Shared political and economic space has a proven utility in Arabia and the Persian Gulf.[409] Two such cases are the Kuwait-Saudi Arabia and Iraq-Saudi Arabia neutral zones that were introduced by the Uqair Protocol late in 1922 and that survived as unique features of the Arabian political map until new bilateral agreements were drawn up to partition them in 1969 and 1981 respectively. However, the area of the former Kuwait-Saudi Arabia neutral zone is still subject to the joint economic regime that dates from the era of the neutral zones.[410] A small neutral zone continues to exist between individual emirates of the UAE (Abu Dhabi—Dubai since 1961), while a shared zone existed for at least the late 19505 between Fujairah and Sharjah. Similar features existed between Oman and Ajman and Sharjah respectively during the 1960s, while the bizarre arrangements for the shared administration of Abu Musa with the MoU of 1971 have already been discussed. Given the recent predilection of Arabian states for arriving at fully sovereign settlements of territorial questions and the genuine progress made toward this end, the further appearance of shared political space in Arabia seems unlikely. The eastern three-quarters of the Saudi-Yemeni border remains, as already established, the last missing fence in the desert. It is known to this author, however, that the possible institution of such a feature in the area east of the Yemeni Mashreq—an area for which there are few historical precedents in terms of claims or evidence of effective occupation—has at least been discussed during the last eight years of negotiations between the two states.

If little progress was reached on shared political space in the one and a half decades before Britain vacated the Gulf as protecting power, a great deal of progress was made in drawing up national zones of maritime jurisdiction in or underlying that water body itself. Some of the arrangements drawn up for continental shelf boundary delimitation were innovative and influential, such as the 1968 Iranian-Saudi agreement with its treatment of the islands of Farsi and Arabi. Importantly, however, the Persian Gulf would also be the major testing ground for the institution of joint economic space. The first continental shelf boundary agreement to be concluded in this region was between Bahrain and Saudi Arabia on 22 February 1958. The boundary agreement recognized a simpie median line delimitation that in effect disregarded all interlying (and previously disputed) high- and low-tide elevations. This had been one of several possible boundaries mooted in Anglo-Saudi negotiations convened in August 1951 to discuss the seabed question. The main problem to be sorted out in the years following these negotiations was the northern terminus of the Saudi Arabia-Bahrain maritime boundary in the vicinity of the Bu Saafah shoal, the disputed status of which was accentuated by the presence of an underlying oil field. Instead of opting to share ownership of the feature by instituting a neutral zone, the 1958 agreement provided that Bu Saafah be ceded to Saudi Arabia but specified that in future Bahrain would receive half of the revenue accruing from the exploration of the associated oil field.[411]

The March 1969 Abu Dhabi-Qatar maritime boundary agreement resolved the dispute over ownership of the offshore Bunduq oil field in a similarly imaginative manner. Terminal point B on the maritime boundary was offset slightly from the true equidistant lines between the adjacent coastlines to coincide directly with the location of the oil field. For practical reasons it was specified that only one concessionaire (representing Abu Dhabi) be allowed to develop the field, though, importantly, all revenue from Bunduq was to be shared in perpetuity.[412]

The joint sharing arrangements agreed in 1971 for the Mubarak oil field between Sharjah and Iran have been detailed above, but, given that Abu Musa has been and remains a symbol of Arab-Iranian rivalry, it is important to repeat that some cooperative measures are in place across Gulf waters. Officially, this seems to have been the only example of Arab-Iranian joint development of disputed mineral resources at sea. However, during the course of legal proceedings before the Iran—United States Claims Tribunal in The Hague, a copy of a continental shelf delimitation agreement negotiated between Abu Dhabi (UAE) and Iran was produced. Although there is nothing officially on the record to suggest the existence of this maritime boundary, it seems certain that the text (coneluded in the mid-1970s) formed the basis of a working arrangement at least. The agreement/arrangement is interesting for the manner in which it deals with the trans-boundary offshore Salman (previously referred to as Sassan) oil field. With respect to the joint management of the Salman field, the agreement did not set any production limits or quotas on either party. Still, before the onset of the Iran-Iraq War in 1980, there were a number of meetings convened to exchange technical information on the field between the parties.[413]

Clearly, not only has there been a history of cooperation in dealing with territorial and resource issues in Gulf waters, but also a history of Arab-Iranian cooperation in these issues. There is no reason whatsoever why these precedents cannot be expanded upon in future years and decades as the offshore political map of the Gulf is finalized.

* Conclusion

Article 10 of the GCC charter, signed on 25 May 1981, defined the responsibilities of that organization’s “Commission for the Settlement of Disputes.” To date, there is no evidence that it has ever met, to treat territorial disputes between member states. Ironically, it seems conceivable that the commission could finally be activated to deal with boundaries at some future point (following the likely deliverance of the ICJ’s judicial award in the Hawar case later in 2000) when there are no disputes remaining between member states. In March 1997, it was suggested to this author that the commission might yet play a monitoring role in this regard, a promising idea that deserves to be developed. After all, the Gulf Cooperation Council is likely to play an important role in promoting regional territorial stability. It is worth recalling that there is no equivalent region/ continent-wide convention aiming for the preservation of the prevailing framework of state territory, as there is in Latin America with the institutionalized acceptance of the principle of uti possidetis, and as there is in Africa following the Organization ofAfrican Unity’s “sacrosanctity” declaration, delivered in Cairo in 1964.

Yet, if the GCC states themselves have done much to get their own house in order in the last decade or so, real territorial challenges surround this regional grouping of states. Although progress towards finalizing the political map on land and sea in the region continues to gather pace in the early spring of 2001, problems linger.

In June 2000, Saudi Arabia and Yemen finally (yet rather suddenly) agreed upon the course of what until then had been Arabia’s last indeterminate land boundary.[414] Then, in July, the same, decisive momentum that Heir Apparent Abdallah of Saudi Arabia had brought to bear in boundary negotiations with Yemen seemingly also broke the long stalemate in the Kingdom’s negotiations with Kuwait over a lateral maritime boundary delimitation in the Persian Gulf. The two sides signed such an agreement on July 2, 2000. The final resolution of Kuwaiti-Saudi maritime disputes also opened the door to the onset during September 2000 of formal negotiations between Iran and Kuwait over an opposite maritime boundary delimitation in northern Gulf waters. Last but not least, the ICJ delivered its verdict on Bahrain-Qatar island and maritime disputes as recently as 16 March 2001.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-11.jpg][Map 13.3 Bahrain Boundary Issues]]

Here, Bahrain emerged largely as the winner since the sovereignty of the Hawar island group—unquestionably, the chief bone of contention in the case— was confirmed as lying with the island state. Effectively, the ICJ has therefore recognized the status quo as far as ownership of the Hawar group is concerned in ratifying Britain's earlier ruling of July 1939. True, Qatari sovereignty over the locality of Zubarah on its north-western shoreline was confirmed though this part of the ruling was every bit as predictable as the court's treatment of the Hawar group. Although including Zubarah in the range of questions to be decided had originally appeared a boon for Bahrain, it is probably more realistic to surmise that by doing so, the ICJ was ensuring that Qatar would at least go home with something when judgement was made. So much for reaffirmation of the status quo in the ICJ judgement.

What about the court's treatment of the disputed shoals and its announcement of a maritime boundary delimitation between the two states? In dealing with these issues, the court arguably had a little more flexibility. Until the judgement of mid-March, both the Dibal andjaradah shoals have been occupied by Bahrain and had previously been recognized as belonging to the island state (albeit within a seabed area provisionally characterized as Qatari) after a British ruling in 1947. The court has now ruled that the Dibal shoal belongs to Qatar but that Jaradah belongs to Bahrain as an island. Such a distinction is important forjaradah's newly-recognized island status has projected the maritime boundary between the states further eastward than would otherwise have been the case. Bahrain probably has more reason to be satisfied with ICJ's maritime delimitation than Qatar.

These positive developments notwithstanding, Iraq's unequivocal acceptance during November 1994 of the earlier UNIKBDC verdict—on the course of its land boundary with Kuwait—will continue to be the subject of close scrutiny. Continuing dialogue is thus needed to ensure that the Lower Gulf islands dispute never becomes more than a symbol of Arab-Iranian rivalry, while the same might be said for the future treatment of the Shatt al-Arab dispute, currently dormant rather than finally settled.

In the end, all of these challenges need monitoring and managing. In addition, substantial attention must also be devoted to the maritime political map, a process that has basically stalled since the mid-1970s. Arguably, there needs to be an inclusive regional structure within which the requisite cooperation to broach these territorial challenges can be nurtured and developed. As discussed above, there are significant existing precedents for cooperation in the area, even if it might probably be asking too much to ever seriously entertain any enlargement of the GCC. Recent Yemeni applications for membership have basically been shelved, while Iran and all GCC member states would probably never be able to agree on the vexed issue of nomenclature. Yet perhaps Iran, Yemen, and, in time, Iraq could realistically play a beneficial role in the GCC's Commission for the Settlement of Disputes, initially as observers, presuming the body is eventually activated. This might just provide the forum needed for closer coordination in territorial and resource issues. It might also provide an inclusive structure in which the more destabilizing aspects of the old "usual suspects" can be closely monitored and freely discussed. After all, if you can't solve them, then manage them!

[382] J.R. V. Prescott, Political Frontiers and Boundaries, London: Unwin Hyman, 1987.

[383] This possible symbolic worth is obviously not a phenomenon restricted to the Gulf, as can be seen by the way the Senkaku/Diaoyutai and the Tok-Do (Liancourt Rocks) disputes are respectively utilized as an outlet for the expression of nationalistic rivalries between Japan, China, Taiwan, and Korea.

[384] Jacques Ancel, Lesfrontieres, Paris: Delagrave, 1938.

[385] .ذا لاًحلألآعلأ, Boundary-making:A Handbook for Statesmen, Treaty-editors and Boundary Commissioners, Washington, DC.: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1945.

[386] "Bloody clashes reported on Saudi-Yemen border," in Yemen News, 28 January 2000.

[387] “UAE, Oman ratify partial border agreement, 27 March 2000,” Reuters, 29 March 2000.

[388] For greater detail, see Richard Schofield, “Boundaries, Territorial Disputes and the GCC States,” in David E. Long and Christian Koch (eds.) Gulf Security in the Twenty-First Century, Abu Dhabi: Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research, 1997, pp. 133–168; see also Richard Schofield, “Finalizing the Arabian Territorial Framework,” in Geopolitics and International Boundary Studies 2:3, winter 1997, pp. 90–105.

[389] Richard Schofield, “Border Disputes in the Gulf: Past, Present and Future,” in Gary G. Sick and Lawrence G. Potter (eds.). The Persian Gulf at the Millennium, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997, p. 129.

[390] Hand-drawn lines linking geographic coordinates on British admiralty charts have generally been appended to maritime boundary delimitation treaties.

[391] John c. Wilkinson, Arabia’s Frontiers: the Story of Britain’s Boundary-Drawing in the Desert, London: I. B. Tauris, 1991, p. xi.

[392] Gulf Cooperation Council, “Closing Statement,” thirteenth annual GCC summit, Abu Dhabi, UAE, December 1992.

[393] Dispatch dated 16 December 1939 from Lacy Baggallay, Foreign Office, to the India Office in the following file held at the Public Record Office, Kew, London: co 732/86/17.

[394] CAen BA£owr-V۵١A١ The End of Empire in the Middle East: Britain’s Relinquishment of Power in Her Last Three Arab Dependencies, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991, p. 127.

[395] Richard Schofield, Unfinished Business: Abu Musa, the Tunbs, Iran and the UAE, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 2000 (forthcoming), chapter 4.

[396] Charles D. Belgrave, Personal Column, London: Hutchinson, 1960, p. 156.

[397] Foreign Office Research Department, “Frontiers in the Lower Persian Gulf,” 16 June 1969, in PROfile: FCO 8/965 (Persian Gulf—territorial problems and boundaries).

[398] Concluding/summarizing remarks made at a conference entitled Security Flashpoints: Oil, Islands, Sea Access and Military Confrontation, convened by the University of Virginia’s Center for Oceans Law and Policy, UN Plaza-Park Hyatt Hotel, New York, 8 February 1997.

[399] For a more detailed exploration of these issues, see Richard Schofield, “Finalizing the Arabian Territorial Framework,” in Geopolitics and International Boundaries 2:3, winter 1997, pp. 98–103.

[400] Richard Schofield, Kuwait and Iraq: Historical Claims and Territorial Disputes, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1993, pp. 24–47 (Hereafter Schofield-Kuwait and Iraq).

[401] Richard Schofield (ed.), The Iraq-Kuwait Dispute, volume 2, Farnham Common: Archive Editions, 1994, pp. 255–358.

[402] David H. Finnie, Shifting Lines in the Sand: Kuwait’s Elusive Frontier with Iraq, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1992, p. 175 (note 2).

[403] For greater detail, see Richard Schofield, “The Historical Problem of Iraqi Access to the Persian Gulf: The Inter-relationships of Territorial Disputes with Iran and Kuwait, 1938–1990,21 in Clive H. Schofield and Richard N. Schofield (eds.). World Boundaries 2: The Middle East and North Africa, London: Routledge, 1994, pp. 158–172.

[404] Schofield-Kuwait and Iraq, pp. 127–132.

[405] Schofield-Kuwait and Iraq, pp. 186–191.

[406] Gerd Nonneman, “The (Geo)political Economy of Iraqi-Kuwaiti Relations,” in Geopolitics and International Boundaries 1:2, autumn 1996, pp. 178–223.

[407] Facsimiles of the original text and associated correspondence reproduced in Thejournal of Foreign Policy, the Institute for Political and International Studies, Tajrish, Teheran, volume 6, 1993, pp. 193–208.

[408] Richard Schofield, “The Last Missing Fence in the Desert: The Saudi-Yemeni Boundary,” in Geopolitics and International Boundaries 1:3, winter 1996, pp. 247–299. For a shorter revised and updated summary of its content, see Richard Schofield, “The International Boundary between Yemen and Saudi Arabia,” in Renaud Detalle (ed.), Tensions inArabia:The Saudi-Yemeni Faultline, Baden-Baden, Germany: Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft, 2000, pp. 15–51.

[409] Gerald Blake, “Shared Zones as a Solution to Problems of Territorial Sovereignty in the Gulf States,l’ in Richard Schofield (ed.). Territorial Foundations of the Gulf States, London: UCL Press, 1994, pp. 200–210 (hereafter Schofield-Territorial Foundations).

[410] For further details, see Richard Schofield, “Borders and Territoriality in the Gulf and Arabian Peninsula during the Twentieth Century,” in Schofield—Territorial Foundations, pp. 1–77.

[411] Ibid.,pp. 55–56.

[412] Ibid.,p. 52.

[413] Rodman Bundy, “Maritime Delimitation in the Gulf,” in Schofield—Territorial Foundations, pp. 182–183.

[414] The Saudi-Yemeni boundary settlement was certainly hailed as a victory for Yemen by its President, Ali Abdallah Saleh. For a map of the delimitation, the text of the agreement, and various upbeat commentaries see Al Thawrah (Sanaa), 22 June 2000. As for the delimitation itself, in the east, it was not incredibly dissimilar to Britain’s old claims for the northern boundary of the Aden Protectorate. This made sense for any delimitation decided upon was always likely to reflect the degree to which territory had been effectively occupied. It was also noticeable that the locality of Wadia in the central borderlands (the scene of a violent border incident in 1969) was confirmed as belonging to Saudi Arabia, while the Red Sea island ofDuwaima (the scene of a much more recent but equally serious clash) was defined as belonging to Yemen. Maybe there was some sort of trade-off in this respect. As for the agreement between the two states, it was notably short in detail when specifying turning points for the delimitation of which—considering the length of the borderlands—there were surprisingly few. Perhaps the window of political opportunity had come before the technical teams were strictly ready to announce the finer detail of any agreement. Here one recalls Yemeni President Saleh’s pragmatic assessment of the Saudi-Yemeni border negotiations back in 1996. He had noted that the territorial dispute would probably only ever be settled by a political decision made at the highest level.

 Chapter 14: The Kuwait-Iraq Border Problem

Hussein Hassouna

This chapter deals essentially with the legal aspects of the Kuwait-Iraq border problem, though it also raises other related regional and worldwide issues of current importance. Reference is first made to the history of the Kuwait-Iraq boundary problem in the light of the 1913, 1923, 1932, and 1963 agreements concerning that boundary. In that context, Iraq's sovereignty claim over Kuwait, which provoked both the 1961 and 1990 crises, is examined in some detail. A description then follows of how the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait was demarcated in 1993, by the United Nations Boundary Demarcation Commission, established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 687 of 1991.[415] A special effort is also made to assess the impact of such demarcation on Kuwaiti-Iraqi ties and the restoration of peace and security in the area. Finally, the remaining contentious issues between the two countries are analyzed, including the consequence of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, the imposition of sanetions on Baghdad, and the topic of Kuwaiti prisoners and missing individuals. The position of both the United Nations and of the League of Arab States on these matters is highlighted.

The chapter concludes with a general appraisal the situation in the region in light of these developments.

* Historical Background of the Border Problem

The Shaykhdom of Kuwait, situated at the head of the Gulf and encircled by Iraq and Saudi Arabia, was under the suzerainty of Ottoman rulers during the nineteenth century. Faced with a growing threat by Russia to their "position" in the Gulf, British authorities secured a general engagement from the ruler of Kuwait, which greatly enhanced their posture in the area. The 1899 agreement— which spelled out London's conditions—required the ruler of Kuwait to obtain British consent prior to ceding, selling, leasing, or giving for occupation any portion of territory to the government or subjects of another power.[416]

Under the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 29 July 1913, the British and Ottoman governments reached agreement on their respective spheres of influence in the Gulf As part of the accord, Turkey recognized the 1899 Anglo-Kuwaiti agreement and pledged not to try to change the Kuwaiti “status quo,” whose northern and western boundaries were formally defined in that Convention for the first time.[417] Thus, Kuwait was separated from the adjacent province of Basra within the Ottoman Empire to the north and west by two lines: a Green Line running from the coast at the mouth of the Khawr Al-Zubair in a northwesterly direction, passing immediately south of Umm Qasr, Safwan, and Jabal Sanam to the Batin, and then southwest down the Batin; as well as a Red Line down the Khawr Abdallah. Both lines depicted the limits of Kuwaiti authority and territorial powers. While the Convention envisaged the creation of a delimitation commission, ostensibly to demarcate the ground boundaries thus defined, such a commission was never set up.[418] In the event, the Convention was never ratified, only to be relegated into oblivion by the outbreak of World War I. Therefore, its boundary definitions were never legally binding on either Britain or Turkey (and, consequently, neither on Kuwait nor Iraq), although they became the basis of future boundary “agreements.”

With the declaration of World War I between Britain and Turkey in November 1914, the Shaykhdom of Kuwait was accorded recognition as “an independent government under British protection.”[419] At the end of the war, the Ottoman Empire was dismembered and a mandate system instituted under Article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant. The three districts of Mosul, Basra, and Baghdad, which formed a part of Mesopotamia, were merged together to constitute the Kingdom of Iraq. The mandate over this “Kingdom” was conferred on Britain. Importantly, in its administration of the mandate, London sought to define Iraq’s boundaries, and, to that end, Sir Percy Cox, then British high commissioner for Iraq, suggested that the Green Line—of the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1913—be confirmed as the boundary between the two “countries.” This was achieved in 1923 through an exchange of letters between the ruler of Kuwait, the British political agent in Kuwait, and the British high commissioner for Iraq, which described the frontier as identical with the frontier indicated by the Green Line in the 1913 Convention.[420]

Just before its admission into the League of Nations in October 1932, Iraq's mandate was "terminated." At the same time, British authorities opted to "reaffirm" the existing frontier between Iraq and Kuwait and, to that end, prodded both Iraqi and Kuwaiti officials to exchange letters. The frontier was "reaffirmed" on the basis of the 1923 definition, through an exchange of letters in July and August 1932 between the Iraqi prime minister and the ruler of Kuwait.[421]

On 19 June 1961, Kuwait's official accession to independence was marked by yet another exchange of letters between the ruler of Kuwait and the British political resident in the Arabian Gulf, Sir William Luce. By virtue of that exchange, Britain conceded the abrogation of the 1899 Anglo-Kuwaiti agreement, which had become "obsolete and inappropriate" and "inconsistent with the sovereignty and independence of Kuwait. "[422] The agreement was replaced by a new accord of friendship and assistance.

On 25 June 1961, six days after the signing of this latest compact, the Iraqi prime minister, General Abdul Karim Qasim, announced his claim to Iraqi sovereignty over Kuwait.[423] He declared that Baghdad refused to recognize the 1899 agreement, on the ground that it was imposed by Britain on Kuwait. Iraq further claimed all of the territory belonging to the district of Kuwait, ostensibly associated with the province of Basra, which should therefore come under its authority. Faced with this situation, the ruler of Kuwait requested British assistance, under the provisions of the 1961 Anglo-Kuwaiti accord. A similar request was made to Saudi Arabia. In response thereto, British and Saudi military forces were dispatched to Kuwait, to defend it from an "imminent assault."[424] When Kuwait subsequently requested support from the League ofArab States (LAS) in defense of its independence, a League force was constituted and sent to Kuwait to replace British troops.[425]

While the presence of the League's force contributed to preserving Kuwaiti independence, the root of the problem, namely Iraq's territorial claims, was only dealt with through a change of government in Baghdad. Starting with the February 1963 change of regime, the Iraqi government adopted—ever so gradually—a new policy toward the Shaykhdom. As a result of improved relations between the two countries, an agreement was concluded between them on 4 October 1963, under which Iraq recognized the independence and sovereignty of Kuwait—and its boundaries—as specified in the 1932 exchange of letters between the then prime minister of Iraq and the ruler of Kuwait.[426]

Although Iraq has occasionally questioned the legal validity of the various international agreements defining its boundary with Kuwait, this issue was squarely addressed by Security Council Resolution 687, on 3 April 1991. To be sure, the resolution was adopted in the aftermath of the Gulf War—that is, after the restoration of Kuwait's sovereignty and independence, which were clearly violated by the 1 August 1990 Iraqi invasion and occupation. Yet, the Security Council noted in its resolution that Iraq and Kuwait had signed specific "MinUtes" on 4 October 1963 formally recognizing the boundary between the two countries, and allocating certain islands to each party. Resolution 687 further acknowledged that Iraq had accepted the independence and sovereignty of Kuwait within defined borders as specified in the 1932 exchange of letters between the then prime minister of Iraq and the ruler of Kuwait.[427] Consequently, the Security Council demanded that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary—and the allocation of islands set out in the 1963 Agreed Minutes—and decided to guarantee the inviolability of that boundary. In his subsequent report to the Council, the United Nations secretary-general reported that Resolution 687 had been accepted by the parties, signifying Iraq's formal acceptance of its international boundary with Kuwait based on the 1963 agreement. Nevertheless, and despite the Security Council's pronouncement— that the 1963 agreement was binding—the affirmation was somewhat unprecedented, which led to the assertion that a legal tribunal such as the International Court ofjustice should have more appropriately determined the validity of such an agreement.[428] Only such an attestation would avoid potential legal or political controversies between the parties.

* Demarcation Of The Iraq-Kuwait Boundary

The Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission was established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 687 of 3 April 1991, which called on the secretary-general of the United Nations to lend his assistance to and make arrangements with both protagonists to demarcate their mutual boundary. As already noted, that boundary had formally been agreed upon, but had never been demarcated.

After consultations with the governments of Iraq and Kuwait, the secretarygeneral did in fact establish the Demarcation Commission, composed of five members—three independent experts appointed by the secretary-general, and one representative each of Iraq and Kuwait—to carry out the necessary technical tasks. The Commission held its first session in New York on 23 May 1991. It presented its Final Report, dated 20 May 1993, to the secretary-general with a list of geographic coordinates demarcating the boundary, along with an “authoritative” map of the area (see Map 14.1).

A preliminary assessment of this United Nations-appointed body reveals that the Commission performed a technical rather than a political task. It has not reallocated territory between Kuwait and Iraq but has carried out the technical task necessary to demarcate—for the first time ever—the precise coordinates of the international boundary, as reaffirmed in the 1963 Agreed Minutes. Thus, the Commission demarcated, in geographic coordinates, the latitude and longitude of the boundary described in the 1963 Agreed Minutes. It also made arrangements for the physical representation of the boundary through the emplacement of a number of boundary pillars or monuments. Finally, it provided for the arrangement, as well as the continued maintenance and accurate location, ofsurface markers.

The Commission therefore successfully completed its task of final demarcation of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, the inviolability of which both countries are committed to respect, and which the United Nations Security Council has pledged to guarantee. Indeed, this particular demarcation has allowed the realignment of the demilitarized zone established along that border, precisely within the newly demarcated international border. Without a doubt, such a demarcation will significantly enhance—in the long term—the stability of the border, thereby contributing to the maintenance of international peace and security in the region.[429]

Not surprisingly, Kuwait was the first to welcome the Commission’s report, maintaining that the end results represented an important achievement for the United Nations. Kuwait perceived the results as a contribution to the promotion of international peace and justice. Iraq, for its part, expressed initial reservations, describing the Commission’s decisions as purely political. Baghdad emphasized that the results were incompatible with international law and justice.[430] Subsequently, the Iraqi government formally confirmed Baghdad’s “recognition” of Kuwait and of the international boundary between the two countries, as demarcated by the Commission.[431] The Security Council in turn welcomed this development.

[[d-j-dr-joseph-a-kechichian-iran-iraq-and-the-arab-12.jpg][Map 14.1 Kuwait-Iraq Border]]

* Remaining Contentions

Despite this successful outcome of the search for a final settlement of the border contest between Iraq and Kuwait, several important questions-arising out of the 1990 crisis—remain as sources of contention not only between Kuwait and Iraq, but also between the latter and the international community. These controversial issues include Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction, the festering implications of the United Nations-imposed sanctions against Baghdad, and the troubling consequences of Kuwaiti citizens either taken as prisoners or missing since 1990.

 Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction

The Security Council first addressed this thorny problem in 1991, under Resolution 687, when it “imposed” strict conditions. Indeed, Iraq was ordered to destroy any such weapons—under international supervision—and not acquire, or develop, new systems. Toward that end, significant progress has been achieved to comply with the provisions of that resolution, although that headway has been deemed as being insufficient. In its Resolution 1284 (17 December 1999), the Security Council concluded that Baghdad failed to meet those conditions that would lift relevant prohibitions imposed against it.

In the opinion of the Security Council, Iraq has failed to implement the United Nations resolutions in full.

The League of Arab States, for its part, has continuously called upon Iraq to carry out its obligations under relevant Security Council resolutions, including those pertaining to the issue of weapons of mass destruction. Still, the LAS advanced that the removal of all weapons of mass destruction from the Middle East region, and above all the Israeli nuclear arsenal, was indispensable for maintaining peace throughout the region.[432] To be sure, this position was similar to the declared intention of the Security Council, as underlined in Resolution 687. In fact, this critical resolution specified that the “actions” requested from Iraq represented steps toward the goal of establishing a zone free from weapons of mass destruction in the entire Middle East.

Yet, and while it has formally denied possessing weapons of mass destruction after its arsenal was destroyed, Iraq has refused to accept the Security Council’s 17 December 1999 resolution 1284. The latter established a new reinforced systern of monitoring, verification, and inspection. Ironically, Kuwait perceived—as declared before the Security Council in December 1999—that Baghdad still possessed weapons of mass destruction and that this remained a source of great concern to the Shaykhdom. Naturally, Kuwait did not trust Iraqi intentions, and believed that such weapons posed a threat to its security and the stability of the Gulf region.[433]

 Sanctions Imposed against Iraq

Equally important, and since 1991, Iraq has been subjected to widespread sanctions that, in turn, have drawn the ire of the international community. Senior leaders in a number of countries have publicly expressed their concerns about the deterioration of the economic and humanitarian conditions of the Iraqi population. Such concerns have led the Security Council to adopt new measures aimed at improving the system established under the so-called oil for food program, to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people (Resolution 1284). The Council further expressed its intention, once satisfied of Iraq’s full cooperation with the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, to suspend for a period of 120 days—renewable by the Council—prohibitions against the export of civilian commodities and products to Iraq.

Baghdad has so far rejected this overture. In fact, Iraq has refused to accept a mere suspension of sanctions, insisting that they should be lifted in their totality because Baghdad allegedly fulfilled previous obligations in toto. In addition to key Western powers, including the United States and Britain—which rejected Baghdad's claims—Kuwait has also expressed certain reservations. Although Kuwait has supported the Security Council's calls for an improvement of the humanitarian situation in Iraq, it has laid full responsibility for the continuation of that suffering on the government of Iraq.

The plight of the Iraqi people, and the urgent need to alleviate their suffering, has been a source of particular concern to the League ofArab States. For the past decade or so, the issue has received constant attention by the League's secretarygeneral, who reports to the LAS Council of Ministers on whatever developments or progress may be observed. For their part, Arab foreign ministers expressed their full solidarity with the suffering Iraqi people, stressing the urgent need to lift sanctions as soon as possible. To that end, the ministers decided at their specially convened meeting of 24 January 1999 to exert collective efforts, in cooperation with the United Nations and especially with the members of the Security Council, to lift economic sanctions imposed on Iraq. LAS foreign ministers proposed a timetable that would rescind sanctions concurrently with a comprehensive review of sanctions, and in accordance with the international obligations, referred to in Security Council resolutions on Iraq. A follow-up committee was established to take concrete action in that regard, but partly due to Iraq's boycott of the process, limited common action has been achieved to date.

 Kuwaiti Prisoners and Missing Persons

A third contention has been the fate of several hundred Kuwaitis missing in the aftermath of the 1991 Gulf War. The Security Council first raised this question of "humanitarian" concerns when it affirmed, under Resolution 687, Iraq’s commitment to facilitate the repatriation of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals. The specific language of the resolution called on Baghdad to extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross in carrying out its mission. Nine years later, no significant progress having been achieved on that score, the Council reaffirmed in Resolution 1284 Iraq’s obligations regarding the repatriation of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals—or their remains. The firm language of the Security Council reiterated Baghdad’s obligation to return all Kuwaiti property including archives seized during the 1990–1991 occupation. Finally, the Security Council requested the secretary-general to report thereon periodically, and to appoint a high-level coordinator for these issues.[434]

The League of Arab States attached similar importance to this thorny contention. In March 1999, the League’s Council of Ministers requested SecretaryGeneral Esmat Abdul Magid to establish a specific mechanism—within the framework of the Security Council resolutions—to help settle the Arab humanitarian problems between Iraq and Kuwait on the one hand, and those between Iraq and Saudi Arabia on the other. The goal of that mechanism was to better support the International Committee of the Red Cross and best assist the latter’s efforts in settling remaining matters.[435]

Various consultations were held under that League mechanism with all parties concerned, but no progress has so far been achieved. To date, Iraq has denied the existence of any remaining Kuwaiti prisoners, and has refrained from providing information about known missing individuals. This has led Kuwait to assert—before the Security Council—that Baghdad was not serious about resolving this humanitarian contention. It called on the Council to pursue the issue with vigor.[436]

* General Appraisal

Clearly, the Kuwait-Iraq border problem—like other border disputes in the Gulf region—not only draws its distant roots from the colonial history of the Middle East but is also laden with serious political rivalries. Most of the Gulf states’ borders have never been accurately demarcated. Not surprisingly, several have turned into sources of conflict between neighboring countries that, at the dawn of the twenty-first century, remain unresolved. Noticeably, the preservation of borders drawn or imposed by colonial powers—on the basis of the principle of uti possidetis—has often failed to ensure regional stability.

Inasmuch as the demarcation of the Kuwait-Iraq border was successfully coneluded by the United Nations—after the 1991 Gulf War—a critical new precedent has been set to diffuse a major source of conflict. Still, several controversial contentions remained, and on their resolution will largely depend the restoration of good-neighborly relations between the two protagonists. This remains a precondition for recovering Arab solidarity among LAS member states. Indeed, few crises have undermined the LAS as severely as has the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. No matter how controversial their differences, or how expedient United Nations-imposed solutions, the reality of the Arab world surely necessitated a fundamental political reappraisal of ties between the warring parties.

Among those pending issues, a solution to the problem of Kuwaiti prisoners and missing persons would open the door for restoring better Kuwaiti-Iraqi relations, and improving the general atmosphere in the Gulf region.

On the other hand, a final resolution of the issue of Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction—in accordance with relevant Security Council resolutions—would certainly increase pressure on Israel to adhere to the 1968 Treaty on the NonProliferation of Nuclear Weapons. Such an action would greatly facilitate the creation of a zone free from all weapons of mass destruction throughout the Middle East, a goal constantly reaffirmed by the United Nations. It might be added that a fair settlement of the “weapons” and “prisoners” problems would undoubtedly lead to the long overdue lifting of United Nations sanctions against Iraq, which in turn would greatly alleviate the serious economic conditions of the Iraqi population.

Finally, the Kuwait-Iraq border problem underscores once more the need to create new regional legal mechanisms for settling legal issues of such nature. Current efforts by the League of Arab States to create an Arab Court ofjustice, for example, and its March 2000 approval to establish a new mechanism for conflict prevention, management, and resolution constitute important steps in that direction.

* United Nations Security Council

RESOLUTION 687 (91)

S/RES/687 (1991)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 2981st meeting, on 3 April 1991.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990,661 (1990) of 6 August 1990,662 (1990) of 9 August 1990,664 (1990) of 18 August 1990,665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990,669 (1990) of 24 September 1990,670 (1990) of 25 September 1990,674 (1990) of29 October 1990, 677 (1990) of28 November 1990, 678 (1990) of29 November 1990 and 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991,

Welcoming the restoration to Kuwait of its sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity and the return of its legitimate Government,

Affirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq, and noting the intention expressed by the Member States cooperating with Kuwait under paragraph 2 of resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end as soon as possible consistent with paragraph 8 of resolution 686 (1991),

Reaffirming the need to be assured of Iraq’s peaceful intentions in the light of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait,

Taking note of the letter sent by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq on 27 February 1991 and those sent pursuant to resolution 686 (1991),

Noting that Iraq and Kuwait, as independent sovereign States, signed at Baghdad on 4 October 1963 “Agreed Minutes Between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq Regarding the Restoration of Friendly Relations, Recognition and Related Matters,” thereby recognizing formally the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait and the allocation of islands, which were registered with the United Nations in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations and in which Iraq recognized the independence and complete sovereignty of the State of Kuwait within its borders as specified and accepted in the letter of the Prime Minister of Iraq dated 21 July 1932, and as accepted by the Ruler of Kuwait in his letter dated 10 August 1932,

Conscious of the need for demarcation of the said boundary,

Conscious also of the statements by Iraq threatening to use weapons in violation of its obligations under the Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War ofAsphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, signed at Geneva on 17 June 1925, and of its prior use of chemical weapons and affirming that grave consequences would follow any further use by Iraq of such weapons,

Recalling that Iraq has subscribed to the Declaration adopted by all States participating in the Conference of States Parties to the 1925 Geneva Protocol and Other Interested States, held in Paris from 7 to 11 January 1989, establishing the objective of universal elimination of chemical and biological weapons,

Recalling also that Iraq has signed the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, of 10 April 1972,

Noting the importance of Iraq ratifying this Convention,

Noting also the importance of all States adhering to this Convention and encouraging its forthcoming Review Conference to reinforce the authority, efficiency and universal scope of the convention,

Stressing the importance of an early conclusion by the Conference on Disarmament of its work on a Convention on the Universal Prohibition of Chemical Weapons and of universal adherence thereto,

Aware of the use by Iraq of ballistic missiles in unprovoked attacks and therefore of the need to take specific measures in regard to such missiles located in Iraq,

Concerned by the reports in the hands of Member States that Iraq has attempted to acquire materials for a nuclear-weapons program contrary to its obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968,

Recalling the objective of the establishment of a nuclear-weapons-free zone in the region of the Middle East,

Conscious of the threat that all weapons of mass destruction pose to peace and security in the area and of the need to work towards the establishment in the Middle East of a zone free of such weapons,

Conscious also of the objective of achieving balanced and comprehensive control of armaments in the region,

Conscious further of the importance of achieving the objectives noted above using all available means, including a dialogue among the States of the region,

Noting that resolution 686 (1991) marked the lifting of the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990) in so far as they applied to Kuwait,

Noting also that despite the progress being made in fulfilling the obligations of resolution 686 (1991), many Kuwaiti and third country nationals are still not accounted for and property remains unreturned,

Recalling the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, opened for signature at New York on 18 December 1979, which categorizes all acts of taking hostages as manifestations of international terrorism,

Deploring threats made by Iraq during the recent conflict to make use of terrorism against targets outside Iraq and the taking of hostages by Iraq,

Taking note with grave concern of the reports of the Secretary-General of 20 March 1991 and 28 March 1991, and conscious of the necessity to meet urgently the humanitarian needs in Kuwait and Iraq,

Bearing in mind its objective of restoring international peace and security in the area as set out in recent resolutions of the Security Council,

Conscious of the need to take the following measures acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Affirms all thirteen resolutions noted above, except as expressly changed below to achieve the goals of this resolution, including a formal cease-fire;

2. Demands that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocation of islands set out in the “Agreed Minutes Between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq Regarding the Restoration of Friendly Relations, Recognition and Related Matters,” signed by them in the exercise of their sovereignty at Baghdad on 4 October 1963 and registered with the United Nations and published by the United Nations in document 7063, United Nations, Treaty Series, 1964:

3. Calls upon the Secretary-General to lend his assistance to make arrangements with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, drawing on appropriate material, including the map transmitted by Security Council document 5/22412 and to report back to the Security Council within one month;

4. Decides to guarantee the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary and to take as appropriate all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting with Iraq and Kuwait, to submit within three days to the Security Council for its approval a plan for the immediate deployment of a United Nations observer unit to monitor the [Khwar] Abd[a]llah and a demilitarized zone, which is hereby established, extending ten kilometers into Iraq and five kilometers into Kuwait from the boundary referred to in the “Agreed Minutes Between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq Regarding the Restoration of Friendly Relations, Recognition and Related Matters” of 4 October 1963; to deter violations of the boundary through its presence in and surveillance of the demilitarized zone; to observe any hostile or potentially hostile action mounted from the territory of one State to the other; and for the Secretary-General to report regularly to the Security Council on the operations of the unit, and immediately if there are serious violations of the zone or potential threats to peace;

6. Notes that as soon as the Secretary-General notifies the Security Council of the completion of the deployment of the United Nations observer unit, the conditions will be established for the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end consistent with resolution 686 (1991):

7. Invites Iraq to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, signed at Geneva on 17 June 1925, and to ratify the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, of 10 April 1972;

8. Decides that Iraq shall unconditionally accept the destruction, removal, or rendering harmless, under international supervision, of:

(a) All chemical and biological weapons and all stocks of agents and all related subsystems and components and all research, development, support and manufacturing facilities;

(1) All ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometers and related major parts, and repair and production facilities;

9. Decides also for the implementation of paragraph 8 above, the following: (a) Iraq shall submit to the Secretary-General, within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution, a declaration of the locations, amounts and types of all items specified in paragraph 8 and agree to urgent, on-site inspection as specified below;

(b) The Secretary-General, in consultation with the appropriate Governments and, where appropriate, with the Director-General of the World Health Organization, within forty-five days of the passage of the present resolution, shall develop, and submit to the Council for approval, a plan calling for the completion of the following acts within forty-five days of such approval:

(i) The forming of a Special Commission, which shall carry out immediate on-site inspection of Iraq's biological, chemical and missile capabilities, based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the special Commission itself;

(ii) The yielding by Iraq of possession to the special Commission for destruction, removal or rendering harmless, taking into account the requirements of public safety, of all items specified under paragraph 8 (a) above, including items at the additional locations designated by the special Commission under paragraph 9 (b) (i) above and the destruction by Iraq, under the supervision of the special Commission, of all its missile capabilities, including launchers, as specified under paragraph 8 (b) above;

(iii) The provision by the Special Commission of the assistance and cooperation to the Director-General of the InternationalAtomic Energy Agency required in paragraphs 12 and 13 below;

10. Decides further that Iraq shall unconditionally undertake not to use, develop, construct or acquire any of the items specified in paragraphs 8 and 9 above and requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Commission, to develop a plan for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with this paragraph, to be submitted to the Security Council for approval within one hundred and twenty days of the passage of this resolution;

11. Invites Iraq to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968;

12. Decides that Iraq shall unconditionally agree not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapons-usable material or any subsystems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities related to the above; to submit to the Secretary-General and the Director-General of the International Atomic Energy Agency within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution a declaration of the locations, amounts, and types of all items specified above; to place all of its nuclear-weapons-usable materials under the exclusive control, for custody and removal, of the International Atomic Energy Agency, with the assistance and cooperation of the special Commission as provided for in the plan of the Secretary-General discussed in paragraph 9 (b) above; to accept, in accordance with the arrangements provided for in paragraph 13 below, urgent on-site inspection and the destruction, removal or rendering harmless as appropriate of all items specified above; and to accept the plan discussed in paragraph 13 below for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of its compliance with these undertakings;

13. Requests the Director-General of the Internationd Atomic Energy Agency, through the Secretary-General, with the assistance and cooperation of the special Commission as provided for in the plan of the Secretary-General in paragraph 9 (b) above, to carry out immediate onsite inspection of Iraq's nuclear capabilities based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the special Commission; to develop a plan for submission to the Security Council within forty-five days calling for the destruction, removal, or rendering harmless as appropriate of all items listed in paragraph 12 above; to carry out the plan within forty-five days following approval by the Security Council; and to develop a plan, taking into account the rights and obligations of Iraq under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968, for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with paragraph 12 above, including an inventory of all nuclear material in Iraq subject to the Agency's verification and inspections to confirm that Agency safeguards cover all relevant nuclear activities in Iraq, to be submitted to the Security Council for approval within one hundred and twenty days of the passage of the present resolution;

14. Notes that the actions to be taken by Iraq in paragraphs 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 of the present resolution represent steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free from weapons of mass destruction and all missiles for their delivery and the objective of a global ban on chemical weapons;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the steps taken to facilitate the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, including a list of any property that Kuwait claims has not been returned or which has not been returned intact;

16. Reaffirms that Iraq, without prejudice to the debts and obligations of Iraq arising prior to 2 August 1990, which will be addressed through the normal mechanisms, is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait;

17. Decides that all Iraqi statements made since 2 August 1990 repudiating its foreign debt are null and void, and demands that Iraq adhere scrupulously to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt;

18. Decides also to create a fund to pay compensation for claims that fall within paragraph 16 above and to establish a Commission that will administer the fund;

19. Directs the Secretary-General to develop and present to the Security Council for decision, no later than thirty days following the adoption of the present resolution, recommendations for the fund to meet the requirement for the payment of claims established in accordance with paragraph 18 above and for a program to implement the decisions in paragraphs 16, 17 and 18 above, including: administration of the fund; mechanisms for determining the appropriate level of Iraq's contribution to the fund based on a percentage of the value of the exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq not to exceed a figure to be suggested to the Council by the Secretary-General, taking into account the requirements of the people of Iraq, Iraq's payment capacity as assessed in conjunction with the international financial institutions taking into consideration external debt service, and the needs of the Iraqi economy; arrangements for ensuring that payments are made to the fund; the process by which funds will be allocated and claims paid; appropriate procedures for evaluating losses, listing claims and verifying their validity and resolving disputed claims in respect of Iraq's liability as specified in paragraph 16 above; and the composition of the Commission designated above;

20. Decides, effective immediately, that the prohibitions against the sale or supply to Iraq of commodities or products, other than medicine and health supplies, and prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto contained in resolution 661 (1990) shall not apply to foodstuffs notified to the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait or, with the approval of that Committee, under the simplified and accelerated "no-objection" procedure, to materials and supplies for essential civilian needs as identified in the report of the Secretary-General dated 20 March 1991, and in any further findings of humanitarian need by the Committee;

21. Decides that the Security Council shall review the provisions of paragraph 20 above every sixty days in the light of the policies and practices of the Government of Iraq, including the implementation of all relevant resolutions of the Security Council, for the purpose of determining whether to reduce or Uft the prohibitions referred to therein;

22. Decides also that upon the approval by the Security Council of the program called for in paragraph 19 above and upon Council agreement that Iraq has completed all actions contemplated in paragraphs 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 above, the prohibitions against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq and the prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto contained in resolution 661 (1990) shall have no further force or effect;

23. Decides further that, pending action by the Security Council under paragraph 22 above, the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) shall be empowered to approve, when required to assure adequate financial resources on the part of Iraq to carry out the activities under paragraph 20 above, exceptions to the prohibition against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq;

24. Decides that, in accordance with resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent related resolutions and until a further decision is taken by the Security Council, all States shall continue to prevent the sale or supply, or the promotion or facilitation of such sale or supply, to Iraq by their nationals, or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of:

(a) Arms and related materiel of all types, specifically including the sale or transfer through other means of all forms of conventional military equipment, including for paramilitary forces, and spare parts and components and their means of production, for such equipment;

(b) Items specified and defined in paragraphs 8 and 12 above not otherwise covered above;

(c) Technology under licensing or other transfer arrangements used in the production, utilization or stockpiling of items specified in subparagraphs (a) and (b) above;

(d) Personnel or materials for training or technical support services relating to the design, development, manufacture, use, maintenance or support of items specified in subparagraphs (a) and (b) above;

25. Calls upon all States and international organizations to act strictly in accordance with paragraph 24 above, notwithstanding the existence of any contracts, agreements, licenses or any other arrangements;

26. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with appropriate Governments, to develop within sixty days, for the approval of the Security Council, guidelines to facilitate full international implementation of paragraphs 24 and 25 above and paragraph 27 below, and to make them available to all States and to establish a procedure for updating these guidelines periodically;

27. Calls upon all States to maintain such national controls and procedures and to take such other actions consistent with the guidelines to be established by the Security Council under paragraph 26 above as may be necessary to ensure compliance with the terms of paragraph 24 above, and calls upon international organizations to take all appropriate steps to assist in ensuring such full compliance;

28. Agrees to review its decisions in paragraphs 22, 23, 24 and 25 above, except for the items specified and defined in paragraphs 8 and 12 above, on a regular basis and in any case one hundred and twenty days following passage of the present resolution, taking into account Iraq's compliance with the resolution and general progress towards the control of armaments in the region;

29. Decides that all States, including Iraq, shall take the necessary measures to ensure that no claim shall lie at the instance of the Government of Iraq, or of any person or body in Iraq, or of any person claiming through or for the benefit of any such person or body, in connection with any contract or other transaction where its performance was affected by reason of the measures taken by the Security Council in resolution 661 (1990) and related resolutions;

30. Decides that, in furtherance of its commitment to facilitate the repatriation of all Kuwaiti and third country nationals, Iraq shall extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross, providing lists of such persons, facilitating the access of the International Committee of the Red Cross to all such persons wherever located or detained and facilitating the search by the International Committee of the Red Cross for those Kuwaiti and third country nationals stiU unaccounted for;

31. Invites the International Committee of the Red Cross to keep the Secretary-General apprised as appropriate of all activities undertaken in connection with facilitating the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third country nationals or their remains present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990:

32. Requires Iraq to inform the Security Council that it will not commit or support any act of international terrorism or allow any organization directed towards commission of such acts to operate within its territory and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts, methods and practices of terrorism;

33. Declares that, upon official notification by Iraq to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions above, a formal cease-fire is effective between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678

34. Decides to remain seized of the matter and to take such further steps as may be required for the implementation of the present resolution and to secure peace and security in the area.

* United Nations Security Council

RESOLUTION 1284 (99)

S/RES/1284 (1999)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 4084th meeting, on 17 December 1999.

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, including its resolutions 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991,707 (1991) of 15August 1991,715 (1991) of 11 October 1991,986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, 1051 (1996) of 27 March 1996, 1153 (1998) of 20 February 1998, 1175 (1998) of 19 June 1998, 1242 (1999) of 21 May 1999 and 1266 (1999) of 4 October 1999,

Recalling the approval by the Council in its resolution 715 (1991) of the plans for future ongoing monitoring and verification submitted by the Secretary General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in pursuance of paragraphs 10 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991),

Welcoming the reports of the three panels on Iraq (5/1999/356) and having held a comprehensive consideration of them-and the recommendations contained in them,

Stressing the importance of a comprehensive approach to the full implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq and the need for Iraqi compliance with these resolutions,

Recalling the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free from weapons of mass destruction and all missiles for their delivery and the objective of a global ban on chemical weapons as referred to in paragraph 14 of resolution 687 (1991),

Concerned at the humanitarian situation in Iraq, and determined to improve that situation,

Recalling with concern that the repatriation and return of all Kuwaiti and third country nationals or their remains, present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990, pursuant to paragraph 2 (c) of resolution 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991 and paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991), have not yet been fully carried out by Iraq,

Recalling that in its resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991) the Council demanded that Iraq return in the shortest possible time all Kuwaiti property it had seized, and noting with regret that Iraq has still not complied fully with this demand,

Acknowledging the progress made by Iraq towards compliance with the provisions of resolution 687 (1991), but noting that, as a result of its failure to implement the relevant Council resolutions fully, the conditions do not exist which would enable the Council to take a decision pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) to lift the prohibitions referred to in that resolution,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait, Iraq and the neighboring States,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, and taking into account that operative provisions of this resolution relate to previous resolutions adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Decides to establish, as a subsidiary body of the Council, the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) which replaces the special Commission established pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) of resolution 687 (1991):

2. Decides also that UNMOVIC will undertake the responsibilities mandated to the special Commission by the Council, with regard to the verification of compliance by Iraq with its obligations under paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 687 (1991) and other related resolutions, that UNMOVIC will establish and operate, as was recommended by the panel on disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues, a reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, which will implement the plan approved by the Council in resolution 715 (1991) and address unresolved disarmament issues, and that UNMOVIC will identify, as necessary in accordance with its mandate, additional sites in Iraq to be covered by the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification;

3. Reaffirms the provisions of the relevant resolutions with regard to the role of the IAEA in addressing compliance by Iraq with paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991) and other related resolutions, and requests the Director General of the IAEA to maintain this role with the assistance and cooperation of UNMOVIC;

4. Reaffirms its resolutions 687 (1991), 699 (1991), 707 (1991), 715 (1991), 1051 (1996), 1154 (1998) and all other relevant resolutions and statements of its President, which establish the criteria for Iraqi compliance, affirms that the obligations of Iraq referred to in those resolutions and statements with regard to cooperation with the special Commission, unrestricted access and provision of information will apply in respect of UNMOVIC, and decides in particular that Iraq shall allow UNMOVIC teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transport which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of UNMOVIC, as well as to all officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom UNMOVIC wishes to interview so that UNMOVIC may fully discharge its mandate;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, within 30 days of the adoption of this resolution, to appoint, after consultation with and subject to the approval of the Council, an Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC who will take up his mandated tasks as soon as possible, and, in consultation with the Executive Chairman and the Council members, to appoint suitably qualified experts as a College of Commissioners for UNMOVIC which will meet regularly to review the implementation of this and other relevant resolutions and provide professional advice and guidance to the Executive Chairman, including on significant policy decisions and on written reports to be submitted to the Council through the Secretary-General;

6. Requests the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, within 45 days of his appointment, to submit to the Council, in consultation with and through the Secretary-General, for its approval an organizational plan for UNMOVIC, including its structure, staffing requirements, management guidelines, recruitment and training procedures, incorporating as appropriate the recommendations of the panel on disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues, and recognizing in particular the need for an effective, cooperative management structure for the new organization, for staffing with suitably qualified and experienced personnel, who would be regarded as international civil servants subject to Article 100 of the Charter of the United Nations, drawn from the broadest possible geographical base, including as he deems necessary from international arms control organizations, and for the provision of high quality technical and cultural training;

7. Decides that UNMOVIC and the IAEA, not later than 60 days after they have both started work in Iraq, will each draw up, for approval by the Council, a work program for the discharge of their mandates, which will include both the implementation of the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, and the key remaining disarmament tasks to be completed by Iraq pursuant to its obligations to comply with the disarmament requirements of resolution 687 (1991) and other related resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance, and further decides that what is required of Iraq for the implementation of each task shall be clearly defined and precise;

8. Requests the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director General of the IAEA, drawing on the expertise of other international organizations as appropriate, to establish a unit which will have the responsibilities of the joint unit constituted by the special Commission and the Director General of the IAEA under paragraph 16 of the export/import mechanism approved by resolution 1051 (1996), and also requests the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, in consultation with the Director General of the IAEA, to resume the revision and updating of the lists of items and technology to which the mechanism applies;

9. Decides that the Government of Iraq shall he liable for the full costs of UNMOVIC and the IAEA in relation to their work under this and other related resolutions on Iraq;

10. Requests Member States to give full cooperation to UNMOVIC and the IAEA in the discharge of their mandates;

11. Decides that UNMOVIC shall take over all assets, liabilities and archives of the Special Commission, and that it shall assume the Special Commission's part in agreements existing between the special Commission and Iraq and between the United Nations and Iraq, and affirms that the Executive Chairman, the Commissioners and the personnel serving with UNMOVIC shall have the rights, privileges, facilities and immunities of the special Commission;

12. Requests the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC to report, through the Secretary-General, to the Council, following consultation with the Commissioners, every three months on the work of UNMOVIC, pending submission of the first reports referred to in paragraph 33 below, and to report immediately when the reinforced system of ongoing monitqring and verification is fully operational in Iraq;

13. Reiterates the obligation of Iraq, in furtherance of its commitment to facilitate the repatriation of all Kuwaiti and third country nationals referred to in paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991), to extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross, and calls upon the Government of Iraq to resume cooperation with the Tripartite Commission and Technical Subcommittee established to facilitate work on this issue;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every four months on compliance by Iraq with its obligations regarding the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third country nationals or their remains, to report every six months on the return of all Kuwaiti property, including archives, seized by Iraq, and to appoint a high-level coordinator for these issues;

15. Authorizes States, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs 3 (a), 3 (b) and 4 of resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent relevant resolutions, to permit the import of any volume of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly relating thereto, as required for the purposes and on the conditions set out in paragraph 1 (a) and (b) and subsequent provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

16. Underlines, in this context, its intention to take further action, including permitting the use of additional export routes for petroleum and petroleum products, under appropriate conditions otherwise consistent with the purpose and provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

17. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to approve, on the basis of proposals from the Secretary-General, lists of humanitarian items, including foodstuffs, pharmaceutical and medical supplies, as well as basic or standard medical and agricultural equipment and basic or standard educational items, decides, notwithstanding paragraph 3 of resolution 661 (1990) and paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), that supplies of these items will not be submitted for approval of that Committee, except for items subject to the provisions of resolution 1051 (1996), and will be notified to the Secretary-General and financed in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 8 (a) and 8 (1) of resolution 986 (1995), and requests the Secretary-General to inform the Committee in a timely manner of all such notifications received and actions taken;

18. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to appoint, in accordance with resolutions 1175 (1998) and 1210 (1998), 2 group of experts, including independent inspection agents appointed by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 986 (1995), decides that this group will be mandated to approve speedily contracts for the parts and the equipment necessary to enable Iraq to increase its exports of petroleum and petroleum products, according to lists of parts and equipment approved by that Committee for each individual project, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide for the monitoring of these parts and equipment inside Iraq;

19. Encourages Member States and international organizations to provide supplementary humanitarian assistance to Iraq and published material of an educational character to Iraq;

20. Decides to suspend, for an initial period of six months from the date of the adoption of this resolution and subject to review, the implementation of paragraph 8 (9) of resolution 986 (1995):

21. Requests the Secretary-General to take steps to maximize, drawing as necessary on the advice of specialists, including representatives of international humanitarian organizations, the effectiveness of the arrangements set out in resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions including the humanitarian benefit to the Iraqi population in all areas of the country, and further requests the Secretary-General to continue to enhance as necessary the United Nations observation process in Iraq, ensuring that all supplies under the humanitarian program are utilized as authorized, to bring to the attention of the Council any circumstances preventing or impeding effective and equitable distribution and to keep the Council informed of the steps taken towards the implementation of this paragraph;

22. Requests also the Secretary-General to minimize the cost of the United Nations activities associated with the implementation of resolution 986 (1995) as well as the cost of the independent inspection agents and the certified public by him, in accordance with paragraphs 6 and 7 of resolution 986 (1995):

25. Requests further the Secretary-General to provide Iraq and the committee established by resolution 661 (1990) with a daily statement of the status of the escrow account established by paragraph 7 of resolution 986 (1995):

26. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements, subject to Security Council approval, to allow funds deposited in the escrow account established by resolution 986 (1995) to he used for the purchase of locally produced goods and to meet the local cost for essential civilian needs which have been funded in accordance with the provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions, including, where appropriate, the cost of installation and training services;

27. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) to take a decision on all applications in respect of humanitarian and essential civilian needs within a target of two working days of receipt of these applications from the Secretary-General, and to ensure that all approval and notification letters issued by the Committee stipulate delivery within a specified time, according to the nature of the items to be supplied, and requests the Secretary-General to notify the Committee of all applications for humanitarian items which are included in the list to which the export/import mechanism approved by resolution 1051 (1996) applies;

28. Decides that Hajj pilgrimage flights which do not transport cargo into or out of Iraq are exempt from the provisions of paragraph 3 of resolution 661 (1990) and resolution 670 (1990), provided timely notification of each flight is made to the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements, for approval by the Security Council, to provide for reasonable expenses related to the Hajj pilgrimage to be met by funds in the escrow account established by resolution 986 (1995):

29. Calls upon the Government of Iraq:

(i) to take all steps to ensure the timely and equitable distribution of all humanitarian goods, in particular medical supplies, and to remove and avoid delays at its warehouses;

(ii) to address effectively the needs of vulnerable groups, including children, pregnant women, the disabled, the elderly and the mentally ill among others, and to allow freer access, without any discrimination, including on the basis of religion or nationality, by United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to all areas and sections of the population for evaluation of their nutritional and humanitarian condition;

(iii) to prioritize applications for humanitarian goods under the arrangements set out in resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

(iv) to ensure that those involuntarily displaced receive humanitarian assistance without the need to demonstrate that they have resided for six months in their places of temporary residence;

(v) to extend full cooperation to the United Nations Office for Project Services mine-clearance program in the three northern Governorates of Iraq and to consider the initiation of the de-mining efforts in other Governorates;

30. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the progress made in meeting the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people and on the revenues necessary to meet those needs, including recommendations on necessary additions to the current allocation for oil spare parts and equipment, on the basis of a comprehensive survey of the condition of the Iraqi oil production sector, not later than 60 days from the date of the adoption of this resolution and updated thereafter as necessary;

31. Expresses its readiness to authorize additions to the current allocation for oil spare parts and equipment, on the basis of the report and recommendations requested in paragraph 28 above, in order to meet the humanitarian purposes set out in resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

32. Requests the Secretary-General to establish a group of experts, including oil industry experts, to report within 100 days of the date of adoption of this resolution on Iraq’s existing petroleum production and export capacity and to make recommendations, to be updated as necessary, on alternatives for increasing Iraq’s petroleum production and export capacity in a manner consistent with the purposes of relevant resolutions, and on the options for involving foreign oil companies in Iraq’s oil sector, including investments, subject to appropriate monitoring and controls;

33. Notes that in the event of the Council acting as provided for in paragraph 33 of this resolution to suspend the prohibitions referred to in that paragraph, appropriate arrangements and procedures will need, subject to paragraph 35 below, to be agreed by the Council in good time beforehand, including suspension of provisions of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions;

34. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the implementation of paragraphs 15 to 30 of this resolution within 30 days of the adoption of this resolution;

35. Expresses its intention, upon receipt of reports from the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and from the Director General of the IAEA that Iraq has cooperated in all respects with UNMOVIC and the IAEA in particular in fulfilling the work programs in all the aspects referred to in paragraph 7 above, for a period of 120 days after the date on which the Council is in receipt of reports from both UNMOVIC and the IAEA that the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification is fully operational, to suspend with the fundamental objective of improving the humanitarian situation in Iraq and securing the implementation of the Council’s resolutions, for a period of 120 days renewable by the Council, and subject to the elaboration of effective financial and other operational measures to ensure that Iraq does not acquire prohibited items, prohibitions against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq, and prohibitions against the sale, supply and delivery to Iraq of civilian commodities and products other than those referred to in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991) or those to which the mechanism established by resolution 1051 (1996) applies;

36. Decides that in reporting to the Council for the purposes of paragraph 33 above, the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC will include as a basis for his assessment the progress made in completing the tasks referred to in paragraph 7 above;

37. Decides that if at any time the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC or the Director General of the IAEA reports that Iraq is not cooperating in all respects with UNMOVIC or the IAEA or if Iraq is in the process of acquiring any prohibited items, the suspension of the prohibitions referred to in paragraph 33 above shall terminate on the fifth working day following the report, unless the Council decides to the contrary;

38. Expresses its intention to approve arrangements for effective financial and other operational measures, including on the delivery of and payment for authorized civilian commodities and products to be sold or supplied to Iraq, in order to ensure that Iraq does not acquire prohibited items in the event of suspension of the prohibitions referred to in paragraph 33 above, to begin the elaboration of such measures not later than the date of the receipt of the initial reports referred to in paragraph 33 above, and to approve such arrangements before the Council decision in accordance with that paragraph;

39. Further expresses its intention to take steps, based on the report and recommendations requested in paragraph 30 above, and consistent with the purpose of resolution 986 (1995) and related resolutions, to enable Iraq to increase its petroleum production and export capacity, upon receipt of the reports relating to the cooperation in all respects with UNMOVIC and the IAEA referred to in paragraph 33 above;

40. Reaffirms its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991) on the termination of prohibitions referred to in that resolution;

41. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter and expresses its intention to consider action in accordance with paragraph 33 above no later than 12 months from the date of the adoption of this resolution provided the conditions set out in paragraph 33 above have been satisfied by Iraq.

Notes

This paper was prepared by its author in his private capacity.

[415] United Nations, Security Council, Resolution 687 (1991), New York, 1991. The resolution is reproduced as Appendix 1.

[416] Jill Crystal, Kuwait: The Transformation of an Oil State, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1992, pp. 11–13.

[417] J· B. Kelly, Arabia, the Gulf and the West, New York: Basic Books, Inc., 1980, pp. 168–72.

[418] Frederick F. Anscombe, The Ottoman Gulf: The Creation of Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Qatar, New York: Columbia University Press, 1997, pp. 113–42.

[419] لآ. Hui. للأفدالة, The Arabian Gulf States:Their Legal and Political Status and Their International Problems, Beirut: Librairie du Liban, 1978, p. 254.

[420] Ibid.,pp. 254–57.

[421] Ibid.,p. 256.

[422] David H. Finnie, Shifting Lines in the Sand: Kuwait’s Elusive Frontier with Iraq, London: I. B. Tauris and Company, Ltd., 1992, pp. 126–32.

[423] Ibid.,pp. 132–34.

[424] Charles w. Koburgerjr., “The Kuwait Confrontation of 1961,” United States Naval Institute Proceedings 100:1, January 1974, pp. 42–9.

[425] Hussein A. Hassouna, The League ofArab States and Regional DisputeszA Study of Middle East Conflicts, Dobbs Ferry, New York: Oceana, 1975, pp. 98–107.

[426] Finnie, op. cit., pp. 149–51.

[427] Resolution 687, op. cit.

[428] M. H. Mendelson and s. c. Hulton, “The Iraq-Kuwait Boundary: Legal Aspects,” Revue Beige de Droit International 2,1990, p. 294.

[429] United Nations, Security Council, “Final Report on the Demarcation of the International Boundary Between the Republic of Iraq and the State of Kuwait by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission,” S/25811 (20 May 1993), New York, 21 May 1993.

[430] United Nations, Security Council, “Letter dated 21 May 1992 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Iraq addressed to the Secretary General of the United Nations,” 5/24044 (1999), New York: 17 December 1999.

[431] “Letter dated 12 November 1994 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Iraq addressed to the Secretary General of the United Nations,” 5/19994/1288, New York: 14 November 1994. The content of this letter may explain the reason why Iraq changed its position on the issue. As stated, it proceeded from the premise that the Security Council would follow up in the implementation of its resolutions, based on the principles ofjustice and fairness, principally through the lifting of the comprehensive embargo.

[432] League of Arab States, “Statement adopted by the Arab Ministers for Foreign Affairs,” Cairo, Egypt: 24 January 1999.

[433] United Nations, Security Council, “Statement by the Representative of Kuwait before the Security Council,” 5/4084, New York: 17 December 1999.

[434] United Nations, Security Council, S/RES/1284 (1999), New York: 17 December 1999 (see Appendix 2). Ambassador Yuri Vorontsov was appointed for that purpose, and the first report on his activities was submitted to the Security Council on 26 April 2000. See United Nations, Security Council, 5/2000/347, New York: 2000.

[435] League of Arab States, “Council Resolution Number 5837,” 3rd Ordinary Session, Cairo, Egypt: 18 March 1999. Pursuant to this resolution, the League’s secretary-general has conducted high-level consultations on that issue with the United Nations secretary-general, the special United Nations coordinator Ambassador Vorontsov, the president of the International Committee of the Red Cross, and Kuwaiti, Saudi, and Iraqi officials.

[436] “Statement by the Representative of Kuwait,” 5/4084, op. cit.

 Chapter 15: Yemeni-Saudi Relations Gone Awry

Mohammed A. Zabarah

The Yemeni-Saudi relationship has been a major topic to scholars, policy decision makers, and legalists for several reasons: first, because of the enormous amount of oil on the Arabian Peninsula (nearly 57 percent of the world's oil originates from the littoral states of the Arabian Gulf) and the intense world interest in maintaining security and stability in the region; second, because of the need to see that the "new world order," which calls for the normalization of relations between states, progresses; and third, because Yemeni-Saudi relations have been kept a hostage to the border dispute between them for the past six decades. This has occurred despite the fact that both Arab states have attempted to downplay their contentiousness by emphasizing their intrinsic cultural bonds and their Islamic roots.

It is within this context that the Yemeni-Saudi border dispute is best analyzed. This chapter does not purport to examine the legal aspects of the dispute. Rather, it evaluates its implications in the formulation and conduct of the two states' policies toward each other. Toward this objective, the study analyzes the relationship between the two states by identifying the perceptions each state has of the other, and how those perceptions influence the course of their relationship. The hypothesis contends that the perceptions of the Yemeni governments of Saudi Arabia—which evolved after the Yemeni revolution of 26 September 1962—have been less coherent and more antagonistic.

Following a brief background of the Yemeni-Saudi relationship immediately after the two states became independent, the study will focus on the 1934 Taif Agreement, and how it impacted the relationship between the two neighbors. It will then devote its attention to the ramifications of the political changes that evolved in Yemen, and their impact on the Yemeni/Saudi relationship. Finally, it will examine the consequences of the Yemeni policy during the second Gulf Crisis and the subsequent Gulf War (1991), and how that policy affected the border issues between the two.

* The 1934 Taif Agreement

The 1934 Taif Agreement between Yemen and Saudi Arabia officially ended the brief war between the two states. It is considered the benchmark that has defined their relationship since then. In fact, the war was the culmination of initial confrontational contacts, which began as soon as the Ottoman rule of the Arabian Peninsula ended in 1918. Importantly, the agreement was the first treaty between two Arab states, and it impelled both to curtail their differences to ensure their security and independence.

Inasmuch as the confrontational aspect of Yemeni/Saudi ties was directly related to mutual claims on Asir, the province situated south of the Hejaz in the southwestern part of the Arabian Peninsula and bordering on the Red Sea, all subsequent contacts may be understood through the value attached to that strategic territory. The area is larger than Jordan and Lebanon put together. In 1828, Asir fell to Ottoman occupation, and was treated as a semi-autonomous region. When Ottoman rule ended in 1918, Muhammed al-Idrisi, then ruler over the territory, became titular head of the province. Encouraged by both Italy and Britain, which provided him with arms and money, al-Idrisi adopted a policy aimed at establishing Asir as an independent, sovereign state. Britain went so far as to hand al-Idrisi the port city of Hodeidah after bombarding and occupying it in 1918. As a result of al-Idrisi's policies, an open conflict ensued with Imam Yahyah of Yemen, who ruled over the Mutawakilite Kingdom of Yemen.[437]

Imam Yahyah quickly sent his armies to recapture Hudaydah, and began his march into Asir. Ali al-Idrisi, who succeeded his father in 1922, was unable to forestall the advances of the Imam's forces. He, thereupon, proposed an agreement to the Imam recognizing the latter's interests in Asir. Al-Idrisi was willing to pay homage to the Imam and defer to him the rights to be an arbitrator on all issues other than political questions. Still, his proposal fell short of accepting the Imam's outright political control over Asir Province. [438] In the event, and when the Imam rejected this proposal, al-Idrisi entered into negotiations with King Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman Al Saud in Saudi Arabia. King Abdul Aziz, like Imam Yahyah, had been preoccupied with the pacification of the Hejaz. He had marched westward from Riyadh, his capital, to recapture the entire Hejaz, including Makkah and Madinah, the two holiest cities in Islam. In doing so, he established himself as a major power player on the Arabian Peninsula.

These “negotiations” between al-Idrisi and King Abdul Aziz resulted in the 1926 Makkah Treaty that transformed Asir into a “Protectorate.”[439] Al-Idrisi waived an independent foreign policy, but retained autonomy in internal affairs. Although Imam Yahyah eventually rejected the Makkah Treaty, he was careful not to provoke King Abdul Aziz. In fact, the Yemeni leader was involved in border clashes with British forces stationed in Aden and the Protectorates. These clashes persuaded the Imam that the British presence in Aden was far more dangerous to his independence than King Abdul Aziz. To his credit, nevertheless, Imam Yahyah was cognizant of the close relationship between the Saudi leader and London, and fearful that the Saudi-British connection could possibly target his rule in Yemen.

The Yemeni-Saudi relationship took a turn for the worst in 1930, when Al-Idrisi began to renege on his commitments to the Makkah Treaty. He also began to move closer to Imam Yahyah. In response, King Abdul Aziz was impelled to abrogate the treaty, and al-Idrisi sought political asylum from Imam Yahyah. The latter granted this request and, thus, became al-Idrisi’s protector. Encouraged by this new development, Imam Yahyah seized the opportunity to help the Yam tribe in Asir, an offshoot of the Yemeni Hamdan tribe, and sent his troops into the province to occupy the city ofNajran. Attempts by both sides to resolve this dispute continued through 1933. Both the Imam and King Abdul Aziz exchanged letters and sent delegations to each other’s capitals. All attempts ended in failure. By the end of 1933, tensions between the two countries intensified, largely because al-Idrisi raised the banner of revolt against King Abdul Aziz and, not unexpectedly, Saudi forces in Asir were reinforced. In early 1934, a Saudi ultimatum was sent to the Imam. It demanded the immediate evacuation of all Yemeni forces from Asir, the restoration of the earlier “borders” (implying Yemeni evacuation from Najran), and the extradition of al-Idrisi to Saudi Arabia.

Imam Yahyah ignored the ultimatum as clashes erupted between the two protagonists. The brief war led to the defeat of Yemeni forces and induced the Imam to accept the Taif Agreement, which was mediated by several Arab states. The agreement itself comprised 23 articles and included the three points contained in the Saudi ultimatum. Al-Idrisi was extradited to Saudi Arabia, Yemeni forces were evacuated from Asir, and Najran was relinquished to the Kingdom. Article 22 specifically stated that the agreement was binding for 20 years, subject to renewal.[440]

During these early contacts between Imam Yahyah and King Abdul Aziz, the two men exchanged several communications concerning the border disputes. All exchanges reiterated the Muslim character of both states and emphasized the need for an amicable resolution of existing differences. Still, each ruler perceived the other as too closely associated with an outside power, as Yemen was uneasy over the close Saudi ties to Britain. The Yemeni leadership believed that King Abdul Aziz would not have defeated Sharif Hussein of the Hejaz had it not been for British military and political support. Indeed, the Yemeni government further believed that King Abdul Aziz relied upon British support to “deal with Al-Idrisi.” According to the Imam, London welcomed the Makkah Treaty, because it absolved the British from honoring their commitments to al-Idrisi.[441] Moreover, the border clashes between Yemen and British forces in Aden and the Protectorates helped King Abdul Aziz consolidate his control in Asir. At the same time, it augmented the Saudi’s military capabilities, vis-â-vis Yemen. According to the Yemeni leadership, the tone of the ultimatum, and the quick Saudi military victory over Yemen, indicated close Saudi-British cooperation.[442]

Saudi Arabia was similarly convinced that there was close cooperation between the Yemeni government and Italy. Riyadh considered Italian-Yemeni relations as a threat to the interests of Saudi Arabia and a destabilizing factor in the region, specifically, King Abdul Aziz was troubled by the Italian assistance to the Imam, in the form of arms and money.[443] He was convinced that Rome was eager to supplement its colonial possessions on the other side of the Red Sea (in Eritrea), by enhancing its putative influence in Yemen. The King was politically astute enough to place blame—for the differences between him and the Imam— on the Italians. He insisted, for example, that Italian influence on the Imam’s government was hindering attempts by the two neighboring governments to formulate a border agreement.[444]

Consequently, the Taif Agreement settled Saudi-Yemeni differences in Asir, and occasioned a relationship based on mutual recognition of their interests. From 1934 until 1962, Yemen and Saudi Arabia cooperated in formulatingjoint Arab policies and maintained healthy ties. The exception occurred in 1958 when Yemen joined the United Arab Republic in a confederation. The alignment between Yemen and revolutionary Egypt made Saudi Arabia somewhat uneasy, but it did not negatively affect their relationship. This can be attributed to the fact that both political systems were traditional and monarchical. As a leading Saudi scholar observed,

The political system of a country is undoubtedly a major determinant in its foreign policy behavior. Accordingly, the more closely one country's political system resembles that of another, the greater the degree of mutual understanding which can be expected between them. Conversely, as the differences between the political systems widen, so do their chances for misunderstanding.[445]

Indeed, neither Saudi Arabia nor Yemen viewed each other with hostility, or with misgivings. On the contrary, King Abdul Aziz felt that the Yemenis were "brothers" to the Saudis, and deserving of his support. He maintained that attitude throughout the remainder of his life. When Imam Yahyah was killed in the abortive 1948 coup d'etat, King Abdul Aziz was furious. Shortly thereafter, he formulated a policy that was antagonistic to the insurrectionists, and favorable to Imam Yahyah's successor, Imam Ahmed. [446] The 1934 Taif Agreement was renewed in 1954, further illustrating the strong ties between the two countries. Throughout this period, Riyadh represented Sanaa's diplomatic interests where Yemen had no established missions.

* Political Changes in Yemen

The Yemeni revolution of 26 September 1962 profoundly changed the political landscape on the Arabian Peninsula. It ushered into the region a new form of government, the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR), and a new era of configurations and new concepts that wreaked havoc with regional security. In short, it made the area susceptible to incoherence, initially introduced by the revolution itself, and shortly thereafter by the introduction of Egyptian troops into Yemen on behalf of the revolutionaries. The relationship between republican Yemen and Saudi Arabia became strained and antagonistic. The YAR was now an ally of the “progressive” revolutionary Arab movement. Led by Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt, the Arab movement called for pan-Arabism and the overthrow of the monarchical systems throughout the Arab world, which were defined as reactionary, anachronistic, and not representative of Arab masses. Republican Yemen was, like Egypt, calling for the overthrow of the Saudi establishment.

During the Yemeni civil war, which lasted from 1962 to 1970, the YAR and Saudi Arabia were at loggerheads. Although both states viewed each other with suspicion and misgivings, Yemeni perceptions of Saudi Arabia proved to be more volatile and highly emotional. Yemeni revolutionary leaders lambasted Saudi Arabia with vehemence, portraying it as anachronistic, reactionary, and a puppet of the United States. They even threatened Riyadh with a massive air strike. Saudi leaders, on the other hand, were far more concerned with the estimated 80,000 Egyptian troops in Yemen. By 1965, the Egyptian presence in the YAR represented the greater threat to the security and interests of the Kingdom. According to a well-placed Saudi analyst,

The presence of Egyptian forces in Yemen was perceived by Saudi Arabia as an act of aggression aimed at more than merely controlling Yemen or even driving the British from Aden and the Protectorates. The troops, especially in view of Nasser’s verbal attacks on monarchical systems in the Arab world, and his threat to attack Saudi Arabia, represented a clear danger to SaudiArabia.[447]

Saudi fears of whatever intentions Egypt and republican Yemen represented were heightened when President Abdallah Sallal of the YAR “publicly announced his intention to extend a republican form of government to the entire Arabian Peninsula. ”[448] Saudi policy, as formulated by Riyadh two years after the Yemeni revolution, was to contain the conflict to Yemen proper, thereby avoiding a spillover into Saudi Arabia.

Following the 1967 Six-Day War, Egyptian troops were withdrawn from Yemen, and in accordance with the 1968 Khartoum Agreement between Egypt and Saudi Arabia, Riyadh focused greater attention on events occurring in Aden. Earlier, Britain had agreed to withdraw from Aden and the Protectorates by 1968, which, not surprisingly, led to a struggle between two rivals for power in South Yemen. Starting in 1964, the Front for the Liberation of South Yemen (FLOSY) and the National Liberation Front (NLF) gained in popularity and influence. The contest culminated in the defeat of FLOSY, whose members fled to North Yemen. The NLF was quick to form a new government, which was Marxist in orientation and antagonistic to all the states in the region. Aden then called for the spread of socialism throughout the Arabian Peninsula, a development that clearly implied the region would be unstable. To Saudi Arabia this was a foreboding trend that threatened intrinsic regional interests. Indeed, Riyadh drew clear lessons from the Egyptian intervention in Yemen, and was persuaded that its “security and that of the Red Sea would be threatened if Sanaa were controlled by an unfriendly regime.”[449] There was a perceptible recognition by the Kingdom to adopt a conciliatory stand vis-â-vis the YAR. Sanaa had also viewed events in South Yemen with alarm. Both states’ apprehensions were further intensified when the radical wing of the South Yemeni Communist Party, led by Salem Rubai Ali and Abdul Fattah Ismail, took power in 1969. Ali and Ismail formed a radical political organization, the National Democratic Front (NDF), composed of North Yemeni leftists, to undertake subversive activities against the YAR. On the heels of epoch-making developments in South Yemen, Riyadh and Sanaa adopted a policy of rapprochement. Eventually, this led to diplomatic recognition of the YAR by Saudi Arabia, in 1970.

In the end, the conflict between the YAR and the People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) was essentially a political and ideological rivalry. Both regimes emerged from similar roots and both shared a nation. In fact, both regimes had attempted to unite in one form or another ever since the British withdrawal from Aden. Nonetheless, the complexity in their rivalry stemmed from the fact that the PDRY became a Marxist-Leninist system closely associated with the Soviet Union and antagonistic to both the YAR and Saudi Arabia.[450] The YAR, on the other hand, had become less revolutionary and less radical, and far more cooperative with Saudi Arabia.

To counter the PDRY’s enmity to both Sanaa and Riyadh, both states agreed to form a counter-insurgency movement in South Yemen, composed of former members of FLOSY. Before long, South Yemeni dissidents spread havoc in Marxist PDRY. The situation deteriorated rapidly and developed into an open war between the two Yemens in September 1972.[451]

This latest confrontation was short-lived and was fought to a military standstill. Both parties had overtaxed themselves with continuous military challenges and were, to put it mildly, unwilling to pursue such a path. Under the auspices of the League ofArab States (LAS), both Yemens signed the Tripoli Agreement on 28 October 1972, whereby both Sanaa and Aden agreed to a cease-fire. A proviso calling for unity between the two states within one year of signing was also initialed. The agreement, however, failed to achieve stated objectives because of: ε’(1), the ideological chasm separating the PDRY and the YAR, (2), the clash of personal rivalries between their leaderships for dominant political influence in any settlement, and, (3), opposition within each state to the unification in any settlement.”[452] More importantly, the Soviet Union stood against such a union. In the event, the Kremlin believed that unity between Sanaa and Aden could conceivably lead to the termination of Soviet influence and prestige on the Arabian Peninsula. It became, therefore, a fundamental Soviet policy to oppose any unification movements between the two Yemens. Yemeni leftists and Baathists in prominent government position were encouraged by Moscow to place the onus of the failure to unite on Saudi opposition. Leading Arabist writers fueled this contention further by insisting that Saudi Arabia was opposed to unity. They also projected Riyadh as being “insensitive,” “heavy-handed,” and “indifferent” to Yemen.[453] Not surprisingly, such views influenced Yemeni perceptions of Saudi Arabia, especially when the border issue was raised.

In compliance with Article 22 of the Taif Agreement, Riyadh raised the renewal issue with Sanaa in 1974. Since Saudi Arabia and the YAR were on excellent terms at the time, the renewal question was not seen as being a problem. Prime Minister Abdallah al-Hajri, who was on good terms with leading Saudi officials, did not hesitate to agree to renew the Taif Agreement. Al-Hajri went so far as to accept that the Saudi-Yemeni border dispute was over and that the frontier between the two states was permanent. This point was made explicitly clear in a joint communique issued on 17 March 1974. [454] Moreover, al-Hajri and his Saudi counterpart were in complete agreement regarding the threat emanating from Yemeni leftists and communists. They collaborated in curtailing the latter’s advances and nascent influence in the YAR.

Still, the YAR Consultative Assembly rejected the renewal agreement as well as the communique. Shortly thereafter, agents of the PDRY, while visiting London, assassinated al-Hajri. These two events magnified Saudi perceptions of Yemen as a volatile nation, prone to radical changes. Indeed, Saudi perceptions were further reinforced when, within one year, President Ibrahim al-Hamdi and President Ahmed al-Ghashmi of the YAR were assassinated.[455] Al-Ghashmi was known as a staunch anti-communist. Like Saudi leaders, he viewed communism as a threat to the security and stability of the Arabian Peninsula. His assassination brought to an abrupt end the close cooperation between the YAR and Saudi Arabia, especially on political matters, including the encroachment of communist ideas throughout the region. Without a doubt, his untimely death left an impact on the Sanaa-Aden relationship.[456] Al-Ghashmi's successor, Colonel Ali Abdallah Saleh, had no previous experience in government. He came to power during a most tenuous time, and his initial inability to calm differences between Sanaa and Aden led in February 1979 to open conflict between the two Yemens. This intra-Yemeni border war was "a mirror image" of the 1972 conflict.[457] It was short-lived but far more favorable to the PDRY, which, along with the National Democratic Front, was able to capture large stretches of North Yemeni territory. Under the auspices of the LAS, a cease-fire was arranged, which was followed by a commitment by both protagonists to work toward unity.

Like the 1972 Tripoli Agreement, this latest LAS mediation, known as the Kuwait Agreement, failed to achieve stated objectives for roughly the same reasons. Evidently, the insistence of the PDRY to have its proteges within the NDF included in the Sanaa government did not help assuage the painful experience of the North Yemeni government. President Saleh showed a resilience that belied his age (he was 34 at the time) and experience. Saleh had overcome, in his first year in office, a Nasserite coup plot, assassination attempts, domestic disturbances, and war with the PDRY. In August 1979, he concluded an arms arrangement with the Soviet Union worth an estimated 700 million, which angered and dismayed Saudi Arabia. To be sure, Riyadh's ire was not without justification, as it had just underwritten a $390 million YAR purchase of American arms. More important, Saudi Arabia had invested substantial capital with the Carter administration to satisfy congressional opposition to the purchase. President Jimmy Carter went so far as to invoke the waiver provision of the Arms Export Control Act to expedite urgently needed deliveries. When Sanaa, however, agreed to the cease-fire, Saudi Arabia held up delivery of the arms earmarked for Yemen. To the Saudis, Yemen's purchase of Soviet weapons was contrary to the "trustworthy" Yemeni-Saudi ties. The motive behind Saleh's move was to illustrate genuine Yemeni independence. For Sanaa, improved relations with Moscow, at the expense of Saudi-Yemeni good relations, was worth the effort. Consequently, Saudi Arabia threatened to withhold all of its financial and economic assistance to the YAR, which obliged President Saleh to quickly send diplomatic envoys to Riyadh. Saleh became engaged in a concerted effort to convince the Saudis that the nascent Yemeni-Soviet connection would never be allowed to become a threat to any state in the region. Once Riyadh was mollified, Yemeni-Saudi relations improved.

Despite this significant effort, regional trends affected the rapprochement between Riyadh and Sanaa. In 1981, the conservative Arab Gulf monarchies formed the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), in response to the Iranian revolution and the Iran-Iraq War. Soviet expansionism in Somalia, Ethiopia, and Afghanistan further threatened to change the geopolitical equation throughout the region. World concerns over these dynamic developments concretely manifested themselves in the attitudes of Muslim states as well. On January 1980, the Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC) summit, meeting in Islamabad, Pakistan, condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and strongly criticized Moscow's presence in the Horn of Africa.[458] Arab participants, with the exception of the PDRY, condemned Moscow's actions in Afghanistan in even stronger terms.[459] GCC leaders were particularly perturbed by the Kremlin's incursions into the region and believed it to be a menace to their security.

To be sure, the Arab Gulf monarchies' decision to form the GCC reflected their shared concern over their inability to protect themselves from both external as well as internal threats. The formation of the GCC, a military, economic, political, and cultural association, was viewed as a necessary mechanism to defend the region from all forms of threats. It was also formed to protect member states from Iran and Iraq. Most feared that once the Iran-Iraq War was over, the two warring states would attempt to re-establish their predominance over the region.[460] Indeed, "the distinguishing features of the GCC were that it was composed of monarchical political systems, traditionally conservative, rich in oil, weak in military strength, relatively unpopulated, and allied to the West."[461] In other words, the GCC was endowed with unique features that naturally excluded Yemen.

Sanaa was angered by its exclusion from the Riyadh-based regional organization. The YAR accused GCC states of forming a regional grouping that was contrary to the solidarity ofArab states.[462] Inasmuch as the exclusion of the YAR was a political decision, it was equally applied to the PDRY In fact, GCC rulers recognized that both Yemeni regimes chose "the course of political development through revolutionary coups—a method unacceptable to the six members of the Arab Gulf Cooperation Council."[463] Nevertheless, Riyadh rapidly pacified the YAR's injured perceptions, as it increased Saudi economic and financial assistance through the joint Saudi-Yemeni Cooperation Council (formed in 1976). Sanaa was mollified, and its opposition to the GCC was terminated, even if it felt slighted. This perception festered in the mind of President Saleh and his government, and by 1984 their views of the Kingdom became far more negative.

It is important to emphasize that while overall contacts improved ever so slightly, they in fact deteriorated throughout the rest of the 198O's for two specific reasons: first, because the 1984 discovery of oil enhanced Sanaa's negotiating posture, thereby altering the existing levels of dependency; second, because Sanaa established closer ties with Baghdad, which in turn further tilted the balance of power on the Arabian Peninsula.

When oil was discovered in the YAR, many believed the economic plight of the country would improve. Still, the amounts were relatively minute, compared to the vast reserves in Saudi Arabia. But, they proved enough to catapult the border dispute between Riyadh and Sanaa to the forefront. With these discoveries, the border dispute was no longer related just to the clauses contained in the 1934 Taif Agreement. It now included more than 1,000 miles of undefined frontier, stretching from the demarcated line with Asir, eastward along the Rub al-Khali to the boundary with Oman. Significant oil led Sanaa to assume that it would no longer be financially dependent on Saudi economic assistance, and that it could now conduct its foreign and domestic policies independent of Saudi pressures.[464] This thinking was linked to attempts by Sanaa to promote relations with Baghdad. Having been excluded from the GCC, Sanaa opted to improve ties with Saddam Hussein, in an attempt to improve and foster its regional significance. There is no doubt that the Baathist members of the Saleh government, who viewed Iraq as a viable alternative ally to Saudi Arabia, motivated this policy. Saddam Hussein was quick to respond in kind. Iraq provided Yemen with financial and economic assistance, in addition to technical assistance to the military. It also helped train Yemeni Republican Guard units and helped in the formation and training of the national security apparatus. Both the Republican Guard and the national security apparatus were modeled after Saddam Hussein's. Naturally, this new Iraqi-Yemeni cooperation was of deep concern to the Saudi government. When Yemen became a member of the Arab Cooperation Council, formed in 1988 by Egypt, Jordan, Iraq, and Yemen, Saudi apprehensions were intensified. Saudi alarm was pervasive and salient, especially since Ali Abdallah Saleh and Saddam Hussein had developed a close personal relationship. To Riyadh's dismay, the official mass media of the Saleh government inferred that Saudi Arabia was against Yemeni national interests.[465] One observer concluded that "having to contend with restive Iraq and Iran in the north, Riyadh has compelling reasons to contain its enemies and obviate the specter of being pressured on two sides."[466] Baghdad's increasing influence on the Arabian Peninsula was clearly evident as Saddam Hussein nudged both the YAR and the PDRY toward unity.

* Consequences of the 1991 Gulf War

The decade of the 1990s began on a high note for North and South Yemen. On 22 May 1990 the two states united to form the Yemen Republic. It was an accomplishment of historic proportion in contemporary Yemeni history. Unity was accompanied by the adoption of constitutional democracy as the basis of its political framework. Political parties, which had been outlawed in both North and South, were allowed to function freely within the parameters of the new political ethos. Liberal laws calling for respect for freedom of thought and expression were enacted. A proliferated mass media came into existence. Remarkably, the exultation and euphoria over unity was exhibited not only in Yemen, but also throughout the Arab world. Leading Arab scholars were persuaded that Yemeni unity was a prelude to Arab unity

Although Yemeni unity was regionally and internationally encouraged and accepted, incoherence in Yemeni decision making—vis-â-vis Saudi Arabia—was evident in two specific events. Indeed, the incohesive policies left the impression that Sanaa was muddling through, unable or inept to adjust its decisions. Consequently, the country’s economy, regional standing, and ever so fragile ties with Riyadh all suffered. They also intensified the negative perceptions each state had of the other, which frustrated any attempts to resolve the festering border dispute.

 The 1990 Iraqi Invasion of Kuwait

Less than three months after the two Yemens united, Iraq invaded Kuwait and, subsequently, incorporated the Shaykhdom as its nineteenth province. The invasion was traumatic to all Arab Gulf states and a rude awakening to the world. It directly threatened Western national interests and portended ill for the sovereignty of the conservative Arab Gulf monarchies. The Bush administration quickly initiated a bold policy aimed at rolling back the Iraqi army from Kuwait, restoring the independence of the Shaykhdom, and re-establishing the status quo ante in the region. Washington considered these objectives as prerequisites to regional security. It was, therefore, essential to enlist Arab as well as non-Arab states in forming the international coalition against Baghdad. Enlisting Yemen in the nascent coalition was determined to be important. The American secretary of state, James Baker, visited Sanaa to seek Yemeni support and participation in the coalition. Sanaa rejected the overture, insisting that the crisis, as an Arab problem, required an Arab solution. Yemen emphatically asserted that the League of Arab States possessed the wherewithal to deal with the crisis. This Yemeni opinion was not shared by most Arab Gulf states or by key Western powers. In the event, Saudi Arabia was incensed by Sanaa’s position, since it believed that collective Arab action was not sufficient to dislodge Saddam Hussein from Kuwait.[467] Moreover, the Yemeni position was regarded by several Arab states, including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Syria, as well as by major Western powers, as a clear indication that the Saleh regime endorsed Saddam Hussein and his regional policies.

Regardless of what conclusions many drew, Saudi Arabia did not forgive the Saleh regime, especially since the latter benefited from Riyadh's financial largesse. An estimated $100–350 million in financial aid was annually transferred from Saudi Arabia to the YAR at the time. Such amounts were disbursed to ease Sanaa's balance of payments deficits.[468] Equally important, Riyadh had vastly assisted Yemen by granting more than a million Yemenis the right to work freely in Saudi Arabia, and repatriate hard-currency earnings. The privileges given to Yemeni workers in Saudi Arabia were many. They were allowed to travel freely around the country and to own businesses. They were not required to be sponsored by Saudis nor were they forced to carry their residency papers with them. Indeed, Yemeni remittances "fueled growth in all levels of the private sector"[469] and, together with aid, "permitted the government to relax all kinds of economic regulation."[470]

Given this legacy, Saudi Arabia had assumed that Yemen would support it in its hour of need. When Sanaa sided with Baghdad, however, Riyadh and the Gulf Arab states concluded they had been "stabbed in the back." In response to Yemen's position, the Kingdom, Kuwait, and the United Arab Emirates evicted all Yemeni workers from their respective countries. Over one million Yemenis were forced to return to Yemen. The economic hardships on Yemen doubled as the Yemeni riyal began a steady decline in its value vis-â-vis the dollar. Inflation and unemployment rates increased dramatically, further compounded by the fact that practically all aid from Western states was terminated.

What ensued was not surprising. A steady stream of acrimonious exchanges became the trademark between the Yemeni and Saudi governments. Each accused the other of undermining its national interests, and each seethed with anger over the other. Yemen's position was, however, more antagonistic to Riyadh. The discord was illustrated by massive demonstrations against Saudi Arabia, which were clearly staged by Sanaa. Students from the military academy, government employees, and members of national security were encouraged to demonstrate in front of the Saudi embassy in the capital. Government employees were provided transportation to rally the masses in a timely fashion. Some of the demonstrations became vociferous and ugly. Stones, shoes, and sandals were catapulted onto the embassy grounds. King Fahd's pictures were thrown on the ground and trampled upon. Saddam Hussein's photographs, on the other hand, were raised above the crowd.

Adding insult to injury, the demonstrations were publicly aired on Yemeni television, even though counter-demonstrations—in support of Saudi Arabia—were not televised or mentioned by the government mass media. Saudi Arabia's wrath intensified when Sanaa denied that the government staged anti-Saudi demonstrations. Riyadh became convinced that the Saleh government could no longer be trusted, and squarely placed the blame for the deterioration in relations on Saleh himself as well as his foreign minister, Dr. Abdul Karim al-Iryani. According to reliable sources, al-Iryani had formulated Yemen's policy during the Gulf Crisis, and may have orchestrated the idea that Saudi Arabia strongly opposed Yemeni unity. It was widely rumored that Saudi Arabia had offered Aden a billion dollars to terminate unity discussions with Sanaa in 1990.[471] Whether these reports were true or not, they reinforced Yemeni perceptions of Saudi Arabia as being opposed to unification.

Against this thorny background, the border issue was shelved, essentially from 1990 until after the Yemeni civil war in 1994. Routine ministerial meetings convened, but far more serious concerns dominated the moribund dialogue.

First, Sanaa and Riyadh engaged in a pervasive antagonism. Their relationship during this period was similar to ties after the Yemeni revolution and the subsequent Egyptian involvement in 1962.[472] In such an atmosphere, the border issue became more of a point of contention between the two sides, made more salient by the fact that 1,000 miles of borderline had not been demarcated. The area stretched along the desolate Empty Quarter to the boundary with the Sultanate of Oman. It was in this vicinity that oil companies were prospecting for oil. Saudi sensitivities further motivated Riyadh to send a warning letter in April 1992 to oil companies warning them not to infringe on its territories.[473]

Second, both Yemen and Saudi Arabia failed to agree on what criteria should be applied to resolve the dispute, as "the principle of self-determination was not applicable in unpopulated areas, and in most parts neither side had a history of local administration, which might reinforce a claim."[474] The two states based their claims on several lines on maps that were drawn as far back as 1914: the so-called Violet Line, drawn in 1914 by the British government and the Ottoman Empire, to separate their areas of influence; the Riyadh Line, drawn by Saudi Arabia in 1935 to separate areas under British control in South Yemen from Saudi Arabia; the 1934 Taif Agreement, which delineated the border line between Yemen and Asir; and the 1938 Philby Line, which marked the line east of Asir, stretching in a southeasterly-northern direction toward Shabwa Province.

Third, Abdul Karim al-Iryani, in the latter part of the 1980s, postulated a theory—later adopted by members of the Yemeni government—that asserted that Saudi Arabia was susceptible to the same contradictions that afflicted the Kingdom of Yemen. As these intrinsic contradictions had led to the demise of Imamate political institutions, the postulate assumed, so would they affect the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.[475] Yemen, according to this perspective, should not attempt to resolve its border dispute with Saudi Arabia in haste, because there was a likelihood that violent political changes would bring forth a more arnicable political system in Riyadh, one that may be willing to be far more flexible in its strategic regional ambitions. Still, this perspective did not imply that the Yemeni government would cease publicizing its readiness to negotiate in good faith with the Kingdom. Rather, it had to improve relations with all Arab Gulf states—and dispel the notion that it had supported Iraq's invasion of Kuwait— even if Yemeni leaders were not ready to pay the price to achieve this aim. GCC states demanded Sanaa admit its policy was a mistake, and that it stop cooperating with Saddam Hussein, whereas Ali Abdallah Saleh's government was not willing to meet such demands. On the contrary, Yemeni leaders invited Iraq's deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, in August 1992 to visit Sanaa. In an official policy statement, President Saleh strongly denounced the international sanctions on Iraq, maintaining that they represented violations of Baghdad's sovereignty.[476] Moreover, Ali Abdallah Saleh's close cooperation and friendship with Saddam Hussein did not endear him to Arab Gulf rulers. The Al Saud feared that Saleh, backed by Saddam Hussein, would attempt "to subvert Saudi Arabia in the Asir border area, the target of possible irredentist ambitions by Yemen dating back to the occupation of the region by Saudi Arabia in 1934."[477] To be sure, "there are Saudis who not only still fret over Yemen's ambivalent stance towards Saddam Hussein but who regard the country's republican, multi-party political system (with all its flaws) as subversive in a peninsula dominated by traditional monarchies. "[478]

 The 1994Yemeni Civil War

The civil war erupted in the first week of May 1994 and lasted for 70 days. It was short but devastating. It was a natural outcome of the rivalry for power between the country's two leading political parties, the Yemen Socialist Party (YSP) and the General People's Congress (GPC). To be sure, the war unleashed regional involvement, specifically from Saudi Arabia. Two reasons account for the Saudi involvement in support of the YSP.

First, Riyadh had come to believe that President Saleh was the man most responsible for the Yemeni policy adopted during the Gulf Crisis.[479] Indeed, Saudi leaders were convinced that it was Saleh and his foreign minister, Dr. Abdul Karim al-Iryani, who insisted on its execution. When war broke out between government forces in Sanaa and the YSP, the Yemeni leadership believed that Riyadh physically, and financially, supported southerners. In fact, the Saudi effort to achieve a cease-fire was also viewed by Sanaa as sustaining the south.[480] To some extent, these perceptions were easy to formulate, especially after Saudi Arabia intensified its attempts to have other Arab governments recognize the so-called Democratic Republic of Yemen (DRY). Sanaa perceived this Saudi policy as clear evidence that Riyadh was against Yemeni unity. Whether Saudi Arabia had encouraged the south to proclaim its independence to make it "possible for Saudi leaders to refer the Yemeni war to the United Nations" is difficult to determine.[481] Nevertheless, the argument presented to substantiate this view rested on the premise that Saudi Arabia would—ostensibly—campaign for international support for the south far more vigorously if Sanaa invaded a neighboring "independent state."[482] In the event, this was the argument presented by Riyadh to Washington, although the latter insisted that "no political party such as the YSP had the right unilaterally to declare secession."[483] There is no doubt that the secretary-general of the YSP, who was then the vice president of the Yemen Republic, believed that declaring secession would relieve the south from Sanaa's military advances. Yet, the declaration—made reluctantly— was primarily "for external reasons, when it became clear that his forces were losing the war and he badly needed international support." "The timing of the announcement," almost three weeks after hostilities had broken out, "was linked to diplomatic activity and was aimed at securing international recognition, so that sympathetic states could provide arms openly rather than secretly."[484]

Ironically, the same Yemeni perceptions of Saudi Arabia—which emerged during the Yemeni civil war—appeared again during the Yemeni-Eritrean discord over the island of Greater Hanish, a Yemeni island on the Red Sea that Eritrea invaded and occupied in December 1995. Eritrea later invaded and occupied the island of Small Hanish. To be sure, Sanaa had not taken any precautionary measures to protect the islands, even though Eritrea had expressed its “intentions” as early as August 1995. Caught by surprise, the Yemeni leadership quickly placed “the blame for its failure to protect the sovereignty of its territories on Saudi Arabia and Israel. Sanaa accused Saudi Arabia and Israel of arming the Eritreans, thus giving Eritrea the wherewithal to attack and occupy Hanish.”[485] No matter how convoluted, these perceptions were widely rejected by the Yemeni citizenry, as opposition parties accused Sanaa of dereliction in protecting the sovereignty of the state. They also portrayed the Yemeni leadership as being too preoccupied with enhancing its self-interests, rather than protecting and promoting the national interest.

The second reason for the Saudi involvement in support of the YSP was Riyadh’s “imperative” need to have a land corridor south to the Arabian Sea, to ensure that its oil exports would not be subject to a blockade. Saudi Arabia may have access to blue waters but only through three narrow waterways: the Suez Canal, Bab al-Mandeb—both on the Red Sea—and the Straits of Hormuz in the Persian Gulf. More important, Riyadh had no control over either of the three narrow waterways. To alleviate this shortcoming, Saudi Arabia approached both Oman and the PDRY, to solicit their approval for a corridor plan. Both refused, because Riyadh insisted on having the corridor declared as Saudi sovereign territory. When the Yemeni civil war erupted, many observers viewed Saudi support of the secessionists as strategically significant. If the south became an internationally recognized independent entity, a grateful South Yemen could have accepted the Saudi corridor plan.[486]

Against this background, and from 1990 until early 1995, the Yemeni-Saudi relationship was acrimonious and belligerent. It experienced a temporary thaw when both states agreed to resolve their border dispute after an American mediation session, which resulted in a memorandum of understanding signed at the home of Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz in Makkah. The 11—point document reaffirmed the commitments of both states to the 1934 Taif Agreement. Both promised not to allow their territories to be used as centers of aggression— against each other—or for carrying out any political, military, or information activities.[487] Committees were also established and charged with determining land and sea frontiers, developing economic cooperation, and preventing troop movements near disputed areas.

Although Yemeni opposition parties criticized this latest accord, the agreement did not specifically renew the Taif Agreement, nor did Sanaa make any major concessions. On 23 June 1995, President Ali Abdallah Saleh visited Jeddah, raising hopes that the bruised relationship would—once again—be beneficial to both sides. Saleh went so far as to state that the 1934 Taif Agreement would be renewed without amendment. Unfortunately, the relationship soured once again in December 1995, when Sanaa accused Riyadh of encouraging Eritrea to invade and occupy Greater Hanish. From that point on, the Yemeni-Saudi relationship reverted to being belligerent, as Yemeni officials initiated a concerted effort to portray Saudi Arabia as the cause of all of Yemen's problems, ranging from limited economic development to kidnappings to corruption.[488] No doubt Yemen appears to be winning the public relations battle, by portraying itself as the victim of Saudi aggression and meddlesome interventions, as it was able to convince Washington to mediate. In turn, the United States responded positively, irrespective of the fact that the State Department was warning American citizens to reconsider traveling to Yemen to avoid "kidnappings" and other assaults on foreigners. The American administration seemed to disregard the views of scholars who contended that the Saleh regime lacked the competence necessary to enforce law and order in the country. Lastly, Washington seemed to have ignored the statement made by Prince Naif bin Abdul Aziz, Saudi Arabia's interior minister, when he declared that "Saudi Arabia is convinced that the dispute with Yemen is in no need of international arbitration."[489]

Washington's readiness to mediate stemmed from its resolve to achieve normal relations between various Arab states and Israel. Given that Saudi Arabia is considered pivotal in the eventual success of this policy objective, it became essential to employ Yemen as a pressure point against the Kingdom.

Sanaa seized on this American initiative by adopting a more flexible policy toward Israel. In fact, the Yemeni government’s quick response had two primary objectives: to reinforce the view held by many Westerners that Riyadh was strongly resisting the policy of “normalization” (between the Arab states and Israel), and to portray Saudi Arabia as being opposed to resolving festering border disputes. Sanaa hoped that such a policy would gain Western economic and political assistance. To achieve these two objectives, Yemeni officials met secretly with prominent Israeli government officials and initiated a dialogue. Israeli “tourists” were granted Yemeni visas, coincidentally as President Ali Abdallah Saleh was visiting Washington, in April 2000. During Saleh’s tour in the United States, he visited the Middle East Center for Peace and Economic Cooperation, a well-known Jewish organization promoting Israeli interests. On the heels of this latest development, the Jordanian newspaper Al-Majd, in its 25 April 2000 issue, quoted Western reports and several foreign sources that a military and security pact was indeed signed between Yemen, Israel, and the United States.[490] The newspaper asserted that “actual implementation of the deal began three weeks ago.” Without a doubt, such cooperation would affect the security of Saudi Arabia and the Arabian Peninsula, given that it may well allow Israel a non-negligible role in Red Sea.

* Conclusion

The Yemeni-Saudi relationship began on a sour note in the 1920s because the two sides perceived each other as expansionist and a threat to their newly created states. Their antagonisms stemmed from their inability to resolve a border dispute and counter-claims over Asir. Once that issue was resolved, albeit through a war, the discord between the two states evaporated. For nearly 30 years, Yemen and Saudi Arabia experienced an admirable relationship that was based on cooperation and trust. Saudi Arabia became the most reliable ally of Yemen during this period. Naturally, the fact that both countries were monarchies helped them to coexist in relative harmony.

This period was followed by a turbulent era in Yemeni political history born out of the 1962 revolution. The subsequent Egyptian intervention and the introduction of Egyptian troops into Yemen were causes for concern to Saudi Arabia. Facing an aggressive Yemeni government, allied to a similarly aggressive Egypt, Saudi Arabia sought and received American assurances of its sovereignty and independence. Once Egyptian troops withdrew, Saudi Arabia and Yemen forged closer links largely because of the threat emanating from the newly established communist political system in the PDRY. This cooperation lasted throughout the 1970s and early 1980s. When Aden's putative threat diminished, and when Sanaa became an oil producer, the YAR began developing and enhancing its relationship with Iraq. A reinvigorated Yemeni leadership no longer perceived the Al Saud as essential to its regional significance and economic development. Saudi Arabia, in turn, perceived the close Yemeni-Iraqi connection as a threat to its national security. The border dispute between Yemen and Saudi Arabia thus stood out as a sore point. On its own merits, it did not affect negatively the long-established contacts between the two states. However, in conjunction with the improved and personalized relations between Saddam Hussein and Ali Abdallah Saleh, it preoccupied Saudi Arabia. During this period, Sanaa perceived Riyadh as opposing Yemeni unity. That perception increased in intensity in the latter part of the 19805.

The final period witnessed further impairment in the Yemeni-Saudi relationship, caused by the Yemeni decision to side with Saddam Hussein during the 1990–1991 Gulf crisis. GCC states, especially Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which had generously supported Yemen's economic development, felt betrayed by Sanaa. In turn, Yemen was shunned and isolated for almost three years, as its refusal to recognize and admit that it had made a policy mistake only reinforced Saudi misgivings of the Saleh regime. The fact that the Yemeni government's negative perceptions of Saudi Arabia were widely publicized in the official media troubled Riyadh further. To the Saudis, Ali Abdallah Saleh and Dr. Abdul Karim al-Iryani were the two political leaders most responsible for the deterioration of relations between Riyadh and Sanaa. Although a memorandum of understanding was signed by both parties in early 1995, both sides remained belligerent toward each other simply because the Yemeni leadership was no longer seen by Riyadh as trustworthy. Irrespective of that, the two nations signed a border and maritime agreement in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, on 12June 2000. Although the text and the details of the border agreement have not been made public, both nations expressed their optimism that their relationship has taken a turn for the best.[491] It is, however, too early to conjecture as to whether the incoherence of the Yemeni political decision-making body will be able to chart a more rational policy vis-â-vis Saudi Arabia. Improved Yemeni-Saudi relations depend on the ability of the Yemeni political leadership to persuade the Gulf Arab states, especially Riyadh, that it can be trusted.

[437] Al-Sayyed Mustafa Salem, Takwin al-Yaman al-Hadith: Imam Yahyah Bayna 1904–1948 [The Formation of Contemporary Yemen], Cairo, Egypt: The League of States, Center for Arabic Studies, 1963.

[438] Issam Dhia al-Din al-Sayyed, Asirfll-Takat al-Siyassiyah al-Saudiyyah al-Yamaniyyah: 1919–1934 [Asir in the Saudi-Yemeni Relationship], Cairo: Dar al-Zahrah lil-Nashr, 1989, p. 107.

[439] Turkey Muhammad al-Madhi, Al-llakat al-Saudiyyah al-Yamaniyyah: 1904–1954 [Saudi-Yemeni Relations], Riyadh: Dar al-Shail lil-Nashr, 1997, pp. 44–47.

[440] Ibid.,pp. 227–42.

[441] Muhammad al-Shahari, Al-Matami‘ al-Saudiyyah al-Tawasuiyyah fil-Yaman [Saudi Ambitious Expansionism into Yemen], Beirut: Dar ibn Khaldun, 1996, pp. 144158. I

[442] Al-Sayyed, op. cit.,p. 160.

[443] Ibid.,pp. 17475.

[444] Ibid.,p. 174.

[445] Saeed M. Badeeb, The Saudi-Egyptian Conflict over North Yemen: 1962–1970, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1986, p. 92.

[446] Mohammed A. Zabarah, Yemen: Traditionalism vs. Modernity, New York: Praeger, 1982, pp. 27–29.

[447] Saeed M. Badeeb, op. cit., pp. 49–50.

[448] Manfred Wenner,ModernYemen: 1918–1966,Baltimore:Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967,p. 195. See alsoj. E. Peterson, Yemen:The Search for a Modern State, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982: and F. Gregory Gause III, Saudi-Yemeni Relations: Domestic Structures and Foreign Policy, New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

[449] M. s. El Azhary, “Aspects of North Yemen’s Relations with Saudi Arabia,” in B. R. Pridham (ed.). Contemporary Yemen: Politics and Historical Background, London: Croom Helm, 1984, p. 197.

[450] Abdallah al-Sultan, Al-Bahr al-Ahmar wa Assira’a al-Arabi al-Israili [The Red Sea and the Arab-Israeli Conflict], Beirut: Markaz al-Dirassat al-Arabiyyah, 1984, p. 156.

[451] El Azhary, op. cit.,p. 197.

[452] Robert Litwak, Security in the Persian Gulf: Sources of Inter-State Conflict, number 2, London: International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1981, pp. 81–82.

[453] Leading Arabists considered the Saudi monarchical system as being outdated. They assumed that such a system did not represent the aspirations of the Arab masses.

[454] Gause, op. a‹., pp. 105–106.

[455] “Anonymous” individuals assassinated al-Hamdi along with his brother, Abdallah. Al-Ghashmi was assassinated by an explosive device in a briefcase carried to him by a messenger sent by Salem Rubai Ali of the PDRY When the briefcase was opened, both al-Ghashmi and the messenger were killed. See Manfred Wenner, “South Yemen since Independence,” in Pridham (ed.), op. cit., p. 126.

[456] Although al-Ghashmi was a strong ally of Saudi Arabia, he was believed to be cruel and oppressive. He had the misfortune of succeeding al-Hamdi, who was respected as an avowed supporter of Arab nationalism and a political leader of exceptional intelligence.

[457] Gause, op. cit.,p. 40.

[458] Al-Sultan, op. cit., p. 146.

[459] Ibid.,p. 148.

[460] Hamid al-Moufi, “Majlis al-Ta’awun al-Khaliji” [The Gulf Cooperation Council], Majalat Al-Siyasah al-Dawaliyyah, number 65, October 1981, p. 127.

[461] Mohammed A. Zabarah, ‘‘Yemen and Regional Security,” Al-Masar, 1:1, winter 2000, p. 6. See alsoAbdu H. Sharif, “Yemen and Arabian Peninsula Security: Quest for Inclusion, Consequences of Exclusion,” paper presented at the 1994 annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, New York, 14 September 1994, pp. 4–5; and J. E. Peterson, The Arab Gulf States: Steps Toward Political Participation, Washington D.C.: Praeger, published with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1988.

[462] Al-Moufi, op. cit.,p. 131.

[463] This conclusion, by Majid Khadduri, is indeed all-encompassing. See Peterson, op. cit., p. viii.

[464] For more details, see Joseph Kostiner, Yemen: The Torturous Questfor Unity, 1990—1994, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1996. See also Petroleum Finance, Ltd., “AlYaman: Al-Kilaf al-Hududi wal-llakat ma’a al-Saudiyyah,” [Yemen: The Border Dispute and Relations with Saudi Arabia], paper presented to the Seminar on the Border Dispute between Yemen and Saudi Arabia, Sanaa, Yemen, 7 August 1997.

[465] Al-Thawrah and 26 September, various issues from 1988 and 1989.

[466] Jamal s. al-Suwaidi (ed.),TheYemeni War of 1994: Causes and Consequences,Abu Dhabi: The Emirate Center for Strategic Studies and Research, 1995, p. 98.

[467] Mark Katz, “External Powers and the Yemeni Civil War,” in ibid., p. 83. See also Zabarah, Al-Masar, op. cit., pp. 4–5.

[468] Under the National Reconciliation Agreement signed by the YAR and the royalists in 1970, Saudi Arabia agreed to pay Sanaa $100 million annually in budgetary support. See also Caroline Drees, “Saudi Says Acted in ‘Self-Defense’ in Yemen Clash,” Infoseek News Channel, 20 July 1998. More concretely, Saudi economic assistance to Yemen was also apparent in the construction of mosques, schools, and roads.

[469] Kiren Aziz Chaudhry, The Price of Wealth: Economies and Institutions in the Middle East, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1997, p. 196.

[470] Ibid.,p. 206.

[471] Yemeni newspapers spread the idea that Saudi Arabia was working against Yemeni unity. It used Foreign Minister Prince Saud bin Faysal's visit to Aden and his alleged offer as such an example.

[472] Ahmad Nu'man al-Mathhaji, "Ta'dudiat Marakiz al-Quwa al-Yamaniyyah wa Atharaha alAl-Ilaqat al-Yamaniyyah al-Saudiyyah fl Asr al-Dimukratiyyah" [Multi-political Forces in Yemen and Their Influence on the Yemeni-Saudi Relationship in the Era of Democratization], paper presented at the Conference of the North American Association for Middle East Studies, Washington, D.c.,8 December 1995, p. 12.

[473] Ibid. p. 12.

[474] Brian Whitaker, "The International Dimension," Yemen Gateway, 18 February 2000, p. 3.

[475] Colleagues at Sanaa University reiterated that they heard Dr. al-Iryani state his theory at "Qat" sessions in Sanaa before and after the Gulf crisis of 1990–1991.

[476] Kostiner, op. cit., p. 54.

[477] Ibid.,p. 52.

[478] Brian Whitaker, “Crisis over the Border,” Middle East International, number 492, 20 January 1995,1.11.

[479] Zabarah, “Yemen and Regional Security,” p. 11.

[480] Katz, op. cit., p. 82.

[481] Kostiner, op. cit., p. 95.

[482] Ibid.,p. 95.

[483] Michael Hudson, “The Evolution of US Policy Toward Yemen: Seeking Stability in Arabia,” paper presented to the Conference on the Future of Yemen, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, London, 25–26 November 1995, p. 10.

[484] Brian Whitaker, ‘‘National Unity and Democracy in Yemen: A Marriage of Inconvenience,” Yemen Times, 27 November 1995, p. 11.

[485] Mohammed A. Zabarah, “The Role of Yemeni Policymakers,” Focus Yemen, commentary delivered at the Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, 1999, p. 20.

[486] Whitaker, “Crisis over the Border,” p. 11.

[487] The memorandum of understanding can be found in Al-Hayat, 27 February 1995, p. 5.

[488] Al-Quds al-Arabi, Al-Sharq al-Awsat, Shu ‘un Arabiyyah, various issues, 1998–1999.

[489] Ain al-Yaqeen, “Detailing Yemeni Aggressions and Border Movements,” 22 July 1998, p. 4.

[490] As reported in Yemen Times, volume 10,1–6 March 2000, p. 1.

[491] Yemen Times, volume 10, 19–25 June 2000, pp. 1–2.

 Relations Between Gcc States

 Chapter 16: Unity on the Arabian Peninsula

Joseph A. Kechichian

When the six conservative Arab Gulf monarchies (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates [UAE]) established the Gulf Cooperation Council in 1981, they specifically identified their “common characteristics and similar systems founded on the creed of Islam” as the defining reasons for their effort.[492] The foreign ministers of the six member states provided even clearer justification for their endeavor at their first pre-summit meeting in Taif, Saudi Arabia. The 4 February 1981 communique read, in part, that the conservative monarchies wished to unite “out of consideration of their special relations and joint characteristics stemming from their joint creed, similarity of regimes, unity of heritage, similarity of their political, social and demographic structure, and their cultural and historical affiliation.”[493]

Similar statements followed but what they all purported to declare was that unity on the Arabian Peninsula was widespread and, more important, that potentially negative underlying currents—including ethnic and religious differences—were the figment of “Orientalist” imaginations.

Still, the reality of the GCC in 1981 was evident: The six countries embarked on a helter-skelter unity bandwagon because of perceived threats—especially from the Islamic Revolution in Iran. Nevertheless, and although unity was brought on the Peninsula, it was not in it.

Without a doubt, the creation of the GCC represented a momentous step toward unity on the Arabian Peninsula, as was the 1990 effort in Yemen. To be sure, the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR) and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) united by necessity—perhaps to "correct" the 1962 division that separated them—but the end result was substantial.[494] Undeniably, both the GCC and unified Yemen achieved much, but, as events since 1981 in every Gulf state amply illustrated, major differences among Gulf states remained. Some of these differences were grave, especially in Bahrain, Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia, where dormant ethnic and religious divisions awakened. In Yemen, internal tensions threatened to unravel the meager achievements of unification. Little of what ailed these societies was well understood. Even less was known about the long-term repercussions of domestic conflicts.

* The Political Arena on the Peninsula

Except for Saudi Arabia, an independent country for over 50 years, GCC states were very young sovereign actors in the international political arena. Kuwait gained its independence in 1961, and Bahrain, Qatar, and the ﷺ in 1971. Although Oman's sovereignty was exercised for several centuries, the Sultanate did not enjoy autonomy before 1970, when Sultan Qaboos acceded to the throne and literally opened his country to the outside world.

In the 19805 and 1990s, several GCC rulers attempted to enlarge popular participation in their political systems, recognizing that internal stability strengthened regional security. Indeed, the absence of effective political participation presented a catalyst for potential upheavals and instability, and the demise of the Shah of Iran in 1979 reminded GCC rulers that no regime, no matter how strong, could remain in power if a population rejected its ruler's legitimacy. While the impact of the Iranian revolution could not be overemphasized, GCC states' political systems amply indicated that authority and legitimacy were institutionalized quite differently than in Iran. Ruling families in the Lower Gulf consolidated power and authority over their subjects through historical tribal allegiances. Moreover, economic and social changes experienced since the discovery of petroleum, as well as the resulting rapid pace of modernization, accelerated the demand for political participation. The pivotal question, as one observer concluded, was "whether change in Arab Gulf societies would be gradual and peaceful, or whether it would produce instability and violence."[495]

Change, of course, meant that the stability of GCC regimes was far from guaranteed. Since political stability required that a system, or sub-system, in the international arena maintain equilibrium among its members, GCC states' search for stability necessitated political cooperation among the six regimes. This was especially significant because the Arabian Peninsula and the Persian Gulf were at the center of international and regional conflicts that threatened both GCC rulers and their subjects. Thus, how conservative regimes absorbed and processed change, while continuing to function normally by stressing their religious and ideological values, remained the key "stability" question. In the absence of mass political participation, stability in GCC states also required that the rulers satisfy certain popular requirements. Among these were the political and socioeconomic needs of their populations, both indigenous and expatriate, and the safeguarding of their citizens from external and internal sources of threat, as well as supporting basic freedoms for all.

Yet, the legitimacy of GCC rulers rested on norms adopted in different times, when the world was not preoccupied with the Persian Gulf. In fact, their relative political successes were largely accomplished through the use of coercion, in a relatively isolated environment.[496] In the post-oil boom era, however, when all six states were endowed with small intelligentsias and when education levels were rapidly rising, political coercion was no longer the most effective tool to achieve stability. Therefore, GCC rulers were faced with new challenges calling for further tolerance of peaceful internal dissension, to strengthen their legitimacy and sources of authority. This was certainly the case with the Shias, whose grievances surfaced with a vengeance after 1979, in large part inspired by the Islamic Revolution in Iran.

How Shias were treated in GCC societies illustrated the dilemma of unity on the Arabian Peninsula.

* Shia Communities in the GCC States

To fill its divinely inspired mandate, the Khomeini regime attempted to export its “revolution” within the boundaries of Shia legal thought. Admittedly, it would have been inconsistent for Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to advocate belligerent policies, when Shia religious and legal interpretations prohibited offensive wars. An armed attempt by Muslims to subjugate unbelievers, according to Shia jurisprudence, may only be declared by the imam or his immediate deputy after obtaining permission from the Prophet. Such a conflict would be an offensive jihad. A defensive jihad, on the other hand, did not require the imam to ask for the Prophet’s or, for that matter, anyone else’s permission.[497]

Significantly, all four types of defensive jihads applied to Khomeini’s views in exporting the revolution and influencing Arab Gulf societies.[498] Furthermore, since in Shia doctrine it was essential that all Muslims (particularly Sunni Muslims) eventually become true believers, and join the Dar-al-Imam, it was logical to assume that Khomeini considered Gulf Sunni Muslims as apostates even though they were born Muslims (murtaddjitri).[499] Indeed, these religious and legal interpretations shed light on Khomeini’s understanding of defensive jihad, and, beyond Iran’s territorial entity, defensive jihad encompassed the entire Muslim world. Such fundamental assumptions justified Teheran’s foreign policies, including Iran’s response to the war with neighboring Baathist, but nonetheless Muslim, Iraq.[500] Of course, after 1982, the war with Iraq was no longer a territorial dispute, but a clear attempt to export the nascent revolution to Baghdad.

Thus, except for the war with Iraq, Iran did not attempt to export its revolution through coercive methods. Rather, it endeavored, with limited successes, to invite sympathetic Shias and Iranian nationals in GCC states (and elsewhere) to become true Muslims by simply joining the Dar al-Imam. Toward the fulfillment of this goal, economically and politically deprived Shias were also called to rebel against conservative Sunni GCC governments by demanding that the influence of “Westernization” be curbed. A return to true religious fundamentalism was the order of the day.

Shias across the Gulf formed an integral part of the settled populations and worked their way up the social ladder, enjoying economic prosperity. Yet, despite these gains, Shias throughout the lower Gulf region were always perceived as a distinct group both socially and politically. An additional source of tension was their overwhelming numeric advantage among nationals in Bahrain, Qatar, and, to some extent, the UAE.

Beyond the numbers, however, serious sociopolitical cleavages scarred Sunni-Shia relations in every GCC state. For example, with a large Shia middle-class population, which comprised 70 percent of the island’s citizens, Bahrain was a fertile ground for dissent. Since 1978, revolutionary leaders in Teheran frequently called on Bahraini Shias to revolt against Manama, which in turn angered the Sunni-led government. Although an effort was made, at least after the early 1970s, to bring elements of the Shia middle class into the government, tensions did not subside. Nevertheless, Shia officials filled a number of cabinet positions, and in December 1972, 14 out of the 22 elected members of the National Assembly were Shias. Bahrain’s experiment with parliamentary life highlighted underlying tensions between reform-minded Shia deputies and more conservative Sunnis, leading the ruler to dissolve the chamber in 1975.[501]

What worked elsewhere in the Gulf could not be applied in Bahrain. Indeed, the dynamic island-state was different because the serious sociopolitical cleavage between the two Muslim communities could not be resolved by mere “deportations,” as in the case of expatriate laborers. Most Bahraini Shias were citizens and enjoyed full privileges under the laws of the state, which protected them from summary deportations. The challenge facing Manama, therefore, was how to meet the rising expectations of Shia Bahrainis. Moreover, Manama’s task was complicated given that Bahraini Shias enjoyed freedom of worship, and the commemoration of Ashura (celebrating al-Husain Ibn Ali’s martyrdom—a political as well as a religious phenomenon) was a national holiday. The government, while lenient to religious freedoms, objected to Shia political manifestations, particularly during Ashura, dealing harshly with demonstrators. Noticeably, this trend continued into the mid-1990s, with heavy casualties.[502]

The Kuwaiti Shia population was estimated to hover around 25 percent of the total indigenous population in 1995 (perhaps 250,000 out of an estimated 1 million citizens). In addition, an estimated 80,000 Iranians lived and worked in Kuwait, where few residents were granted citizenship even after decades of successive habitation.[503] A number of pro-Iranian demonstrations were staged beginning in 1979, although the Al Sabah regime did not hesitate to put them down rapidly and severely. Ironically, the conservative Sunni government in Kuwait had an especially difficult task in monitoring the activities of its politically motivated Shia citizens and Iranian residents. Since religious and political meetings occurred in mosques that were under the supervision of the Ministry of Religious Endowments and Islamic Affairs, it was especially significant that in the early 1980s, 9 out of the 25 Shia mosques in Kuwait did not fall under this category and, therefore, lacked governmental oversight. Furthermore, it was assumed that political meetings and paramilitary activities occurred in some of the 60 Shia centers of religious education and propagation (Husayniyahs). [504] Recent events in the Shaykhdom, including the devastating Iraqi invasion and subsequent liberation, did not fundamentally alter perceptions of inequality between Shias and Sunnis. By the mid-1990s, Kuwait’s Shia population—both Arab and Persian—had gained little additional influence, either in parliament or in the government. In October 1996, several Sunni Islamist groups, led by the Salafiyah Movement, won National Assembly seats that left Shias—once again— out of the political arena.[505]

In Oman, where the majority of the population were Ibadhis, an offshoot sect of Shia Islam, less than 7 percent of the indigenous population was Shia, most of whom were concentrated in the capital city of Muscat. Although the Sultanate did not experience many violent clashes or opposition from its Shia population in the 1980’s and 1990’s, Muscat was understandably concerned with rapid developments across the strategic Straits of Hormuz and, more important, about the spillover effects of the Iranian revolution. In mid-1994, Omani authorities arrested several hundred “Islamists” who, according to official sources, “had external connections, both financial and organizational.” Although the majority of those arrested—and eventually released—were Sunnis, several Shia and Ibadhi Omanis were among those that intended to “overthrow the regime.”[506]

In Qatar, the only other state in addition to Saudi Arabia that accepted the call to the Doctrine of the Oneness of God (al-Daawah ila al-Tawhid), the number of Shias hovered between 15 and 80 percent of the citizen population, depending on sources.[507] Despite this major discrepancy in statistical estimates, few Qatari Shias were politically active, although it would be a mistake to conclude that the Al Thani did not have to take them into account.

Finally, in the UAE, the native Shia population was estimated to be as high as 41 percent among the Federation’s citizens. In this instance, as well, statistical discrepancies abounded.[508] Interestingly, in Dubai 30 to 40 percent of the population were of Iranian origin, most of whom had settled in the Shaykhdom around the turn of the century. Other large Shia populations in Sharjah and Abu Dhabi made the UAE the truly cosmopolitan country it was. Much as in other Gulf states, pro-Iranian demonstrations were staged periodically after 1979, which prompted UAE internal security forces to keep close surveillance of Shias and deport—on a regular basis—convicted violators of UAE laws.

Despite clear gains in certain economic fields, Shias remained essentially outsiders in the sociopolitical arenas of GCC states. The fact that most Shia citizens provided needed assistance in the oil industry was largely and conveniently overlooked because ruling Sunni governments would not absorb them as full participants in GCC states’ political life. With the notable exception of a few wealthy merchant families in Oman and Bahrain (by no means representing the large Shia populations in the region), Shias in the Gulf were mostly on the lower social and economic strata. Conversely, almost two decades after the Iranian revolution, Shias failed to develop strong bonds of allegiance to their respective states, and many continued to draw inspiration from the Iranian revolution in their efforts to assert undeniable self-identities.

While the overall number of Shias in the six GCC states hovered around one million, GCC rulers feared a potential alliance between Shias and disenfranchised Sunni groups—presumably with the express support of the revolutionary regime in Teheran—to threaten internal stability. This certainly was the contention of senior Bahraini officials who maintained that disturbances on the island after 1995 were fully supported by Iran.[509] Throughout the 1980s, the Arabian Peninsula experienced the successive jolts of Iran's revolutionary shocks, including the 1981 Bahrain coup attempt, the 1983–1985 multiple bombings in Kuwait, the 1987 Makkah bloodshed (repeated on and off since then), and, of course, the severe jolts of the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. These events intensified GCC states' fear of the Iranian and Iraqi regimes, leading to routine expulsions of expatriate workers (mostly Iranians) believed to have been involved in anti-regime disturbances. In turn, Teheran perceived these actions as pro-Western, unjust, and, in the revolutionary jargon, un-Islamic.

Saudi-Iranian relations went from bad to worse throughout the 1980s but, miraculously, improved in the aftermath of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. Riyadh re-estabhshed its broken ties with Teheran in March 1991 and encouraged its GCC partners to improve ties as well. The Kuwaitis hired several Iranian oil-well capping enterprises, for example, to help Western corporations extinguish some of the 600+ fires set by retreating Iraqi troops. Heir Apparent Abdallah bin Abdul Aziz Al Saud attended the 1997 Organization of Islamic Conference summit meeting in Teheran, where he received special attention. For its part, Riyadh welcorned former President Rafsanjani and sent Foreign Minister Saud al-Faysal for high-level discussions in 1998 with Ayatollah Khatami.[510] Of course, Oman and the UAE, which had nurtured their contacts with Iran even during the most difficult period, were instrumental in the rapprochement under way. GCC states even contemplated security discussions with Iran as a balancing factor vis-â-vis Iraq.

Despite these noticeable changes, the rapprochement between the GCC states and Iran was only an antidote for a serious and, perhaps, permanent disagreement. Relations between Sunni Arab rulers and Shia Persian revolutionaries were too divergent to ensure an enduring truce. GCC states were literally caught in the Saudi-Iranian legitimizing vortex and were, as a result, almost always prey to political and religious pressures from either side. In the past, the small shaykhdoms had looked to Baghdad as a third alternative pole, but in the wake of recent events, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for GCC states to rely on that source in toto—-as long as Saddam Hussein remained in power. Still, GCC rulers and populations alike opposed the various embargoes that hurt helpless Iraqis and, to address their concerns, provided material assistance. Nevertheless, and because GCC states knew that Teheran—especially if it formed close ties with its brethren in Iraq—could easily resort to its “Shia” card to influence internal political developments in the shaykhdoms, they looked to Baghdad as a perpetual balancer. This proposition was valid as long as Shias remained disenfranchised, which, subsequently, perpetuated the lack of unity on the Peninsula.

* Evolution of Class Structure in the GCC States

Although any scheme of social stratification on the Arabian Peninsula blurred the lines between social, economic, and political elites and groups, the end result was not always unity. It was important to note that poverty and marginal political power, for example, sometimes accompanied the social status enjoyed by badu tribes. Similarly, the ulama in Saudi Arabia or in Qatar—who enjoyed considerable political influence—did not always enjoy high economic standing. Still, the ruling families remained at the top of the Gulf paradigms because they were the only elites into which members were born. Moreover, due to their high social positions, wealthy Gulf ruling families experienced unprecedented enhancements of their political and social clout. Many members exploited their standings by allocating to themselves a portion of the state oil income, involving themselves in their country’s commercial enterprises, and using their spending powers to exercise direct influence on the state.

Yet, even within groups of high standing elites, there was disenchantment. In the post-oil boom era, younger, more educated princes demanded greater participation in the running of their country’s internal and foreign affairs. Likewise, Westernized elites in search of an effective voice were increasingly dissatisfied with the established consensus-reaching approaches designed and supported by their elders. Naturally, some senior officials were aware of these subtle changes, and several among them understood that their societies could experience serious upheavals if dissenting calls were not heeded. Still, although key officials were aware of changes within their own ranks, few knew how to address them. If Gulf ruling families could satisfy the genuine needs of younger princes—that is, without jeopardizing the established cohesion at senior levels—then chances were good that the disenchantment within their ranks would be limited.[511]

* Political Participation in the GCC States

Neither the situation of Shias nor the evolution of class structure in GCC societies affected unity on the Arabian Peninsula to the same degree that the call for genuine political participation did. Despite the many accomplishments of the 1970s through the 1990s, GCC citizens demanded even more, insisting that their voices be heard loud and clear. Such calls illustrated GCC citizens' aspirations for genuine unity, and several Gulf rulers responded.

Even before the War for Kuwait, the small northern Shaykhdom was engaged in a political participation experiment, in the form of an elected parliament. Similarly, Bahrain was also a "parliamentary" government, although the institution was suspended in 1975. For its part, the UAE's National Assembly aimed—for many years—to ratify a "provisional" constitution. Oman and Qatar experimented with consultative councils, each with concrete accomplishments to its credit. The winds of change were indeed blowing across the Arabian Peninsula, and by osmosis, war, or both, the trend was for more political participation. Although the conservative Arab Gulf monarchies were perceived as "anachronistic absolute monarchies," in reality they were confronting sociopolitical challenges and, in many respects, growing stronger.

Despite their many shortcomings, Gulf rulers were keenly aware of social developments requiring their attention, ranging from the evolution of class structure to the impact of modernization. In the oil-boom era, GCC rulers assumed that providing the highest possible incomes for their citizens would keep the lid on social problems. In reality, direct and indirect aid taxed services, increased manpower imports, and eroded the value of work. The search for “instant wealth became an end in itself. ”[512] But when the novelty faded, people turned to the more fundamental questions affecting their lives.

The 1970s—the oil decade-synthesized a new class structure in which the ruling families “enhanced their status as a social and economic elite while retaining political monopoly.”[513] This phenomenon was paralleled by the emergence of a secondary elite—akin to a middle class—that benefited from the economic boom and, not surprisingly, became much more differentiated. With better education levels, middle-class members were ideally suited to exploit opportunities as they arose. But the economic recession of the 1980s limited government capabilities to satisfy heightened expectations. And, rather than pursue painful economic policies, Gulf rulers continued to provide free services to maintain the social balance.[514] By failing to swallow the painful economic pill of the past decade, GCC states literally created a post—oil boom generation, whose objective was to maintain its high standard of living at all costs.

The post—oil boom generation gave the rulers legitimacy as long as the latter provided them with material possessions. At some point, it may well be next to impossible to provide everyone with everything, and the middle class will grow and expand its influence in ways that might not be welcomed by the ruling families. It is indeed conceivable that an eventual alliance between middie and lower classes may emerge “to break the oligarchic social and political power of the elites.”[515] Signs of this alliance were visible in GCC states’ national assemblies and consultative councils, where middle-class members were increasingly popular.[516] Moreover, calls for genuine political participation were emanating from all directions, including from within the ruling families, where younger members, especially from cadet branches, were marginalized with little or no influence on political issues. Although difficult to anticipate with certainty, it may be accurate to conclude that ruling families that failed to heed these calls for political participation could indeed face the ire of their “subjects” in the not too distant future.

* Trends in Arab Gulf Unity

Assuming that the Iranian revolution was the catalyst—and the Iran-Iraq War the excuse—for the six conservative Arab Gulf states to set up a regional security organization without the participation of the two northern Gulf states, what was the nature ofArab Gulf unity? Moreover, whereas prior to November 1980 most Gulf rulers acknowledged that the Gulf region represented the strategic depth for the Arab world facing Israel, developments in both Iran and Iraq—amply demonstrated by the Iran-Iraq War and the War for Kuwait—transformed the confrontation states into the strategic depth of the Gulf countries, vis-â-vis Iran and Iraq. Political and military changes in the Gulf strengthened Arab Gulf rulers' perceptions that the Islamic Revolution was as tangible a threat to their political survival as the Israeli threat was to their physical well-being. Of course, the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait was even more pronounced, since it affected each and every conservative Arab Gulf state. Consequently, and out of necessity, Gulf rulers were forced to come out of their shells and shoulder the responsibility of providing—collectively—security in the Persian Gulf region. As one observer noted:

To understand the tremendous change that has swept through the Gulf countries, one must realize that a clearer comprehension of the fundamentals of international power plays has become fixed in the minds of Gulf rulers. In consequence of their efforts and commitments towards the nonoil Arab countries, the Gulf producers' intentions must be given very seriOUS weight.[517]

Still, the War for Kuwait altered the balance of power in the region, and further narrowed the parameters of unity on the Peninsula. Once again, necessity was the primary reason for all regional attempts that boxed—as best as possible— those that were in the unity scheme (the so-called GCC+2 [Egypt and Syria]) versus those that were excluded from it, namely Iran and Iraq.[518]

What prompted Gulf rulers to feel secure enough to take a plunge into the GCC+2 scheme varied. First, it was clear that politically they were better entrenched than most other Arab states. Second, their achievements in enhancing the quality of life in their countries, and the desire to develop their societies' potential, permitted them to count on deeds and results.

Third, the availability of vast resources obviously allowed Gulf rulers to invest in the future and shed their shyness cloak. Finally, their regional strengths emerged, without ignoring deeply felt commitments to the Arab world, from a sharpened appreciation of what the Iranian revolution and the Baathist regime in Baghdad potentially represented to their way of life. This appreciation coalesced divergent views and, under Saudi leadership, galvanized GCC states to form a genuine alliance against Iran and Iraq. It was not the Yemen but the Iran-Iraq War that motivated GCC rulers into action. Moreover, after the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, GCC states were further motivated to enter into new alliances with Western powers. In short, both Iran and Iraq helped GCC states to seek a unity of necessity on the Arabian Peninsula. All of their defensive cooperation efforts focused on the two major hegemonic powers. Indeed, Gulf rulers recognized that “Iraq had been a threat before the Iranian revolution and that Iran has been a danger since.”[519] They feared these two powers most and knew what the risks were. When Iraq invaded Kuwait, one of the GCC rulers’ worst fears materialized. With weak military capabilities, the reliance on Western allies was a foregone conclusion. GCC forces responded as well as they could, but in the two-month-long “war,” they were not the critical factor. In fact, the return of the Al Sabah to Kuwait raised the fundamental “outside military support” question forcefully for the GCC alliance. Under the circumstances, it would indeed be quite difficult to shake it off for some time to come. Simply stated, conservative Arab Gulf rulers shed all pretenses and opted for survival when their regimes were at stake. The trend was for more of the same.

Because GCC societies opted to focus on regional and international threats, their quest for unity on the Arabian Peninsula was only partially achieved. Festering internal tensions have meant that every Gulf state has experienced significant social upheavals during the past few years. At least four main sources of instability (or relative stability—depending on how governments responded) can be identified as future indicators of dramatic change:

1. disenchantment with the ruling family,

2. demands made by the intelligentsia,

3. pressures imposed by an increasingly professional military, and

4. competition for power by religious extremists.

Although social upheavals were not intrinsic to the Gulf region, the oil boom of the 1970s disrupted the nature of personal and family relationships, introduced consumerism, subordinated the Islamic principle of egalitarianism to more formal authority structures, and created an economic dependency on the government.[520] Moreover, the oil-boom era literally tore at the fabric of the most traditional societies on earth, where values were measured and implemented by entirely different social yardsticks than the ones practiced in the West. Ironically, most GCC citizens perceived the turbulent decades of the 1980s and 1990s as a reprieve from the chaos of the 1970s. Many compared the 19705 to an age of drunkenness and the period afterwards to a recovery from it. The return, of course, was to the more traditional values one could find in religion, society, and family, even if the more evident signs of modernization were readily espoused. Thus, seemingly contradictory forces in GCC societies coexisted, and the debate was over the level of comfort that these powerful forces—traditions and modernization—imposed on them.

Finally, and although the exploitation of oil produced undeniable economic benefits for a majority of GCC states' populations, a level of disorientation was also apparent because they were thrown into a very complex international arena of politics, economics, and finance, without adequate preparations.[521] Given the speed with which "modernizing" factors were introduced, some of the social changes were clearly instigated by eager governments. Others were unforeseen. A transformation of the economy; the creation of a bureaucracy to allow for new functions; the provision of extensive and mostly free social services; the adoption of all-inclusive development programs; the emphasis on education for manpower development; the shift to and extent of urbanization; the massive influx of close to 5 million expatriate workers; and the considerable defense needs of vulnerable countries all complicated matters for every GCC government.[522]

These social changes left dramatic imprints on GCC societies. Without exception, the badu were partially detribalized as a new national political culture emerged. A more nuclear family arose, leading as well to changes in relations between the sexes. The exposure to alien values and norms meant that a cultural erosion was under way that, in turn, allowed for the evolution of class structure and a greater social stratification. Finally, the changing outlooks of the younger generation raised serious dilemmas for conservative governments. Their response was the adoption of more aggressive policies at the regional level. To be sure, wary rulers addressed internal concerns but only with hesitation and, it seemed, always with a certain level of reluctance. In the long run, GCC internal issues were far more important than any regional hegemonic threats, and it was by addressing intrinsic demands for change that conservative Arab Gulf governments ensured their survival in power. In the meantime, unity on the Peninsula was assumed to exist, since most GCC governments focused on achieving regional cohesion.

* The Political Arena of the Yemen

Unlike GCC states, where unity efforts were the result of necessity, the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR) and the People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) coexisted helter skelter, despite serious clashes spanning the period between 1962 and 1990. The fact remained, however, that Yemen was—at one point in history—a united entity, and six decades of wars (civil, regional, and international) notwithstanding, Yemenis craved unity.

 Pre-Unification Efforts

Both the YAR and the PDRY sat at the strategic edge of the world’s richest petroleum peninsula for years before the discovery of their own oil reserves. Although poor, the two were not friendly, even though together they formed a buffer zone between the Horn ofAfrica and Arabia. For years, the Soviet Union backed the PDRY to foster Soviet policy in the whole Middle East, and the last thing Moscow wanted to see was a re-unification with the “capitalist” North. Saudis were also against unification, as they feared that a unified Yemen could end up being dominated by Southern Yemeni communists. Yet, among ordinary people on both sides of the border, pressures for a united Yemen were surprisingly strong.[523] Unification was an emotional issue that transcended economic and global politics. Southerners often spoke of family and friends in the North. Many, including government officials, quietly admitted to a hope that unity would be achieved by political compromise on both sides. In Sanaa, public and private opinions were more guarded (reflecting the area's tribal traditions), but ministers reminded outsiders that the people ofAden were Yemenis just like themselves. In the late 1970s, an economic expert in Sanaa explained a typical personal dilemma by stating:

My mother and father both came from the North, but I was born in Aden. When the socialists came to power, I came North and stayed ever since. My wife and two children remained in the South and if circumstances changed I would certainly go back. Eighty percent of my business friends come from the South and they would like the opportunity to return.[524]

Periodic outbreaks of violence in both North and South exacerbated these difficulties. But after the February 1979 hostilities, a new government to address intrinsic political and social issues reached a tentative agreement.

President Ali Abdallah Saleh (YAR) was invited by Aden to be the first head of the united nation, and joint committees were created to examine ways of integrating education, currency, and transport. Certainly, the industrialization of the South and the relatively efficient agriculture of the North promised a good economic mix. Moreover, a major stumbling block was removed with the announcement that the socialist PDRY would accept a unity government, which would follow Shariah laws. As the 19705 closed, the political will to unite was present, on both sides. South Yemenis, for example, celebrated the ten-year anniversary of the 1962 coup that had brought the northern regime to power. In 1975, Aden also identified re-unification as a primary goal of the Marxist regime.[525] Although many Northern officials were suspicious of the South's willingness to let President Saleh rule the united country, the latter's personal commitment to unification was strong. In 1978, Saleh overcame two attempted coups by anti-unity groups. The first, in October 1978, resulted in the execution of several army officers, and the second, in May 1979, remained shrouded in secrecy. Shortly thereafter, Lieutenant Colonel Muhammad Yahyah al-Anisi, chief of the Amaliga (an army special forces group), Major Muhammad Sanabani, the commander of the Seventh Armored Brigade, and Major Ali Mahdi Sanabani, the commander of the Reserves, were all removed from their posts, allegedly because of their involvement in the two coup attempts. Such high-level support for coups indicated that the Saleh government was weak. Nevertheless, the president neutralized a large section of the opposition by purging high-ranking officers, which left him fairly free to pursue his own policies.

Over the years, Yemeni leaders' personal commitments to unification changed little. In 1979, for example, Foreign Minister Abdallah al-Asnaq, a prominent opponent of the PDRY government, was downgraded to the position of presidential adviser in the North. Saleh's counterpart in the South, Abdel Fattah Ismail, who came to power in a June 1978 coup when he deposed President Rubai Ali, was by no means a puppet of the USSR, even though Aden accepted considerable aid from Moscow. The PDRY embarked on a five-year plan (1979–1984) that intended to build on an already developing industrial base.

For the leader of a supposedly socialist state, Ismail encouraged several aggressive capitalist schemes. Aden sponsored joint development projects between the public and private sectors; authorized the British Crown Agents firm to continue purchasing for and advising it; maintained telephone links to London, which was Aden's best technical link to the outside world; allowed British Petroleum to fly its flag; and insisted that young men in the civil service and nationalized banks receive Western training. But despite all of these efforts, "unification talks" did not proceed well. Most were held at the informal level, with little progress made on substantive issues.

The underlying external pressures against unification remained and were exacerbated by the February 1979 war in the North.[526] Saudi Arabia's concern over Soviet influence in the region essentially meant that Riyadh remained active in derailing the fledgling talks in the first place. North Yemen was viewed as a buffer state between Saudi Arabia and the PDRY, and every successful unifIcation meeting was looked on with alarm. But, despite the fact that Riyadh provided almost all the cash injected into the YAR, and that Sanaa's armed forces were equipped and trained with Saudi finances, it was difficult to find North Yemenis who spoke favorably of their generous neighbor.[527]

For their part, the Soviets—who provided much of the finances to keep the PDRY afloat—sought the strategic advantages of a satellite state that provided access to the Arabian Gulf, as well as facilities for a deep-water port at Aden. Despite this close relationship, ties were never cemented between Aden and Moscow. In looking at the Soviet relationship with the PDRY, it is important to examine the former Soviet Union's ties with the YAR as well. Significantly, the USSR was the principal supplier of military and financial aid to republican forces throughout the civil war, even if Soviet relations with the YAR were abruptly broken in 1972. By the end of the 1970s, and although Moscow maintained a very large trade mission in Sanaa, the Soviet influence on the YAR was limited. There were few indications that Moscow understood the Arab world any better in the late seventies than it had prior to the 1972 Egyptian debacle.[528] Slow unifIcation talks made it abundantly clear that the Soviet Union's greatest gain from the February 1979 war was not any direct military successes by the South, but the damaging long-term effects on the Northern economy. Far more important, Arabs who suffered the consequences of economic dislocations were not ready to support, or even tolerate, an outside power bent on regional domination.

No matter how influential outsiders were, or tried to be, and no matter how difficult it was to achieve progress in unification, many North Yemenis claimed that Yemen was one country divided by two governments. What prevented unification, they argued, were the two countries' economic positions and the assiduous work of the Saudis and the Soviets to keep the two sides apart.

If Riyadh and Moscow were too obsessed with Sanaa and Aden, Kuwait was especially interested in fostering reconciliation. Kuwaiti officials helped negotiate a merger agreement in 1979 even if they acknowledged that ideological and other differences between the two countries appeared to be major obstacles to unity. These differences, officials then claimed, were not dealt with by those charged with putting the agreement into effect. Kuwaiti negotiators encouraged the adoption of a Yemeni draft constitution—with 136 articles—expected to be submitted to a referendum after consultations between the two presidents and their legislative bodies. To their credit, the Kuwaitis expected little, as the 1972 agreement stood in stark contrast to the newfound optimism. They certainly favored the union as a means of reducing tension in the Gulf region but also wished to create an alternative source of influence to balance Saudi Arabia’s growing pressures on them. Moreover, the Al Sabah hoped that the PDRY, within the framework of a unified state, would feel less threatened by its neighbors and might even loosen its ties to the Soviet Union. Ironically, these ties were substantially strengthened after the 1978 signing of a 20-year friendship treaty between Moscow and Aden.[529] Still, the two Yemens, dominated by socialist and tribal backgrounds, failed once again to heed friendly “pressure,” preferring to determine the ideology of their projected unified state themselves. This was a major realization that strengthened both leaderships in ways that few outsiders accepted or understood.

 Unification

Unification became a realistic prospect in the late 1980s when oil prices dropped and, more important, when the Soviet Union teetered on the brink of economic collapse. The PDRY lost its principal benefactor, which in turn meant a halt in the country’s economic development. Aden’s port could not be developed into the world-class facility many hoped for, and lack of cash postponed much-needed repairs to the country’s oil fields and assorted infrastructure. A merger, South Yemeni leaders posited, would encourage Western oil companies to return and invest in the nascent Shabwa fields. After the initial step, the reasoning concluded, pre-revolutionary landowners and entrepreneurs who had fled the country years earlier would return and bring back sorely needed capital. Similarly, opportunities derived from a merger appealed to the YAR, after oil exploration in the Maarib area proved to be less promising than originally anticipated. By accepting the merger, Sanaa would double its reserves and acquire of one the best natural ports on the Arabian Peninsula. An accord was reached on 30 November 1989—in Aden—and the two states formally united on 22 May 1990, six months ahead of schedule, into the Republic of Yemen.[530]

Within two months of this dramatic development, Iraq invaded Kuwait, an event that plunged the entire region into a crisis situation. Except for Iraq, no other country suffered more from the War for Kuwait than Yemen. Sanaa opposed the Iraqi invasion but vociferously objected to the U.S.-led foreign intervention. As a result, Yemen received the ire of regional and international actors, led by Saudi Arabia, from where an estimated one million Yemeni workers were hurriedly expelled.[531] Yemen lost its much-needed remittances. It also lost concessionary oil supplies from Iraq, its Arab Cooperation Council (ACC) partner, which forced Sanaa to divert production for internal use. Foreign exchange revenues were halved overnight. GCC states, along with the United States, cut their own financial assistance programs. A relatively poor country sank even lower, which, not surprisingly, added to the strain on internal stability.[532]

 Post-Unification Efforts

Several years after unification, disenchantment was still greater in the south than in the north. The Sanaa government edged out Aden, and many southerners regretted the “de-socialization” of the southern part of Yemen. The last of the countless red stars that used to adorn Aden’s official buildings vanished, and the slogans of the Yemen Socialist Party (YSP) were carefully washed off city walls. Most portraits of the four “historical” leaders, including Abdel Fattah Ismail, whose assassination on 13 January 1986 had triggered a bloody internal civil war, were also removed.

On the hills that overlooked the harbor, an imposing peace dove replaced the huge color picture ofAbdel Fattah Ismail, the martyr ideologist of the YSP. The Abdel Fattah Ismail and Ali Antar Museums, and the museum where the assassination of the four leaders was reconstituted—in the former headquarters of the political bureau—were in a state of neglect for lack of funds and visitors. A recent report claimed that a single building devoted to South Yemeni history would be created to preserve Aden’s rich traditions. The monumental complexes housing the YSP and the Institute for Scientific Socialism—gifts from East European countries built in the purest Soviet style—looked like ships adrift abandoned by their crews and passengers. Before leaving for Sanaa, YSP leaders kept their promise and did all they could to clean Aden of anything that might remind Yemenis that it once was a center of socialist influence. Most Yemenis who believed that a new era of prosperity was about to begin enthusiastically welcomed this “de-socialization.”

Disenchantment soon set in, however, as southerners discovered that interventionist socialism was gradually replaced by the wild capitalism of the north. “Before, our socialist leaders would exploit US,” a worker complained. “Now, the northerners are systematically bleeding the country,” he asserted. [533] Northerners traveled to the south loaded with riyals exchanged on the black market, never intending to invest in their country. Engaged in speculation and buying anything that might someday increase in value, they brought with them all of the vices of the north. After 1990, Aden market stalls, which used to be hopelessly bare, overflowed with vegetables, fruits, and other essentials. But prices were prohibitive since subsidies had been abolished immediately after unification, and few could afford them. The market where “qat” (the local euphoric drug) was sold, which did not exist in 1989, looked exactly like its counterparts in Sanaa working-class neighborhoods. It drained a considerable part of the meager wages of southern Yemenis, who were now free to use the substance even if it became a burden on the family budget. “The former South Yemen,” an academic opined, “has become the East Germany of re-unified Yemen. ”[534]

What followed for several years was a price explosion that affected southerners more than northerners, because the latter found ways to double or even triple their salaries, by moonlighting or engaging fiercely in the black market and smuggling. An attempt to introduce an unofficial foreign-currency marketeering in the south was thwarted by the police, now headed by a northerner. There was every indication that officials in Sanaa wanted Aden to become a provincial town. Even government employees’ salaries were paid late—in extreme cases up to seven months late—all of which led southerners to lose confidence in unity, and especially in their new leaders in Sanaa. Thus, invectives against YSP officials were a common occurrence, and former PDRY leaders betrayed Yemenis by abandoning them: “We are disappointed and were better off before unification,” a disgruntled southerner acknowledged. The high cost of living affected everyone, especially after the subsidization policy was scrapped. Others compared the YSP to “a figurehead on a shelf,” without any real control over what was happening in Sanaa.[535]

Southerners, who rejected the YSP in the hope that President Saleh's General Congress Party (GCP) would improve their lot, were clearly "worse off," and totally adrift. They did not know where to turn, especially when they saw corruption setting in—slowly but surely—through northerners working at customs, port, and airport facilities. A new "northern" customs director imposed arbitrary duties on Somali women carrying parcels of clothing for the local markets, which enraged all those who heard about the incident. Diplomatic missions were not immune to such arbitrary decisions. The majority accepted these unofficial rules if they wanted to get their diplomatic bags quickly. Outraged by such occurrences, many Yemenis remained faithful to socialism, which the peopie of Aden saw disintegrating among the widespread laxness of the re-unified Yemeni society.

The general breakdown of law and order continued unabated as an intense arms smuggling campaign from Saudi Arabia to the Shabwa and Hadhramaut Governorates intensified. Gangs spread havoc on Aden beaches at night, and the number of break-ins increased markedly. Car owners who never bothered to lock their vehicles were taking additional precautions. In order not to be bothered, women increasingly wore a veil. Many dreaded the promulgation of the law allowing polygamy and divorce, both of which had been banned in the south since the 1960s. But some South Yemenis no longer waited; they traveled one hour to Taiz in the north, where a legal second marriage, or a quick divorce from a religious judge, was easily arranged. "The impression was that [northerners] [we]re systematically destroying anything that was good in the South," and many believed that this was Sanaa's doing, to keep the former PDRY in a state of permanent underdevelopment. A United Nations Development Program (UNDP) employee confided how UNDP officials refused to allocate to the south credits that were not used in the north.

Sanaa's oft-repeated promise to turn Aden, which at the time of unification was called "Yemen's commercial and economic capital," into a free port capable of competing with Dubai or Hong Kong remained unfulfilled. After it was postponed several times, the law turning Aden into a free port was scheduled to be promulgated on 22 May 1991. Several years later, the project was still at its initial stages, with an official stating, half-jokingly and half seriously, that it was as difficult to turn Aden into a free port as it was to "turn a church into a night-club."[536]

Ironically, the committee in charge of studying the project was named the Committee for the Development of Free Ports in Yemen, which hinted that Aden might not necessarily be chosen as the site of the future free zone. There was increasing talk that Hodeidah, in the north, was best located to play that role. The very active “Hodeidah lobby” praised its advantages, arguing that it was already equipped with modern facilities, effective communications means, and a skilled labor force, all of which allegedly was lacking in Aden.

Other concessions were made to Islamists, who proved their strengths in the north at the time of the referendum and remained faithful in opposing the secularism that was rooted in the south.[537] Nevertheless, the Isiah, the union grouping the religious and the tribal leaders, achieved a breakthrough in the south after unification, with the help of the League of the Sons of Yemen (LSY).[538] The LSY constituency, repressed under the socialist regime, reorganized with the help of the Isiah, creating a formidable alliance between tribes and Islamists. Whether this alliance could impose itself in Aden, where secular traditions were stronger, was difficult to determine. What was clear, however, was that northern Islamists lost a substantial part of their influence after a year of campaigning against the Aden beer brewery, which they called “a center of communism.” This battle was lost in part because many of these fierce enemies of the diabolical brew spent weekends in Aden to enjoy such forbidden pleasures. Still, the struggle against the tribal-Islamist alliance was a trump card in the hands of southern leaders, as it enabled them to boost popularity among traditional constituents who were in a state of utter confusion.

 Political Stability In Yemen

After 1990, a series of convulsive bloodbaths preoccupied the Yemeni body politic.[539] At the same time, the legacy of this history mobilized Yemeni leaders in their quest for effective government, and despite clashes, real progress was achieved. Yemeni leaders applied what they preached by holding elections and, equally important, by tolerating opposition forces.[540] A new level of political stability was attained as Sanaa struggled to uphold minimum human rights standards and raised the level of tolerance for open political discourse.

The London-based human rights organization Amnesty International confirmed that all known political detainees and prisoners were released prior to unification. In its 1991 report, Amnesty claimed that one prisoner of conscience in North Yemen was released in January 1990, but it was not possible to confirm the release or continued detention of another 26 suspected political opponents. Released detainees from both former states alleged torture and ill treatment. Amnesty maintained that the cases of 50 people who “disappeared” in Yemen before unification remained unresolved. Since unification, however, no death sentences were known to have been ratified by the presidential council (although an estimated 300 Yemenis were detained after the 1994 civil war), which commuted eight such sentences in November 1990.[541]

For all the progress that such developments introduced into the political systern, Sanaa faced considerable difficulties as challenges emerged from both left and right following several assassinations. For example, a group of political parties, trade union leaders, and prominent personalities called on the government to launch a full investigation into the killing of Hassan Huraybi, director-general of the Central Highlands rural development project, on 10 September 1991.[542] In a statement issued within hours after the assassination, the group insisted that the authorities were responsible for this incident and demanded that the criminal(s) be apprehended and brought before a court of law. They also warned that lack of government cooperation would open the floodgates of political unrest throughout the country.[543]

When no progress was made in identifying Huraybi’s murderer(s), riots swept the capital in late 1991. Violence raged in Sanaa on 19 October 1991 after an army colonel shot dead a traffic policeman who had pulled him over for failing to stop at a red light. The incident took place in the center of the capital, outside the central bank building, in an area where large numbers of unemployed men sat in cafes. Observers said the shooting acted as a catalyst for rising frustrations at the level ofjoblessness and price increases. Cars and military vehicles were set on fire, and a building in front of parliament was burned. Police used tear gas to quell the demonstrations, and one report from a Western observer claimed that as many as nine people were killed. The government denied this, although demonstrations continued the following day as political parties called for a march to commemorate the fortieth day since the killing of Hassan Huraybi.

A number of political parties, including the League of the Sons of Yemen and the Nasserites as well as the government Yemen Socialist Party (YSP) and General People's Congress, called on citizens not to take part in view of the previous days' events. Nevertheless, the demonstration went ahead with the Tajammu (Yemeni Unionist lance) at its head. Other protesters returned to the central bank area, where they held a rival demonstration. A number of arrests were reported, but the government also announced that it would put the colonel on trial for the incident that had sparked the riots. Since the colonel was from President Saleh's own tribe, the latter was under pressure not to show any signs of favoritism.

It also emerged that Sadiq Abdallah bin Husain, a Republican Party representative and the son of the influential Shaykh Abdallah bin Husain al-Ahmar, escaped an assassination attempt outside Sanaa on 18 October 1991. His car was ambushed and three of his companions were injured. Shaykh Abdallah was head of the Hashid tribe and a leading national figure. Shaykh Naji Abdel-Aziz Al-Shayef, head of the neighboring Baqil tribe, condemned the incident, and Internal Affairs Minister Mujahid Abu Shawarib called for the issue to be sorted out in a neighborly way. Others maintained that the incident was the latest in a series of attempted political assassinations, with the League of the Sons of Yemen blaming the YSP for failing to maintain law and order.[544]

Acts of violence were not limited to major cities. Two groups of heavily armed saboteurs were arrested in Hadhramaut, the official Sanaa weekly 26 Septemher revealed in late 1991, asserting that the groups were discovered with machine guns, land mines, rocket-propelled grenade launchers, and communications equipment.[545] In December 1991, two YSP members were assassinated while attending the opening session of a national conference in Ibb. Naaman Qasim Hassan, a member of the local party secretariat, and Nabil Ghaleb were the latest victims of the ongoing spate of violence in the country. Al-Thawrah, the YSP official magazine, published a report of their killing, which further increased tensions in the country.[546] In fact, between 1990 and 1994, an estimated 150 YSP members were killed in and around Sanaa.[547]

What these disturbances indicated was that unification did not alleviate Yemen's chronic tribal disputes. They also stood as a stark warning to President Saleh and his successors to assume control over internal stability if outside powers, in particular Saudi Arabia, were not to use this excuse to increase their involvement in internal Yemeni affairs. Consequently, and unless Sanaa gained the upper hand in domestic matters, it faced clear threats to its political stability.

Because President Saleh and Vice President al-Baid could not settle their differences, a growing political rift emerged by 1995, when the latter moved back to Aden. Al-Baid asked for specific reforms, and on 20 February 1994—in Amman, Jordan—a "Document of Bond and Agreement" was signed to bury the hatchet. On 3 April, Sultan Qaboos of Oman welcomed the two Yemeni leaders to Salalah, in yet another effort at reconciliation. Little did the Omani know that within a day of that fateful meeting, military confrontation between northerners and southerners would re-start in earnest.[548] Simply stated, the power game was too well entrenched for any document, or handshake, to carry the day.

The 1994 "civil war" that followed caused serious harm to unity but, in a convoluted way, addressed two perennial problems: outside meddling in internal Yemeni affairs and the legitimacy of state institutions. On both scores, unified Yemen's President Saleh won the day, by holding his ground against Saudi support to the YSP and by staking his rule on "total victory."'[549] When, on 21 May 1994, Ali Salem al-Baid announced the establishment of the Democratic Republic of Yemen (DRY)—in effect seceding from the union that was barely four years old—Saleh launched his troops against the "traitors."[550] The move proved to be a last-stand effort that failed, and on 4 July 1994, northern forces occupied Aden and Mukallah. Separatists fled either to Djibouti or Oman, from where they retrenched to other safe havens.

To his credit, President Saleh consolidated his position by proposing several constitutional amendments that strengthened the country's fledgling institutions. Few expected him to challenge the single most powerful organization— the military—reasoning that he could not weaken his own power base. In the event, Saleh de-politicized the armed forces—forcing army officers to resign their party memberships—because he realized that not "uniting" the military after 1990 had been a grave error. Shortly thereafter, the ill-fated Presidential Council was abolished and replaced with an upper house of parliament composed largely of shaykhs and other dignitaries.

Ali Abdallah Saleh managed to reconcile with many southern ex-socialists, who, for one reason or another, accepted to join his successive cabinets after mid-1995. Even Riyadh retrenched and sought to reach an agreement over the long-festering border dispute between the two countries. Although no final accord was signed by mid-1998, Sanaa was confident that one would indeed come about, in the not too distant future. More important, Saleh gained support from various groups that, for a variety of reasons, accepted the inevitability of pluralism. For the first time in several decades, Yemeni leaders accepted to live by democratic rules, opting to gain the consent of the governed.[551]

In the end, unity was ensured, even if the reliance on violence revealed that the union was far from being absolute. Assassinations and an outright civil war underscored Sanaa's inability to impose permanent stability and security without resorting to force. What they indicated was that over six decades of warfare did not diminish the Yemeni appetite for unity. By upholding the rule of law, Saleh surprised many—including himselR—by demonstrating that unity could indeed function, even if it were not perfect.

[492] "Charter of the Cooperation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf," inJohn A. Sandwick, The Gulf Cooperation Council■. Moderation and Stability in an Interdependent World, TSouXAer anAHi؟,- ton, D.C.: Westview Press and American-Arab Affairs Council, 1987, p. 217.

[493] “Foreign Ministers’ Statement on the Founding of the Gulf Cooperation Council,” Al-Hadaf (Kuwait), 5 February 1981, p. 5.

[494] It is not the purpose of this essay to assess the relative successes of the GCC and the post-1990 Yemeni unification but to infer from both whether they increased—or decreased—unity on the Peninsula. Much has been written on the GCC and Yemen in recent years. For a sampling, see: R. K. Ramazani, The Gulf Cooperation Council: Record and Analysis, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1988; Sandwick, op. cit.; Erik R. Peterson, The Gulf Cooperation Council: Search for Unity in a Dynamic Region, Boulder and London: Westview Press, 1988; Emile A. Nakhleh, The Gulf Cooperation Council: Policies, Problems and Prospects, New لآأأةد١د٢علآ٠^٠</sup>لا١ آحلججةآ١(اأا-ل Burrowes, The Yemen Arab Republic: The Politics of Development, 1962—1986, Boulder: Westview Press, 1987; idem, “Prelude to Unification: The Yemen Arab Republic, 1962–90,”) International Journal of Middle East Studies 23:4, November 1991, pp. 483–506; idem, “The Yemen Arab Republic’s Legacy and Yemeni Unification,” Arab Studies Quarterly 14:4, fall 1992, pp. 41–68; Charles Dunbar, “The Unification of Yemen: Process, Politics, and Prospects,” The Middle East Journal 46:3, summer 1992, pp. 456–76; and Eric Watkins and Patrick Makin, “Yemen’s Crisis Threatens the Country’s Unity,” Middle East International, number 463, 19 November 1993, pp. 18–19.

[495] Emile A. Nakhleh, The Persian Gulf and American Policy, New York: Praeger, 1982, p. 22.

[496] For a brilliant essay on this key issue in the conservative Arab Gulf states, see Frank Stoakes, “Social and Political Change in the Third World: Some Peculiarities of Oil-Producing Principalities of the Persian Gulf,” in Derek Hopwood, The Arabian Peninsula: Society and Politics, London: George Allen and Unwin, Ltd., 1972, pp. 189–215.

[497] W R. Campbell and Djamchid Darvich, “Global Implications of the Islamic Revolution for the Status Quo in the Persian Gulf”. Journal of South Asian and Middle Eastern Studies 5:1, fall 1981, pp. 31–51

[498] The four kinds of defensive jihads are: (!)jihad to preserve the territory and community of Islam during an attack by unbelievers; (2) jihad to prevent unbelievers from gaining control over the persons of Muslims; (3) jihad to repel a particular group of unbelievers when it is feared that they might gain ascendancy over a particular group of Muslims; and (4) jihad to evict unbelievers where they had succeeded in conquering Muslim territories. For a full discussion, see ibid.,p. 33. See also E. Kohlberg, “The Development of the Imami Shii Doctrine ofjihad,” Deutsche Morgen Undischen Gesellschaft Zeitschrift 126,1976, pp. 64—86.

[499] Manoucher Parvin and Maurie Sommer, “Dar al-Islam: The Evolution of Muslim Territoriality and Its Implications for Conflict Resolution in the Middle East,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 11:1, February 1980, pp. 1–21.

[500] Iranian sources referred to the 1980–1988 Iran-Iraq War as “imposed,” not only to buttress Iranian innocence but, more important, to solidify the fledgling revolution. In other words, the war allowed clerics to rally public support by combining revolutionary rhetoric with nationalist tendencies. See Dilip Hiro, The Ungest War: The Iran-Iraq Military Conflict, New York: Routledge, 1991, pp. 7–39.

[501] Nakhleh, The Persian Gulf and American Policy, op. cit., pp. 26–40.

[502] For a thorough analysis of internal developments in Bahrain, see Joe Stork, RoutineAbuse, Routine Denial: Civil Rights and the Political Crisis in Bahrain, New York: Human Rights Watch, 1997; see also Bahrain Freedom Movement, Facts About Bahrain, London: BFM, 1997.

[503] Ramazani, ap. cit., pp. 38–42, 200.

[504] Abdallah Muhammad Gharib, Wajaa Dawr al-Majus: Al-Ibad al-Tarikhiyah wal-Aqaidiyah wAl-Siyasiyah lil-Thawra al-Iraniyah [The Iranian Revolution’s Impact on the Historic, Religious and Political Tensions between Sunnis and Shias], Cairo: Dar al-Jil lil-Tabaat, 1981, pp. 320, 323–28.

[505] Faris Glubb, “Kuwait: New Parliament,” Middle East International, number 536, 25 October 1996, p. 14; see also “Fears of Sectarianism Lead to Protest,” Country Report—Kuwait 4: 1996, London: The Economist Intelligence Unit, p. 14; and Shafeeq N. Ghabra, “Balancing State and Society: The Islamic Movement in Kuwait,” Middle East Policy 5:2, May 1997, pp. 58—72.

[506] Abdullah Juma Al-Haj, “The Politics of Participation in the Gulf Cooperation Council States: The Omani Consultative Council,” The Middle East journal 50:4, autumn 1996, pp. 566–68; see ا۽ہد ۽ SAem J:ü\, Omani Islamism:An Unexpected Conjrontation with the Government, OccanX Papers, number 8, Annandale, Virginia: UASR, September 1995.

[507] One source advanced the 80 percent figure for 1980. See R. K. Ramazani, Revolutionary Iran: Challenge and Response in the Middle East, Baltimore and London:Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986, p. 259. Elsewhere, we have a figure as low as 16 percent. See James A. Bill, “Islam, Politics, and Shi’ism in the Gulf,” Middle East Insight 3:3, January/February 1984, p. 6. Since all demographic figures on the Gulf region are suspect, caution must be exercised in evaluating them.

[508] In Ramazani, the figure is 41 percent, whereas in Bill it stands at 18 percent: see ibid., pp. 259 and 6, respectively.

[509] Graham E. Fuller, “Storm Clouds in the Gulf,” The Los Angeles Times, 3 May 1996, p. B13.

[510] Jubin Goodarzi, “Iran’s Arab Policy: A Thaw in the spring,” Middle East International, number 577, 19 June 1998, pp. 18–20. See also R. K. Ramazani, “The Emerging Arab-Iranian Rapprochement: Towards an Integrated U.S. Policy in the Middle East?” Middle East Policy 6:1, June 1998, pp. 45–62.

[511] Peter Ford, “In Saudi Arabia, Political Ferment Bubbles Quietly,” The Christian Science Monitor, 5 June 1991, p. 3. See also Peter w. Wilson and Douglas F. Graham, Saudi Arabia: The Coming Storm, Armonk, New York: M. E. Sharpe, 1994, pp. 60–82; and F. Gregory Gause III, Oil Monarchies: Domestic and Security Challenges in theArab Gulf States, New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1994, pp. 78–118.

[512] J. E. Peterson, “Social Change in the Arab Gulf States and Political Implications,” inj. E. Peterson (ed.), Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, Washington, DC.: Defense Academic Research Support Program and The Middle East Institute, 1988, p. 54.

[513] Ibid.,p. 55.

[514] Mohammad Rumaihi, Beyond Oil: Unity and Development in the Gulf, London: Al-Saqi Books, 1986, pp. 42–43: see also Gause, op. cit., pp. 58–62 and 7075.

[515] J. E. Peterson, op. cit., p. 56.

[516] J. E. Peterson, TheArab Gulf States: Steps Toward Political Participation, New York: Praeger and the Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1988, pp. 12–26; see also Al-Haj, op. cit., pp. 559–71.

[517] Marwan Iskandar, “A New Approach to Gulf Security,” An-NaharArab Report and MEMO 5:7, 16 February 1981, p. l;see also Joseph A. Kechichian, “The Polarization of the Arab World: The Emergence of a New Regional Order,” Middle East Insight 7:5, fall 1991, pp. 20–23.

[518] For two of the better think-pieces on this key issue, see Tim Niblock, “Arab Losses, First World Gains,” and Youssef Choueiri, “Syria and Egypt and the Spoils of War,” both in John Gittings (ed.), Beyond the GulfWarzThe Middle East and the New World Order, London: Catholic Institute for International Relations, 1991, pp. 77–85 and 92–94, respectively.

[519] Joseph Wright Twinam, “The Gulf Cooperation Council: The Smaller Gulf States and Interstate Relations,” in Charles F. Doran and Stephen w Buck, The Gulf Energy, and Global Security: Political and Economic Issues, Boulder and London: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1991, p. 115.

[520] Levon Melikian, “Arab Socio-Political Impact on Gulf Life-Styles,” in B. R. Pridham (ed.). The Arab Gulfand theArab World, London: Croom Helm, 1988, p. 115.

[521] Levon Melikian, “Gulf Reactions to Western Cultural Pressures,” in B. R. Pridham (ed.). The Arab Gulfand the West, London: Croom Helm, 1985, p. 205.

[522] J· E. Peterson, Social Change in the Arab Gulf States and Political Implications, op. cit., p. 48.

[523] For a thorough analysis, see J. E. Peterson, Yemen: The Search for a Modern State, Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982. For a broad analysis of Yemeni society, covering historical, social, religious, political, linguistic, economic, and ethno-musical features, see “Le Yemen, Passe et Present de runite,” Revue du Monde Musulman et de la Mediterranee, number 67, 1993.

[524] “A Country Divided: Yemen Unity Talks Falter,” 8 Days, 8 September 1979, pp. 6–9.

[525] Robert w. Stookey, South Yemen: A Marxist Republic in Arabia, Boulder and London: Westview Press and Croom Helm, 1982, p. 68.

[526] Robin Bidwell, The Two Yemens, Harlow, Essex, and Boulder: Longman and Westview Press, 1983, pp. 294–306.

[527] Abd al-Rahman Al-Baydani, Azmat al-Umma al-Arabiyyah wa Thawrat al-Yaman [The Arab Union Question and the Yemeni Revolution], Cairo: n.p., 1984, especially pp. 787–816.

[528] Norman Cigar, “South Yemen and the USSR: Prospects for the Relationship,” The Middle East fournal 39:4, autumn 1985, pp. 787–92.

[529] “Ideology Blocks Yemens’ Merger,” NewYork Times, 28 January 1982, p. A17.

[530] Abu Bakr al-Saqqaf, “Problemes de FUnite Yemenite,” in Revue du Monde Musulman et de la Mediterranee, number 67, 1993, pp. 95—108.

[531] Gause, op. cit., pp. 161–62.

[532] Simon Edge, YemenzArabian Enigma, MEED Profile Number 7, London: EMAP Business Information Limited, 1992, especially pp. 5–14.

[533] Jean Gueyras, “Yemen: Fragile Unite,” Le Monde, 10 July 1991, p. 7.

[534] Ibid.

[535] “Official Reports 35 Percent of Workers Unemployed,” Joint Publications Research Service Near East and South Asia 91–063, 13 September 1991, pp. 81–83.

[536] Gueyras, op. cit., p. 7.

[537] Abd al Aziz Ibn Qa’id al Masudi, “The Islamic Movement in Yemens,” Middle EastAffairsJournal 2:2–3, winter/spring 1995, pp. 26–55.

[538] Renaud Detalle, “Les Islamistes Yemenites et 1’Etat: Vers “Emancipation,” in Bassma Kodmani-Darwish and May Chartouni-Dubarry, Les Etats Arabes Face â la Contestation Islamiste, Paris: Armand Colin and Institut Francais des Relations Internationales, 1997, pp. 271–310.

[539] Robert D. Burrowes, “The Other Side of the Red Sea and a Little More: The Horn of Africa and the Two Yemens,” in David A. Korn (ed.). The Horn ofAfrica and Arabia, Washington, DC.: Defense Academic Research Support Program and The Middle East Institute, 1990, pp. 63–74; see also Charles F. Dunbar, “Internal Politics in Yemen: Recovery or Regression?” in Jamal s. Al-Suwaidi (ed.), TheYemeni War of 1994: Causes and Consequences, London: Saqi Books for the Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research, 1995, pp. 57–70.

[540] Matthew Gray, “Electoral Politics and the 1997 Elections in Yemens,” Journal of South Asian and Middle Eastern Studies 21:3, spring 1998, pp. 31–47.

[541] Middle East Economic Digest (hereafter MEED) 35:28,19July 1991,p. 32.

[542] “Government Reacts to Sanaa Assassination,” Foreign Broadcast Information Service-Near East and SouthAsia (hereafter FBIS-NES), 91–177,12 September 1991, pp. 19–20.

[543] Fadyah al-Zubi, “Al-Jawi Says: We Have Entered Period of Political Assassinations,” Saivt Al-KuwaytAl-Duwali, 15 September 1991, pp. 1,6, in “Spate of Political Assassinations Predicted,” FBIS-NES-91—184, 23 September 1991, p. 31. Huraybi was shot dead in an ambush in a Sanaa suburb on 10 September 1991. Officials believed that the real target of the killers was Omar Al-Jawi, leader of the Yemeni Unionist Alliance, with whom Huraybi was traveling at the time of the attack. Al-Jawi was wounded. Huraybi’s son believed that his father was targeted in a tribal dispute, however, and the killing caused widespread shock in the capital. There were immediate calls for a ban on firearms in Sanaa even though it was considered impractical, since it is common practice throughout the country to carry guns. But it was likely that the government would consider some form of weapons control legislation to address this growing problem. The strong statement by political leaders—including the representatives of both pre-merger ruling parties— reflected the widespread anxiety about the vulnerability of the country’s fledgling democracy. AL-Jawi’s party was sharply critical of Iraq, and took a more explicit stance against the invasion of Kuwait than the government. Although President Saleh instructed the interior ministry to undertake a full inquiry into the murder, no culprits were arrested. See “Kilhng Shocks Political Leaders,” MEED 35:38, 27 September 1991, pp. 32–33.

[544] “Riots Hit Sanaa as Tensions Mount,” MEED 35:43,1 November 1991, p. 24.

[545] MEED 35:48, 6 December 1991, p. 39.

[546] “Two Members of the YSP Assassinated,” MEED 35:50, 20 December 1991, p. 30.

[547] Patrick Makin, “Yemen: Unlikely Panacea,” Middle East International, number 469, 18 February 1994, pp. 15–16.

[548] Patrick Makin, “Yemen: Regressive Road to Divisions,” Middle East International, number 473, April I994,p. 12.

[549] Mark N. Katz, “External Powers and the Yemeni Civil War,” in al-Suwaidi, op. cit., pp. 81–93.

[550] Alfred Hermida, “Yemen: The South Secedes,” Middle East International, number 476, 27 May 1994, pp. 8–9. Four years after these developments, President Saleh continued to use the “traitor” epithet when referring to al-Baid. Interview with President Ali Abdallah Saleh, Sanaa, Yemen, 31 May 1998.

[551] Ian Williams, “Yemen Comes in from the Cold,” Middle East International, number 538, 22 November 1996, pp. 17–18.

 Forging Institutions in the Gu Arab States

R. Hrair Dekmejian

The quest for legitimacy, in order to provide a moral basis for the retention and exercise of power, is an ongoing process in the evolution of political systems. In today's milieu of increasing globalization, the need for political legitimization has assumed a new urgency, particularly in the modernizing states of the developing world. In its Weberian formulation, legitimization involves the transformation of rule based on power into authority, where rulership is made popularly acceptable through a combination of charismatic, traditional, and legal rational modalities of legitimacy. Such transformation becomes necessary because rulership based on power alone is manifestly inefficient, costly, and undependable in assuring political longevity and stability.[552] Thus, the central problem of rulership becomes how to find the right legitimacy mix—in the words of Mosca and Lasswell—a "political formula" of "stable governance."[553]

In the newly independent developing states, the usual modalities oflegitimization consist of reliance on the charisma of revolutionary leaders and movements and/or appeals to traditional norms and practices, especially in deeply conservative societies, where tribal and religious cultures are prevalent. In the Arab world, Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman AI Saud's legitimacy formula was embedded in the Saudi Arabian traditional nexus of tribalism and Wahhabi Islam, reinforced by his heroic charisma as a victorious prince. A somewhat modified formula obtained in Egypt's non-tribal setting, where Nasser's rule rested on his personal charisma and the pharaonic tradition of omnipotent authority.[554] A host of other developing world leaders, with lesser degrees of success, including Nkrumah (Ghana), Sukarno (Indonesia), Castro (Cuba), Qadhafi (Libya), Mobutu (Zaire), and Numayri (Sudan), used similar formulae. Yet with the passing of the charismatic era, the challenges of modernization have had a withering effect on the old mechanisms of legitimacy, especially because of the reluctance and/or failure of many leaders in building institutions of governance. Such reluctance or failure, to fill the legitimacy vacuum left by the erosion of charisma and tradition, combined with the declining capabilities of ruling elites to provide for the basic needs of rapidly growing populations, has had a destabilizing effect on many emerging societies.

In the Arab context, the building of political institutions has been a tortuous process, often featuring one-party rule backed by the military, or monarchies based on traditional consensual institutions. Thus, political institutionalization based on conciliar bodies and parliaments have been an incremental and cyclical process in most Arab countries.[555] According to Baaklini, Denoeux, and Springborg, however, the situation began to change in the 1990s with a general resurgence of legislative bodies in several key Arab states, which appears to have had a diffusive influence in the Arab orbit.[556] This chapter is an attempt to comparatively assess the emergence and institutional role of assemblies in Kuwait, Oman, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar.

* Common Factors

Despite their obvious commonalities as Arab states, which share cultural bonds and membership in the Gulf Cooperation Council, the four monarchies possess significant differences in wealth, size, and political system. Each constitutes a unique polity formed under particular historical circumstances. Kuwait developed under British tutelage, and soon after independence in 1961, adopted a constitution with an elected parliament. Oman’s modernization was begun after the accession of Sultan Qaboos,who set the stage for experimentation with several advisory institutions, culminating in 1991 with the adoption of a quasielectoral process for a Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura). In Saudi Arabia, from its founding by Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman Al Saud, several deliberative mechanisms were used until 1993, when King Fahd bin Abdul Aziz decreed the appointment of a Consultative Council as an integral part of his Basic Law of Governance. Qatar has been engaged in a liberalization program in recent years. These countries represent four distinct gradations along the “institutionalization spectrum,” phases of a process in institutional development corresponding to the changing political and social environment of each country, and its modernization tempo.

Yet, a unique feature of the Arab Gulf monarchies is that traditional institutions continue to have considerable social vibrancy and political utility, despite the impact of modernization. Therefore, it would be incorrect to posit that the new legislative/consultative organs are meant to radically replace traditional institutions such as tribal councils, religious organizations, or royal conclaves. Rather, the new institutions should be viewed as functioning in tandem with existing institutions or in a supplementary capacity.

Another politically salient feature in the four polities is their internal social complexity. Although culturally united under dual overarching identities as Arabs and Muslims, these societies are highly heterogeneous along tribal, sectarian, and ideological lines.

* Kuwait

The political system of modern Kuwait harks back to the mid-eighteenth century, when the oligarchy of notable families chose the Al Sabah family as rulers. Based on the practice of tribal consensus and consultation (ijma al-qabaili), this system broke down in the late nineteenth century. The growth of Arab nationalism and the rise of a new merchant class prompted Al Sabah Amirs to set up an ineffectual council in 1920. In response to renewed demands, Shaykh Ahmad, the Amir in 1938, consented to the formation of a 14-member National Council elected from 150 families, which drafted an interim constitution to limit the ruler’s power. Shaykh Ahmad rebuffed these efforts and replaced the National Council with an advisory body, which he soon dissolved for its attempts to limit monarchical power. In 1950, the new Amir set up a new assembly of 20 elected and 11 appointed members, to draft a permanent constitution. The document, which provided for a hereditary monarchy (amirate) based on popular sovereignty and certain restrictions on the ruler’s power, was formally adopted in 1962, a year after Britain pulled its military forces out of the northern Gulf. Importantly, the constitution is defined as a “contract” between the ruler and the people, who are represented by the National Assembly; it guarantees personal liberties, the right to social and economic welfare, and freedoms of press, residence, and communication. The National Assembly consists of 50 members, elected for a four-year term, in addition to the cabinet members, who are appointed by the Amir. Members of parliament may question any minister and votes of no-confidence are taken, although only the Amir has the right to call for the prime minister or cabinet to resign. Moreover, the Amir has the power to suspend or dissolve the National Assembly in times of crisis, a prerogative exercised twice since independence. The National Assembly may override the Amir’s veto by a two-third majority.[557]

Despite its small size, Kuwaiti society is segmented along tribal, confessional, and ideological dimensions.[558] The Kuwaiti polity consists of eight tribes, two religious sects, two branches of the ruling family, and several ideological factions and interests, with considerable crosscutting cleavages and overlapping loyalties among them. Since independence in 1961, and the adoption of a constitution in 1962, vigorously competing subgroups and interests within the National Assembly have marked Kuwaiti politics. The 50 members of the National Assembly and the 16 members of the cabinet, 4 of which are elected National Assembly members, constitute a power coalition —which brings together the representatives of virtually all the segments of the Kuwaiti electorate, except women. A detailed breakdown of the affiliations of the 1996 National Assembly members would reflect the diversity of groups, constituencies, and interests that are represented.

 TheTnbal Factors

Tribal representation is one of the most salient dimensions of Kuwaiti politics. In the modern context, tribal membership still constitutes a primary source of identity and pride for a large percentage of Kuwaitis. No less than 28 (56 percent) Assembly members came from various tribal backgrounds. Of the 25 electoral constituencies, tribal majorities populate 13. In 5 of these constituencies, both Assembly members belonged to the same tribe: Awazim (#12, #25), Mutayr (#17), Rawashid (#16), and Ajman (#21). Seven tribal constituencies had split representation, reflecting cohabitation by two dormant tribes: Utaybah/Mutayr (#14), Rawashid/Mutayr (#15), Anaza/Awazim (#18), Mutayr/ Anaza (#19), Ajman/Mutayr (#22), Mutayr/Awazim (#25), and Hawajir/ Dawasir (#24): one tribal constituency elected two non-tribal deputies. In aggregate tribal representation, the Mutayr controlled 7 seats, followed by the Awazim (6), Rawashid (5), Ajman (5), Anaza (2), Utaybah (1), Hawajir (1), and Dawasir (1), although four additional tribal members were elected from the nontribal constituencies. The number of those elected from each of the eight tribes roughly reflected their respective numerical strengths in each constituency because of the tradition of tribal solidarity (asabiyyah), whereby members are expected to vote for their tribal kinsmen.

 Non-Tribal Factors

The non-tribal population, commonly referred to as hadar, includes the traditionally urban merchant class, early immigrants from neighboring countries, and families lacking strong tribal attachments. In all, 12 constituencies were in the hadar category, where diverse tribal individuals constituted a minority population. While non-tribal elements lack the inner solidarity of the tribes, they participate in the political process through membership in a plethora of ideological, religious, and socioeconomic groupings.

 The Sunni vs. Shia Factor

An equally important, and politically significant, factor was the sectarian divide between the Sunni majority (75 percent) and the Shia minority (25 percent). The Sunni majority includes all of the major tribes as well as some of the nontribal population. The Shia population was mostly concentrated in non-tribal constituencies, with a total of 5 Assembly members: 2 members from the mostly Shia constituency (#15), and 5 from the Sunni/Shia split constituencies (#1, n>ו.

 Ideological Groups and Interests

To the right of the ideological spectrum are two Sunni Islamist groups that favor conservative lifestyles and full implementation of Islamic law. Of the two groups, the Salafi Movement is the more conservative, representing the puritanical Wahhabi Hanbali creed associated with the teachings of Shaykh Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Wahhab of Saudi Arabia. A less conservative faction, the Islamic Constitutional Movement (ICM) is the political arm of the Muslim Brotherhood. The combined strength of the Salafi and the Islamic Constitutional Movements, along with a half-dozen pro-Islamists, was about 56 percent of the Assembly’s membership, representing a cohesive opposition bloc to the government and the advocates of liberalization, particularly those pressing for women’s right to vote.

The non-Islamist segment of the Assembly’s ideological spectrum consists of “independents” and supporters of the government, as well as the Kuwait Democratic Forum, which advocates liberalization and government accountability.

About half of the non-Islamic members could be considered government loyalists, the rest being independents and liberals.

Class interests also found representation in the Assembly. While Sunni Islamists provided a representation for less affluent Bedouins, the affluent nontribal districts and the wealthy business families were represented in the Assembly by about a half-dozen deputies.

* Oman

In contrast to the long-term development of Kuwait’s parliamentary system, Sultan Qaboos Al Bu Said promulgated Oman’s Consultative Council (Majlis Al-Shura) only a decade ago. Indeed, the accession of the youthful Sultan to the throne in 1970 marked the onset of unprecedented political and socioeconomic change for one of the world’s most traditional monarchies. The British-educated Sultan decreed a far-reaching modernization program that included the progressive institution of a Majlis system, designed to endow what had been an absolutist monarchy with a degree of popular legitimacy

The first step in opening up the political process was the Sultan’s appointment, in 1981, of a 45-member State Consultative Council (see). The sec consisted of 17 government officials, 11 businessmen, and 17 tribal leaders. In 1983, the SCC’s membership was increased to 55, with the aim of broadening its dual roles as a consultative and a representational mechanism.[559] In their consultative role, the members would provide the Sultan with expert advice on the country's development programs. Equally significant was the Council's representational role in bringing together three of Oman's major constituencies— senior officials, the urban-based business interests, and the tribal elite from small-town/rural areas. Thus, in his choice of Council members, the Sultan had implicitly acknowledged the segmented nature of Omani society and sought to accord representation to each of the three parts.

In December 1991, the Sultan initiated a new "experiment" by establishing a Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura), the members of which were chosen through a two-phase electoral-appointive mechanism based on "the proportion of members necessary for striking the required nationwide representational bAl-ance."[560] The Majlis was constituted as an independent legal and financial entity, with administrative independence from the rest of the government. Each of its 59 members was chosen by the Sultan from a list of three candidates selected by conclaves of provincial notables. The Majlis membership was raised to 79 for its second term in 1994, in which constituencies of 30,000 or more received two seats, in keeping with the fall 1995 national census.[561] For the first time, women were allowed to stand as candidates from the Muscat area, two of whom were eventually elected as Majlis members.

In preparing for the selection of members for the third Majlis, the government sought to build upon the experience of the previous two terms, by instituting measures that ensured "free and fair" voting. In this instance, nevertheless, suggestions for holding direct elections were rejected. In the words of the interior minister, "We have not yet reached that stage in our step by step approach."[562] On 16 October 1997, about 51,000 voters went to the polls to vote by secret ballot for 756 candidates, including 27 women, who were allowed to run in all the provinces for the first time. The nomination of candidates in the 59 provinces was limited to individuals of "social standing" such as tribal leaders, intellectuals, and businessmen, whose names would be submitted to the interior ministry for final approval.[563] Voters could select four candidates from among the participants in each of 23 provinces with over 30,000 people, two of whom would be eventually selected by the Sultan as Majlis members. The 36 less populous provinces would choose two candidates each, one of whom would be tapped for Majlis membership. The final result of this rigorously controlled system of election and selection was an 82-member Majlis representing different segments of Omani society.

A social background analysis of Majlis members reveals the representational sweep of this institution and the great diversity of constituencies represented therein. These include representation based on Oman’s regions, tribes, and sects, as well as gender.

 The Regional and Tribal Factors

All 59 of Oman’s wilayas were represented by one or two members, depending on the size of the population. In view of the geographical comprehensiveness of the representational structure, both urban and rural populations were included, particularly the rich variety of Oman’s tribes.

Tribal representation in the Majlis al-Shura is significantly large, including individuals belonging to both the Ghafiri and Hinawi tribal confederations. Among the 82 Majlis members, at least 75 have tribal identities such as Wahaibi, Hinai, Hikmani, Kaabi, Harthijunaybi, Shuhi, Riyami, Rahbi, Kalbani, Ghaythi, and Ibri. A comparison of the tribal names of Majlis members and a tribal map of Oman reveals a high degree of representation from the country’s tribal roots. In fact even some urban constituencies are represented by members with tribal identities due to the ongoing urbanization of tribal populations in recent decades. In view of the role played by tribal alignments in the history of Oman, a high degree of tribal representation should be considered an essential element to promote national unity and political legitimacy.

 The Religious and Gender Factors

Closely related to tribal representation is the sectarian breakdown of Majlis members. Oman’s indigenous population consists of an Ibadhi majority, a large Sunni minority, and a small Shia community. Considering that the ruling

Al Bu Said family is Ibadhi, balanced sectarian representation becomes a key factor in maintaining national unity and, hence, political legitimacy. There were a total of 48 Ibadhis, 33 Sunnis, and 1 Shia in the 1997 Majlis. These numbers may roughly approximate the sectarian breakdown of Oman's population. It should also be noted that the Majlis speaker, Shaykh Abdullah Al-Qatabi, is Sunni.

Unlike its GCC neighbors, Oman has been a pioneer in introducing female roles into its political system. In the 1997 Majlis, two women made their mark, in keeping with Sultan Qaboos' repeated efforts to increase female involvement in the political process.[564]

* Saudi Arabia

In the Saudi context, the consultative process developed in an uneven fashion, beginning with the eight-member Shura Council of Hejaz in 1927 under King Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman Al Saud.[565] In 1956, King Saud bin Abdul Aziz (1953–64) decreed an expanded Council of 25, but its functions were soon transferred to the cabinet?[566] Nevertheless, traditional forms of consultation, based on tribal consensus, were followed at different levels of Saudi governance.

In August 1995, King Fahd bin Abdul Aziz appointed 60 members to a new Majlis al-Shura, expanded to 90 members in July 1997. The establishment of the Majlis represented an important step toward institutionalizing a consultative process in the Kingdom, at a time of mounting challenges triggered by the 1991 Gulf War, a sharp economic decline, and pressures from Islamist and nationalist critics for reform and political participation. As prescribed by royal decree, the main purpose of the Majlis is to provide advice (nasiha) to the King and otherwise contribute to the development of the Kingdom. The Majlis meets bi-monthly, and its deliberations and advice are held in confidence. There is some evidence that the Majlis has had a considerable impact in shaping the King's decisions.[567] Beyond its general advisory role, the Majlis is permitted to assume a potentially important mediation role between the authorities and the Saudi citizenry. It receives petitions, complaints, and suggestions from the general populace, through its Committee of Petitions (Lajnat al‘Araid), formed in 1995.[568]

In addition to its consultative/legislative and mediative roles, the Saudi Majlis also serves an important representational function, which can be gleaned from a social background analysis of its members. Indeed, King Fahd’s decree identifies certain categories of citizens as participants in the consultative process-—the ulama (Islamic scholars and clergymen), Ahl al ‘Ilm (people of learning), Ahl al-Ra’i (shapers of opinion), and Ahl al-Khibra (experts).[569] These categories are well represented in the Majlis, although a closer scrutiny of the King’s appointments reveals a strategy of wider inclusion aimed at strengthening Saudi legitimacy

 The Conservative and Liberal Factors

The Majlis membership reveals the King’s intent to seek a balance to accommodate both the religious and liberal constituencies of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. About 17 percent of 1997 Majlis members are religious conservatives, most of the rest being liberals or politically colorless.[570] Among conservatives, several Salafis stand out, even if some had protested the Kingdom’s foreign and domestic policies in the early 1990s. Clearly, the King’s intention was to co-opt key Islamist critics, along with some liberal nationalists.

 The Religion Factor

The 1993 Majlis included one Shia member, whereas in the 1997 Majlis, there are two. Although this is not representative of the size of the Shia minority, it demonstrates an important element in the Saudi political process. The two Shia appointees are from the top ranks of academia and the bureaucracy, with doctorates from Western universities. They represent the moderate wing of the Saudi Shia community, and their appointment signals the state’s ongoing policy of accommodating its Shia population—a policy that was initiated in 1993 to satisfy their aspirations for equality and to neutralize the appeal of pro-Iranian revolutionary groups.

 The Regional Factor

An important aspect of the 1997 Majlis is the large group that hails from Najd (44 percent), in view of the political centrality of Riyadh, and the importance of Najd as the ruling family’s home base. The Hejaz claims the second largest group of members (29 percent), most of whom are from the holy urban centers of Makkah and Madinah. The Eastern Province is home to about 9 percent of the members, followed by Asir with 3 percent, and the rest coming from Hail, Jizan, Tabuk, and Al-Baha.[571]

 The Tribal and Class Factors

Although tribal leaders are not by themselves present in the Majlis, about 35 percent of the members come from such major tribes as Anaza, Mutayr, Utaybah, Shammar, Ghamid, Harb, Zahran, and Dawasir. To some extent, the tribal and rural origins of Majlis members indicate that many hail from relatively modest socioeconomic backgrounds, even if most of them may now be considered from the upper middle class. Importantly, the Majlis includes members of notable families and wealthy businessmen, as well as less affluent bureaucrats and academics.[572] No member of the ruling family has been appointed to the Majlis.

* Qatar

Under its new Amir, Shaykh Hamad bin Khalifah Al Thani, the State of Qatar has made unprecedented strides toward democratization through the liberalization of its media, the municipality elections of 1998, and the planned parliamentary elections in the year 2003. Meanwhile, the Qatari Majlis al-Shura has functioned since 1995, as an appointive body.

The Qatari Majlis consists of 35 members who are appointed by the Amir and enjoy parliamentary immunity. It brings together prominent individuals, tribal leaders, businessmen, and senior bureaucrats.[573]

A social background analysis of Majlis members reflects a very large tribal presence—over 80 percent. In addition, several ranking government officials, as well as representatives of some of Qatar's large families and kinship networks, are also represented. Also included are several well-known businessmen. It is notable that one Majlis member is Shia, representing Qatar's minority population.

* Conclusion

Political institutionalization centering on legislative/conciliar assemblies is part of the new wave in the Gulf Arab monarchies. Bahrain and UAE appear to be preparing to follow the pattern set by their neighbors in forming such conciliar bodies. Although the ruler suspended an earlier "experiment" in Manama, and the UAE's federal requirements complicate the appointment of Majalis by individual Emirates, the trend is for more representation. Still, by all accounts, this process of institutionalization is irreversible, even if it is unclear how far it will be permitted to proceed in each country.

Clearly, the Shura Councils of Oman, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia are not as far advanced as the Kuwaiti parliament; and indeed, may develop along different directions. Yet, aside from blatant differences and peculiarities in each case, it is possible to reach a preliminary assessment.

It is clear that beyond their advisory and legislative functions, these "conciliar" bodies play a mediative function between the rulers and the ruled. Moreover, they also play an honorific function to bestow importance upon prominent citizens, and a symbolic function—both domestically and internationally-to "show off' each country's advancement toward modernity. Nevertheless, two further functions emerge from the data presented above that appear in all four of the case studies. These are the representational and co-optative functions, reflecting the consociational nature of these conciliar bodies, which directly contribute to the social stability and political legitimacy of the Gulf Arab monarchies.

[552] H. H. Gerth and c. Wright Mills, From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology, New York: Oxford University Press, 1946, pp. 78—79. See also Robert A. Dahl, Modern Political Analysis, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1963, p. 19.

[553] Harold D. Lasswell, Nathan Leites & Associates, Language of Politics, Cambridge: MIT Press, 1965, p. 12.

[554] R. Hrair Dekmejian, Egypt Under Nasser, Albany, New York: State University of New York Press, 1971, pp. 37–47.

[555] On Egypt, see R. Hrair Dekmejian, “The U.A.R. National Assembly,” Middle Eastern Studies 4:4, July 1968, pp. 361—75. See also Abdo Baaklini, Guilain Denoeux, and Robert Springborg, Legislative Politics in the Arab World, Boulder: Westview, 1999, pp. 1–3.

[556] Baaklini et al., ibid., pp. 1–2.

[557] On the history of Kuwait’s legislative experience, see Abdo I. Baaklini, “Legislatures in the Gulf Area: The Experience of Kuwait, 1961–1976,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 14:3, 1982, pp. 362–68.

[558] On the divisions within Kuwaiti society, see Jill Crystal, Kuwait :The Transformation of an Oil State, Boulder: Westview, 1992, pp. 71–78.

[559] On these developments, see Dale F. Eickelman, “Kings and People: Oman’s State Consultative Council, The Middle East journal 38:1, winter 1984, pp. 68–71. See also Abdullah Juma Al-Haj, “The Politics of Participation in the Gulf Cooperation Council States: The Omani Consultative Council,” The Middle East journal 50:4, autumn 1996, pp. 559–71.

[560] Oman: Political Development and the Majlis Ash-Shura, Washington, D.C.: Independent Republican Institute,July 1999, pp. 17–18.

[561] Ibid.,p. 23.

[562] Press conference by Sayyed Ali bin Hamad Al Busaidi, Washington, DC.: National Press Club, 14 October 1997.

[563] Ibid.,p. 23.

[564] See Embassy of the Sultanate of Oman, “News From Oman: Special Basic Statute Issue,” Washington, D.C.: 1998, p. 4.

[565] Al-Jazirah, 7 July 1997, p. 10.

[566] Al-Riyadh, 8 July 1997, p. 16.

[567] AlSharq al-Awsat, 15 July 1997, p. 5.

[568] Al-Riyadh, 7July 1997,p. 15.

[569] Madawi al-Rasheed, “God, the King and the Nation: Political Rhetoric in Saudi Arabia in the 19905,“1 The Middle Eastjournal 50:3, summer 1996, p. 371.

[570] R. Hrair Dekmejian, “Saudi Arabia’s Consultative Council,” The Middle East journal 52:2, spring 1998, p. 211.

[571] Ibid., pp. 213–15.

[572] Ibid., p. 214.

[573] Dawlat Qatar, Majlis Al-Shura, Doha, Qatar, December 1998, pp. 27–29.

 The GCC States: Internal Dynamics and Foreign Policies

Muhammed Saleh Al-Musfir

Throughout history, the Arabian Gulf region has been an area of contention among various aggressive international powers, which have sought to control this strategic location to safeguard their own vital interests. Alexander the Great was the first to realize the strategic value of the Gulf for the preservation of his vast empire. After conquering Egypt, he reportedly declared: “I shall never be certain of my army’s security in Egypt and the Mediterranean basin as long as the Persians have extended their domination to the Gulf region.”[574] The Macedonian emperor’s pronouncement marked the beginning of the international struggle for the Gulf area, which continues at the dawn of the twenty-first century.

The purpose of this chapter is to analyze the political evolution of the GCC, and the multiple relationships among its six member states, to assess whether Council members are capable of preserving and shaping their own destinies. An effort is also made to assess the GCC's effectiveness and future viability. The analysis that follows is not intended to be comprehensive but to highlight, from an indigenous perspective, various contentions among the six conservative Arab Gulf monarchies. Intrinsic sociopolitical issues are also discussed to identify regional trends that may further shape GCC states' policies toward each other. How the six rulers responded to underlying currents, and how they factored in changing social pressures in their respective societies, mattered far more than many assumed.

* Historical Overview

Because of fundamental changes in the post-1973 period—when substantial increases in the price of oil created significant financial windfalls in the Gulf—Iran, Iraq, and the conservative Arab Gulf monarchies assumed great economic and strategic importance both in regional and international affairs. With the great wealth from oil came increased feelings of insecurity, as several hegemonic powers threatened the stability of the area. Even earlier, especially after the 1968 British announcement that London would leave the Gulf by late 1971, the smaller Gulf states began to seriously examine mutual cooperation and collective self-defense schemes. During the late 19705 and early 1980s, seven major regional and international developments pushed the Arab Gulf states further to accelerate their search for regional cooperation. In May 1981, the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC)-Majlis al-Taawun li-Duwal al-Khalij al-Arabiyyah—was established, at the GCC states' first summit meeting, in Abu Dhabi. The significant developments that persuaded Gulf rulers to accelerate their search and settle on specific steps included:

1. the insecurity generated by the world energy crisis,

1. the anxiety resulting from the new wealth of the Gulf countries,

1. the epoch-making 1979 Iranian revolution,

1. the December 1979 Soviet invasion and occupation ofAfghanistan,

1. the rise of “Islamic militancy” in several countries,

1. the start of the Iran-Iraq War in September 1980, and

1. the ongoing Arab-Israeli conflict, especially the repercussions of Israeli power throughout the Middle East, painfully displayed in Lebanon.[575]

In response to these significant developments, the six GCC countries—Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, Oman, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE)—embarked on their boldest initiative yet. While the actual and minute accomplishments of the GCC since May 1981—ranging from common postal accords to increased investment laws for GCC citizens—are too numerous to cite, the most important exploit has been the mere fact of joining six competitors into a regional alliance. Given the legacy of the region, especially after centuries of foreign control, GCC rulers made conscious efforts to slowly trust their counterparts. In time, and non-negligible shortcomings notwithstanding, they certainly displayed a willingness to cooperate in many important areas. During the last two decades of the twentieth century, the GCC’s numerous steps strongly influenced—in some cases, directly affected—both internal and external politics in all six member states and, in doing so, created an entirely new environment for their successors. Inevitably, their emerging outlooks affected all GCC states’ foreign policies, security affairs (both internal as well as external), and economic methods.

It is important to emphasize that while GCC states did not always adopt identical policies, they were more structurally immersed in formulating closer steps than heretofore experienced. In other words, while each member state exercised a degree of independence in formulating a specific policy, over time far more coordination occurred among all six than anyone anticipated or believed possible.

Among the more important foreign policy accomplishments, for example, GCC rulers coordinated their opposition to the Israeli presence in Lebanon, the West Bank, and Gaza; rejected the Soviet presence in Afghanistan and South Yemen in toto; backed the Fahd peace plan (also known as the Fez Plan) to settie the Arab-Israeli dispute; and adopted joint policies vis-â-vis the Iran-Iraq War. All four were laden with controversy, but, at least on this score, GCC rulers found common ground as they formulated appropriate responses. In fact, the nexus that emerged—on these four issue areas—stood out within the larger Arab world, further illustrating GCC states' political advances.

Still, GCC states were far less successful in defense cooperation, an area that touched upon their very survival.[576] What was agreed upon were vague notions calling for defense cooperation to deny the area to "foreign" powers. To be sure, there were sharp disagreements among members on GCC states' relations with the great powers. While some called for non-alignment in defense matters, others were pressing for specific accords with Western powers, including the United States.

Another important area of limited GCC accomplishments was internal security. By all accounts, GCC states were unable to agree on full cooperation in internal security matters, as a draft internal security agreement (ISA)prepared in 1982-—could not be implemented. In the event, the ISA could not be adopted because several states, including Kuwait, found it to be too restrictive on their individual freedom. ISA rules called for cross-border pursuits that were frowned upon for potential violations of sovereignty and territorial integrity. Because all six could not adopt the ISA, member states entered into watered-down bilateral accords, with mixed results.

Somewhat more successful were the GCC's efforts to promote economic cooperation.[577] In late 1982, an economic agreement was approved, which provided for joint planning and development in several sectors—petroleum, investments, and housing. Even more successful were the GCC's efforts in social cooperation. As tribally based Arab countries, the GCC states enjoyed the advantages of common culture, language, and religion. On these scores, at least, progress could be—and was—forthcoming in the development of mutually beneficial social, cultural, and educational programs. Conferences, festivals, and regular scientific exchanges became the norm rather than the exception. Given the substantial progress in these areas, one may indeed anticipate that continued social and cultural integration could increase opportunities for more successful efforts in establishing political and economic unity.

* The GCC Structure

The expressed structural aim of the GCC is to achieve a “confederal” union through coordination, integration, and amalgamation in different fields of human endeavor. As such, the organization is hierarchical in nature, presided over by a Supreme Council, itself composed of the heads of states, who rotate as president on an annual basis. At the second level, where most of the organization’s joint decisions are reached, is the Ministerial Council, consisting of the foreign ministers, who meet periodically throughout the year. A secretary-general appointed to renewable three-year terms and six directors supervising 23 departments lead a Secretariat, headquartered in Riyadh. Because of the requirement of unanimity in the GCC’s charter, all substantive matters discussed in the Supreme Council and the Ministerial Council are subject to mutual veto. Hence, GCC operations are usually carried out through consensus, and rely on incrementalism.[578]

* Relations among GCC States

If the organization is somewhat handicapped by internal decision-making requirements, member states are free to conduct bilateral relations unhindered. There are, nevertheless, several factors that shape those ties that, in turn, affect both bilateral as well as multilateral contacts. These include the key inter-dynastic ties that pepper the Arabian Peninsula, long-standing tribal relations, festering boundary disputes that prevent coordination and cooperation, narrow foreign policy orientations that may be temporary in nature (but that affect one or more members directly), wider Arab policy obligations, sectarian limitations that handicap both rulers and subjects, economic ties and oil policies, and, finally, strategic and arms procurement policies.[579] These contentions direct how GCC states behave with each other and, in turn, how such contacts affect the region as a whole. Some of these major bilateral issues—in no specific order—are highlighted, to better identify specific trends on the Arabian Peninsula.

 Saudi Arabia-Kuwait

This relationship is cemented by the common Anazi tribal roots of the Al Saud and Al Sabah ruling families, as well as their shared apprehensions of non-GCC powers. Despite common characteristics, differences remain, including Kuwait's refusal to sign the GCC's internal security agreement, and Saudi Arabia's consternation with the Shaykhdom's somewhat liberal social and political outlook. Moreover, Kuwait is opposed to accepting the Saudi predisposition to ignore past inter-Arab tensions, particularly the enmities generated by Iraq's 1990 takeover of Kuwait. Although the Kingdom supported the 1991 war against Iraq, the Al Sabah remain apprehensive of their hegemonic neighbor. The unsettled status of two islands—Umm al-Maradim and Qaru—that may hold substantial oil deposits is a further potential source of conflict between the two.[580]

 Saudi Arabia-UAE

Although the disputes over the Buraimi Oasis and the Khawr al-Udayd inlet were resolved in the mid-1980s, additional boundary problems remain to be settled between the two countries. The UAE's leading ruling families—Al Nahyan, Al Makhtoum, and Al Qawasim—are non-Najdi an, thus not tribally linked to the Al Saud. Among the various contentions between the Kingdom and the AE, none were as problematic as the 1999 discord, over the Saudi-Iranian rapprochement. Because of Iran's continued occupation of three strategic UAE islands (Abu Musa and Greater and Lesser Tunbs, which were first occupied in 1971), Abu Dhabi vociferously protested Riyadh's "friendly" discourse with Teheran. Indeed, the Emirates demanded that a settlement of the Islands issue be a precondition for establishing closer ties with Iran by any of its GCC partners. Faced with the continued normalization of Saudi (and other GCC states') relations with Iran, the UAE responded by accelerating its decision to reopen its “suspended” diplomatic mission in Baghdad, in April 2000.

 Saudi Arabia—Bahrain

The historical ties between the Al Khalifah and the Al Saud ruling families is based on their common membership in the Utub branch of the Anaza. Over the years, and primarily because of Manama’s security concerns—about revolutionary Iran and the domestic turbulence of the mid-1990s—Bahrain has come to rely on Saudi Arabia for protection. Equally important, Riyadh provided substantial economic assistance, in the form of crude oil and significant trade. In turn, Manama, which was physically attached to the mainland through a bridge in the mid-1980s, provided the Saudi Eastern Province population additional trade outlets. A point of friction remains between the two sides, over the status of Abu Saafah island, claimed by both.[581] Although Bahrain’s recent liberalization policies may arouse some concerns in the more conservative Kingdom, Saudi Arabia’s rapprochement with Iran over Gulf security has had a calming influence on Shia opposition groups in both countries.

 Saudi Arabia—Qatar

By all outward indications, Saudi-Qatari relations appear to be amicable. Yet, there remain a cluster of border disputes that are unresolved. One potentially troublesome issue is that of the Khawr al-Udayd inlet—providing the Kingdom access to the Gulf—which was ceded to Saudi Arabia by the UAE, without Qatari consent. As to the disputed Khafus area on the land boundary, the treaty negotiated in the mid-1990s has not been made public, a fact pointing to remaining disagreements. Equally important, several foreign policy differences exist, as Qatar maintains normal ties with Iraq and has developed trade contacts with Israel, both unwelcome in Riyadh. In addition, and surprisingly, Doha sided with the Yemeni president Ali Abdallah Saleh in the 1994 civil war in that country. Senior Saudi officials perceived that development in negative terms. When Qatar took a leading role in hosting the 1997 Middle East Economic Summit, Saudi Arabia led a concerted boycott. Moreover, Qatar’s decision to take its border dispute with Bahrain to the International Court of Justice was also opposed by Saudi religious authorities, indicating Riyadh's disapproval.[582] Since 1996, Qatar's liberalization efforts have also met with Saudi displeasure, particularly the epoch-making Al-Jazeera television broadcasts that have galvanized public opinion throughout the Arab and Muslim worlds. Adding insult to injury, "elections" to the municipal council, as well as suffrage for women—even important appointments to positions of leadership by several women—were met by Saudi officials with some apprehension. In a surprise move, in March 2001, Doha and Riyadh signed a pact to end various border disputes even if no details were made public.[583]

 Saudi Arabia—Oman

In its relations with the Kingdom and other GCC states, Oman has been considered as the sharik al-mukhalif (the contrarian partner), particularly in foreign policy. Oman's ties to Israel, Iraq, and Iran have been at odds with the general direction of Saudi foreign policy. On the matter of Gulf security, the Kingdom opposed the 1994 Omani proposal for an integrated GCC force of 100,000 troops, fearing that a majority would be volunteers from the Sultanate.[584] Similarly, Oman expressed misgivings about Saudi defense minister Prince Sultan's Dara al-Jazirah (Peninsula Shield) scheme as a viable Gulf defense mechanism.[585] Although the two countries demarcated their borders, the Kingdom has expressed concerns about the 1992 Oman-Yemen border treaty, which, allegedly, grants Yemen questionable concessions that, from the Saudi perspective, may be Saudi land. Another potentially troublesome issue is the doctrinal antipathy between Saudi Unitarianism (the Muwahhidun creed within the Sunni Hanbali school of religious doctrine) and Omani Ibadhism, which briefly flared up in the early 1990s.[586]

 Kuwait-UAE

Relations between Kuwait and the UAE have been generally amicable, in part because the two countries do not share borders, and because Kuwait devoted substantial financial resources to the seven Emirates starting in the 1950s. While Abu Dhabi acknowledges the financial assistance provided by Kuwait well after the UAE's 1971 independence, the two countries differ on several foreign policy matters. For example, the recently re-established diplomatic ties between Abu Dhabi and Baghdad were not well received in Kuwait. Furthermore, Al Sabah officials have questioned Shaykh Zayed's repeated calls for a rapprochement with Iraq, notwithstanding any humanitarian motives that the latter may have expressed.

 Kuwait—Oman

Although the Sultanate and Kuwait have had generally amicable relations, several issues divide them, particularly in foreign and security policy. Muscat's uninterrupted diplomatic tie with Iraq, despite the 1990 Iraqi invasion and takeover of Kuwait, has met Kuwaiti disapproval. The Shaykhdom had also opposed Sultan Qaboos' 1994 proposal to establish a GCC defense army of 100,000 troops, because of the likelihood that Omani soldiers would make up a large portion of this force. Even Oman's close relations with Egypt were not looked at with favor, given Kuwait's 1991 objections to an Egyptian military presence in the Gulf—the Egyptian assistance to liberate the Shaykhdom notwithstanding.

 Kuwait—Qatar

Although there are no major contentions between Kuwait and Qatar, their relationship lacks both depth and warmth. Despite the performance of Qatari troops against Iraq during the 1991 war—at the battle of Khafji in particular—Kuwait has tended to downplay the Qatari role, evoking disappointment and even some anger from the Qatari media. In addition, Kuwait has been critical of Qatar's liberalized media policies because of the latter's sympathy with the suffering Iraqi people. In late 2000, Kuwait temporarily suspended the Al-

Jazeera television correspondent's broadcasting privileges from the shaykhdom, further increasing Qatari antipathies. Nor does Kuwait approve of normalized ties between Doha and Baghdad. Finally, Kuwait has traditionally sided with Bahrain on the latter's territorial conflict with Qatar, which, understandably, further muddies diplomatic waters between the two GCC partners.

 Kuwait—Bahrain

This has been an amicable relationship in recent years, mainly because of the absence of territorial disputes. Kuwait has extended to Bahrain considerable economic aid and appears to favor Manama in its territorial dispute with Doha. Yet their close ties did not prevent Bahrain from re-establishing diplomatic relations with Baghdad in March 2000.

 Oman—Qatar

Omani-Qatari ties are normal in the absence of border disputes and other fundamental contentions. Qataris admire the Omani administrative system, although the two states are competitors in the rapidly emerging East Asian energy markets, as both states intend to sell substantial quantities of natural gas to India and other developing markets.

 Oman—Bahrain

Relations between the Sultanate and Bahrain date from the nineteenth century, when Bahrain was under Omani rule. No major issue has divided the two sides in recent years, and normal relations have prevailed between the two ruling families.

 Oman—UAE

In historical terms, and despite certain interpretations, the UAE constitutes an extension of Oman. To be sure, normal relations have prevailed, especially after the two countries became truly independent after 1971, although several border “disputes” between various Emirates and the Sultanate remain unsettled. Oman’s boundary disputes with the Emirates of Ras al-Khaimah, Umm Al-Qiwain, Ajman, Sharjah, and Fujairah remain in limbo. Still,

Abu Dhabi and Oman did reach a resolution of their overall border concerns in February 2000, with the exception of the Umm al-Zumun enclave, which is claimed by Abu Dhabi, Saudi Arabia, and Oman.[587] In the event, the latest accord was not made public, which may bode ill. Another foreign policy contention is Oman's close relations with Iran, which was formalized into a security treaty in April 2000. Not surprisingly, the treaty is opposed by the UAE, because of the Iranian occupation of Abu Musa and the two Tunb islands. Equally unsettling, at least for Muscat, is Abu Dhabi's acquisition of advanced US. weapons systems (especially 80 F-16s) that are perceived by Oman as potentially provocative.

 Qatar-Bahrain

Relations between these two small states are the most disruptive within the whole GCC structure. At the root of their differences is the eighteenth-century Al Khalifah family "occupation" of Zubarah, in northern Qatar, and the subsequent British control of the region. What had been a dormant issue under British rule flared up after independence in 1971. Today, a group of 16 islands, including Hawar, Fasht al-Dibal, and Fashtjaradah, all of which are controlled by Manama on the grounds of historical sovereignty—but claimed by both—stand as concrete evidence of conflict. In both 1978 and 1983, the two countries engaged armed confrontations, after which they requested Saudi mediation. Faced with lack of progress, in 1994 Doha appealed to the International Court ofjustice (ICJ), a plea that was rejected by Manama.[588] When the ICJ agreed to take on the case, Bahrain reluctantly accepted to participate, but made a counterclaim citing its historical right to rule Zubarah and its inhabitants, mostly of the Nuaym tribe, most of whose members lived in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, and the UAE. Signaling its displeasure with the Qatari appeal to the ICJ, the Bahraini chief justice (a religious cleric) expressed his full support of the late Shaykh bin Baz's fatwa (published in Saudi Arabia), on the illegality of a non-Muslim court to decide on a matter between Muslim states.[589] These differences notwithstanding, Qatar and Bahrain have sought reconciliation through mutual visitations and economic and cultural cooperation, especially after the accession of two young rulers in 1996 and 1998, respectively. In early 2000, the ICJ rendered a decision agreeable to both countries, granting the Hawar islands to Bahrain and Zubarah to Qatar. Several reefs will be divided among the two countries.[590] Although some Gulf observers anticipate further difficulties, both rulers have embraced the peaceful resolution of this longstanding dispute, even if the ruling was bittersweet. In Shaykh Hamad’s own words:

Allow me to be frank with you as I have always been: The court award in this respect was not easy upon US. These Islands have a great standing in the hearts of our people, a standing that is deeply rooted in the history of this country and the keenness of its sons to be bound to each grain of its soil. However, despite the pain we feel we think that the court award has, anyway, put an end to the dispute between the two states, and we can now put that dispute, which has become part of history, behind US.[591]

 Qatar-UAE

Most contentions between Qatar and the UAE have been amicably settled. The major exception is the dispute over the Khawr al-Udayd inlet, which was ceded by Abu Dhabi to Riyadh without consultations with, much less approval from, Qatar. In the foreign policy arena, the UAE has had strong reservations about Qatar’s ties with Iran, and nascent commercial ties with Israel.

 Bahrain—UAE

Good political and economic ties exist between these two states. Manama is especially close to Abu Dhabi because of the latter’s financial assistance and, over the years, encouragement to employ Bahrainis in various UAE government positions.

* Assessments and Conclusions

Any assessment of the GCC’s effectiveness, on both the bilateral as well as multilateral levels, must first and foremost analyze the behavior of its members since its founding two decades ago. The regional organization was conceived as an alliance even if it portended to behave as a collective security system, which, in summary, reveals far more than most GCC states' citizens and officials were willing to acknowledge.

 Foreign Policy

In the foreign policy arena, the GCC states declared that they aimed to coordinate and unite their foreign policies, although coordination proved far more difficult than anticipated. With the exception of their united positions to oppose the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, the GCC states could not realize pressing issues, including their perspectives on Iran and Iraq. To be sure, member states had major foreign policy differences during their first decade as an alliance—Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Qatar, and Oman were pro-West, while the UAE and Kuwait tended toward non-alignment. As the Soviet Union collapsed and the Socialist bloc declined in numbers and value, it was not surprising to witness an American victory—by leading a formidable coalition to liberate Kuwait—that, without a doubt, led to the rise of the United States as the sole hegemon in the Gulf region. Ironically, the GCC states have accommodated themselves to the expanded U.S. presence in the region, despite earlier reservations. While the U.S. presence had been limited to Bahrain and Oman until the 1991 war, since then it has expanded as well to include Saudi Arabia, Qatar, and Kuwait. This victory and considerable presence notwithstanding, GCC member states, individually, reassessed their regional ties. In fact, a mere decade after the War for Kuwait, the GCC s united front against Iraq has broken up, with only two sovereign states (Saudi Arabia and Kuwait) without direct diplomatic ties with Iraq.

 Defense Policy

If progress in major foreign policy issues was limited, little has also been achieved in formulating a unified GCC defense policy, especially after the 1991 Kuwait conflict. The pre-war GCC defense project—Dara al-Jazirah (Peninsula Shield)—was too small for an integrated force. Moreover, it was inadequately trained to constitute a viable military organization, especially after GCC heads of state rejected Sultan Qaboos' 1994 recommendation to enlarge it to a 100,000-rnan army. Instead, Saudi Arabia proposed the expansion and modernization of the Dara al-Jazirah.[592] Because both defense schemes have proven to be stillborn, each GCC government has relied on its bilateral defense ties with key Western powers. At their December 2000 summit in Riyadh, GCC heads of state approved a new defense accord homing on the establishment of an updated rapid deployment force along with coordination of military training and expenditures.[593] It may be too early to determine how fruitful this new cooperative venture might be.

 Economic and Oil Policies

Although a unified economic agreement was accepted and implemented starting in 1982, there has been far more planning and analysis than actual implementation in unifying the GCC states' economic and oil policies. Indeed, it has been difficult to achieve economic cooperation because GCC economies are not complementary, and member states often engage in mutual competition in their industries. The customs union, for example, which was approved by the 1999 summit meeting, is not to be implemented until the year 2005. In setting oil production and pricing policies, GCC states are often in disagreement and, as such, are unable or unwilling to forge a common front to meet constant Western pressure.

 Arab Policies

Finally, in the all too vital Arab political arena, and since the War for Kuwait, GCC member states' ties to the larger Arab sphere have generally declined. Except for the UAE and Qatar, which have called for Arab summit meetings to prevent a full Arab fragmentation, the other GCC states have discouraged attempts at unified Arab action. Since Kuwait's reluctance to adhere to the 1991 Damascus Declaration, for example, no joint Syrian-Egyptian military presence in the Gulf could be exercised. In the alternative, no effort to forge a viable Arab security program emerged, thereby ensuring a Western presence in the region. Support for the Palestinian cause notwithstanding, particularly after the second intifada, the Amman League of Arab States summit meeting in March 2001 unraveled over the adoption of a unified Iraq policy.[594]

* Future Trends

Given present power realities within the GCC framework, it is clear that the member states will be unable to provide for their individual or collective security in the foreseeable future.[595] Thus, the presence of foreign forces is likely to become a permanent feature in most GCC countries. The GCC's security dilemma is further complicated by the looming threat of a full-scale nuclearization of the region, where Israel, India, and Pakistan are already adequately equipped, and Iran aspiring to the same status. Parallel to this measurable development, GCC states' citizens perceive with great apprehension the growing Israeli presence in the Gulf area, as well as the large number of foreigners in the workforce.

Due to the phenomenal growth of educational institutions and universities, coupled with the perceptible impact of the communication revolution, a far better informed citizen pool has now emerged in the Gulf. As a result, public opinion has become a significant factor, impacting on government decisions in various ways. Undeniably, public opinion is being shaped by satellite television stations like Al-Jazeera from Qatar, one consequence of which is a growing desire for greater political participation. Cases in point are the 1998 Qatari decision to grant women full rights to participate in municipal elections, as well as Shaykh Jaber Al Sabah's decree to grant Kuwaiti women the right to participate in National Assembly elections starting in 2003. Oman took similar decisions in the early 1990s.

Under the circumstances, and according to Ibtisam Suhail al-Kutbi, a well-known feminist scholar and commentator, the necessity of constitutional reforms, including women's rights, has emerged as a major factor shaping public opinion in the GCC states, including Saudi Arabia.[596] In turn, a growing public interest in political participation translates into pressure upon GCC regimes to democratize, reduce corruption, achieve a fairer distribution of wealth, and make themselves more accountable to their citizens. With the rapid growth of GCC populations, and the reduction of economic benefits by all six regimes, public demand for political participation and government accountability is expected to increase even further.

In response to changing popular attitudes, several GCC states have taken some tentative steps toward greater openness. Qatar has begun a far-reaching effort to draft a permanent constitution and hold parliamentary elections in 2003. Bahrain, under the leadership of Shaykh Hamad bin Isa, has freed political prisoners as a prelude to a return to constitutionalism. Even in Saudi Arabia, and ever since 1993, the Majlis al-Shura has shown some promise of expanded participation, which may include women members in the near future.[597] Likewise, Oman's liberalizing experiment since the early 19905 and its semi-elected Majlis al-Shura constitute important steps in building a new type of political systern. Finally, in the Emirates, there has been a significant liberalization of the press and electronic media, as well as a greater role played by women in the state bureaucracy and the private sector.

Thus, in the context of the contemporary milieu of globalization, the diverse trends—social, political, economic, and cultural—throughout the six conservative Arab Gulf monarchies are bound to transform the GCC states to various degrees. What the full impact of these changes will be is difficult to forecast. Suffice it to say that the GCC, as a regional organization, is probably unlikely to prove its full capabilities. In the end, it will be up to each individual state to accomplish finite objectives, while balancing the needs of the regimes with those of citizens.

[574] Dawlat al-Imarat al-Arabiyyah al-Muttahidah, Al-Kitab alSanawi [United Arab Emirates Yearbook], Abu Dhabi, UAE: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1972, p. 94.

[575] Muhammad al-Sayyid al-Said Idris, Iqlim al-Khalij [The Gulf Region], Beirut: Markaz Dirasat Al-Wahdah al-Arabiyyah, 1999, p. 162.

[576] Abdallah al-Nafisi, Majlis al-Taaumn al-Khaliji [The Gulf Cooperation Council], London: Ta-Ha Press, 1982,pp. 16–17.

[577] Al-Said Idris, op. cit., p. 162.

[578] R. Hrair Dekmejian, “Prospects for the Growth and Influence of the Gulf Cooperation Council,” Washington, DC., 1985, pp. 58–77.

[579] Ibid.,p. 13.

[580] Nisrin Murad Taqi, Al-Ittihad (Abu Dhabi), 20 February 2000, p. 8.

[581] Ibid.

[582] Riad Najib El-Rayyes, Riyali alShamalAlSaudiyyah wal-Khalij wal-ArabjiAlam al-Tisinat [North Wind: Saudi Arabia, the Gulf and the Arabs in the Nineties], London: Riad El-Rayyes Books Ltd., 1997, p. 60.

[583] “Saudi, Qatar end border dispute, sign pact,” Reuters, March 21,2001.

[584] El-Rayyes, op cit., p. 60.

[585] Ibid.

[586] R. Hrair Dekmejian, Islam in Revolution, 2nd edition, Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1995, p. 159.

[587] Nisrin Murad Taqi, op. cit., p. 8.

[588] El-Rayyes, op. cit., p. 54.

[589] Ibid., p. 62.

[590] “Gulf Arabs welcome ruling on Qatar, Bahrain dispute,” Reuters, March 17, 2001.

[591] AlSharq (Doha),March 17,2001,p. 1.

[592] El-Rayyes, op. cit., pp. 61–62.

[593] Rawhi Abeidoh, “Gulf council states discuss rapid deployment force,” Reuters, December 30, 2000.

[594] Suleiman Khalidi, “Arab summit, split on Iraq, backs Palestinians,” Reuters, March 28, 2001.

[595] Muhammad Saleh Al-Musfir, “Security Challenges in the Gulf Cooperation Council,” Majallat Kulliyat al-Idarah wal-Iqtisad, University of Qatar, 1998, pp. 10–15.

[596] Ibtisam al-Kutbi, Al-Ittihad (Abu Dhabi) 2 March 2000, p. 16.

[597] R. Hrair Dekmejian, “The Saudi Consultative Council, ’و The Middle East Journal 52:2, spring 1998, pp. 204–218ː see also Amir Talal Al Saud in Al-Quds al-Arabi, 27 March 2000, p. 7.

 The Gulf States and Western Powers

 Chapter 19: Constants and Variations in Gulf-British Relations

Gerd Nonneman

Past and future trends in British-Gulf relations need to be seen in the context of (1) British foreign policy interests at the global and regional levels and (2) the broader foreign policy interests of the Gulf states. It needs to be recognized that these interests are multiple and varying—both between countries and across time. The context also has to encompass changes in the regional and global systerns. While all of this has brought differences and variations in policy output, and therefore in relations, there are nevertheless a number of larger themes that can be identified.

Key categories to be factored in when considering the Gulf side of the equation are (1) the nature of the Gulf regimes and economies, (2) the nature of the regional system in the Gulf, and (3) the changing nature of the global system. Within these categories, two observations stand out. First, there is a clear difference between (i) Iraq, (ii) Iran, and (iii) the other Gulf states. Second, in all three, there has been a shifting balance between external constraints and relative autonomy.

The aims pursued on both sides have been and will continue to be driven by pragmatic calculations of raison d’etat. In the case of the Gulf states, these center on (1) economic interest, (2) external security, and (3) domestic security. For the Gulf states, in fact, the concern with both external and internal security is key, and indeed arguably encompasses economic matters.

In the case of Britain, the main, inter-related concerns are economic interest and considerations of global politics and security. Three particular contextual features stand out: (1) Britain’s historical connection with the Gulf, (2) the increasingly significant European dimension, and (3) the British relationship with the United States—both ally and rival in the Gulf.

* British Foreign Policy and the Gulf

British foreign policy has of course undergone a dramatic shift in the post-1945 era. The loss of empire—starting in India and virtually ending with the withdrawal from the Gulf in 1971—brought with it attempts to find a new role, chiefly to adapt to the country’s post-imperial status’ In a sense, the entry into the European Community and the withdrawal from the Gulf can be seen as two sides of this coin, along with the construction of the Commonwealth and, probably more importantly, the development of the “special relationship” with the United States. Two key elements underlying policy were, unsurprisingly, the pursuit of economic advantage and the achievement of security. These were accompanied, however, by a third: the maintenance of a semblance of Britain’s Great Power status, both because this helped in the achievement of the first two goals and because of a historical sense of Britain’s place in the world, which continued to inspire many policymakers. The development of the “special relationship” served the security and status objectives. The belated entry into the EC was recognition that the developing grouping had become a complementary avenue toward securing the status objective as well as that of economic security. A specific, and unquestioned, aim has been maintenance of Britain’s status as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council. There is a mutual (if partial) link between this aim and Britain’s retention of its comparatively large military establishment and capability in force projection.

As the post-war era progressed, the economic and security aims became increasingly intertwined in the area of energy supplies, especially from the Gulf. After India’s independence, the British presence in the Gulf served both the economic interest and a lingering imperial ambition. From the 1970s, British interests in the Gulf were pursued through maintenance of traditional links with the conservative ruling regimes, and through an increasing reliance on the United States. This latter relationship, however, remained competitive as much as cooperative, especially in the commercial field—

London having already largely lost out in oil concessions to Washington and the local states themselves.

In the pre-1945 era (and indeed up to the independence of India), Britain's key reasons for its Gulf presence also included strategic considerations. Indeed, the Gulf was half-way on the routes to the empire's jewel in the crown; this meant it was not only a useful stopover and refueling point, it also brought greater concern over competition for the region from other powers, such as Holland, Russia (later the Soviet Union), and Germany. But in this period too, commerce and, increasingly, access to resources were central to Britain's interests in the Gulf. As has been observed elsewhere, it was the British that were most effective at controlling the sea routes and trade to the Indies. As one of the northernmost European countries, Britain paid the highest prices for spices and therefore had major incentives to control the trade. The British ... established workable relationships with local rulers.[598]

In the latter point, one theme of this chapter is already foreshadowed: Britain was successful, in part, because it managed relations with the local rulers successfully. In other words, local actors, even if much the weaker party, did have a certain level of autonomy.

With the shift from coal to oil, which got under way from the First World War, Britain was faced with two countervailing forces. On the one hand, it did not dominate oil sources to the extent it had done for coal and coal trading stations. On the other, oil was becoming crucial to economic activity and military deployment—and Mesopotamia and Persia had shown great promise of reserves. An early decision to try and achieve independence from American oil resulted in a pursuit of exclusive control of these oil fields, and in the link-up with the then small, private Anglo-Persian Oil Company (APOC), which swiftly became a major, government-backed player. Yet Britain never succeeded in controlling the level of oil reserves that could have become the basis for the sort of dominance it had enjoyed in the days of coal. The crucial role of oil was highlighted by Britain's military operations in the Middle East during World War II: These were to a large extent aimed at securing allied oil supplies.[599] The war would also mean economic exhaustion for Europe (including Britain). Just as important, the post-war reconstruction and development needs led to an energy crisis in Europe, “dramatically increasing Europe’s dependence on Middle Eastern oil.”[600] This is the context in which Britain’s opposition to the Iranian nationalist government of Mossadegh and its nationalization ofAPOC must be understood. At the same time, of course, Middle Eastern oil was now increasingly seen as of strategic importance even for the United States. With the emergence of the Cold War and with Britain a close NATO ally, the security of oil supplies from the Gulf remained a matter of global strategic importance. Even with the development of Britain’s own oil resources, this indirect economic and strategic interest, in a global context, remained.

From the second half of the nineteenth century, the effect of British protection, subsidies, and boundary drawing in the Gulf can hardly be overstated. In the shaykhdoms of the Gulf, official dealings with, recognition of, and help for, particular shaykhs and families, through the series of exclusive agreements concluded between 1820 and 1916, transformed the nature of politics, strengthening the position of those so recognized and laying the foundations for the modern states now in existence. In Kuwait, for example, the de facto autonomy of the Shaykhdom was made secure and subsequently given juridical confirmation as a result of Britain’s protection from 1899. Several shaykhdoms owe their independent existence to a British decision to recognize a ruling shaykh as partner in an exclusive agreement—thus, for instance, the decision to deal with the Al Thani of Qatar from 1916 (independently from Bahrain). In Oman, the rule of the Al Bu Said dynasty was rescued from the interior’s challenge by British assistance between 1955 and 1959. In several cases (most notably the succession of Shaykh Shakhbut by Shaykh Zayed in Abu Dhabi, and that of Sultan Said by Sultan Qaboos in Oman), Britain played a central role in internal transfers of power. Even the construction of the third Saudi state in the first two decades of the twentieth century was assisted by British acceptance and subsidies—assiduously sought by Abdul Aziz Al Saud (“Ibn Saud”).

Likewise, a wholly new state was created in Mesopotamia and a monarchy imposed. Boundaries were drawn between these various emerging states. In some cases (such as the later UAE), this process meticulously adhered to local realities on the ground but, nevertheless, thereby “froze” them. In other instances it arguably changed the course of history by stopping Saudi expansion into Kuwait and Iraq (as well as, more indirectly, deterring Ibn Saud from extending his control to the other shaykhdoms). Several British decisions are contested to this day, including the Iraqi-Kuwaiti boundary, placed far enough north to keep the Ottoman Empire or any of its allies or successors from acquiring a secure naval base on the Khor al-Zubair, and the award of the Hawar islands to Bahrain.

In the Arabian Gulf states, this history left Britain enjoying good relations with the ruling regimes and playing a role in domestic and external security issues as well as some other aspects of government. The effect of this link is still visible at the start of the twenty first century. In Saudi Arabia too, Britain retained good links, although here they were soon eclipsed by the United States.

On the other hand, their involvement in the two more populous states of Iraq and Iran in the end helped their demise through the nationalist backlash it erected. In these cases too, therefore, the British role had a historic impact on the subsequent nature of politics in the region. In Iraq, this happened swiftly in 1958. In Iran, the Second World War brought British (and Soviet) intervention, and the forced abdication of the nationalist Shah Reza Khan, followed by the accession of his young and inexperienced son, Muhammad Reza. Britain was also instrumental, later, in the overthrow of the nationalist Mossadegh government. All this sowed some of the seeds of the backlash that would, in 1979, overthrow the pro-Western Pahlavi regime altogether.

As one observer has pointed out, the period of British paramountcy and protection saw an outside power playing the role of manager, guardian and arbiter of the region. Intervention by outside powers was deterred, piracy and smuggling were suppressed, interstate conflicts were frozen, and coups were either vetoed or encouraged pre-emptively. As a result of the UK’s presence, disruptive forces were contained and their manipulation by outside forces prevented. Saudi Arabia was prevented from acquiring the Buraimi oasis; and Iran was denied Bahrain. Iraq’s claim to Kuwait (1961) was balked ... by a British military response ... Territorial claims between Iran and Arab states were likewise shelved.... [A]lso in the thwarting of internal developments, the British exercised a veto. Sheikh Shakhbut in 1966 and Sultan Said in 1970 were ousted to forestall internal discontent. The British role as protector thus guaranteed internal and external security in a region largely insulated from other inter-Arab pressures.[601]

Even if such pressures from Arab politics further afield did begin to make some inroads in the 19605, this did not lead to any strong domestic demands for British withdrawal. The British decision in 1968, rather, must be seen in the context of a reassessment of the country's overall place in the post-war world by a new Labour government concerned with both resource allocation at home and the worldwide anti-imperialist mood. Indeed, paradoxically the British withdrawal from the Gulf came at a time when growing Western dependence on the region was becoming evident, with projections that it would become acute in the next decade. The financial cost of the UK's presence was negligible ('12 million) and, although the smaller littoral states offered to pay that cost, the UK's imperial era was terminated with a minimum of attention to future policy interests.[602]

Since 1971, Britain has managed to maintain excellent relations with the six monarchical Arab states of the Gulf, and in the case of the five smaller ones, as already indicated, even a significant direct involvement at the security, military, and high official levels. This has been based on the strength of the historical connection perceived by both sides, but also on the British view of how the country's post-imperial interests, as part of the Western economy and the NATO alliance, could be attained. This is best summed up in the words of the late Sir Anthony Parsons, one of Britain's most senior former diplomats, when commenting on the fact that there are "more Britons in the Gulf now than at any time during the heyday of Britain's presence East of Suez":

To put it bluntly, Britain ... sees the Gulf in terms of oil, finance and commerce. [Although self-sufficient in oil,] ... we are a member of the European Community, which is not.... We are conscious of the fact that the cumulative importance of the Gulf for the industrialised economies of the Western world as a whole is such that radical changes ... would, by extension, be seriously damaging to Britain. [Hence, we have a] strong interest in the stability of the Gulf, that is to say in the continued existence of political structures which will ensure an uninterrupted supply of crude oil at stable prices, a rational policy of investment of surplus funds from the Gulf in the West and steady progress in the implementation of social and economic development programmes.[603]

Sir Anthony did not, of course, leave the extensive commercial involvement of British companies in the Gulf unmentioned either. An account of British-Gulf relations in trade, investment, and arms supplies is provided later in this chapter.

 Key Factors in British Gulf Policy Today

The concerns underlying Britain’s foreign policy in the Gulf today and for the foreseeable future can be summarized as follows: first, direct British economic interests in terms of British exports and possible investments in the Gulf, and the attraction of public or private Gulf funds to the United Kingdom; second, the indirect economic interest that the UK has in maintaining a secure flow of oil at acceptable prices for the world economy as a whole; third, as a consequence, the maintenance of security in the Gulf region, both to deter external interventions and to maintain domestic stability in the friendly states of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC).

These concerns are pursued in the context of three particular features of British involvement in the region. The first is the historical link that Britain has retained, especially with the smaller states of the GCC, and with their ruling families in particular. This continues to inform aspirations and expectations both in London and in Gulf capitals. At the same time, it still leaves London with an (albeit diminishing) advantage over competitors, because established patterns of personal relationships, trade, policy advice, and military and security assistance have had a persistent quality. The second feature is that since the 1970s, Britain’s foreign policy has increasingly taken into account the European—or rather European Community/European Union—dimension. Although this has developed only very gradually, and often hesitatingly, it has become a recognizable element in British policy. Even when not managing to adopt common positions, there has been an increasingly marked attempt at least to coordinate policy with the rest of the EU. The fledgling Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP), and the albeit modest attempts at the construction of a European defense identity, can only further enhance this trend.

In contrast, the third feature is that British policy is also constrained by the "special relationship" with the United States, and the dependence on US. power projection capability. The latter can only increase as Britain's own capabili ties diminish in line with cutbacks. Washington has been a rival in the Gulf since the 19305, when American rather than British companies won lucrative Saudi oil concessions. This rivalry continues over arms supplies and trade—a feature that will persist. At the same time, however, in major security issues of global concern, Britain will continue to forge policy in close coordination with Washington. The best recent example is British policy on Iraq, which has been driven at least as much by the American agenda as by Britain's own analysis and interpretation of local political dynamics. Indeed, officials at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have at times been heard to quip that, on Iraq, Britain "does not have a foreign policy of its own." This does not quite reflect the whole picture, of course. British politicians can on occasion be quite as gung-ho as others.[604] And Britain has, in some areas, pursued policies at variance with American preferences. This should not come as a surprise, given the different interests at stake, to which must be added differing interpretations of Middle East and Gulf political dynamics, as well as the absence in Britain of the sort of pro-Israeli lobbying power associated with the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) and others. In the Middle East at large, this has been apparent in differing approaches to the Arab-Israeli conflict, although London has been cautious to avoid policies that would run directly counter to those pursued by Washington. In the Gulf, the most interesting cases are those of Iran and Iraq. The link between Palestine and the Gulf has also been perceived in different ways on both sides of the Atlantic, which has led to policy differences—not least on weapons supplies to the conservative Gulf states—but this factor has diminished in salience since the 1990–91 Gulf War.

Iran. The most obvious clash between British and American policies in the Gulf has been over Iran. London, of course, also had its problems with Teheran, not least over the Salman Rushdie affair. Yet, contrary to the U.S. approach—which attempted to isolate Iran altogether—during the 1990s Britain opted squarely for the European “critical dialogue” solution. It consistently preferred “the overall EU approach to the US boycott for fear of driving the Iranians into a position where they have nothing to lose by being more hostile to the West.”[605] There was an appreciation that Iran had itself reason to feel threatened, and that much of its rearmament and rhetoric could be seen in that light. At the same time, at least some foreign “actions” attributed to Iran were seen to be the work of non-governmental organizations, such as a variety of Bonyads, as well as of particular elements within the regime’s various institutions. Overall, the view was that while this was reprehensible, there was enough evidence of a powerful strand of policy in Teheran aimed at normalizing Iran’s international relations. Thus, the decision was made to cultivate this trend rather than undercut it. This view was seen to be validated even on the Rushdie question, when President Rafsanjani tried to disband the Bonyad-e-15 Khordadر which had offered a reward on the author’s head. When this proved out of reach, the Iranian government eventually “circumvented the obstacle by declaring that no official organ of the state would carry out the sentence.”[606]

In other words, the analysis that London, along with the rest of the EU, settied on was similar to that arrived at by many academic analysts of Iranian foreign policy, as well as several former government policymakers in the U.S.[607] Britain and the EU were, of course, in part driven by commercial considerations, but this was no unthinking or unprincipled policy. To quote a 1997 American analysis: “On balance, the evidence does not describe a nation which can best be dealt with as a pariah state. Iran does not seem so rigid and inflexible that political dialogue and economic incentives will have no effect.”[608] Along with British policymakers, these analysts concluded that while military containment had some value, “dual containment” was ill-advised since it “seems more likely to lock Iran into a pattern of hostility ... [and] leaves the US with no clear way to respond to any signals from the Iranian leadership.” Hence, the authors posited, “a strategy of constructive engagement ... seems more likely to enhance regional stability.... [It would also] offer a greater chance of consensus between the 5٢Ĵ and its allies while allowing for the fact that Europe and the Gulf states have already adopted many aspects of this policy."[609]

It may be worth recalling that Britain, together with its European partners, branded the American Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA, expanded to include Cuba) "illegal," in its insistence on extraterritorial legislation to punish foreign companies doing business with these countries. Another, less overt and less acrimonious, difference has existed over the issue of oil pipelines from the Caspian Sea. While Washington has maintained its insistence on a Baku (Azerbaijan)-Ceyhan (Turkey) route, and/or alternative lines that also avoid Iranian territory, there has at least been a willingness in Britain to consider the merits of the proposal of a link through Iran to the Gulf. Arguably, such a direct line makes considerably better economic sense, as well as avoiding the security problems posed by the volatile Caucasus region. In this instance as well, European companies have run up against the risks posed by ILSA.[610]

Since the election of Muhammad Khatami as Iran's president in May 1997, and especially since the parliamentary election victory of the pro-Khatami camp in 1999, this policy was felt to have been vindicated. Full diplomatic relations were restored in September 1998, with an agreement to exchange ambassadors (even if the actual exchange did not occur until May 1999). Generally, a positive tone has predominated since then, both in official and business circles. The visit by Iran's foreign minister Kamal Kharrazi to London in March 2000 was hailed by both sides (and by the British business community) as a success. The following month, it was announced that Foreign Secretary Robin Cook was to return the visit later in the year, the first such visit since the 1979 Iranian revolution.[611]

None of this means that Britain has no reservations about Iran or about aspects of the latter's policies. As a publication of the Royal United Services Institute (RUSI) points out, "an aggressive WMD [weapons of mass destruction] programme for which there is solid evidence would cause the UK to take a much tougher line." Implicitly, however, this recognizes that there is not in fact such evidence. Hence, "in common with other Europeans, Britain sees its role more as a facilitator of enhanced understanding of Teheran's concerns, as well as those on the other side of the Gulf." The piece, written by the head of RUSI's Middle East program, adds: "There is some frustration in European and Gulf quarters with the regular recitation of the 'mantra' of 5 ٢Ĵ concerns about Iran, especially with regard to sponsorships of groups actively opposed to the peace process." The author concludes by stating that "without a resumption of Iranian-sponsored terrorism in Europe, or direct threats to the Gulf, there will not be a major adjustment in European policy towards Teheran."[612] It is, perhaps, partly in recognition of this fact that US. policymakers since 1999 have embarked on a significant adjustment in their own policy toward Iran.

Iraq. By contrast, American and British policy on Iraq has been striking in its coordination. Indeed, Britain has been the only country to stand by the United States in the enforcement of the no-fly zones in Iraq.[613] On sanctions, London has remained close to Washington, notwithstanding increasing criticism from within and outside the Middle East. Indeed, most British military, intelligence, and diplomatic officials are thought to concur with their American colleagues in believing that "while Saddam [Hussein] remains in power, any outside attempts to record and destroy Iraq's still-unaccounted-for hidden stocks of biological and chemical weapons and ballistic missiles will fail."[614] Hence, both British and American officials "insist that although the current situation is far from ideal, the broad aims of the Iraq strategy have been met."[615]

Nevertheless, the countervailing pressures on Britain's policy that were referred to earlier—including the increasingly significant European dimension of foreign policy—along with the different policymaking context, have made themselves felt. Prior to the 1995 defection of Hussein Kamil, British policymakers were already looking for "an orderly way to ease the embargo in due course."[616] This position changed, however, after the revelations that followed the defection. The fact that the "oil-for-food" Security Council resolution was approved that same year took some further pressure off British policymakers on the question of sanctions. Until 1999, Britain along with the United States stood firm against any significant relaxation of the sanctions regime—with the exception, once again, of the expansion of the oil-for-food deal—and the conditions for lifting them. London has also been at the sharp end of accusations over the inflexible position of its representative on the sanctions committee, when it came to clearing Iraqi imports under the oil-for-food program. Yet it remains true that, on the whole, Britain has tried to maintain a common position with the other EU states over Gulf policy.[617]

There is an awareness in British policymaking circles, in part fed by European concerns, of the need to avoid a “Carthaginian peace.”[618] In fact, the new Security Council resolution establishing the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), finally approved in April 2000, was in large measure the result of dogged British diplomacy.[619] The effort was aimed at producing a more realistic option for dealing with Iraq and, at the same time, rebuilding support in the Gulf itself for the international containment of the regime in Baghdad. Indeed, “Britain’s patient pursuit of the diplomatic option in drafting and building support for what became Resolution 1284, played well in the Gulf where the return of the initiative of the UN was welcorned.” Britain, one analyst has commented, “will take a middle road in ... [Security Council] deliberations [on Iraq], in contrast both to the French, Russian and Chinese belief that there is little left for the inspectors to do, and the 5٢Ĵ desire to make the standard of compliance high enough for it to withstand pressure for sanctions to be lifted.”[620]

The Link between Palestine and the Gulf. The combination of the policymaking context, geographical location, and economic interests, all further reflected in the European dimension of British policy, has produced a different approach to the linkage between the Palestine question and the Gulf.[621] British policy has, to a greater extent than was apparent in the United States, reflected awareness that the concern with a just solution of the Palestinian question that existed among Gulf elites, but especially among the populations of the region, was an issue that could potentially undermine British interests. Hence, Britain’s—and Europe’s— changing policies on the Arab-Israeli question after 1973. At the same time, this policy also reflected a different perception of Gulf Arab intentions vis-â-vis Israel, and, perhaps most crucially, a much lower identification with the security concerns of Israel and the pro-Israeli lobby in the United States. London and its European partners remained committed to a secure Israel, but did not necessarily swallow all of the Israeli arguments about the threat posed by the Arab states—least of all by the six conservative GCC states.[622]

Together, these features led to a British (and French) ability to supplant the American role as a key supplier of weapons to the Gulf states on several occasions. The most striking example was the conclusion of the so-called Al-Yamamah agreement between Britain and Saudi Arabia in 1985. Concluded after five years of Saudi attempts to buy F-15 fighter-bombers were defeated by effective opposition from the pro-Israeli lobby, this became, at an estimated ‘20 billion ($30 billion), the largest single defense contract in British history.[623] (Al-Yamamah II, signed in 1993, brought the total value to some ‘35 billion [$52 billion].) The Al-Yamamah program sustained “an estimated 30,000 jobs in Britain and a few thousand more in Saudi Arabia” over the next 15 years.[624] The deal, which remains in force at the time of writing, has included the supply of 120 Tornado aircraft and Hawk and PC-9 trainers, as well as naval equipment, construction, and a range of related supply, service, and training contracts. Saudi Arabia pays much of the cost in oil (dealt with by British Petroleum and Royal Dutch-Shell), while the British side pledged to reinvest a portion in the Kingdom under the so-called offset agreement. Under the arrangement, seven joint companies were set up by the end of 1999.[625] This was not the last time that Britain (or France) benefited from the blocking of U.S. arms sales to the Gulf states: further difficulties were created for the U.S. administration by sustained pro-Israeli lobbying in Congress in the years that followed. As a result, Washington was unable to supply Stinger missiles even to friendly Bahrain in the latter stages of the Iran-Iraq War, or indeed to conclude any major arms sales with other GCC states prior to the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.[626] Meanwhile, the Al-Yamamah contract had “shifted the entire structure of the Saudi Air Force from dependence on the US to dependence on Britain.”[627]

The aftermath of the 1990–91 Gulf War has produced significant change in the dynamic just discussed. This has been driven by a number of factors. Progress in the Arab-Israeli peace process has somewhat reduced the salience of this issue as a spoiler for U.s.-Gulf relations, and consequently Britain lost some of its advantage. Moreover, the importance of US. equipment and power projection capability were demonstrated beyond doubt. Finally, the conflict also gave the US. administration (in casu President Bush) the power to waive the congressional bans and limitations on the transfer of F-15s and Stingers to GCC states.

* The Gulf States’ Foreign Policy and Britain

The Gulf states’ policy toward and relations with Britain cannot be understood without taking account of the context that has shaped these states’ overall foreign policies. In this instance as well, the key categories are the natures of the Gulf regimes, the nature of the regional system in the Gulf, and the changing nature of the global system.

 Nature and Needs of the Gulf Regimes

All are rentier states of one sort or another, highly dependent on the revenue generated by the sale of hydrocarbons. Control over these resources has given them a measure of leverage and influence on the world stage, as well as the ability to buy large amounts of weapons. By the same token, especially after the oil boom of the 1970s, which further increased such influence and resources, their dependence increased as well: dependence on the revenues themselves, on the consuming markets, and on the suppliers of goods and technology for the spending plans that this wealth made possible. Inevitably this also influenced foreign policy, as none of the Gulf states could opt for autarky, and none—at least since the market effects of the double oil shock in the 1970s became clear—wished to risk endangering continued oil revenue or disrupting industrialized economies.

The GCC States. The GCC states consistently aimed for moderate prices in coordination with the main consumer countries. This can be traced to a number of factors, in addition to their historical pro-Western orientation. They are dependent on world markets for the demand and supplies referred to above, and in particular on the West for protection. Approximating ideal-type “rentier state,” their regimes are highly dependent on government largesse for political survival. Finally (with the exception of Bahrain, which is in effect subsidized by Saudi Arabia), they are low-population, large-reserves producers, which means they need secure long-term prospects for oil markets but can afford to forgo immediate price maximization.

With specific regard to Britain, the ruling families retained extensive links with their former protector, both practical and personal. Saudi Arabia was never officially a protectorate, and soon veered toward reliance on the United States. But it is worth recalling that the founder of the modern Kingdom actively pursued British protection against both the Ottomans and his rivals, the Al Rasheed, in the first two decades of the twentieth century, and established very close relationships with a number of British figures.[628] Britain, along with the United States, remains a destination of choice for the education of many among the GCC elites. Several members of ruling families—including the rulers of Oman, Qatar, and Bahrain—graduated from Britain's Royal Military Academy at Sandhurst.

There have been areas of tension, too, in particular with Saudi Arabia and Bahrain. In the case of the former, the 1980s episode over the film Death of a Princess showed a level of mutual incomprehension.[629] Throughout the 1990s, the presence and activity of the Saudi opposition Committee for the Defence of Legitimate Rights (CDLR), led by Muhammad al-Masaari, brought Saudi demands for its expulsion from Britain. The Conservative John Major government attempted to deport al-Masaari, only to be stopped by legal challenges.[630] Similarly, the Bahraini government, until the political reforms of 2001, objected to the activities of the opposition Bahrain Freedom Movement, and London very diplomatically indicated to its Bahraini equivalents the British concerns over the systematic crackdown on the opposition during the 19905. Yet these episodes did not undercut the basic positive outlook from the GCC states toward Britain.

For these states, Britain, while not a significant importer of Gulf oil and gas, remains an important source of technical, administrative, and military assistance, as well as of services, high-technology goods and equipment, and arms. It is also an arena offering opportunities for investment and, more generally, recycling of surplus petrodollars—in part through the City of London. Britain is further seen as an important member of the European Union. This link is valuable because the EU represents a crucial market for GCC states' exports, as well as being their main supplier of technology, goods, and services, and offering an arena for investment. Finally, Britain provides a partial alternative to the United States. This is useful for domestic and regional political and commercial reasons, as well as in cases where American policy is constrained by pro-Israeli voices in Congress.

That is not to say that the GCC states have simply adopted British commercial or policy preferences. Rather, Gulf leaders have generally kept their options open, continuing a pattern set in the latter part of the nineteenth century and perfected by figures such as Kuwait's Shaykh Mubarak the Great in 1899, and Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman Al Saud in the first half of the twentieth century. They have themselves used outside powers as much as they have accepted significant elements of dependence on them, and they have preferred, wherever possible, multi-dependence over mono-dependence. This continues to be reflected in Saudi, Qatari, and UAE arms purchases, for instance, and is unlikely to change. Hence, just as London lost out to Washington over Saudi oil concessions, so America lost out to Britain on various occasions in arms deliveries to the Kingdom. Contrary to what dependency theorists used to hold, therefore, these states, considering their basic weakness, have shown a surprising level of relative autonomy.

As one Gulf-based scholar has shown, GCC voting patterns at the United Nations General Assembly provide an interesting illustration of this phenomenon. They reflect, he argues, a foreign policy in which the influence of the relationship with an ally—in this case Britain—is balanced with any other national interest at stake. Voting over the Falkland Islands dispute between Britain and Argentina in the 1980s may serve as a good example: Of the six states, only Oman consistently voted with Britain against the resolution demanding a negotiated settlement; the others abstained—not wishing to take sides—but Kuwait in 1985 switched to voting in favor of the resolution, reflecting the Shaykhdom's then typically independent-minded foreign policy orientation.[631]

Iran and Iraq. On the other hand, Iran and Iraq both have nationalist and somewhat anti-Western foreign policy traditions. Their regimes have, especially in the case of Iran, been able to use ideological and non-welfare means, rather than merely relying on oil revenue, to shore up their popularity at home. Moreover, because both have larger population-to-reserves ratios, the dynamic in favor of lower prices does not function quite the way it does for the GCC states. Hence, Iran and to a lesser extent Iraq (which has larger reserves) have shown a tendency to push for relatively higher prices—quite apart from other foreign policy rhetoric critical of the West. Nationalist assertion and suspicion of the West (not least Britain) is an inevitable part of the modern history of both states. Iraq, an artificial British creation, has suffered from insecurity over its borders, its very existence, and the survival of its successive regimes. The phenomenon of Saddam Hussein's dictatorship has merely further illustrated and reinforced these characteristics and their foreign policy implications. Iraq displays some features of a "quasi-state,"[632] with a justifiably paranoid regime relying on both rhetoric and foreign policy action to secure its survival. In Iran, the weakness of the Qajar regime (long "penetrated" by Britain as well as by Russia), gave way to Reza Khan's nationalist search for strength—until Britain and the Soviet Union forced his abdication during the Second World War, for his unwillingness to expel the German presence. The foreign-imposed crowning of his son, followed in 1955 by the British-American-orchestrated coup against the nationalist prime minister Mossadegh, further strengthened underlying nationalist trends, as well as fueling suspicion of Britain in particular. The Islamic Revolution was, in part, a further expression of this trend. Nationalist assertion and wariness of foreign domination remain very much part of Iran's foreign policy culture. Britain, in particular, then, has none of the historical advantages in these two countries that it has enjoyed in its relations with the GCC states.

Yet it has been striking that both Iran and Iraq have been quite restrained in their oil price demands or export conditions, even at the most politically difficult moments. It was, for instance, Washington rather than Teheran that stopped Iranian oil exports to the United States. As for Iraq, in the tense weeks before the 1990 invasion of Kuwait, and even in the immediate aftermath, Baghdad reiterated its willingness to export oil to the U.S. and the West in general, at prices around $22-25/barrel. Additionally, both states have been eager to do business with countries whose policies they have otherwise been critical of. It has in the main been sanctions by other states that have curtailed such links. Politi ical links have been more problematic in the case of Iran, but here too the evidence since the mid-1980s has shown a trend toward normalization, albeit somewhat constrained by the Khomeini legacy.[633] While this legacy has been most visible in relations with Washington, its most obvious illustration with regard to Britain was the Rushdie case. Even in the case of the United States, however, the improvement in relations has been striking since 1999—Dual Containment notwithstanding. Yet the development of British-Iranian relations since the de facto resolution of the Rushdie affair illustrates that London has realized and exploited the extent of Iranian pragmatism sooner and more fully than has Washington.

Ideology Takes Second Place. Clearly, then, the main driving force for Gulf relations with Britain (or, for that matter, with most of the world) has been a pragmatic calculation of national interest, centered around economic and security interests and regime survival—in other words, raison d'etat and raison de regime. Gulf states' previous ties with Britain, and, in the case of Iran and Iraq, the nationalist reflex, remain significant, but do not normally swamp those calculations. Ideology, including its Islamic and Arab themes, has taken and will continue to take a secondary role. The only exceptions are in early revolutionary stages (as in the first decade or less of Iran's Islamic Republic) and as a residual category in nationalist form.

Iraq under Saddam Hussein might seem to contradict this pattern.[634] Yet this is true only for the period since the 1990 invasion of Kuwait. The anomaly is linked to the nature of this particular ruler's regime, in the particular circumstances he found himself after the end of the Iran-Iraq War.[635] Moreover, it should be clear that even in the case of Iraq, much of the ideological rhetoric deployed has been used instrumentally. This is not to deny the relevance of the nationalist reflex, but none of this need obstruct good relations with the West, as Iraqi policy from 1975 to 1989 illustrated. Given a change in the regime, Iraq would doubtless fit back into the pattern.

This analysis does not imply that the "regional" element, especially over values thought of as important in 'Arab' or 'Islamic' terms, has lost its importance altogether. Indeed, both outsiders and local regimes ignore it at their peril—not least precisely because pragmatic calculation of regime interests means these governments cannot afford to be seen blatantly failing to observe such values. Britain's keen appreciation of this fact has at times given it an advantage over the United States, relative to what both states have had to offer in military or economic terms.

 The Regional and Global Systems

There are two regional systemic levels: the Middle East at large, and the Gulf in particular. It is from the wider, Middle East level that the above observation takes its relevance.

The Middle East System. In Arab foreign policies generally, the “Arab system” has become gradually less dominant as a determinant since the 19705. Pan-Arabism as an ideology has virtually vanished from the scene. Arab themes in general no longer have the force they had from the 1940s until the use of the oil weapon in 1973. State and regime interests have become predominant, in a context of interdependence both within the region and with the world beyond it—even if this interdependence is skewed in favor of the industrialized economies. Yet an Arab dimension persists. In part this is true because of residual convictions among ruling elites, but probably more so because many perceive the danger of ignoring what remains a potent, albeit no longer dominant, value among their populations. [636] The Palestine question is still an issue to be reckoned with in this respect. Consequently, close collaboration with the United States retains elements of political risk. This is also true for non-Arab, but Muslim, Iran given that the issue has Islamic as well as ethnic dimensions. In the case of Iran, too, genuine concern with the asymmetrical nature of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process is reflected in its foreign policy stances. Although these perceptions are no longer translated in official support for the eradication of the Jewish State, Iran (and not merely that country’s “conservative” factions) still reserves the right to disagree with the nature of the process, outside pressure notwithstanding. This, just like the whole question of outside involvement in the first place, ties in to the nationalist reflex. Teheran also reserved the right to support, for instance, Hizbollah, as a Lebanese movement resisting foreign occupation. Iranians reasonably argue that this is quite different from “sponsoring terrorism.” The British position has recognized this distinction. In turn, such recognition facilitates Iranian relations with London, although Britain does retain concerns over actions by radical factions in Iran, and over WMD questions.

The Middle East system also contains straightforward strategic features, quite separate from Arab or Islamic values, which impact on Gulf states’ foreign policies. The key elements can be grouped in three categories. First, Israel’s regional superpower status and nuclear capability remains a central concern. It is at least part of the reason for feelings of insecurity and attempts to ameliorate this. By the same token, Israeli objections to Gulf states’ acquisitions of sophisticated weaponry have long bedeviled U.s.-Gulf relations, hence giving opportunities to Britain and other competitors. Second, the growing influence of non-Gulf powers in the expanding Middle East impacts on the Gulf states themselves. Turkey and Syria present threats and opportunities for Iraq and Iran, while Iran, as already pointed out, faces a range of potential threats along its northern and eastern borders. In turn, such factors inevitably influence perceptions in the Gulf, and beyond. Third are the implications of the rich-poor divide in the region—with the Gulf states, and the GCC in particular, falling into the rich camp. This has long been a source of potential insecurity for the latter, again feeding into their foreign policies both toward the Middle East and potential protectors elsewhere.

The Gulf Sub-System. The sub-system of the Gulf has featured several types of clashes. The most obvious have been the ideological ones pitting Arab nationalists, secular republican Iraq, and revolutionary Islamic republican Iran against the neo-traditionalist conservative pro-Western GCC monarchies. It should go without saying that this forms a large part of the explanation for the monarchies’ continued desire for outside protection—not least by Britain. It also helps explain the support Britain and others gave Iraq during the 1980s against the perceived threat emanating from Iran’s revolution. The nature of the ideological question has been changing, however. By the turn of the millennium, Iran had matured into essentially a status quo power and was increasingly being perceived as such. Instead, a common concern about Iraq united Iran and the GCC states—and arguably helped bring Iran closer to Britain and the West as well.

Ideology, then, was only one factor in Gulf tensions, as plain geostrategic interests were also at stake. Iraq continues to face a problem of access to the Gulf. It has to share the Shatt al-Arab with its main rival Iran, and, since the delimitation of the maritime border by the United Nations in 1993, has lost even most of its navigation channel in the Khor Abdallah to Kuwait.[637] By the same token, Kuwait will always see a threat from its northern neighbor, and all of the GCC states perceive a potential threat from their larger, more populous republican neighbors.

A third type of clash has already been referred to in a different context: that based on differential economic needs. Iran has relatively lower oil reserves and a very large population, and will therefore be relatively less interested in the very-long-term future of the oil market. Moreover, it faces higher immediate needs than Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the UAE, where the opposite applies. Iraq falls in between these two ends of the spectrum, although its reconstruction and eventual rearmament needs (or desires) will, for the foreseeable future, nudge it toward a higher-price stance.

The Changing Global System. Arguably, the change in the international system represented by the end of the Cold War and the disappearance of the Soviet Union was always likely to increase pragmatic policies toward Britain and the West, by taking away a key option for playing off East against West. Except for Iraq, that has indeed appeared to be the result. Iran, although not simply for this reason, has moved closer to the United States, having already established strong relations with Britain and the rest of Europe. The GCC states have moved closer to an explicit reliance on Washington and other Western protectors—although this has been mainly the result of the Kuwait crisis. The resolution of that crisis could perhaps also be seen, however, as demonstrating just how unipolar the new world disposition had become.

Yet this is not the whole picture. Among the background causes of Saddam Hussein’s Kuwait debacle was precisely his fear that, in the new world order, he and Iraq were being encircled by the United States as the new global hegemon. This had already begun to worsen relations with Britain as well prior to the invasion. In Iran, the foreign policy adjustment has not meant a less critical position on the policies of Israel or her supporters, nor a departure from the country’s insistence that Gulf security be left to Gulf states alone. Teheran, moreover, has been moving closer to the GCC states (most strikingly to Saudi Arabia), regardless of the state of its relations with Washington—indeed, quite contrary, at least until 1999, to US. desires expressed to those states. This in itself indicated that America’s allies in the Gulf still maintained their relative autonomy. It seems plausible that Washington’s own mellowing toward Teheran since 1999 was in fact helped along by Riyadh. In addition, although the post—Kuwait War period has seen a resurgence of the US. as the largest player in the local arms market, it is striking that the six states have to varying extents maintained the multiplicity of sources for their defense. Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and the UAE all signed defense agreements with London and Paris, as well as with Washington. Saudi Arabia continued with the Al-Yamamah agreement, Qatar with its purchases of French equipment, and the UAE with its own diverse procurement, while Oman’s arms imports too continue to be mainly European.[638]

* Trade and Investment

In what follows, a summary overview is offered of Gulf-British economic interaction and, in the subsequent section, of the arms trade in particular, to underpin some of the analysis above.

The UK’s trade relationship with the Gulf stands out, when compared to other EU trade partners, by its large surplus, running at between ‘2–4 billion ($3–6 billion) a year during the 1990s—even without arms and services exports. Given Britain’s own oil reserves, its imports from the Gulf consist mainly of petroleum products and re-exports via Dubai. Only a little over 10 percent of its imports from Saudi Arabia—the largest source, followed closely by the UAE— are made up of oil, in the framework of the Al-Yamamah arrangement. Total imports from the Gulf states during the final decade of the twentieth century ran in the region of ‘1.5—2 billion per year, the vast majority corning from the GCC (see Table 19.1). In 1996, the United Kingdom was the GCC’s eleventh largest export destination, accounting for some 1.6 percent, far behind Japan

(827 billion), the United States ($11 billion), South Korea ($11 billion), and Singapore ($8.5 billion).[639]

Detailed available statistics about British exports to the Gulf states only record about one-third of the actual total. Services and arms exports are usually excluded, even if some non-arms but defense-related items do at times feature. Visible non-arms exports from Britain to the Gulf ran at between ‘4—6 billion per year ($6–9 billion) during the 1990s (see Table 19.2). Figures for 1996 imports into the GCC are representative. They show the United Kingdom in second place with 11 percent, after the United States (16 percent), but ahead of Japan (10 percent), Germany (7 percent), Italy (6 percent), and France (5 percent).[640] The most recent figures that indicate 1999 was the worst year in the decade, with visible exports just topping ‘4 billion (after a peak of 7.4عد billion in 1997). Sir David Wright, the chief executive of British Trade International, a government export-promoting agency, blamed this on the overall “cautious economic and commercial climate” in the region, created in the wake of low oil prices. As he also pointed out, however, exports of services were worth about another £4 billion, leaving the trade surplus at well over ‘5 billion, “and this in as bad a year as we’ve had in recent times. ”[641] The largest single category of nonarms visible exports from Britain to the Gulf was “machinery and transport equipment” (see Table 19.3).

Britain also ranks as the second largest exporter to Saudi Arabia, after the United States. While the Kingdom represents the fourteenth largest market for British goods (1998 figures, not counting arms), it has become the ninth largest market for British services.[642] Arms exports, fluctuating significantly, probably averaged up to £2 billion per year, with over three-quarters going to Saudi Arabia. This means that about half of British visible trade flows to the Kingdom have consisted of defense-related exports, which have to be added to the figures listed in Table 19.2 (roughly doubling them) to obtain a realistic (if no more than indicative) picture.[643] The Saudi arms market has been crucial to Britain’s defense industry—even though some contracts under the Al-Yamamah deal were rescheduled and experienced payment delays following the 1998 oil price collapse.

Table 19.1 UK Imports from the Gulf States, 1991–1999 (in £ Million)

| | 1991 | 1992 | 1993 | 1994 | 1995 | 1996 | 1997 | 1998 | 1999 |

| Saudi Arabia | 964 | 964 | 1,274 | 740 | 721 | 753 | 997 | 892 | 875 |

| Kuwait | 30 | 127 | 236 | 239 | 151 | 180 | 201 | 186 | 181 |

| Bahrain | 39 | 50 | 52 | 25 | 26 | 21 | 33 | 67 | 25 |

| Qatar | 5 | 10) | 20 | 7 | 15 | 11 | 16 | 30 | 40 |

| Oman | 74 | 83 | 83 | 78 | 74 | 87 | 105 | 92 | 78 |

| UAE | 232 | 332 | 251 | 231 | 281 | 3881 | 516 | 559 | i |

| GCC | 1,344 | 1,566 | 1,917 | 1,321 | 1,269 | 1,432 | 1,868 | 1,826 | 1,866 |

| Iraq | 3 | ... | ... | ... | ... | ... | ... | 2 | ... |

| Iran | 158 | 164 | 245 | 133 | 126 | 119 | 36 | 36 | 37 |

| Total | 1,505 | 1,730 | 2,162 | 1,454 | 1,395 | 1,551 | 1,904 | 1,883 | 1,903 |

Note: ... = less than £0.5 million

Source: COMET (Committee for Middle East Trade, London)

Table 19.2 UK Visible Non-Defense Exports to the Gulf States, 1991-1999, (in £, Million)

| | 1991 | 1992 | 1993 | 1994 | 1995 | 1996 | 1997 | 1998 | 1999 |

| Saudi | 2,229 | 1,968 | 1,826 | 1,516 | 1,644 | 2,483 | 3,800 | 2,690 | 1,529 |

| Arabia | | | | | | | | | |

| Kuwait | 178 | 262 | 312 | 312 | 551 | 679 | 504 | 3885 | 302 |

| Bahrain | 147 | 167 | 151 | 150 | 151 | 161 | 158 | 144 | 118 |

| Qatar | 109 | 118 | 143 | 1280 | 146 | 192 | 584 | 293 | 169 |

| Oman | 238 | 241 | 306 | 362 | 448 | 416 | 370 | 2855 | 231 |

| UAE | 760 | 927 | 1,315 | 1,114 | 1,184 | 1,394 | 1,547 | 1,563 | 1,403 |

| GCC | 3,662 | 3,682 | 4,052 | 3,581 | 4,124 | 5,225 | 6,963 | 5,360 | 3,752 |

| Iraq | 4 | 34 | 12 | 10) | 5 | 11 | 6 | 26 | 36 |

| Iran | 512 | 568 | 4997 | 289 | 333 | 397 | 396 | 331 | 245 |

| Total | 4,178 | 4,284 | 4,561 | 3,880 | 4,462 | 5,633 | 7,365 | 5,717 | 4,033 |

Note: ... = less than £0.5 million

Source: COMET (Committee for Middle East Trade, London)

Beyond this, British companies in 2000 were also hoping to benefit from the cautious opening to foreign investment in Saudi Arabia.[644] At the time of writing, the Al-Yamamah offset arrangement had already resulted in the creation of seven joint ventures. In addition, there have been cross-investments by British Aerospace and Rolls Royce in two U.S.-sponsored offset investments under the U.S. Peace Shield program. Total British investment in the Kingdom as of 1999 stood at around $3.5 billion, much of it in the Al-Yamamah framework. Nevertheless, as one report noted, “there is still a mountain to climb before the Al-Yamamah offset requirement is met.” Outside this framework, much depends on just how open the Saudi economy will in fact become, although there are already an estimated 100 joint ventures.[645] Saudi Arabia’s importance in British foreign economic relations is further illustrated by the fact that some 30,000 Britons live and work in the Kingdom.

Elsewhere in the GCC, tentative openings to foreign investment were also being watched closely by British business, in addition to export opportunities.[646] Kuwait’s prospective opening of some of its oil sector to outside investment led to the holding of a British Oil and Gas Show there in March 2000. As already mentioned, the UAE is the UK’s second largest trade partner in the Gulf. To a large extent this concerns re-export trade through Dubai. In 1998, the UK was the third largest importer of goods from the Emirate. In addition, an estimated 12 percent of the 1,500 companies based in the Jabal Ali Free Zone in 1998 were British.[647]

Outside the GCC, Iran has been a significant market, albeit dwarfed by Saudi Arabia, taking some ‘500 million in UK exports annually in the early 1990s. Notwithstanding improving political relations, however, a sharp drop in 1994 has failed to be reversed: The 1999 figure of ‘245 million was the lowest of the decade. This appears to have been in part the result of Iran’s own economic difficulties. British companies remain keenly aware of the possibilities of the Iranian market, however.[648] Apart from exports, a key area of mutual interest is British investment in the country, both in the oil industry and elsewhere, as the new investment law of 2000 is expected to remove some of the obstacles in the earlier Law 81.[649]

Table 19.3 UK Visible Non-Arms Exports to the Gulf States, by Broad Commodity Group, 1998 (in £ Million)

| Saudi Arabia | Kuwait | Bahrain | Qatar | UAE | Oman | GCC | Iran | Iraq | Total |

| 0 | 58.1 | 20.3 | 7.2 | 2.7 | 64.4 | 5.0 | 157.7 | 3.4 | ... | 161.1 |

| 1 | 499.5 | 10.5 | 11.6 | 6.9 | 48.8 | 9.2 | 136.4 | 0.1 | ... | 136.5 |

| 2 | 5.1 | 1.6 | 0.5 | 0.2 | 4.4 | 0.5 | 11.9 | 2.0 | ... | 13.9 |

| 3 | 2.1 | 0.5 | 0.2 | 0.2 | 3.0 | 0.4 | 6.3 | 1.1 | ... | 7.4 |

| 4 | 0.9 | 0.5 | | | 0.5 | ... | 1.8 | 0.3 | ... | 2.1 |

| 5 | 279.1 | 38.5 | 15.9 | 22.4 | 150.7 | 29.7 | 536–2 | 60.3 | 5.8 | 602.3 |

| 6 | 167.4 | 36.2 | 18.0 | 36.7 | 193.1 | 50.1 | 481.5 | 24.8 | 0.8 | 507.1 |

| 7 | 1,602.3 | 152.2 | 57.2 | 101.0 | 648 1 | 1583.1 | 2,718.9 | 206.0 | 15.1 | 2,940.0 |

| 8 | 554.9 | 67.5 | 32.5 | 55.9 | 267.3 | 33.7 | 811–7 | 31.2 | 4.0 | 846.9 |

| 9 | 170.1 | 7.8 | 1.2 | 67.0 | 182.2 | 185.3 | 447.3 | 1.7 | ... | 449.0 |

| 10 | 2,403.7 | 294.2 | 125.6 | 216.2 | 1,259.1 | 251.6 | 4,548.3 | 522.4 | 25.6 | 4,896.3 |

| 11 | 2,690.2 | 294.2 | 123.6 | 2116.2 | 1,259.1 | 251.6 | 4,548.3 | 330.9 | 25–6 | 4,904.8 |

Categories:

0 Food and live animals

1 Beverages and tobacco

2 Crude materials, except fuels

3 Mineral fuels, lubricants etc.

4 Animal and vegetable oils, fats and wax

5 Chemicals and related products

6 Manufactures classified chiefly by material

7 Machinery and transport equipment

8 Miscellaneous manufactured articles

9 Articles not classified elsewhere

105+67+8- Manufactures

11 Total

Note: ... = less than ‘50,000

Source: UK Overseas Trade Statistics December 1998

There remains an interest in the potential of Iraq, but this is recognized to be an uncertain prospect as long as sanctions remain. Yet, even though British companies have been “bound by the constraints of British government policy” and were thus long “deterred from conducting exploratory discussions with embargoed Iraq,”[650] by early 2001 it was clear that they too were straining at the leash.

* Arms Trade and Britain in Gulf Security

The key themes and underlying dynamics of Britain’s evolving role in arms supplies and Gulf security have already emerged from the foregoing analysis. Apart from its overall influence on developments in the Gulf for the past 150 years, Britain has long had a prominent role in security matters in particular. After the official withdrawal from East of Suez, British personnel remained involved in the Omani armed forces—with several hundred still seconded there in the 1990s—and military and security cooperation remained noteworthy elsewhere in the region too. Omani and British forces continue to exercise together regularly, and, since the Gulf Crisis, joint training has also been undertaken with Kuwait. British advisers were active throughout the 1970s and 19805 in Bahrain and Qatar. Indeed, Bahrain had a former British colonial police officer, Ian Henderson, in charge of its internal security until 1999.

From 1987, U.S. naval forces formed the bulk of the protective shield extended to safeguard shipping in the Gulf from Iranian attack. Nevertheless, British and several other European forces played a significant role too. By the summer of 1988, the United States had 32 warships in the Gulf, compared to the Soviet Union’s 8, Britain’s 8 (the “Armilla patrol”), France’s 7, Italy’s 6, and 2 each from Belgium and the Netherlands (in 1987 the European figures were nearly double, including 18 British ships).[651]

This foreign protection changed both its composition and its target between the August 1988 cease-fire in the Iran-Iraq War, and the 1990 invasion of Kuwait. The Iraqi invasion led to a declaration by the European Community of solidarity with the United Nations and the United States in their demands for Iraqi withdrawal. Britain, Italy, and France immediately froze Iraqi assets. This was also one occasion where the Western European Union (WEU) adopted a slightly higher profile than usual, agreeing on 21 August 1990 to step up and coordinate European naval operations in the Gulf. King Fahd of Saudi Arabia accepted the help of American forces on 7 August 1990, and also formally requested forces from Britain, in a conversation with Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd. On 8 August, London announced that several aircraft would be flown to the Kingdom, and the Armilia patrol was strengthened. On 14 September, Britain decided to send ground troops and tanks (the 7th Armoured Brigade, known as the Desert Rats), plus additional Tornado squadrons.[652] As Operation Desert Shield gradually changed into preparations for Operation Desert Storm, troop levels rose. In the eventual attack against the Iraqi forces, Washington was obviously the dominant partner, but the British Royal Air Force participated extensively in the air war (taking relatively heavy losses), while both British and French troops were engaged in the short land war that followed.[653] It is worth recalling the role Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher appears to have played in firming U.S. President Bush's resolve to react by military means if necessary.

There were three further elements to London's importance for Washington in the Kuwait crisis. First, simply by not being the United States, Britain could add political credibility and acceptability to the undertaking, as well as influence other European powers. Second, it was a permanent member of the Security Council. Third, in military terms, it had useful capabilities and, as a base, a location much closer to the theater of operations than the US. itself. These three elements remained significant after the war, when Britain proved a key ally of Washington in the maintenance of sanctions and the no-fly zones over Iraq.[654]

Britain also signed ten-year memorandums of understanding on defense cooperation with Kuwait, Qatar, and the UAE, although decision makers in London were more circumspect than their French colleagues, making these memorandums less explicitly "defense agreements" than was the case with those signed by France. British foot-dragging over UAE preferences in this regard led to French defense suppliers, whose government had acted more swiftly, getting most of the spoils (at least until the decision in March 2000 to purchase 80 F-16s from Lockheed-Martin, worth up to $7 billion).

From a British perspective, such intervention and security cooperation fitted in with the country's European and U.S.-Iked interests, as outlined earlier in this chapter. But there was also a direct British economic interest at stake, viz. the gaining and maintaining of a British share in the regional arms market. In this field, Britain will continue to compete vigorously with the U.S. and European suppliers (chiefly France, Italy, and Germany).

In this competition, two main factors have stood out. The first is the constraints imposed on U.S. arms supplies to the region by the pro-Israel voice on Capitol Hill. As outlined above, in the 1970s and 19805 repeated inability to overcome such constraints helped lead to a preeminent position for European suppliers, including Britain. The Al-Yamamah deal, which made British equipment central to the Saudi air force, was a direct result of this dynamic. Only since the 1991 Gulf War has Washington been able to waive such objections from Congress, hence making the U.S. once again a much more formidable competitor. The second factor is evident precisely in the GCC states' reaction to this U.S. constraint. Most have consistently tried to keep their options open, sometimes demonstratively so. Britain, France, and the U.S. have been played off against each other, while other suppliers have also been brought in. Even Oman, which has traditionally bought most of its arms from Britain, has expanded its range of suppliers.[655]

In the course of the 1990s, a further factor took on added importance, although the effect is not yet fully clear. Britain's declining power projection capability, which is recognized by decision makers in the GCC, may mean that British suppliers may encounter greater difficulties in the future.[656] As has been pointed out elsewhere, "recent British force cuts mean that the British Army cannot deploy the kind of armored forces to the Gulf that it deployed in 1990,"1 and U.S. suppliers of main battle tanks and other equipment may therefore have a potential advantage, since buying American would ensure inter-operability with armored forces that are brought in during a crisis.[657]

Saudi Arabia has been, and will continue to be, by far the most important arms market for Britain. Over the period 1976–1994, UK arms exports to the Kingdom totaled some $23 billion, not very far behind the U.S.’s $28 billion. This hides major fluctuations, with the UK taking first place in the periods 1989–1991 (an estimated $8 billion, or 40 percent of the market), and 1992–1994 ($9.4 billion, or 46 percent of the market).[658] Britain, therefore, remains a very important source for Saudi defense imports, even if the first decade of the twenty-first century may well see a reassertion of the U.S.’s preeminent position.

Elsewhere in the GCC, the only buyer looking mainly to Britain has been Oman. Bahrain has bought very little military hardware from the UK, instead sourcing its needs primarily to the United States. Qatar, for its part, has turned to France. Kuwait, with its varied procurement pattern, has been dwarfed by Saudi Arabia as a market for British defense exports. The UAE (with the exception of Hawk training and combat aircraft) has looked more to France and, as of 2000, to the United States. A list of recent British arms supply contracts with the GCC states is given in Table 19.4.[659]

* Conclusion

Relations between Britain and the Gulf states have been driven by pragmatic calculations of raison d’etat, far more than by ideological considerations. In the case of the Gulf states, this has been focused on economic interest, external security, and regime survival. In the case of Britain, the key concerns have been the opportunities for the economy and, as an indirect but nevertheless crucial interest, the safeguarding of predictable and moderately priced oil supplies to the world economy and to Europe in particular.

British policy has derived both difficulties and opportunities from its historical relations with the region—the difficulties arising mainly with Iran and Iraq, the opportunities with the GCC states. British policy has also been constrained and shaped by its special relationship with the United States and its integration into the European Union. The predominance of pragmatic self-interest over ideological themes, at least since the second half of the 1970s, has been one of the more striking features of the relationships. Another has been the extent to which even the smallest states of the Gulf have continuously striven to balance their dependence on the outside world with the pursuit of a degree of autonomy. This has been clear in the way they played off Britain, even while submitting to varying levels of dependence on it, against other powers—be it the Ottoman Empire prior to World War I, Iran or Iraq afterwards, or the United States during the 1970s and 1980s. At the same time, other powers were played off against Britain. This began under Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman Al Saud, with Russia, the Ottoman Porte, and later the United States. It continues today, with, for example, Qatar and the UAE consciously aiming at multi-dependence to lessen the asymmetry in their interdependence with the West. It is probable that with the dwindling of Britain's military projection capability relative to the United States, the GCC states will, albeit to varying extents, drift closer to Washington for military supplies. Nevertheless, the drive for relative autonomy, observed thus far in the foreign policies of these states, will undoubtedly persist, thus keeping opportunities for Britain very much alive.

Table 19.4 Recent and Current Arms Contracts UK-GCC

| Country | Contract/ date | Description | Start Delivery | Completion |

| Saudi Arabia | 1988 | 3 Sandown mine-hunters | 199? | 2003 |

| | 1993 | 48 Tornado IDS | 1993 | 1998 |

| | 1993 | 20 Hawk 65 | 1993 | 1997 |

| UAE | 1998 | 18 Hawk fighters | 1998 | 2001 |

| | 1989 | 26 Hawk trainers | 1992 | 1996 |

| Oman | 1992 | 2 Corvette VT-83 | 1996 | 1997 |

| | 1997 | 20 Challenger tanks | 1997 | ? |

| Qatar | 1992 | 2 Barzan fast attack boats | 1997 | 1998 |

| | 1996 | 15 Hawk-100 trainers | 1996 | 1999 |

| | 1996 | Starburst SAMs | 1996 | 1996 |

| Kuwait | 1997 | 60 Sea-Skua SSMs | 1997 | 1998 |

| | 1993 | 254 Warrior AIFVs | 1995 | 1998 |

Source: IISS, The Military Balance 1998/99

---

[598] Geoffrey Kemp and Robert E. Harkavy, Strategic Geography and the Changing Middle East, Washington, DC.: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Cooperation with the Brookings Institution Press, 1997, pp. 28,34.

[599] Ibid.,p. 41 ff.

[600] Ibid., p. 49.

[601] Shahram Chubin, Security in the Persian Gulf 4:The Role of Outside Powers, London: Gower for the International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1982,p. 111.

[602] Ibid.,p. 112.

[603] Anthony Parsons, “A British Perception of the Gulf,” paper presented to the Symposium on The Gulfand the West, Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, Exeter University,July 1984, pp. 2–3.

[604] Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher’s role in firming up President George Bush’s resolve to act against the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait is now well recognized. In 1999, the Blair government is known to have been just as irritated with the American unwillingness to consider the use of ground troops in Kosovo, as U.S. policymakers were annoyed with it.

[605] Rosemary Hollis, “Europe and Gulf Security: A Competitive Business,” in Christian Koch and David E. Long (eds.). Gulf Security in the Twenty-First Century, Abu Dhabi: Emirates Centre for Strategic Studies and Research, 1997, p. 86.

[606] Anthony Cordesman and Ahmed Hashim, Iran: Dilemmas of Dual Containment, Boulder: Westview, 1997, p. 125. As the authors point out, Iran’s strategic environment is anything but secure. On various sides, the country faces: its former invader Iraq, with whom it shares a vital shipping channel; Turkey; the issue of the Kurds straddling borders with both these powers; the unsettled region of Armenia and Azerbaijan (with the attendant ethnic questions within Iran itself); a nuclear-armed Pakistan; unsettled and unfriendly Afghanistan; and a huge coastline (p. 126).

[607] One of the most notable among the latter has been Gary Sick, formerly of the National Security Council.

[608] Cordesman and Hashim, op. cit., p. 146.

[609] Ibid., pp. 320–1. The authors add: “The key reason for pursuing ‘constructive engagement’ is that policy must have an endgame. Hostile regimes not only need to be contained; they need to be encouraged to change. ‘Dual containment’ has no endgame other than a blind hope that the 5ʏJ can persuade its allies to join it in a policy of isolating Iran, and that this will lead to political upheavals that will somehow produce a moderate regime. The West never attempted such a strategy of isolation in dealing with the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact” (p. 322).

[610] See Kemp and Harkavy, op. cit., p. 151. See also Cordesman and Hashim, op. cit., p. 15, and IRNA dispatches, London, 5 November 1998.

[611] “UK and Iran Restore Diplomatic Ties,” The Financial Times, 25 September 1998. See also “Britain Exchanges Ambassadors with Iran,” The Independent, 18 May 1999; and “Cook Sees Improvement in Relations with Iran,” The Financial Times, 22 September 1999; Deutsche Presse Agentur dispatch, 17 April 2000.

[612] Neil Partrick, “The United States, Europe and the Security of the Gulf,” in RUSIJournal 145:2, April 2000, pp. 4748.

[613] France pulled out in 1998.

[614] Bryan Bender and Adrian Koch, “Poisoned Cigars, perhaps? Briefing: Iraq,” in Jane’s Defence Weekly 33:15, April 12,2000, p. 22.

[615] Ibid. p. 25.

[616] As pointed out by Hollis, “Europe and Gulf Security”, p. 86.

[617] Ibid.,p. 87.

[618] An expression used also by Anthony Cordesman and Ahmed Hashim, Iraq: Sanctions and Beyond, Boulder: Westview, 1997, pp. 158–160, where they argue, at some length, the need for adjusting the sanctions regime.

[619] See Middle East Economic Survey (MEES) 43:16, 17 April 2000, for an initial assessment.

[620] Partrick, op. cit., pp. 45–46.

[621] For a brief examination of the linkage itself, see Gary Sick, “The Ghost at the Table,” in The World Today, February 1999, pp. 15–17.

[622] See also Bichara Khader, “The Gulf, Palestine and the West,” paper presented to the Symposium on The Gulf and the West, Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, Exeter University, July 1984, pp. 18—19.

[623] See Anthony Cordesman, Saudi Arabia: Guarding the Desert Kingdom, Boulder: Westview, 1997, pp. 155—58. See also Anthony Cordesman, The Gulf and the West, Boulder, Westview, 1988, p. 291.

[624] Hollis, “Europe and Gulf Security,” p. 83.

[625] Cordesman, Saudi Arabia, pp. 155–158; and idem, The Gulf and the West, p. 291. See also Gulf Business 4:6, October 1999.

[626] Cordesman, The Gulf and the West, pp. 283–295,361, 419.

[627] Ibid.,p. 291.

[628] The best known of these were perhaps Captain Shakespear, the explorer Philby, and, in a different way, Sir Percy Cox. For an insightful study of the early days of Saudi foreign policy, see Jacob GdqEp The Foreign Policy of Saudi Arabia:The Formative Years, 1902—1918, حعةل,ةلآلآةةلإ- chusetts: Harvard University Press, 1986. See also Gary Troeller, The Birth of Saudi Arabia, London: Frank Cass, 1976, which focuses, in particular, on the Saudi-British relationship up to the Saudi conquest of the Hejaz.

[629] A British TV dramatization of the events results in the execution of a young Saudi princess and her lover. The screening brought vehement Saudi protest. See Robert Lacey, The Kingdom.Arabia and the House of Saud, New York: Avon Books, 1981, p. 458.

[630] For a thematic review and analysis of Saudi relations with Britain and the rest of Europe during the twentieth century, see Gerd Nonneman, “Saudi-European Relations 1902–2001: A Pragmatic Quest for Relative Autonomy,” International Affairs, July 2001, pp., 631–661.

[631] Hassan Al-Alkim, The GCC States in an Unstable World, London: Saqi Books, 1994, p. 96.

[632] The term coined by Robert Jackson, Quasi-States: Sovereignty, International Relations and the Third World, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990. In terms of the implications for regime behavior, Nazih Ayubi’s label of “fierce states” is apposite here (even if he coined it with a view mainly to such states’ domestic behavior). See Nazih N. Ayubi, Overstating the Arab State: Politics and Society in the Middle East, London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.

[633] See Anoushiravan Ehteshami, After Khomeini: Iran’s Second Republic, London: Routledge, 1995. See also Anoushiravan Ehteshami and Raymond Hinnebusch, Syria and Iran: Middle Powers in a Penetrated Regional System, London: Routledge, 1997.

[634] For an assessment of Iraq’s foreign policy since the 1990–91 Gulf War, see Cordesman and Hashim, Iraq, chapter 9.

[635] Anoushiravan Ehteshami and Gerd Nonneman, War and Peace in the Gulf Reading: Ithaca Press, 1991, chapter 3.

[636] For contrasting views on this question, see Michael Barnett, Dialogues in Arab Politics, New York: Columbia University Press, 1998. See also Stephen M. Walt, The Origin ofAlliances, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1987: and the very useful overview article by F. Gregory Gause III, “Systemic Approaches to Middle East International Relations,” in International Studies Review 1:1, spring 1999, pp. 11–31. See also the forthcoming collective work coordinated by Anoushiravan Ehteshami and Raymond Hinnebusch (eds.). The Foreign Policies of Middle Eastern States, Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 2001.

[637] Richard Schofield, Kuwait and Iraq: Historical Claims and Territorial Disputes, second edition, London: Royal Institute for International Affairs, 1993, pp. 163–198, and p. 206.

[638] Anthony Cordesman, Bahrain, Oman, Qatar and the UAE, Boulder: Westview, 1997: International Institute for Strategic Studies, The Military Balance 1998/99.

[639] Bob Edwards, “Balancing Act: The Gulf s Top 10 Trading Partners,” GulfBusiness 3:3,July 1998, pp. 32–37. See also International Monetary Fund, Direction of Trade Statistics yearbooks, various issues.

[640] Ibid.

[641] Speech given by Sir David at the London Gulf spotlight gathering in London on 17 February 2000; edited version published in comet’s Opportunity Middle East, number 28, March 2000.

[642] “A Tale of Two Kingdoms,” Gulf Business 4:6, October 1999, p. 45.

[643] Hollis, “Europe and Gulf Security,” p. 82.

[644] See “Big boost for UK-Saudi business,” in Opportunity Middle East, number 29, May 2000, pp. 1,6.

[645] “A Tale of Two Kingdoms,” p. 45.

[646] This is illustrated in a series of UK-GCC mission and roundtable reports, in comet’s third-quarter Bulletin for 1999. The Gulfs overall importance within Britain’s Middle East trade is further illustrated by the fact that all but one (Egypt) of the events reported concern the Gulf. See COMET Bulletin, number 52, September 1999.

[647] “A Tale of Two Kingdoms,” p. 45.

[648] An Iranian-British Trade and Investment Mission took executives of 33 companies to Iran in June 1999. A British delegation attended the Iran Oil and Gas event in Teheran in April 2000, and the Iran Trade and Investment Conference was advertised among British firms for May 2000.

[649] Already, the Iranian National Oil Company has offered some 40 buy-back contracts. At the time of writing, Shell and Enterprise Oil were leading bidders. See the report of the June 1999 mission in COMET Bulletin, number 52, September 1999.

[650] Hollis, “Europe and Gulf Security,” p. 81.

[651] Nadia El-Sayed El-Shazly, The GulfTanker War, London: Macmillan, 1998, pp. 239, 256.

[652] France followed suit the following day, committing ground troops after its ambassador’s residence was assaulted.

[653] For an overview of the role of the various WEU states, see Nicole Gnesotto and John Roper, Western Europe and the Gulf, Paris: The Institute for Security Studies, Western European Union, 1992. A listing of individual contributions to the campaign up to 6 February 1991 is on pp. 170–180.

[654] Britain has contributed 12 Tornado aircraft based in Kuwait, and another 6 in Saudi Arabia, along with an estimated 800 Royal Air Force personnel and hundreds of related non-military personnel.

[655] Cordesman, Bahrain, Oman, Qatar and the UAE, pp. 171–72.

[656] Feisal Al Mazidi, The Future of the Gulf, London: I. B. Tauris, 1993. See also Cordesman, Saudi Arabia, p. 129.

[657] Cordesman, ibid.

[658] Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, issues for 1985—1995, Washington, DC.: Government Printing Office, 1985–1996. See also Conventional Arms Transfers to Developing Nations, 1987—94, Washington, DC.: Congressional Research Service, 4 August 1994, as quoted in Cordesman, Saudi Arabia, pp. 108–111 (Cordesman’s own use of the data is, in this case, rather confusing).

[659] International Institute for Strategic Studies, The Military Balance 1998/99, London: IISS, 1999.

THE GULF STATES AND WESTERN POWERS

 Chkvvvk 20

 The Impact of ϑ. Policy on the Stability of the Gulf States: A Historian’s View

Rosemarie Said Zahlan

Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, and Oman are the product of a special historical process that would be difficult to find in any other modern state.[660] Their political systems, social order, demographics, and economic situations are indeed unique to them.

A mere 50 years ago, the Gulf states enjoyed very loosely defined international standing, and they were poor, isolated, and unknown. British Foreign Office files of the 19405, and even the 1950s, reveal countless references to Britain’s inability to continue protecting them forever. They also reflect a general recognition that Saudi Arabia was Britain’s natural successor in the area. As recently as 1961, when the Foreign Office was considering an imminent withdrawal from Qatar, it foresaw its acquisition by Saudi Arabia as a strong possibility.[661]

Such a possibility is no longer valid. During the past 30 to 40 years, the Gulf states have taken enormous steps forward, and have become an essential component of the region. Together, they constitute an economic force arguably equal to those of the other countries of the region. Their population hovers around 8 million (including expatriates) and is forecasted to grow to around 26 million by 2030. Their combined GNPs exceed those of any other Arab state, including Saudi Arabia, making them the largest economic and trading bloc in the modern Arab world. Various institutions have been created and developed at a dramatic pace in each, although generally speaking, most have not received the recognition they justly deserve.

In 1989, for example, on the eve of the Iraqi invasion, scientific output per capita in Kuwait was the highest in the Arab world, and on an absolute level, the University of Kuwait produced more scientific refereed papers than any other Arab university.[662] Moreover, scientific publications from the UAE in refereed journals in 1995 were close to the Korean level, on a per capita basis.[663] Other accomplishments include the creation of the Jabal Ali Free Zone in Dubai, which is one of the largest commercial and industrial establishments in the world, and the maintenance of the offshore banking sector in Bahrain, which plays a substantial regional and international role. The list is long and growing briskly.

This transition from obscurity to prominence was made possible, of course, by the vast wealth that was bestowed on these states as a result of their large oil and gas revenues. It facilitated the swift implementation of new infrastructural, social, educational, and other programs that became the foundations of the modern states. A vital point to bear in mind, however, is that such a striking transfermation was achieved without upheavals, and without significant changes in either political structure or geographical boundaries. Equally important has been the influence of the past on the sociopolitical fabric of the Gulf states. Indeed, the historical legacy has been central to their modern development, and will remain essential in any consideration of their long-term stability. Because so much has changed so swiftly, it is easy to lose sight of this reality.[664]

This chapter examines those specific aspects of American policy since 1990 that have left an impact on the stability of the Gulf states. Such an examination requires the benefit of historical analysis, without which no understanding of the dynamics of these unique states would be complete.

* The British Legacy: Maintenance of the Status Quo

A striking feature of the contemporary map of the Gulf region is the wide variety of countries that lie around it: Iran and Iraq, two ancient and densely populated countries with substantial human and natural resources; Saudi Arabia, a vast country covering most of the Arabian Peninsula, with a low-density population and strong dependence on one natural resource; and the five smaller Gulf states precariously located between them, more limited in population but exceptionally well endowed with the same natural resource.

Another notable characteristic is the level of stability that pervaded the region for the first 80 years of the twentieth century and that has been steadily eroded since. During the former period, the three regional powers of Saudi Arabia, Iraq, and Iran underwent massive internal changes, whereas—by contrast—the five smaller states lived in quiet isolation until the production of oil began around the second half of the century. This stability was the product of deliberate British policy that resulted in a geopolitical balance between these eight countries of such different size, power, and political culture.

At its core was Britain’s maritime control of the Gulf, including the maintenance of the status quo. This was an integrated twin-track approach that extended to the small British-protected states on the one hand and to the three regional powers on the other.[665] The security system it set up, for example, resulted in the emergence of the Gulf states as separate and independent units. The states themselves evolved from the small tribal groupings of the early nineteenth century into modern contemporary entities in a singular process that acted and interacted with the requirements of British policy.

The most outstanding of these requirements were the treaties that Britain signed with specific tribal leaders whose authority in the coastal areas was recognized by their subjects. The treaties became the mainstay of Britain’s power base in the region, ultimately providing it with exclusive rights, and undisputed supremacy. It must be acknowledged that the cumulative effect of the treaties was the sealing off of the small states from the outside world, watched over with great jealousy by Britain. In fact, any hint of possible non-British interest in the area, regardless of how trivial, could provoke a serious crisis. This provided the states and their rulers with external protection and security, while at the same time, it acted as a cocoon that allowed local political systems and social traditions to be preserved.

A peculiar feature of the Gulf states has been the repetition of the same type of events, the same type of protagonists, and the same type of outcome throughout most of the twentieth century. In Bahrain, for example, the major crises and confrontations that occurred at depressingly frequent intervals from the early 19205 continued unabated throughout the 19905. Another example can be found in the events leading up to the Kuwait-Iraq crises of 1961 and 1990. Many aspects of the first are strikingly similar to those of the second, so much so in fact that 1961 could well have been a rehearsal for 1990, particularly since Iraqi claims to Kuwait had always been contained but never resolved. The periodicity and repetitive nature of behavioral patterns can likewise be found in Al Thani feuds in Qatar that were exacerbated by elderly rulers who invariably became recluses and delegated their own duties to appointed successors. Naturally, this led to power sharing between the two, and resulted in an absence of effective leadership.

To be sure, this repetitive feature was a by-product of the British objective of maintaining the status quo, as illustrated by two specific policies.

 Triple Containment Policy

When Saudi Arabia, Iran, and Iraq threatened its supremacy, Britain introduced what in modern parlance could be referred to as a “non-military triple containment policy.” The three regional powers had first actively sought to define their international relations, particularly regarding their smaller neighbors, during the 1930s. They manifested their foreign policy objectives in competing with each other for influence in the Gulf. Each made claims to different areas firmly under British protection: Iran to Bahrain as well as the Tunb and Abu Musa islands; Iraq to Kuwait; and Saudi Arabia to parts of Abu Dhabi, Qatar, and Oman. Britain contained these claims in a variety of measures that are in strong contrast with the procedures of contemporary dual containment. Bilateral diplomatic negotiations, the swift admonition of Gulf rulers for having contact with foreigners, and the firm refusal to sanction the establishment of diplomatic relations with any of the Gulf states themselves were some of the measures introduced. Others included a complex set of procedures to balance the conflicts and interests of the three powers and, if necessary, to intervene militarily. This policy achieved two objectives: It protected the Gulf states from the forward policies of the regional powers, and it maintained the balance of power between all three.

 Micro-Interference in Internal Affairs

British interference in the internal affairs of the Gulf states was limited to cases in which its own interests were at stake.[666] “Government” was generally left to the rulers, who were personally responsible for fulfilling their treaty obligations, and they alone had dealings with the political agents and residents. In turn, this gave the rulers a generally free hand, and in keeping with tradition, they remained accessible to their subjects at all times. Hearing petitions and grievances on a daily basis was the norm. In principle, the rulers had absolute power, but this was tempered by a process of consultation with senior notables before decisions of any consequence were taken. “Governments” in the Gulf states today have retained many of these features, despite the complex and formal government machinery that has since been set up.

Nevertheless, British interference remained on a micro level, to reinforce its potency and effectiveness. In 1938, for example, reformist movements in Kuwait and Dubai led to elections of quasi-representative assemblies. These were led by men who relegated their respective rulers to positions of nominal authority and then proceeded to embark on ambitious programs for social and economic development.[667] The British political agents regarded the reform movements as internal matters but were primarily concerned with the implementation of British treaty conditions. Thus, they warned rebellious leaders that they would not interfere in their assemblies but would continue to deal and communicate exclusively with the rulers whose sovereignty Britain had acknowledged and recognized. This inevitably weakened the opposition and the possibility of reform, while consolidating the position of the rulers.[668] The reform movements collapsed shortly thereafter. The status quo had been maintained with only minimal British involvement.

* In Britain’s Shadow: 1971,1990

When Britain withdrew unilaterally from the Gulf in 1971, there were two immediate consequences that are of relevance to this discussion. First, most of the Gulf states had only just acquired independence and were still in the very early stages of state formation, and second, the United States was poised to replace Britain in the area. Official US. interest in the Gulf states had first been expressed during the 194Os,[669] but Britain had consistently prevented Washington from gaining much influence. As late as 1968, for example, Britain persisted in its refusal to sanction the opening of a U.S. consulate in Dubai.[670]

 Stable Dynamics of Change

Notwithstanding such machinations, independence brought feverish activity to the Gulf states, as government departments were set up, infrastructure planned and constructed, laws promulgated, and international relations established. During this time, the Gulf states were subjected to a wide variety of external forces, each of which was potentially capable of destabilizing them. But they remained firm in the face of the surrounding maelstrom. Without a doubt, the strength of their own sociopolitical fabric, supported by the long years of British external protection, had provided them with the ability to withstand the consequences of momentous events. In addition to the sudden and dramatic rise in oil prices, following the 1973 Arab-Israeli War, which brought an avalanche of revenue to tiny entities, the Gulf states were certainly ill-equipped to manage the massive changes that followed. Other developments, including the 1975 Algiers Agreement between Iraq and Iran, which contributed to the end of the war in Dhuffar, the fall of the Shah of Iran and the establishment of the Islamic Republic in 1979, the November 1979 seizure of the Grand Mosque in Makkah, and the Shia riots in the Eastern Province of Saudi Arabia the same year, all contributed to the rulers’ rapid political growth.

Equally important, the Gulf states survived the large-scale fighting of the Iran-Iraq War relatively unscathed. Although Kuwait was drawn into the periphery of the conflict, and other states witnessed local reactions to the war, the essential features of the states remained intact. The durability of their social structures, their political systems, and their boundaries were tested and amply reaffirmed. Indeed, their capacity to “cope” with crises of considerable magnitude strengthened their ability to manage externally induced forces to their respective advantages.

 Twin Pillar Policy

Even the twin pillar policy, based on a putative alliance between Iran and Saudi Arabia, did not faze them. Adopted by the Nixon administration after the British withdrawal, the policy remained in place until the Shah was overthrown in early 1979. Its primary motivation was the fear of Soviet encroachment on a region of vital importance to industrialized economies.

Iran was regarded as a militarily capable state, able to secure Western interests, and the Shah was seen as a strong and assertive figure, who could play the role of “policeman of the Gulf’ in return for substantial American support. Saudi Arabia, for its part, was viewed as the stabilizing influence on the Gulf states, the true successor to Britain in that sense. The support it received as one of the two pillars of U.S. policy enhanced its position locally and throughout the rest of the Arab world. Inasmuch as this policy was a departure from the days of the Raj, when the twin-track approach had maintained the balance of power between the regional powers and safeguarded the small Gulf states, it held great potential for destabilization. First, it de-coupled the regional balance of power from the security of the small states. Second, it placed one of the regional powers in a position of enormous strength and influence. The triple containment policy had sustained the Pax Britannica, but its nascent variations would lead to cleavages in the security framework within a matter of a few years.

Iraq, which was then receiving significant Soviet aid, quietly sought to counteract Iranian influence, by trying to foster some form of regional integration with the smaller Gulf states. Together they established a Gulf University in Bahrain, and implemented a number of economic and social projects. Yet, the American support to Iran was overwhelming, and included covert Central Intelligence Agency assistance to the Kurds in their rebellion against Baghdad. Not unexpectedly, this provided Iran with great leverage over Iraq, enabling it to impose the 1975 Algiers Agreement whereby Baghdad conceded part of the Shatt Al-Arab waterway to Teheran.[671] It may therefore be correctly argued that the agreement contributed to the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq War five years later.

 Collapse of the Twin Pillar Policy

Nevertheless, when, in January 1979, the Shah’s regime collapsed, so too did a vital component of American policy in the region. The establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran represented a major shift in the regional power structure. Other events caused Washington to search for an alternative policy: the hostage crisis in Teheran, the seizure of the Grand Mosque in Makkah, and the Soviet invasion ofAfghanistan, to name just three.

Within a very short period of time, the Rapid Deployment Force was established—also in 1979—as a major step toward an emerging new policy that was based on direct U.S. intervention in the region. This was underlined by the Carter Doctrine, which warned: Any attempt to gain control of the Gulf region would be regarded as an assault on U.S. interests. The new policy was reconfirmed by the Reagan corollary, which extended the Carter Doctrine to include local destabilization. Indeed, the reliance on American armed forces, rather than those of a regional power, grew as the RDF Joint Task Force was created, and later when it was transformed into the U.S. Central Command.

Noticeably, the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq War in 1980 was the first major conflagration in the region since the days of the Raj. It was also a victim of the twin pillar policy, as one of the many reasons for the conflict was the Iraqi attempt to be rid of binding clauses in the Algiers Accord. Another was a Struggle for hegemony in the Gulf. In the event, the conflagration lasted for eight long years, with an estimated million casualties and both belligerents left dramatically impoverished. Within a short period of time, the arena of war extended beyond the borders of Iraq and Iran and began to pose significant threats to the Gulf states themselves. Their initial response was to establish the Gulf Cooperation Council in May 1981. Although this provided some security, it did not protect them entirely, as the 1983 bomb attacks in Kuwait amply demonstrated. Other problems increased tensions, and by 1984 the Iran-Iraq War had entered its “tanker” phase, which included direct assaults on Kuwaiti ships.[672]

It may be worth recalling that several Western and many other states were providing mihtary assistance to both sides, in a cynical attempt to keep them engaged, ostensibly to safeguard the stability of the Gulf states and their markets. Significant U.S. military involvement, however, only began to take shape after a Kuwaiti request to re-flag its tankers. In 1987, a powerful fleet of the U.S. navy, together with the frigates, destroyers, and minesweepers of a variety of other states, began escorting the re-flagged tankers and sweeping the Gulf waters for mines. Within a year, Iran accepted a cease-fire, and the war ended in August 1988.

* Challenges to Stability since 1990

Given this background, when Iraqi forces invaded Kuwait in August 1990, it was not surprising to see Washington lead the international response, thereby establishing its hegemony in a very public and assertive manner. The symbolism with, and differences between, Lord Curzon’s imperial visit to the Gulf to establish British hegemony at the beginning of the twentieth century and General Norman Schwarzkopfs reliance on state-of-the-art technologies to project U.S. power at the close of the century are especially poignant.[673] In fact, the high-profile U.S. presence during Desert Storm can be viewed as an affirmation of the state security system that had been so dramatically challenged by the Iraqi invasion, and which U.S.-led forces fought on such a large scale to uphold. It can also be viewed as the first and major step in a new and different direction.[674]

In restoring Kuwait to its former status, Washington underlined its adherence to the state system and political structures that London had put in place earlier. The United States reaffirmed the international boundaries of Kuwait, left its political system intact, and strengthened as well as enhanced the position of the ruler. A corollary of these “achievements” is the cohesiveness of Kuwaiti society. Throughout the Iraqi occupation, all Kuwaitis, including leading members of the opposition, remained loyal to the political system, regardless of their own personal convictions. In one sense, therefore, the U.S.

upheld the old order to ensure the external security of the Gulf states. In another sense, it introduced undercurrents of change whose impact on both internal and external stability is potentially negative.

The most obvious of these undercurrents is the introduction of the dual containment policy. Indeed, the dramatic isolation of both Iraq and Iran, coupled with the relentless punitive measures against Iraq, have had disastrous repercussions on the societies, economies, and international relations of both countries. Earlier, the twin pillar policy had provided Iran with considerable leverage over Iraq. Similarly, dual containment proved to be equally divisive. It is earning two potential enemies for the Gulf states and Saudi Arabia. Moreover, it has delinked the security of the Gulf states from that of the rest of the region, abandoning geopolitical realities and releasing forces that threaten stability. Six major concerns, which stand out as potential irritants, are identified and examined below.

 Unpopular US Policies

The Gulf states have all entered into bilateral defense agreements with the United States, reviving the old treaty system. As a result, they are very publicly and openly allied with Washington. The recent visit to Sultan Qaboos of Oman by President Clinton—on his return from the Indian subcontinent—reaffirmed the emerging relationships. The American alliance, however, has further exposed the governments of the Gulf states to the inequities of U.S. policy throughout the Arab world. These include, on the one hand, persistently punishing the Iraqi people for the actions of their government, continuing the bombing raids, and sustaining the sanctions. On the other hand, turning a blind eye to Israel’s continued violations of international law and United Nations resolutions earned many Gulf rulers the opprobrium of some of their citizens.

Indeed, these inconsistencies are not lost on the people of the Gulf states, as their dissatisfaction with these—and other—aspects of American foreign policy could polarize nascent opposition groups. This possibility has been amplified by high-profile events propagated by the media, which report on events as they occur, bringing home the visual experience of Iraqi civilian casualties, and burgeoning Israeli settlements. Ironically, the proposed Cooperative Defense Initiative would call for even stronger links with the United States, placing Gulf governments in even weaker positions vis-â-vis their citizens.

In the past, unpopular alliances have left their impact on Gulf states' internal affairs. In Kuwait, for example, the frustrations caused by the ruler's open association with Britain during the 1936–1939 intifada in Palestine crystallized into the reform movement two years later. The men who had gathered together to express their anger at the ruler's pro-British attitude toward the Palestinians became the protagonists of the 1938 reform movement.[675] The same situation occurred in Bahrain a decade later, when the United Nations partition plan for Palestine became known and, once again, there was a fusion between the Palestine problem and anti-British sentiments that targeted the ruler and his British adviser.[676]

 Arab Relationships

During their long isolation under British rule, the Gulf states were deprived of strong and free relationships with the rest of the Arab world. Once the barriers were lifted, an extensive and widespread interchange began. On the private level, this took the form of visits, professional meetings, and conferences, as joint ventures and investments flourished. On the governmental level, this included membership of Arab regional organizations, donations, and support for major Arab causes, to name just a few examples.

During the past decade, however, a new separation between the Gulf states and the rest of the Arab world is palpable, echoing many of the features of the old days of isolation. Increasingly, the Gulf states are regarded as supportive of US. policies against fellow Arabs that, once again, create unmistakable tensions. Some vocal leaders as well as ordinary citizens are blaming their governments for acquiescing to non-Arab and non-Islamic concerns.

 Dynamics of Decision Making

Because American management systems are quantitatively oriented, and largely based on sophisticated intelligence, they tend to result in rapid decisions. They are in sharp contrast with the procedures that are integral to decision making in traditional societies. The Gulf states are small and slow moving. Management of their affairs is negotiated at an unhurried pace by leaders who value traditional mechanisms. Rulers and governments alike enjoy effective but narrow power bases that have survived through the lengthy processes of discussion, negotiation, and consensus. Each state has its own dynamics and responds in its own way to external pressures. Under the circumstances, the nature of the new relationships with the United States does not allow such discussions and consensus to occur. The result may well translate in undermining internal relationships and time-honored processes.

 Macro-Pressure on InternalAffairs

At least six variables may also be identified to describe the various macropressures on Gulf states' internal affairs.

Arms Sales. Since the end of Desert Storm, the United States has adopted forward policies to promote the sale of costly weapons systems, civilian aircraft, telecommunications gear, and other civil and military hardware. President Clinton's personal interventions regarding these procurements are well known. In many cases, the Gulf states have made the purchases reluctantly, as their strong financial burdens have been compounded by the ongoing slide in oil prices. These vast expenditures constitute nothing less than macro-pressure. They are draining valuable financial resources and removing a powerful source of socioeconomic stability. As already mentioned, the great wealth of these small societies made the transition from tribal shaykhdoms to modern states a relatively smooth process. Time-tested welfare systems shielded individuals and governments from the uncertainties and vicissitudes of their newfound prominence. An apt example of how government bounty could salvage financial disasters is provided in the 1985 collapse of the Suq al-Manakh in Kuwait. To settle the morass of bad debts and stabilize the badly shaken national economy, the government came up with a wide-ranging package to bail out all individuals and institutions that had been involved in the Suq. [677]

This deus ex machina approach is no longer possible, as dwindling national reserves have inevitably induced reductions in subsidies, benefits, and guaranteed public sector employment. The financial shield that has buttressed the societies of the modern Gulf states, which has been an integral part of their development, cannot be relied on as such in the future. Without it, internal tensions can be expected to rise. Expensive mistakes, such as those made in hitherto subsidized private businesses, will have to be covered by their owners. Competition between nationals in the various economic sectors will increase, as will the rivalries within ruling families.

Militarization. When Britain withdrew from the Gulf in 1971, the region was largely demilitarized. Iran was just beginning to expand its land, air, and sea forces, but the remainder of the region was largely free of heavy armaments. This is in strong contrast with the situation today, whereby the smallest Gulf states have sophisticated weapons systems, which they are unlikely to ever use. The origins of this transformation into a heavily fortified camp can be traced directly to the twin pillar policy, which relied substantially on building up Iran’s military capabilities. Inevitably, this factor reverberated on Iraq’s security requirements, as Baghdad had little choice but to counter the putative Iranian threat. The long Iran-Iraq War further involved the purchase of massive amounts of military hardware by both sides, encouraged by governments and arms suppliers around the world. Saudi Arabia was not left out of this diabolical process at the same time.

Only the Gulf states themselves remained relatively unhampered by this trend until 1990, when events overtook them. Before and since the 1991 war, it seems that American policy has been to market its weapons systems, which consequently resulted in the heavy militarization of all the states of the region—for the first time in history. This is over and above the substantial pre-positioning program of American military need, personnel, and facilities that merely add to the growing military nature of the region. It must be emphasized that this militarization is taking place in societies that are not ready for such sophisticated and highly technical armies. It is engendering a false sense of security and, perhaps inadvertently, making the use of force an available alternative to diplomacy as a problem-solving method.

Uncertainties of US. Policies. The methods of implementing British policy throughout the twentieth century were generally well known and remained reasonably constant. This enabled rulers to evolve a corresponding pattern for negotiation and response. By contrast, the frequent changes in American policy have been very pronounced, including the shift from twin pillar to the Carter Doctrine to dual containment; more recently, the trend seems to be toward some kind of normalization with Iran —all of which have taken place within a short time span of 30 years. These changes obviously immobilize a sustained pattern of response, and call for constant adaptation, which places considerable pressure on regional governments.

Increasing Unemployment. A corollary to the expensive weapons sales, and the consequent decline in national reserves, has been the increasing unemployment among Gulf nationals. Although this process began before the 1990–91 war, it has been exacerbated ever since. The dramatic increase in university enrollment, for example, has resulted in a record number of graduates whose expectations are not being satisfied as the job market has been shrinking. Moreover, the exceptionally high population growth rates (around 3.3 percent and above) have exacerbated the problem by several fold. It has been estimated that the labor force (aged 15—64) has been increasing at rates that vary from country to country between 0.7 percent and 1.6 percent per year.[678] Access to international media and the Internet[679] has also been growing, compounding the frustrations of young graduates.[680] These issues, if not addressed, will ultimately induce calls for transparency and accountability regarding national expenditure, a hitherto taboo subject.

Residual Internal Tensions. In each of the Gulf states, there is some residual internal tension, often several decades old. Factionalism within the ruling family (Qatar), uncertainties over succession (Abu Dhabi, Oman), and opposition to the government (Kuwait) are well known examples of this phenomenon. Inter-State border disputes are also several generations old: The Bahrain-Qatar conflict has been ongoing since the 19305, although the March 2001 ruling by the International Court of Justice on their borders seems to have solved the problem. To be sure, some of these problems have been contained; others have been receiving the attention of the GCC in an effort to solve them quietly and, perhaps, expeditiously. An essential component of these efforts, nevertheless, is the slow and gradual level of social change that has served all five states well and contributed to their survival against some odds. U.S. macro-interference could force the pace and act on these smoldering tensions, possibly resulting in open internal conflict.

Institutional Interference. The U.S. relationship with the Gulf states has been formalized in a series of bilateral agreements and joint exercises and through an ongoing flow of visits and consultations between their respective leaders and governments. An integral part of a long-term formal association with Washington is the institutionalization of its concern for, amongst others, the Middle East Peace Process, women's rights issues, the protection of intellectual property, environmental concerns, and many other similar affairs.

These have been extended to the Gulf states and, as such, constitute a form of institutional interference in their internal affairs. The establishment by Oman and Qatar of relations with Israel, for example, can be seen in this light, particularly in the face of non-negligible local opposition. Likewise, the Doha Economic Summit (for the Middle East and North Africa region), which was held in November 1998 despite a noisy Arab boycott—as a protest against Israeli obstruction of the Peace Process—saw six Arab countries in attendance, three of which (Qatar, Oman, and Kuwait) were Gulf states. Another example is the high-profile U.S. support for Kuwait's Amiri decree regarding the enfranchisement of women, to which has been attributed its rejection by the National Assembly.

 Changing Patterns

Among the significant challenges facing Gulf states are those that concern the ruling families themselves. Recent events in Qatar indicate major changes from established patterns. Contrary to tradition, the present Amir deposed his father, which is unique in the history of Qatar (and in most Gulf states), because such behavior does not extend to the father-son relationship. Today, the conservatism of Qatar stands in strong contrast with the avant-garde Al-Jazeera television station, which was established just as the Ministry of Information was abolished. Another break with the past is the relationship with Israel. The recent abduction of an aircraft carrying the Amir's cousin, accused of involvement in an attempted coup, is closer to fantasy than to Qatari tradition. US. support for the Amir in these and other innovations, including the much-discussed municipal elections, has been open and public.[681]

All of these initiatives have been taken in an ultra-conservative society, and represent the first manifestation of substantial internal change since Operation Desert Storm. In the past, the periodicity of events had a predictable element to them, but the departure from traditional Qatari patterns of behavior is a move into uncharted territory. Some of the new measures have introduced flexibility, new opportunities, and possibilities, while others hold potentialities for isolation and tension.

 The Special Case of Bahrain

Finally, and while it is outside the scope of this paper—which sets out a broad framework for all of the Gulf states—it is necessary to briefly focus on Bahrain to illustrate the impact of U.S. policies on the island-state's internal stability.

Of all the Gulf states, Bahrain is the weakest and most vulnerable, and the reasons—many of which are unique—are well known. Manama's ruling family did not emerge from within the society, as in the other states, where a social contract with the rulers has maintained stability. The country has a strong confessional (Shia-Sunni) divide, as well as a strong rural-urban divide. It is densely populated and has a white- and a blue-collar labor force. Most importantly, it is not oil rich.

Less well known, perhaps, is the high level of British interference in its internal affairs, particularly during the twentieth century. This contributed in large measure to the pattern of unrest that has plagued the country for decades and that is still ongoing. In 1923, Britain imposed a number of political, legal, and administrative changes that resulted in the enforced abdication of the ruler.[682] In 1938, there were additional impositions, this time regarding employment opportunities, and again in 1954, 1956, and 1965, for different reasons. Opposition leaders were invariably arrested; some were deported, usually to an island in the Indian Ocean.[683] The government made few serious attempts to reach an accommodation with the opposition. London's policy of supporting the rulers strengthened their position vis-â-vis their people.

The election by male suffrage of the first (and only) national assembly, in 1973, looked set to reverse past trends of tension and confrontation with the government. Yet, the Jufair agreement, giving the United States access to naval facilities on the island, became a major stumbling block when the nascent Assembly rejected it. By 1975, it had become such a contentious issue that the Amir suspended the Assembly altogether. Thus, it may be safe to argue that the close U.S. alliance, particularly since Operation Desert Storm, has perpetuated the old patterns of tension. In fact, the movement calling for greater participation, as well as the restoration of the Assembly starting in 1994, has led to a long period of renewed confrontation. Manama's heavy-handed response and the widespread arrests and ill-treatment of prisoners (some of whom have been deported) have attracted regional and international attention, including calls by many human rights organizations for the cessation of repression and torture.

Sadly, the late Amir, Isa bin Salman (1961–99), was unresponsive to the mounting unrest and international criticism of his rule. He was so in the firm knowledge that official and public American support sustained him.[684] This affirmation strengthened the Amir, allowing him to pursue his repressive policies amid local and internationd clamor for political reform.[685] His son, Shaykh Hamad bin Isa, who succeeded him in 1999, looks set to reverse his predecessors' uncompromising attitudes: the most striking indication has been his repeal in February 2001 of emergency laws, the release of all political prisoners, the sanctioning of a referendum, and other measures that promise to introduce the rule of law to the country.

* Conclusion

Britain’s triple containment policy preserved the status quo in the Gulf region, but left many problems frozen and unresolved. Although it imposed stability, it left behind a large number of grievances, which were not overcome. These included territorial claims and border disputes. Indeed, Britain missed a number of opportunities to solve the Tunbs and Abu Musa dispute[686] before it became a stumbling block in Arab-Iranian relations.

Almost as soon as Washington sought to replace London in the Gulf, it initiated a process of militarization with Iran, and to a lesser extent, with Saudi Arabia. During the 1980s, it extended this policy to include Iraq. Until then, the Gulf states had had only limited military means, but since Operation Desert Storm, their burgeoning arsenals are in striking contrast to their earlier levels.

It is safe to argue that many aspects of superpower rivalry have been transplanted to the Gulf. Rather than being shielded from the Cold War, the region gradually absorbed some of its traits, even after the collapse of the Soviet Union. In 1948, the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff secretly considered the destruction of Middle Eastern oil fields if it became impossible to defend them against Moscow.[687] Cold War policies were manifested once again in Iran with the infamous 1953 CIA plot to overthrow the Mossadeq government.

Current American policies are driven by a preponderance of military considerations as well. Finding solutions to the intrinsic problems of the region is not a priority. Although the resolution of these problems, through diplomatic channels, would be far more conducive to the security of the region, the current discourses on weapons of mass destruction and inter-ballistic missiles seem to dominate. Under the circumstances, and given their relatively weak positions, the Gulf states remain vulnerable to powerful external forces. Not surprisingly, Washington has succeeded in incorporating them into its own system, which, by all accounts, has severely stressed their economies, labor forces, social structures, and political traditions.

The resulting militarization has been absorbing Gulf states' financial and human resources, as the recruitment of substantial numbers of young men into their military—to manage and maintain the newly acquired sophisticated armaments—is weakening the new generation. It is also weakening its effectiveness to plan and prepare for the post-oil phase. Moreover, the high levels of military procurement will inevitably create new centers of non-productive power. The transformation of these centers into institutional forces, which could polarize the opposition, mostly within the ruling families, could also become significant in future political developments.

In the end, because the Gulf states are young and small, and because they are still undergoing so many dramatic and rapid changes, their futures remain fragile. They have established an enabling environment to manage the process of change, which is demonstrated in their commitment to invest in human resources. The adoption of environmental protection policies, the introduction of quality telecommunication services, and high levels of Internet and computer penetration systems all illustrate Gulf leaders' quest for excellence. Thus, as they enter the new century, the Gulf states bring with them many of the attributes that could propel them into a knowledge-based society, enabling them to become members of the global economy. This would be contingent, however, on the introduction of substantial changes in American policy, whose means do not serve proclaimed objectives. Unless the means are reconciled with objectives, the long-term stability of the Gulf states will, indeed, be imperiled.

[660] In placing together these five different states for this chapter, there will be inevitable generalizations. Oman, in particular, does not fit entirely into the first part of the paper, since it was technically an "independent" state. But it was bound by other obligations to Britain that resulted in sharing many of the features discussed in this chapter.

[661] Public Record Office, London, FO371/156977: FO Minute (Green File), 15 November 1961.

[662] A. B. Zahlan, Al’Arab wa Tahadiyyat al’Um wal Taqanah:Taqaddum min dun Taghayyur [The Chailenge of Science and Technology in the Arab World: Progress without Change], Beirut: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 1999, pp. 63–9.

[663] Ibid.

[664] This aspect is discussed at length in Rosemarie Said Zahlan, The Making of the Modern GulfStates: Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Oman, Reading, United Kingdom: Ithaca Press, 1998.

[665] To quote a political resident in 1931, British policy in the Gulf was “to maintain the independence of the Arab Shaykhdoms and at the same time to prevent any other foreign power from dominating them or obtaining special privileges in the Gulf.” British Library, India Office Collection, L/P&S/12/3727, Political Resident to Government of India, 24 November 1931.

[666] This is best illustrated by the fact that there were only four British officers stationed in the entire Gulf region until World War II. Rosemarie Said Zahlan, The Origins of the United Arab Emirates: A Political and Social History of the Trucial States, London: Macmillan Press, Ltd., 1978, p. 162.

[667] For an account of the events leading up to and following the establishment of the Dubai Majlis, see Rosemarie J. Said, “The 1938 Reform Movement in Dubai,” Al-Abhath 23:1–4, December 1970, pp. 247 318. There are a number of studies that compare the Kuwait movement with those of Dubai and Bahrain, which also took place at the same time. One of the earliest was Muhammad al-Rumaihi, “Harakat 1938 al-Islahiyyah fil Kuwayt wal Bahrayn wa Dubayy” [The 1938 Reform Movements in Kuwait, Bahrain and Dubai], Journal of the Gulf and Arab Peninsula Studies 1:4, October 1975, pp. 29–68.

[668] By the same token, Britain could also remove rulers when it found it expedient to do so. The enforced abdication of the ruler of Bahrain (1923) and the British-backed palace coups in Sharjah (1965), Abu Dhabi (1966), and Oman (1970) are apt examples.

[669] For an account of the early years of US. interest in the region, see Rosemarie Said Zahlan, “Anglo-American Rivalry in Bahrain, 1918—1947,” in Shaykh Abdullah bin Khalid Al-Khalifah and Michael Rice (eds.), Bahrain through theAgeszThe History, London: Kegan Paul International, 1993,pp. 567–87.

[670] Public Record Office, London FCO8/37, (5ɛɹل Interest in Persian Gulf Political Affairs.” The document advanced the same excuse it had given a U.S. request in the 1940s to establish a consulate in Bahrain, namely, that it would set a precedent that other countries would seize on as an excuse to enter the region.

[671] Shortly afterwards, Iraq discontinued aid to the Dhuffar revolution in Oman, a major step toward the collapse of that movement.

[672] Nadia El-Sayyed El-Shazly, The Gulf Tanker War: Iran and Iraq’s Maritime Swordplay, London: Macmillan Press Ltd., 1997.

[673] Ziɹɹıl Making of the Modern Gulf States,p. و۱ ۱.

[674] There are of course many well-known studies and publications on the current security situation in the Gulf. See Muhammad Al-Said Idris, Al-Nizam al-Iqlimi lil Khalij al-Arabi [The Regional Security System of the Arab Gulf], Beirut: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 2000.

[675] For the details of the leaders of the anti-British movement and how they later formed the nucleus of the 1938 opposition, see Rosemarie Said Zahlan, “The Gulf States and the Palestine Problem, 1936—48,” Arab Studies Quarterly 3:1, winter 1981, pp. 1—21.

[676] Ibid.

[677] This included paying off small investors, including those with losses of up to $7 million, partially guaranteeing bank losses, providing ten-year interest-free promissory notes, writing off debts that could not be repaid, and buying shares in the stock market to bring up prices.

[678] Nadia Sayyed Ali, “Demography and Development in Three GulfStates,” unpublished doctoral thesis, Oxford University, 1998, p. 180. For an examination of the problems of localization and restructuring of the labor force, see Andrzej Kapiszewski, NativeArab Population and Foreign Workers in the Gulf States: Social, Economic and Security Issues, Krakow: Taiwpn Universitas, 1999.

[679] The Gulf states have the highest number of computers per capita in the Arab world. Moreover, preparations under way—such as those for establishing an Internet City in Dubai—are expected to transform the economies of the different states even further.

[680] The remarkably high enrollment figures in all the states reflect the fact that education, particularly higher education, is of relatively recent vintage. In 1970, there were only 30 graduates in the UAE; by 1975, they had increased to 589, a 19-fold increase in just five years. Today, it is estimated that the annual number of graduating engineers alone doubles every four years.

[681] After the 1996 attempted coup against the Amir, the U.S. State Department publicly supported the sovereignty and independence of Qatar. A spokesman claimed that the coup could not be likened to the Amir's overthrow of his father, since the Amir had had legitimate concerns.

[682] Interference by Major Daly, the political agent, was on such a high level that it is still recalled today in the vernacular as "Daly's rules," an expression of severity in some Gulf states.

[683] There are a number of relevant studies on Bahrain. See M. G. Rumaihi, Bahrain: Social and Political Change since the First World War, London: Bowker, 1967: and Mahdi Abdalla Al-Tajir, Bahrain 1920–1945: Britain, the Shaikh and the Administration, London: Croom Helm, 1987. The harsh treatment of political prisoners became an embarrassment to the British government during the 1960s, when a press campaign in London highlighted their plight. The British government had no choice but to release them. For an overall account of Bahraini unrest up to and including 1995, see Munira A. Fakhro, "The uprising in Bahrain: An Assessment," in Gary Sick and Lawrence G. Potter (eds.). The Persian Gulfat the Millennium, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997, pp. 167–188.

[684] In May 1996, the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff stated that the United States was "most supportive of Bahrain's efforts to ensure its stability." Reuters, 29 May 1996. This theme was reiterated by President Clinton, who assured the Amir that Washington supported his government and sovereignty.

[685] In March 1996, despite the anti-government rallies and street riots, the Clinton administration once again praised Bahrain, this time for its support and attendance at the anti-terrorism summit in Egypt.

[686] Rosemarie Said Zahlan, "Al-Niza'a Hawi al-Juzur al-Arabiyyah fil Khalij 1928–1971: Dirasat lil 'Alaqat al-Arabiyyah al-Iraniyyah wa Dawr Britaniya Fiha" [The Role of Britain in the Conflict over the Tunb Islands, 1928—1971], Journal of the Gulf and Arabian Peninsula Studies 2:6, April 1976, pp. 9–32.

[687] After some debate, they decided to limit the destruction to refining, loading, and transportation systems. There were no plans to consult any of the governments involved. U.S. National Archives, General Records of the Department of State, box 4, “Preparation for Demolition of Oil Facilities in the Middle East,” 25 May 1948.

 Chapter 21: Gulf States’ Links with Their Post-Soviet Northern Neighbors

Theodore Karasik

The late-1989 collapse of the Soviet Union has left a noticeable impact upon and within the Persian Gulf region that deserves special attention. A decade after significant changes in the global balance of power, the legacy of the Soviet system in creating new national leaders is still visible, as a new leadership emerges in Moscow. How these new leaders behave in the Gulf and how they conduct meaningful decision making toward the region are of critical importance because north-south security and trade relations are in full swing. Whether the Gulf States can rely on stable political, economic, and security relationships with Central Asia—while countering the still influential Russian Federation— deserves attention. In recent years, the relationship between Gulf states and several New Independent States (NIS) of the former Soviet Union has shaped slowly evolving security and commercial ties.

Even if Soviet educated, the vast majority of the governing elites in the Caucasus and Central Asia are clan based, which inevitably alters their independent approaches. Under the old Soviet system, local party bosses reigned over their respective republics largely unchallenged, as long as they held to Moscow’s guidelines dutifully enforced by Russian first secretaries. After the Soviet breakup, the Russian deputies went home, but left the local Communist hierarchies and the privileges associated with power, complete with their leaderships, intact and in place. The underlying political structures, and the way in which elections were run, retained their previous blueprints in the decade after the area entered its post-Soviet period. Even if these methods gave NIS officials a Western orientation, most local leaders behaved in typically non-Soviet modes, perceiving their independent republics as far closer to traditional entities. Indeed, discarded concepts, ranging from clan fiefdoms to khanates and emirates, were once again in vogue. Several leaders perceived themselves as custodians over substantial mineral resources, which, noticeably, underscores the dormant similarities between them and the Gulf states. At least on this score, the two regions shared much in common, which further endeared leaders to each other.

In addition to this fundamental characteristic, two other salient concerns shaped the overall impact between Gulf states and leading post-Soviet republics: security and commerce.

The newly engaged Central Asian leaders shared similar perceptions of internal and external threats.[688] In some ways, inexperienced leaders—-at least by international standards—saw foreign interference through political violence, proxies, assassination, rival governments, and introduction of radical ideologies as potential warnings. In this respect, their views mirrored those shared by several Gulf leaders. Not surprisingly, many developed counter-strategies relying on strong security services. Like their Gulf counterparts, they quickly learned to co-opt dissent, practice divide-and-rule strategies, allow ideological flexibility, and permit, when feasible, pseudo-participation in the political systems.

Equally important is the impact that the emerging north-south commercial nexus has had in a very short decade. Early in the 90s, leading Gulf states sought to invest heavily in the former Soviet Union to secure lucrative commercial returns, advance cultural and religious coalitions, and develop joint strategies to market raw materials in mutually beneficial ways. Outside the Soviet orbit, few realized that these objectives would be difficult to accomplish, because the overall physical conditions in the north were comparable to those found in developing countries. The region lacked a proper infrastructure, which severely prevented trade. In fact, the area in general lacked long-distance highways, a situation that has changed little in the decade since independence. Existing roads remained in poor condition, railroads were underdeveloped, and airports were sub-standard. These transportation settings made it difficult to move goods both north and south. Moreover, and because they shared similar types of economies, in that leading countries in both areas produced a limited range of commodities—such as cotton, minerals, oil, and gas—their narrow export bases meant that Central Asian and Gulf states competed.[689] Indeed, the direction of trade in the decade since 1990 has recorded substantial advances, as many anticipated, but progress has been slow, leading to substantial reassessments of future trends.

* Gulf States' Impact on Central Asia

The idea of the Central Asian states being pulled away by either Moscow or Teheran seems far-fetched. To be sure, Russia continues to exercise substantial influence in Central Asia, but the latter is loath to sustain umbilical cords when so little benefits come their way. Likewise, many realize that their religious ties run through Makkah, not Qom. Consequently, neither Russia nor Iran has recorded significant advances in Central Asia. The so-called Islamic threat proved to be vastly exaggerated given that few Central Asians were inspired or mobilized to political action. Opposition figures in Central Asia could not rely on religion to catapult themselves to power given the overwhelming secularization process introduced during the Soviet era. Contrary to widespread assumptions, the common Islamic identity in Central Asia remained too vague and too abstract to challenge nationally defined state authority, and boundaries.

Assuming an Islamic challenge, however, has been used as an excuse to justify authoritarian tendencies throughout the region.

Instead, the region was dominated by an entrenched clan structure, which proved critical throughout the 1990s. Importantly, the intricate clan patterns and associations—so necessary to establishing a realistic blueprint of power structure in Central Asia—proved difficult to decipher. As the establishment of Soviet power corrupted most Central Asian societies, and all social structures were preserved by collective forms, little evidence—save for occasional anecdotal vignettes—was available. Still, the Communists altered Central Asia by working within the framework of traditional hierarchies inadvertently failed to dismantle existing clan structures. An alien ideology could not dismantle in 70 years what took centuries to assemble. Central Asia was clan based before 1917 and, despite Communist authoritarianism, would revert to it in 1990.[690]

Of course, the impact of Communist authoritarianism was substantial, as Central Asia experienced undeniable hardships. Remarkably, and despite the extreme political fluidity that marked their recent behavior, several republics successfully re-drafted their own cultural identities, formed new alliances and associations, identified new friends, and forged important ties with their southern neighbors in the Gulf. Regardless of the kind of arrangements that emerged among the Central Asian states, fresh identities, concrete interests, and long-term objectives were all far more likely than generally assumed.

To some extent, the reasons for these positive developments were directly related to strong tribal and clan alliances in Central Asia. The tendency to remain loyal at the local, rather than the national, level dominated. Tribal, ethnic, and clannish associations were favored because they sought to attach loyalty to dominate the economic, political, and security landscape. In such instances, not a single institution, whether it governed economics, politics, or security affairs, was immune from tribal and clan influences.

Given this background, how have local leaders behaved in the decade since independence? Have they altered the ways through which most controlled the region’s economic assets—especially within their fiefdoms? To be sure, clan politics, combined with entrenched Russian norms, dominated the political landscape. In fact, a distinctive Russian background among Central Asian societies influenced foreign policy formulation and articulation toward the Gulf states. Moreover, the unique mix found among the Central Asian leadership structure also affected the growth and management of Islamic linkages, economic connections, and regional cooperation. Noticeably, Central Asian leaders approached their Gulf counterparts with both delight and apprehension; they were free to conduct international diplomacy to boost links outside Central Asia, while being limited in their abilities to become part of the greater Middle East. The Russian-trained, clannish leaderships still perceived Moscow—despite the trauma and anxiety of the Soviet collapse—as a patron that, in the long run, ensured continuity.

In the end, Central Asia's Soviet-style patrimony included daunting problems that made Gulf policy objectives difficult to manage. Political elites in each new republic, which had grown accustomed to single-party, winner-take-all systems, wrestled with the myriad problems that came with independence. Like their Gulf counterparts, most preferred central control, thereby limiting political competition and creating opposition groups seeking external support. Rivalries revolved around regional or clan contests, rather than institutions that purported to represent class interests or other ideologies. In similar fashion to their Gulf counterparts, Central Asian leaders resorted to lengthy quotations that emphasized the obligations of the leader, portraying the chief executive as the sole decision maker. Most regarded their citizens as subjects, or passive objects of authority, rather than as sources of legitimacy.[691]

* Iran, Russia, and Saudi Arabia in Central Asia

Within the Gulf, Iran wrestled with the notion that it ought to be the single most important country to Central Asia, if for no other reason than geography and history. Yet, Iran emphasized its religious credentials and attempted to redirect the Central Asian republics away from Russia and the West, by encouraging mutually beneficial trade contacts. In fact, Teheran re-launched the moribund regional Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO) and signed several lucrative oil accords.[692] Inasmuch as developing competing oil producers would affect the entire region, Iran's role in forging safe and secure oil lifelines from this critical region to industrialized countries became critical. Nevertheless, Teheran's various activities—in encouraging Central Asian republics to behave in specific ways—meant that revolutionary leaders were keenly aware of how lucrative the area was. Even if the ECO effort failed to produce desired effects in a timely fashion, Iran was still interested in forging close ties with leading Central Asian states, especially over the long term.[693]

Throughout the ‘90s, Iran reasserted its historic and cultural influence in Central Asia, even if Ayatollah Khomeini’s teachings and interpretations were not popular among northern-tier leaders. Likewise, Saudis relied on their religious credentials to influence Central Asian masses, if not the leaders themselves. Independent elements within the Gulf were also interested in enlisting Central Asian support against Western—including Russian—interests. But activity alone did not ensure influence. Indeed, Iran, Saudi Arabia, and others failed to exert real authority in Central Asia, because they themselves were weak and divided.[694] More important, the republics, long viewed as falling within the Russian Empire’s grip, remained vulnerable in both the Soviet as well as post-Soviet eras. In fact, Communist leaders throughout the region would have probably preferred to delay any breakup of the empire, if only to gain breathing space to resolve some of their problems. Because of the proximity to Moscow, especially in political and economic terms, the Central Asian states have had no breathing room of their own.

Therefore, Russia remained powerful because Iran and Saudi Arabia suffered certain foreign policy limitations. Neither Teheran nor Riyadh could compete with Moscow in terms of military, or even economic, means to carve out a sphere of influence. In addition, each state had its own special shortcomings. Although Iran’s location could—in time—mean commercial and transportation links to the southern tier, the country’s international isolation reduced its attraction for states just emerging from three generations of colonialism and political quarantine. Moreover, Teheran’s severe religious order intimidated those accustomed to secularism. Saudi Arabia competed, but its limited population, remote location, and conservative religious traditions made it less than a formidable contender.[695] As important, the northern tier remained a cauldron of real and potential tribulations. Afghanistan’s civil war, which started in the aftermath of the 1979 Soviet invasion, continued, and Tajikistan’s civil war, which began in 1992, was in abeyance. Border problems retained their embarrassing values as well, further compounded by ongoing religious, ethnic, and ideological problems that afflicted the region throughout the decade.[696]

In short, the Muslim populations of the northern tier were unlikely to leave Russia's orbit and rejoin the Middle East anytime soon. The experience of such former colonies, as well as the history of Muslim-Christian relations in this part of the world, supported this conclusion. The hyperbole aside, for 70 years the Muslim republics were Moscow's colonies, and it may prove difficult for them to move away from the imperial center. Moreover, Russia differed in important ways from other European colonizers, having demonstrated a greater willingness to use force to cement closer ties. It should come as no surprise if these intense ties with the former colonies continue for the foreseeable future.

* Why the Two Systems are Different

As the Middle East witnessed the creation of a modern state system starting immediately after World War I, Central Asia was forcibly integrated into the newly created centralized authoritarian state of the Soviet Union. Therefore, by the time newly independent state actors had begun to emerge in the Middle East, Central Asia was already off-limits.[697] Not surprisingly, political elites in most Central Asian republics were subdued faster than their Slavic counterparts, whereas Middle Eastern elites quickly became preoccupied with the superpower status of the USSR. Under the circumstances, there was little attempt to develop genuine bilateral relations between Central Asia and the Middle East.

Thus, the actual development of the "state" in the Middle East and in Central Asia was quite dissimilar. If the Gulf states consolidated their power and developed competing claims on the loyalty of the population, such was not the case in Central Asia. In many ways, the way Britain and France "re-invented" the political map of the Middle East stood in sharp contrast to the "creation" of Soviet Central Asia. The vulnerability that almost inevitably accompanies the creation of states with small populations and little sense of territorial unity proved especially egregious in the USSR. Smaller Central Asian republics, many with re-drawn internal borders that further separated ethnic populations into non-homogeneous entities, became susceptible to sustained interference by larger neighbors. For example, the recent Russian presence in Tajikistan stood in sharp contrast to the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.[698] Some Tajiks perceived Moscow as a genuine asset—whereas Baghdad was perceived as a hegemon determined to re-draw the regional map.

The literature concerning transitology, the study of how governments evolve from Communist dictatorship to democracies, may be helpful in understanding why the two state systems were so different. Transitologists argue that the Central Asian states were able to move from authoritarianism to democracy. Where were these phenomena evident in the Persian Gulf? With a single exception— Saudi Arabia—all were former colonies, and, while similar in that sense, many more dissimilarities existed. For example, ethnic diversity stood out as a case in point, a phenomenon that was quelled in Central Asia. The sheer magnitude of diversity in the Gulf region and its correlation with religious, political, socioeconomic, and spatial markers stood in sharp contrast to Central Asian states. Similarly, powerful historical meanings attached to ethnicity, nation, religion, and state (all negative under the Soviet system), as well as the role played by socialist regimes in developing a new national consciousness, further separated Central Asia's unique characteristics. To this list of fundamentals, it is also important to add the development of "Sovietized" elites—institutions and proto-states within the "independent republics"—to appreciate how difficult the proposition facing Central Asia at the dawn of the twenty-first century appears to be. [699]

* Consequences of Regional Isolation on the Northern Tier

To be sure, the Central Asian republics may be somewhat isolated from the Gulf states, even if the consequences of that indifference—especially for elites—are non-negligible.

 Impact on Islam

Although external influences from the Persian Gulf could play a crucial role, internal political dynamics among individual Central Asian republics were far more significant. Large-scale Islamic fundamentalist movements, which harbored anti-Western sentiments and sought to achieve political power in lieu of the current nomenclatura, were unlikely. Importantly, the Hannafi school of Islamic jurisprudence dominated throughout Central Asia, which translated into a way of life rather than any ideological creed.[700]

What few of Central Asia's leaders were willing to acknowledge was that Islam did not stand as an agent of instability. In fact, religion per se did not offer competition, but stood as an alternative to their inability to rule. How Central Asian leaders managed their economies and governed mattered far more than the populations' religious beliefs. As a consequence, in all of Central Asia, the relationship between Islam and the state remained tense, just as it was during Soviet rule. Noticeably, Central Asian leaders and elites remained far more concerned with the task of restricting the potential spread of "radical Islam" than ruling. Just as some Westerners equated "political Islam" with "fundamentalist" behavior, so did Central Asian elites, and unlike the unique Iraqi case—where religion has been used as an adjunct of extreme nationalism—Central Asian officials did not profess similar beliefs.[701] Islam, in Central Asian mainstream society, became a symbol of cultural freedom, not a movement to reject leadership policies.

 Economics and Trade

Much of Central Asia has still not fully recovered from the collapse of the Soviet Union and the emergence of Russia. For over a decade, few became aware of the importance of markets, and many experienced firsthand the negative consequences of centralized systems. In fact, prior to the 1998 Russian economic crisis, relaxed border security allowed merchants who wanted to buy and sell goods to move across the borders of the new Central Asian states without much hindrance. Since 1998, Uzbekistan has intensified border controls, particularly in the most militantly Muslim and economically despondent region in all of Central Asia, the Ferghana Valley.[702] The greater its restrictions on cross-border interactions, the more steeply regional trade seemed to decrease, which, in the process, subverted the economic development of the region. Yet, the Russian economy was closely tied to the Central Asian cotton economy, which further illustrated existing links between Central Asia and Russia.[703] Undoubtedly, the Soviet legacy lived on.[704]

In the event, at least five agreements existed within Central Asia and the Caucasus to facilitate trade—with each other and Russia—and avoid confusion. Likewise, approximately six international conventions have been developed by the United Nations to ease transit through the landlocked countries of Central Asia. If these agreements were fully implemented, trade might run much more smoothly, as virtually every Central Asian republic prefers to trade with the West. Ironically, most have found little interest in the West, opting to fall back upon their hitherto tested and reliable Eastern partners. In the case of Kazakhstan, for example, trade with China increased substantially. Indeed, Shanghai may be said to have become Kazakhstan's major port.[705]

Because of this Eastern outlook, trade between Central Asia and several Gulf states increased. The United Arab Emirates' Ras al-Khaimah airport, for exampie, expanded facilities to accommodate a large number of tourists specifically from the region, who stocked up on electrical appliances and other "white goods," which they flew back on chartered aircraft.[706] Iran, for its part, exported more than $30 million in natural gas, vehicles, textiles, and foodstuffs to Central Asian republics in 1993, triple the figure for the preceding calendar year.[707] Still, these figures were nowhere as impressive as they portended, given the "abundance of resources."

Saudi Arabia continued to push for economic ties with Kazakhstan—even as modest as they seemed—after several failed attempts. In October 1999, over 40 prominent Saudi business leaders visited Astana to discuss bilateral projects.[708] In July 1997, joint meetings between Saudi and Iranian officials occurred in Almaty, then the Kazakh capital, when the two ambassadors stressed progress in economic relations.[709] It was a symbolic passing of the torch to Saudi Arabia. Several months later, Riyadh promised to finance the construction of a diplomatic village in Astana, to host nearly all foreign embassies.[710]

It is also important to note that personal interests often motivated Central Asian leaders. Many preferred the confusion of multiple agreements—to further their own economic and political agendas—which did not necessarily advance the interests of the area’s populations. Clearly, with the vast majority of that population tied to agriculture and the trading of goods, the implications of declining Central Asian integration, and away from Iran or the Gulf, were ominous.

 Petroleum

In the second half of the 1990s, international interest in the exploration and production of oil in the Caspian Sea region brought great attention to the oilrich republics of Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. In turn, this activity increased the assertiveness of officials in all three republics to move out of Russia’s shadow. At the same time, Washington’s efforts to diminish the historical influence enjoyed by Moscow over the area—by supporting the construction of the Baku-Ceyhan pipeline, an export oil pipeline that would run through the Caucasus to Turkey, for example—met with approval throughout the area.

Yet, the whole affair remained a doubtful proposition, because the Caspian Sea bonanza may not have been as credible as initially thought.[711] Consequently, the rivalry between Turkey, Russia, and Iran over Caspian Sea mineral resources, and oil and gas export pipelines, weakened the ability of the southern Gulf states to become involved in petroleum economy.[712] Gulf investments in Central Asia could, potentially, produce competition, a proposition that was certainly considered carefully by savvy Gulf merchants. Moreover, both Russia and Iran increased pressure, positing that they must be accommodated in some fashion, for effective and secure regional participation. Under the circumstances, the southern Persian Gulf countries may be left out,[713] especially as several Central Asian states are far more interested in self-sufficiency than exporting crude.[714]

 Transportation Problems

Starting in June 1996, Iran voiced certain complaints that its abilities to operate fully functional rail operations to and from Central Asia had encountered specific problems. These included travel through a number of former republics, emerging customs restrictions, mountainous terrain, and areas of instability— including the Ferghana Valley. Moreover, Teheran confirmed that the area's overall infrastructure was in poor condition, and that there was a lack of new investment for repair and maintenance. In fact, the Soviet network could not be used with the Iranian rail system, because of gage differences. Geography played a major role as well, since traffic was routed through desert, steppes, and mountainous regions, all of which required security. In the event, internal conflicts greatly disrupted the Iranian mission.[715] Still, in May 1998, Iran completed the Mashad-Sarakhs-Tedzhen railway, a development that supported claims that the Islamic government could facilitate all transportation requirements between the Persian Gulf and Central Asia.[716] Encouraged by this significant advance, Iran opened discussions on building a canal from the Caspian to the Persian Gulf.[717]

 Leadership Traits: The Turkmenistan Example

Turkmenistan represented the ideal case that supported cooperation between Central Asia and the Gulf states. Starting in 1990, Turkmen leaders embarked on a concerted policy to reduce dependence on any one country for the transportation of oil and gas resources. Ashkhabad advocated building multiple pipelines, running in different directions—to the north, south, east, and west. Turkmenistan, as one of the most repressive of the successor states of the Soviet Union, and one of the poorest, was not hesitant in this oudook.[718] Yet, Turkmenistan was rich in natural resources, as its known reserves of natural gas placed it fourth in the world—behind Russia, the United States, and Iran—with an estimated six- to eight-billion-ton oil reserve. Still, geography and politics dictated how it conducted its foreign affairs, and the type of inducements it sought to present to international investors.

Bordering on the Caspian Sea, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Afghanistan, and Iran, Turkmenistan occupies an important strategic position. That very position, however, makes it vulnerable. With a population of fewer than five million, and a very limited pool of educated individuals, Turkmenistan has been unable to make much economic or social progress since 1991. Its governmental practices and attitudes have remained largely Soviet in substance and style, particularly in urban renewal projects.[719]

Under the circumstances, and because Turkmenistan has never been a genuine nation, the nomadic tribes that inhabited the area east of the Caspian have not rejected Ashkhabad's rule. There is no tradition of government and no legal institutions, except what has been inherited from an alien colonial power. It was, therefore, not surprising that Turkmenistan was ruled by a president whose authority was not limited by laws. As under the Soviet Union, Turkmen elections and referenda were nothing but public endorsements of the ruler's decrees. Finally, the government perceived any religious organization as a potential threat to the stability of the state. It should be noted that the Turkmen Muslim population in its vast majority was tolerant and showed no signs of wishing to establish a theocratic state on the Afghan or Iranian models. This archetype of state-Islamic relations serves as a model for other Central Asian states that suffer from militant Islamic insurgencies from abroad.

* Conclusion

The Central Asian region represented a vast potential political, cultural, religious, and economic gain for the Gulf states. Yet, the political and religious turmoil often associated with the region was sometimes considered a serious impediment to the expansion of economic or cultural ties. Three specific factors that rejected Persian Gulf interests were especially noteworthy: the clan system, age-old ethnic conflicts, and religious revivalism or political Islam derived from old cultural links. For the Gulf, these factors complicated or even endangered potential business contacts, sometimes creating protracted conflicts and deteriorating standards of bilateral development and lost opportunities for legal financial gain.

Russia's ability to prevent the emergence of an Islamic country in Central Asia is an important geopolitical concept. Tsarist Russia, the Soviet Union, and its successor have succeeded in suppressing this objective through diplomacy and force. The Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Russian Ministry of Defense succeeded by building a new security system in the northern band of the Islamic crescent and expanding Kremlin defense policy in the Persian Gulf. It is only natural for the political Islam represented by non-state actors such as Usama bin Laden to replace official Iranian or Saudi cultural religious links in Central Asia.

Moreover, cultural Islam failed, because of Russia's age-old impact on Central Asia, to absorb the teachings and lessons of the 1979 Islamic Revolution and the more potent late 1990s-early 2000 Afghan Taleban or Wahhabi influence, with its overt challenge to Russian imperial authority for political and spiritual control. Russia was astute enough to recognize that when anti—Central Asian subversive activities in the Gulf countries occurred, including the establishment of international networks of clerics against Russian interests and anti—Gulf policy statements and interpretations among the Central Asian elites, an unpleasant side effect was occurring. The driving force behind these feelings of cultural and religious linkages was that clans, ethnic groups, and religious communities involved in challenging state systems were unique in Central Asia, and alien to Persian Gulf religious and political forces. If some believed that the Soviet Union was the continuation of imperial rule, then Russia in the early twenty-first century behaved like its predecessors without question.

For Iran and Saudi Arabia, Central Asia remains impenetrable on the state level because of Russia's strong pull. Unstable conditions faced by the postSoviet rulers in the Central Asian republics converged with the crisis conditions encountered by the post-Khomeini leadership in Iran and the internal and external threat perception problems in Saudi Arabia. These circumstances led to a growing number of contacts that allowed for the development of an increasingly complex set of economic relationships between Iran and Russia, and not Teheran's northern neighbors. For the most part, Iran's efforts to engage the Central Asian states continued to be a good showing, even if Teheran could not play a major role because of internal pressures. Clearly, Teheran denied the possibility that its involvement with northern neighbors could be anything more than predatory or destabilizing simply because Iran faced huge obstacles in Central Asia.

Likewise, although Saudi Arabia had a good start in Central Asia in both religious and economic affairs throughout the early 1990s, it lost steam because of its own economic problems and its ability to maintain domestic stability.[720] Instead, non-state Saudi actors took advantage of Riyadh’s weaknesses. Usama bin Laden and the Arab commander Kattab in Chechnya did not help Central Asian leaders accelerate their ties with the Gulf states. Non-state actors in Chechnya, Afghanistan, and the Gulf began to replace official Saudi ability to export Islamic influence, economic assistance, and diplomatic support.

Finally, in the 1990s, Russia and the Central Asian states were more concerned with their respective policies toward each other then toward Iran. In 1997, Moscow began to pursue military coordination in Central Asia, best illustrated by its substantial involvement in Tajikistan. Later, Russia expressed special interest, and provided substantial assistance to Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan to fight non-state Islamic actors.[721] Russia was using its intelligence capabilities and new security agreements, similar to the Soviet period, to prevent a full disintegration of its security and intelligence influence.[722] Vis-â-vis the pro-Western GCC states, Russia was keen to ensure that its rapprochement with Iran was not gained at the expense of its political and economic interests in the Arab Gulf states, or offended southern Gulf states’ relations with their northern neighbors. Central Asian republics, despite a strong effort to build new linkages with several neighbors, still find their past, present, and future tied to Moscow.

[688] Russian arms sales of both conventional and nuclear-biological-chemical (NBC) technologies played-—and continue to play—-important roles in the evolving relationships between the Gulf states and their northern neighbors, but the focus here is solely on the Central Asian-Gulf states, with a minimal focus on Russian arms sales behavior.

[689] Carol Henderson, “Grass Roots Aspects of Agricultural Privatization in Kyrgyzstan,” CentralAsia Monitor, number 5, 1993, pp. 29—35. See also Don Van Atta, “The Current State of Agrarian Reform in Uzbekistan," Post-Soviet Geography 34:9,1993, pp. 598–606.

[690] Kadir Alimov, "Are Central Asian Clans Still Playing a Political Role?" CentralAsia Monitor, number 4,1994, pp. 14–15.

[691] Edward Allworth, "The Cultural Identity of Central Asian Leaders: The Problem ofAffinity with Followers," CentralAsia Monitor, number 6,1993, pp. 29–30.

[692] Eric Hooglund, "Iran and CentralAsia," in Anoushiravan Ehteshami (ed.). From the Gulf to Central Asia: Players in the New Great Game, Exeter, United Kingdom: University of Exeter Press, I994,pp. 114–28.

[693] Mahrdad Haghayeghi, "Economic Cooperation Organization^ Preliminary Assessment," Central Asia Monitor, number 1, 1995, pp. 14–19. The conclusion reached by ECO announced that the discussion and thinking about advantageous oil and gas routes was "a matter for the future." ECO officials did not specify whether they meant the distant or near future, but existing projects still needed technological feasibility studies, and "additional consultations." The main subject of the consultations, understandably, was the lack of financial resources. See Izvestiya, 27 February 1998, p. 2, in "CentralAsia Put Off Pipeline Route Decisions," FBIS-NES, FTS1998O227OO1O47, 27 February 1998.

[694] Daniel Pipes, "The Event of Our Era: Former Soviet Muslim Republics Change the Middle East," in Michael Mandelbaum (ed.). Central Asia and the World, New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1994, pp. 48—49.

[695] Ibid. See also Mark Katz, “Emerging Patterns in the International Relations of Central Asia,” CentralAsia Monitor, number 2,1994, pp. 23–27.

[696] Pipes, op. cit.

[697] Philip Robins, “The Middle East and Central Asia,” in Peter Ferdinand (ed.). The New States of CentralAsia and Their Neighbors, New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1994, p. 55.

[698] The putative Iraqi influence in Central Asia has been largely neutralized since the end of the War for Kuwait. In fact, the War for Kuwait shaped conservative Arab Gulf states’ attitudes toward the Central Asian republics because Iraq no longer represented a regional threat. Iran, on the other hand, was perceived as a “destabilizer,” a threat to Gulf security but a necessary regional power to act as a local counter-balance to the northern Gulf. Under the circumstances, turning to Russia presented far better odds, especially if Central Asian leaders did not wish to be dragged into Persian Gulf conflicts.

[699] Valerie Bunce, “Should Transitologists Be Grounded?” Slavic Review 54:1, spring 1995, pp. 125–126. See also Edward w. Said’s Orientalism. The book explores the problems of relying on European historical traditions (including the growth of a Western-based culture, religion, etc.) for understanding the Middle East. Said traced its origins from Hellenistic roots, including the perennial European fear of Islam by the seventh century, the emergence of the “us versus them” ideal through the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and the subsequent growth of a discourse in Europe and, later, the United States that placed “the Arab” or “the Muslim” in a second-rate position versus a “much-superior” Westerner. Simultaneously, Said argued that Middle Eastern intellectuals adopted Orientalism, which further solidified the notion of the “evil Arab.” Orientalism, published in 1978, perceived Middle Eastern studies in need of a fundamental overhaul. See Edward w. Said, Orientalism, New York, Random House, 1979.

[700] Richard B. Dobson, “Islam in Central Asia: Findings from National Surveys,” Central Asia Monitor, number 2, 1994, pp. 17–22. See also Mahrdad Haghayeghi, “Islamic Revival in the Central Asian Republics,” Central Asian Survey 13:2, 1994, pp. 249–266.

[701] Shirin Akiner, “On Its Own: Islam in Post-Soviet Central Asia,” Harvard International Review, spring 1993, p. 21.

[702] The Ferghana Valley has been in chaos since before the Soviet implosion. Gulf influence seems to be wholly lacking in addressing the decade-old disorder. The events in Ferghana today seem completely outside the Gulf s orbit of foreign relations. For the evolution of events since 1990, see Theodore Karasik, Azerbaijan, Central Asia and Future Persian Gulf Security, Santa Monica: RAND, 1993. Most of the disputes in the Ferghana Valley focus on land distribution for economic development. See “Unrest In Kyrgyzia,” Central Asia and Caucasus Chronicle 9:3, June 1990, p. 1.

[703] Igor Lipovsky, “The Central Asian Cotton Epic,” Central Asian Survey 14:4, 1995, pp. 529—542; s. Zhukov and o. Reznikova, “Tsentralnaia aziia V mirovoi politike i ekonomike,” Mirovaia ekonomika i mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia (MEMO), December 1994, pp. 26–39.

[704] Nazif Shahrani, “Central Asia and the Challenge of the Soviet Legacy,” CentralAsian Survey 12:2, 1993, pp. 123–135.

[705] Robin Wright, “Beliefs Take a Back Seat to Business as Iran Raises Its Regional Profile,” Los Angeles Times, 1 January 1995, p. 14.

[706] “Those Russians Are Everywhere,” Foreign Report, 1 June 1995, p. 7.

[707] Wright, op.cit.,p. 14.

[708] SPA, 13 October 1999, as cited in “Nazarbayev Receives Visiting Saudi Industry Minister,” FBIS-NES, FTS19991O13OO1965, 13 October 1999.

[709] IRNA, 29 July 1997, as cited in “Saudi, Iranian Officials Hold Cooperation Talks in Almaty, FBIS-NES, FTS1997O㇁29OO(1O, 29 ١٠ 399㇁.

[710] Interfax, 9 December 1998, as cited in “Saudi Arabia Ready to Finance Building of Kazakh Capital,” FBIS-NES, FTS1998121OOOO463,10 December 1998.

[711] For the optimistic view, see Judith Robinson, “Caspian Export Markets Grow,” Washington D.C.: U.S. Department of Commerce, BISNIS Bulletin, June 1998, p. 1. For the pessimistic perspective, see Martha Brill Olcott, “The Caspian’s False Promise,” Foreign Policy, summer I998,pp. 95—113; and Amy Myers Jaffe and Robert A. Manning, “The Myth of the Caspian Great Game: The Real Geopolitics of Energy,” Survival 40:4, winter 1998—1999, pp. 112–129.

[712] Suha Bolukbasi, “The Controversy over the Caspian Sea Mineral Resources: Conflicting Perception, Clashing Interests,” Europe-Asia Studies 50:3, 1998, pp. 397414.

[713] Elshan Alekberov, “Despite Political Obstacles, Energy Work Progresses around Caspian Sea,” Oil & Gas journal Special, 15 June 1998, pp. 47.

[714] James p. Dorian, Tojiev Utkur Abbasovich, Mikhail s. Tonkopy, Obozov Alaibek Jumabekovich, Qiu Daziong, “Energy Investment and Trade Opportunities Emerging in Central Asia, Northwest China,” Oil & Gas journal, 15 June 1998, pp. 48–60.

[715] Eqtesad-e Khorasan Economic Weekly, 15 June 1996, in “Pros, Cons of Central Asian Rail Noted,” FBIS-NES,FTS1996\5OOOOlO,35\t 3996.

[716] IRNA, 20 May 1998, in “Iran Offers Transport, Trade Link to Central Asian States,” FBIS-NES, FTSl9980521000275, 21 May 1998. India was one of the first to support such a route. See The Hindu, 21 May 1996, as cited in “Opening of Ancient Links With Central Asian States Viewed,” FBIS-NES, FTS1996O521OOO4O1, 21 May 1996.

[717] Aleksei Baliyev, “Volga Flows into Indian Ocean? Large-Scale Geopolitics—In Our Hands,” Rossiiskaya gazeta, 3 April 1998, p. 11; Aleksei Chichkin, Tatyana Smolyakov, and Aleksandr Shinkin, “Sensation! Sensation? Will the Volga Flow into the Persian Gulf?” 5 August 1996, as cited in “Officials Said Ignorant of Caspian-Gulf Canal Scheme,” FBIS-NES, FTS1996O8O5OOO535, 5 August 1996.

[718] John Anderson, “Authoritarian Political Development in Central Asia: The Case of Turkmenistan,” Central Asian Survey 14:4, 1995, pp. 509–527. See also Shahram Akbarzadeh, “National Identity and Political Legitimacy in Turkmenistan,” Nationalities Papers 27:2,1999, pp. 271–290. Tribalism was given serious consideration as a destabilizing factor in this case. See especially pp. 282–283.

[719] The political and economic impact of the Russian legacy on Turkmen water supplies and distribution illustrated the types of problems Central Asian countries suffered from. See Sarah L. O’Hara and Tim Hannan, “Irrigation and Water Management in Turkmenistan: Past Systems, Present Problems and Future Scenarios,” Europe-Asia Studies 51:1,1999, pp. 21—41.

[720] Shireen T. Hunter, “Central Asia and the Middle East: Patterns of Interaction and Influence,” Central Asia Monitor, number 6, 1992, p. 14.

[721] Nezavisimaya gazeta, 20 December 1997, p. 3, in “Closer Military Integration in c. Asia Eyed,” FBIS-NES, FTS19971224OOO2O3,24 December 1997.

[722] Theodore Karasik, “Rising Russian Security and Intelligence Objectives in Central Asia,” Central Asia-Caucasus Monitor, 15 April 2000 via wwwcacianalyst.org.

* Part III: Trends In Gulf Affairs

 Chapter 22: The IE Vision Jot Guif Security

Sultan bin Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan

Although the United Arab Emirates (UAE) is a medium-size power with several regional contentions, it has a keen sense of history and, more importantly, fully understands its anticipated role in the Gulf region. Much is expected from Abu Dhabi as a “State”—especially from Emiratis who look to their leaders to fulfill the legacy that Shaykh Zayed bin Sultan and his fellow rulers set some 30 years ago. Our responsibilities to our citizens are clear and must be satisfied in toto if we are to meet our regional role. That purpose, to foster positive ties with our neighbors and play a moderating leadership role in the international arena, is not easy to accomplish. But we do not choose to follow the easy path. On the contrary, we choose the difficult course because that gives US the motivation to excel. At times, our intentions and capabilities may seem disjointed, but our vision for Gulf security is certain. Because the Gulf is our home, and allies and neighbors surround US, our ultimate goal is to strengthen existing bonds, and establish closer associations in the few cases where past differences separated US from each other. Abu Dhabi looks at the region with hope, not fear. We intend to increase confidence-building measures to further narrow sociopolitical gaps, all to better serve Emiratis. We owe it to the next generation to set new markers of friendship and cooperation, not just in words but also in deeds.

What Abu Dhabi hopes in its relations with Iran, Iraq, and the other states on the Arabian Peninsula are measured and reciprocal ties, which support mutually beneficial policies. We do not crave territory nor seek to acquire material goods or resources. On the contrary, as Shaykh Zayed has amply demonstrated, we are prepared to share our wealth and resources to achieve regional stability. Still, we are also firmly determined to defend ourselves and our interests—which, hopefully, are identical to those of our allies and neighbors—at all costs, because it is through self-reliance and confidence that we can be good neighbors. Of course, we rely on our allies—both regional and international—to preserve our freedoms, but those associations are defensive in nature and spirit. There is no denying that our region has, unfortunately, experienced two recent bloody confrontations whose legacies will mark all of our societies for years to come.

The Iran-Iraq War and the War for Kuwait are stark reminders of how elusive the search for regional security might be. Nevertheless, we are determined to pursue our objectives no matter how difficult these challenges may be. We are equally determined to find positive language with both Iran and Iraq, the two northern Gulf powers with regional hegemonic aspirations. Our long-term success, or failure, will surely be determined by our abilities to persuade Iran and Iraq to abandon these elusive hegemonic ambitions and to join US in building for the future.

Still, we are under no illusions. Iran is reeling under the unfolding repercussions of the 1979 Islamic Revolution that changed the ideological nature of the area's most populous country. Although President Mohammed Khatami continues to espouse moderate policies that are encouraging and engaging, Teheran's rhetoric outpaces its actions. Naturally, we in the UAE are impressed by President Khatami's desire to extend bridges of cooperation and, toward that end, want to work closely with his administration to help resolve—once and for all— our territorial dispute. Similarly, we intend to establish bridges of friendship with Iraq, especially the beleaguered Iraqi people, who are victims of mistaken policies—both by Baghdad as well as major Western powers who seek to influence President Saddam Hussein by punishing a hapless population—because Iraq is our neighbor and because the Iraqi people are part and parcel of our societies. We must forgive past errors, open new pages, and eradicate the scourge of war from our area. To accomplish those objectives, it is essential that we look at Iraq with a human face rather than the cold and calculating real-politick perspectives that seek to reward the strong and punish the weak.

Finally, the UAE must also concentrate on the Arabian Peninsula by forging even ties with Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen. As the UAE considers the Arabian Peninsula its natural cocoon, our alliances with fellow Gulf Cooperation Council members are "partnerships-in-peace." Likewise, Abu Dhabi looks to Sanaa with a clear perspective, to include Yemen in the Peninsula's sociopolitical life, even as it has been in it all along.

The UAE can indeed achieve all of these objectives by remaining true to its character and by pursuing the wise policies established by Shaykh Zayed bin Sultan. Our vision is that of peacemakers who are committed to freedom, the pursuit of cooperative ventures, and the establishment of permanent foundations for the next generations ofEmiratis.

* Key Strategic Aims

The paramount strategic objective of the UAE in the Gulf region is to preserve and protect the country's independence and territorial integrity from regional foes. Toward that end, and while Abu Dhabi looks at its neighbors with respect, it has no illusions about intentions that run contrary to neighborly connections. In addition to Iran and Iraq, the UAE aims to improve ties with Yemen, and within the GCC. Our recognition that relations can and must be improved implies that they are not ideally suited. In fact, and despite gargantuan efforts made by Shaykh Zayed, problems linger. Some of these deserve careful assessments, and it is up to US to strengthen existing intra-GCC closeness, to better accomplish our objectives.

 UAE Intentions

Since its inception in 1971, the UAE has fostered two fundamental principles, namely the development of the country's human capital and the wise use of its limited natural resources. Our history defines us and we are aware of the tremendous opportunity that the discovery and exploitation of oil has given US. Yet, as Shaykh Zayed and his fellow rulers understood, without intrinsic human capital, all of that wealth might just as well be left underground. We are dutybound to equip our citizens with the best know-how that we can muster at all costs. Indeed, that is what we are doing, and are committed to for the foreseeable future.

Because the country lacked the human capital to best exploit its resources and build from the ground up, the ﷺ welcomed a huge number of hardworking expatriates from around the world. Their sacrifices and contributions are undeniable and Emiratis are grateful that so many did so much. While most were financially compensated, what is far more important and must be acknowledged, is that the vast majority were separated both from their families and from their countries. These tremendous sacrifices helped the UAE, and every expatriate resident of the ﷺ has his or her name etched in our honor rolls. Equally important, and because we welcomed individuals from so many countries, this international presence influenced our foreign and defense policies.

To be sure, the UAE has pursued an Arab foreign policy agenda because it is an Arab country with established social, cultural, and religious ties with the rest of the Arab world. We never doubted or questioned our intrinsic credentials. Even if we fell on the periphery of the Arab world, almost on the edge of the Arabian Peninsula, our Arab credentials were impeccable. Starting in 1971, we stood by our brethren in the Levant and, after the 1973 October War between Israel and several Arab states, Shaykh Zayed initiated the selected oil embargo against the United States and the Netherlands. At the time, our aim was to instill a sense of urgency and, in no uncertain terms, to help persuade major Western powers that Arab views deserved consideration. Even if our successes in this respect were limited, long-held attitudes—ranging from the Orientalist perspective to the “missionary” variety—began to change, and for the better. We played a modest role in shaping Arab policies that added value to the Emirates while it enhanced the overall Arab position. The hundreds of thousands ofArab expatriates, who resided in the UAE, certainly played significant roles in our direction, even if we were in total agreement with their perspectives.

Within the larger Gulf region as well, the UAE’s established linkages with Omanis, Pakistanis, Indians, Baluchis, Iranians, and many other nationalities before 1971 certainly guided Emirati leaders’ foreign policies after independence. Our tribal inclinations for tolerance and mutual respect were further enhanced by the many contacts that we have had with our neighbors. Long before the Arab Gulf countries joined into an alliance, Emiratis appreciated the tremendous sacrifices that so many of its residents made in fostering closer associations with their respective states.

 The GCCAlliance

Given this legacy, it was natural that the six Arab Gulf countries would join ranks in the Gulf Cooperation Council in 1981. Although the GCC was constituted to meet the challenges created by the 1979 Iranian revolution, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and the 1980 Iran-Iraq War, it was also a natural progression. Going back centuries, Gulf populations shared far more in common than generally assumed. Tribal ties and migrations did not recognize artificial boundaries. Contacts between various communities were ongoing irrespective of what tribal or colonial leaders wished. No matter how determined outsiders were to divide and rule, their reach did not go beyond the surface. Deep-seated bonds that united—and separated—the populations of the Lower Gulf could not be erased.

Still, political necessity brought the six Arab Gulf states together. Prodded by some, and encouraged by others, they embarked on a unique alliance in modern Arab affairs. The GCC states faced clear and specific threats and were determined to address them without hesitation. Much was expected from each member state and even more from GCC leaders. Against some odds, the GCC accomplished a great deal, even if the progress was not always properly measured. The type of political coordination that occurred for the better part of the last two decades was also unique in Arab annals. Because Arab leaders have not publicly revealed their approaches and strategies, the general assumption has been that the GCC was nothing more than a paper tiger, whereas, in reality, the GCC became a stream of political consciousness. Undeniably, the member states held on to their cherished policies and only supported the GCC when it suited them, but on major foreign policy questions, GCC states agreed to preserve the alliance at all costs. GCC leaders learned to trust and, over time, rely on expert opinion as they formulated foreign policy initiatives. In that sense alone, the GCC's accomplishments must rank very high indeed. As far as the UAE is concerned, the GCC proved to be a valuable forum for debate, and while major differences remained, Abu Dhabi perceived the organization as a useful alliance.

If in recent years the UAE failed to gain the GCC's undivided support—regarding its territorial dispute with Iran—Abu Dhabi ascertained that the primary reason for that deterioration was directly related to the Saudi-Iranian rapprochement. Although the UAE supported an overall harmonization with Iran, it preferred a more comprehensive approach, one that would focus on the territorial integrity of every member state. In the event, different interpretations emerged that contradicted previous GCC declarations. Still, the UAE relied on its internal strengths to help resolve its dispute with Iran, without abandoning the GCC mechanism.

 Iranian Cooperation

Short of the GCC mechanism, the UAE has three basic options to settle its dispute over the Iranian occupation of Abu Musa and the two—Greater and Lesser—Tunb islands, namely reliance on the International Court of Justice (ICJ), reliance on third party mediation, and direct negotiations. Because direct negotiations and third party mediation proved to be elusive, Shaykh Zayed has repeatedly called on Iranian leaders to seek the IÇJ's intervention, to permanently solve this festering problem. Naturally, the ideal would be for the UAE and Iran to negotiate in full, and reach a mutually satisfactory solution. The UAE is prepared to embark on such negotiations as well as eager to welcome genuine third party mediation efforts. Yet, because Teheran remains adamant and refuses to engage the UAE on an equal footing, it has become next to impossible to decipher a way out. Shaykh Zayed's consensus-driven policy, which is the unanimous policy of the UAE, has emphasized the need for a peaceful settlement and, short of a mutually agreed solution, to rely on the expertise and justice of the ICJ. The UAE will remain optimistic that such a conclusion may indeed be possible and will continuously urge Teheran to reciprocate.

Lest one conclude that the UAE-Iran islands dispute is the only concern between the GCC states and their northern neighbor, it is important to emphasize that the GCC was created, first and foremost, to meet the challenges posed by the 1979 Islamic Revolution and its potential spillover effects on the Arabian Peninsula. Over the years, the UAE, along with several other Gulf states, played a vital role in limiting the spillover effects of the revolution. At a time when Iran was isolated from the rest of the world, and under an economic and military embargo—at least for most of the 1980s and early 1990s—the UAE played the vital role of retaining certain channels open. We encouraged trade—limited as it was—because it was not in the interests of the Gulf states to strangulate Iran. To be sure, the UAE paid a heavy price for that policy, including assorted smuggling activities that drew the ire of the international community, but we did not punish the suffocating Iranian people. As neighbors and fellow Muslims, we simply could not turn a blind eye on their pain, and did whatever we could to help alleviate it. It is, therefore, doubly stressing to find ourselves at different ends of the spectrum.

Still, the UAE hopes that President Mohammed Khatami will welcome Shaykh Zayed's overtures for peace and the settlement of the islands dispute, either directly or through the ICJ. At the end of the day, what matters is to resolve this festering contest, and establish proper bonds with Iran. We genuinely care about the welfare of the Iranian population and wish to extend our hands in friendship even if we will not surrender one square inch of our national territory. Iran and the UAE have rich historical ties and we must start re-acculturating our respective societies to step away from the xenophobia that allows outsiders to exploit existing differences.

 Iraqi Cooperation

Just as we could not turn our backs on the distress of the Iranian populace, we adopted and followed a similar approach with respect to Iraq, even if the UAE stood with Kuwait and the rest of the GCC states against Saddam Hussein. Clearly, the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait altered the regional balance of power, which could not be tolerated. It was a foregone conclusion that the UAE would stand with its beleaguered GCC ally. In the event, Kuwait was liberated and Baghdad soundly defeated, even if few Arabs—including Gulf Arabs—rejoiced at the wholesale destruction of Iraqi society, which bore a heavy burden for its leaders' mistakes. After a decade, and at the dawn of the twenty-first century, it is vital that we re-evaluate the current United Nations—imposed policy that is literally choking Iraqis.

Naturally, GCC states' financial assistance to Iraq, which over the years amounted to substantial sums, did not moderate Baathi hegemonic aspirations. Nevertheless, Iraq was and remains of strategic value to the Arab world because it offers geographic depths, provides trained manpower, and controls substantial natural resources, including water and oil. We value Iraq as a determinant factor in Arab affairs. As stated above, the UAE has become a cradle of liberty in the Gulf region, because our varied inhabitants determine the course of its actions. What we clearly object to is stripping any Arabs, including Iraqis, of their religious and political freedoms.

UAE strategic interests require that Iraq be brought out of its current doldrums and be re-integrated in the family of nation-states. While recognizing that the tasks ahead are gargantuan, it is still essential to establish the basis for consultation and cooperation, whenever possible. Every day that Iraq is isolated is a day lost for Arab unity. Every day that Iraq is ostracized is a day that adds to the roster of future opposition forces.

Every day that Iraq is cornered is a day that increases the pain of its population. Our objective is to bring Arabs closer to each other. We value the Iraqi populace and wish to cooperate with it to foster mutually beneficial policies, enhance trade opportunities, and intensify our cultural, educational, and scientific links. In addition to these concerns, our openness to Iraq is also a matter of basic human rights, for it is unconscionable to allow Iraqi men, women, and children to wallow in misery, the way they are through no fault of their own. Future generations ofEmiratis and Arabs will not look kindly on leaders who turned their backs to the sufferings of the Iraqi population, and this too must change, if long-term Emirati interests are to be preserved.

 Relations with Major Western Powers

Because of well-known Iranian and Iraqi hegemonic aspirations in the Gulf region, eminently displayed by various invasions and occupations, the UAE and its GCC partners turned to key Western powers for security assistance. Over the years, that natural turn of events promoted close ties between Abu Dhabi and London, Washington, and Paris. Although the UAE was served well by such security assistance, it must be clearly acknowledged that Western powers did not miss opportunities to advance their own narrow interests either. For most, access to secure sources of petroleum was the paramount reason for whatever human and material sacrifices they made. There was little attention to local needs, especially before 1990, when the Gulf region fell within the Western orbit of the larger East-West divide. After 1990, Western powers could no longer ignore intrinsic Gulf interests, some of which stood out as peculiarly different. For example, the ٢JA٦ and its regional partners keenly supported the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples, and opposed Washington’s approach in helping settle the Arab-Israeli conflict. Whenever we expressed our views to our interlocutors, chances were excellent that we would be ignored, even if eloquent promises were made. Times have changed and, although our views are still not given the serious attention they deserve, at least they are no longer ignored. In recent years, we have been successful in creating linkages between our security needs and whatever may be on the agenda with major Western powers. Security interests were no longer the purview of an association with a single power, and following in the wise policies of Shaykh Zayed, we adopted a multi-pronged approach to balancing our commitments with the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

This is a fundamental principle of UAE foreign policy, that our strategic interests require cooperation with several allies, and that we are beholden to none. Toward that end, Abu Dhabi has established and supports the development of proper ties with Beijing, London, Moscow, Paris, and Washington. We seek enduring associations even if we realize that states have raw interests. We are beholden to our principles of fair play. And we are committed to basic Arab causes with all the baggage that such support carries. Not doing so would betray our commitments to ourselves and to the larger Arab and Muslim worlds of which we are an integral part.

* Vision for Gulf Security

To be sure, our cooperative strategic aims have not always been accomplished and, in the process, our vision for Gulf security has not always been applied. A number of extraneous forces pre-determined the extent to which these aims were implemented, including the presence of major powers in the area, and Gulf states' dependence on foreign forces for security. Nevertheless, and despite many shortcomings, the UAE and its GCC partners pursued independent foreign policies—especially after the establishment of the GCC in May 1981. For small and relatively weak states, these convergences proved far more difficult to implement than generally assumed, because conflicting views shaped emerging perceptions.

For centuries, extraneous forces controlled the destinies of the tribal entities that covered the Arabian Peninsula, because the latter were relatively weak. Long-term occupiers included the Ottomans, Portuguese, French, and the British. More recently, American forces established an over-the-horizon presence, and after the 1991 War for Kuwait, a more direct—though United Nations-sanctioned—presence. It is an undeniable fact that all littoral countries, including Iran and Iraq, share specific navigation and exploitation responsibilities within the Gulf. Simply stated, the waterway is our lifeline, and although the UAE and the Sultanate of Oman have alternative accesses to the Arabian Sea, part of the UAE strategic aim focuses on freedom of navigation through it. Abu Dhabi encourages all littoral states to settle their territorial disputes peacefully and to concentrate on improved trade ties between all concerned.

The UAE and its GCC allies opted to build intrinsic defensive capabilities and deter potential aggressors. Abu Dhabi has no territorial claims on any state and only intends to defend itself from regional hegemons or opportunistic aggressors. It should, therefore, come as no surprise that its first line of defense is the Gulf itself.

 Defense Policy

To deter regional hegemons and opportunistic aggressors, the UAE has devoted a substantial portion of its financial resources to acquire defense-related weapons systems. Moreover, and especially after the 1991 War for Kuwait, Abu Dhabi signed several agreements with key Western allies to help the country defend its territorial integrity. Even if some of these purchases or defense accords seemed exaggerated, the country's overall position required them. Against some odds, when so little existed on the ground at independence, the UAE managed to establish a basic defense infrastructure. Its citizens found merit in defending the Emirates because most concluded that the UAE was truly their nation even if the concept was recent and still "under construction." Without any illusions, Abu Dhabi realized that transforming seven uniquely defined Emirates into a federated state necessitated serious commitments, and it is to its founding leaders' credit that so much was accomplished over so little time.

It is important to emphasize, once again, that UAE defense policies were only unified in recent years, after the strains of early federation were overcome. Confidence-building measures within the federation finally matured to a level that allowed all of its member states to adopt identical policies. In fact, Dubai agreed to integrate its separate units within the UAE Armed Forces in 1998, further illustrating the major advances that were achieved on this front.

Given these policy formulations, the federal government assumed the full gamut of all its member states' many contentions with regional powers, including the Abu Musa and the two Tunb islands altercation with Iran, and the variOUS border variances with Oman, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia. In other words, and although the Abu Musa and the two Tunb islands were issues of concern to Ras al-Khaimah and Sharjah, Abu Dhabi did not forgo its federal responsibilities. Toward that end, it assumed the leadership mantle, as Shaykh Zayed championed various solutions to reach a peaceful settlement with Teheran. Finally, and after several years of constant negotiations, Abu Dhabi reached an understanding with Oman to negotiate on behalf of the six federation members whose territories touched the Omani border.

While these mutually beneficial steps enhanced our relationships with key neighbors, and while Shaykh Zayed has repeatedly called on Iran to settle the islands dispute peacefully, the UAE required defense alliances with major Western powers to deter any force from endangering our independence. Naturally, that pursuit meant that the UAE would depend on these extraneous forces, even if that dependence carried certain consequences on internal UAE affairs. Emiratis reject most Western powers' so-called Middle East policies and fail to understand how local leaders stand by such naive and shortsighted interpretations. In truth, UAE leaders navigate these waters with the utmost care, to protect their legitimacies while honoring various defense commitments.

 Foreign Policy

Although we rely on our friends and our allies to provide US with the support and wherewithal required to defend our country, we realize that we must, first and foremost, rely on ourselves. Toward that end, the UAE has forged an independent foreign policy, to better serve its citizens and promote its interests throughout the world. The major principles of that foreign policy are centered around our commitment to freedom, the pursuit of cooperative ventures, and the establishment of mutually beneficial ties, with all.

Naturally, as an Arab country, we strive to coordinate our foreign policy initiatives within a well-defined sphere. Arab concerns are dear to US and we seek to implement what we determine to be in the interests of our nation. Within the Gulf region, more specifically, we are committed to bridging all existing gaps with Iran and Iraq. We do not crave territory and genuinely seek cooperation with our northern neighbors. We adhere to the principles of mutual interest with all, but especially with our neighbors, because what may affect them could have serious repercussions on our society. Foreign policy coordination within the GCC alliance is even more important because we share so much with our friends on the Arabian Peninsula. It is worth repeating that while GCC states may interpret specific concerns from various angles, our views on fundamental issues are identical. We very much hope that joint foreign policy initiatives that serve all member states will be adopted even if narrower matters linger. Our intention is to strengthen the alliance, and even if periodic disagreements or contradictory interpretations arise, we do not let these deter us from the May 1981 march.

As stated above, we also rely on our Western allies and, toward that end, consider their interests carefully. Britain, France, and the United States, in particular, clearly share in the objective to maintain stability throughout the Gulf region. We are amply aware of how major powers, especially the United States, perceive us and devise foreign policy initiatives that serve specific interests. It is for this reason that we constantly sensitize Washington to the many vagaries of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Shaykh Zayed and his fellow rulers trust that the United States, as well as all of our Western allies, will consider these issues more carefully and reciprocate.

* Conclusion

UAE leaders are peacemakers and, as repeatedly demonstrated by Shaykh Zayed, our vision for Gulf security is to preserve every state’s interests. Our country harbors no ill will and has no territorial ambitions of any kind. We aim to foster close associations with our neighbors and seek to trade with the rest of the world in an atmosphere of peace and prosperity.

What we strive to accomplish is to provide for the welfare of our people, add value for future generations ofEmiratis, defuse regional tensions once and for all, encourage the creation of wealth both at home and throughout the area, and pursue noble objectives for abundant life, increased freedoms, and augmented happiness. These are not easy to attain and we are aware of the many dangers looming over the horizon. Yet, we chose to initiate such objectives because Emiratis deserve nothing less. Our history compels US to overcome hardships no matter how strenuous and, as UAE leaders have illustrated since 1971, assume enormous responsibilities. Relying on our people and ourselves, we hold our heads high, as we forge ahead.

 Chapter 23: The Gulf Cooperation Council: Future Trends

Saif bin Hashil Al-Maskery

The Gulf region has been important to world powers—economically, politically, and militarily—long before the discovery and exploration of oil. In fact, the region was a major transit point for trade from Europe to Asia and Africa that, over the centuries, developed into unique patterns. Portugal, Holland, France, and Britain competed for influence by dominating, at one point or another, the entire region. Still, with the discovery of oil, and starting in the 19605, the Gulfs economic importance increased dramatically. The region gained additional value for key industrial countries—in particular the United States—after 1973, when oil prices rose from $3 a barrel to almost $35. This concrete demonstration highlighted the level of dependence in the clearest terms yet. In turn, industrial countries perceived the region as a “national security” arena, warranting a series of doctrines and assorted policies. As former U.S. president Jimmy Carter declared in 1979, any outside power attempting to gain control of this region would be regarded as a threat to Washington’s vital interests, facing potential retaliation, with force if necessary.

To fulfill specific doctrines, successive American administrations aimed to partially accomplish their objectives—denying the area to outside forces and benefiting from its natural resources—by providing sophisticated arms to several Gulf states that, presumably, would ensure stability and guarantee the free flow of oil at reasonable prices. Yet, this approach backfired, when the Shah of Iran was overthrown in early 1979. Iran, which was regarded by the West as a major stabilizing force in the Gulf region, became a far greater threat than anyone in Washington or London ever anticipated. Even when the two major Gulf powers, Iran and Iraq, engaged in an eight-year war that stopped in August 1988, few anticipated the economic strangulation that resulted especially for Baghdad. Less than two years later, Iraq invaded Kuwait, which, ironically, ensured a permanent American regional presence. Consequently, Washington, London, and Paris became the arbiters of Gulf security and stability. Together, these two wars provided major powers the justification to adopt specific foreign policy initiatives that did not always coincide with, or best serve, the interests of the Gulf states.

Today, the Gulf states face new challenges to counter not only external threats but, more important, several internal challenges. To their credit, several Gulf leaders have indeed recognized a few notable challenges and have started acting on them, even if the initiatives are slow or sometimes adopted just for cosmetic purposes. How Gulf leaders understand the present situation, and prepare for future challenges, deserves attention if genuine stability is to be secured throughout the region.

* The Vacuous Pre-1971 Period

Given the legacy of British rule that lasted over a century and a half, it is critical to briefly discuss the consequences of this presence, and to highlight key developments before London withdrew its military forces from the area. Prior to 1971, the region was relatively stable, even though the states and shaykhdoms— as well as the sultanate—on the Arabian Peninsula lacked the amenities of modern countries. There were no schools. There were no hospitals. The economy was dependent on narrow trade activities, mostly pearl diving, and some fishing. At that time, the Gulf countries had no independent political activities worthy of any consideration because of various clauses in so-called treaties of amity signed with Britain. Shortly after the 1952 Egyptian revolution, and the rise of pan-Arabism, a few political movements started to flourish in Iraq, Bahrain, and Yemen.

Iraq, at that time, was not a stable country because of military coups and counter-coups. Bahrain faced various labor disturbances, and Yemen was very weak, with unending internal tribal wars. In Iran, Prime Minister Mossadeq organized a sustained shake-up, but was ousted in no time. By 1953, Shah Muhammad Reza, who was assisted by the West to become a watchdog in the Gulf, regained his throne. The other Gulf States had political movements in various stages of development, often trained and backed by East European countries in the name of world socialism.

When Britain declared its intention to withdraw from East of Suez in 1968, the region entered into a frenzied search for adequate security, ostensibly provided in toto by London. The 1968 declaration, made as the Labour government of Prime Minister Harold Wilson faced financial catastrophe, was implemented within three short years. Even if Gulf leaders intended to assume their fair share of responsibilities or enter into arrangements with other Western powers, the 1971 military withdrawal created a political vacuum. The region was literally left vulnerable to outside threats. In the event, Iran took the opportunity to control the Gulf, by occupying the UAE islands ofAbu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunbs. In fact, and partly as a result of earlier Iranian declarations, several Gulf rulers attempted to persuade Britain to delay its withdrawal, offering to financially compensate London. Although the request was couched in appropriate diplomatic language, the offer was genuine because Gulf rulers appreciated their limitations, and because of existing perceptions of the putative Soviet threat to the area. It may be worth recalling that Moscow’s presence in Iraq and South Yemen, themselves revolutionary regimes in their own rights, shaped Gulf rulers’ evolving security perceptions.

As these understandings evolved, Gulf rulers also reacted to the Western—especially American—view that considered the Shah of Iran as a “suitable” partner, to maintain regional stability and protect intrinsic Western interests. Inasmuch as the Cold War divided the world into a bipolar system, Gulf rulers reacted to the great divide emerging throughout the area. They knew that the Soviet Union perceived revolutionary Iraq as an ally—and armed that country with sophisticated weapons—even if the West paid lip service to their legitimate needs. Equally important, Gulf rulers were wary of Soviet support of domestic “political” movements that aimed to destabilize their regimes. Finally, Gulf rulers retained their skepticism of Iran—because of the Shah’s expansionist ambitions—even if they accepted the Shah as a fellow anti-communist monarch with whom they could do business.

The multiplicity of, at times contradictory, views that Gulf rulers held left most of them “unprotected.” What emerged, therefore, were fragile political entities, best exemplified by the 1971 Iranian invasion of the three UAE islands, against which little could be done.

* The Menacing 1971tö-1979 Period

If the pre-1971 period produced fragile political entities that faced the dual challenges of state and nation building, the next decade underscored the almost obsessive approach to Gulf security that Arab Gulf rulers embarked upon.

In 1968, Baghdad entered into its Ahmad Bakr/Saddam Hussein era, which provided stability in Iraq, albeit through brutal means. Supported by the Soviet Union and several Western powers—including the United States, Britain, and France—Iraq built its armed forces, as well its economy. Although key Western countries first opted to isolate Baghdad—thereby leaving the field wide open to the Soviets—most courted Iraq after the Shah’s throne started to vacillate. Moscow benefited from its prowess, however, by entering into a valuable strategic alliance with Iraq that certainly served its interests well. Simultaneously, this presence in a major Arab state provided the opportunities to pressure Gulf rulers by organizing, training, and financing so-called opposition political movements. Many flourished in various Gulf countries with support channeled via Baghdad and, in time, Aden in the People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen.

The decade’s other major development with a clear impact on the Gulf area was the October 1973 Arab-Israeli War. As a direct consequence of this epochmaking confrontation, leading oil producers initiated an embargo against the United States and the Netherlands, specifically to counter the accelerated military transfers approved by Washington to Israel. Within a very short period of time, the price of oil rose from $3 to $35 a barrel, with an immediate transfer of large financial resources to oil-producing countries. In turn, these transfers ereated a large surplus of funds, which helped Gulf states build modern institutions and sorely lacking infrastructures. In the event, significant expenditures quickly turned the Gulf states into Western “clients,” especially for sophisticated—and expensive—weapons systems.

Within less than a decade, the Gulf states’ large oil and financial reserves altered their positions in the world economy. Ironically the added notoriety, as well as enhanced capabilities—as limited as they were—did not dramatically improve regional stability. On the contrary because the whole international economy was disrupted, Gulf states were perceived as a burden. The entire region became “vital” to the rest of the world.

To ensure their intrinsic interest—a guaranteed free flow of oil at reasonable prices—key Western powers, led by the United States, increased their sales of sophisticated weapons systems: to Iran without much hesitation, and to the Gulf states with some restrictions. The American assistance to Saudi Arabia was a tricky proposition because Washington did not want to upset Israel. This was amply clear during the long and truncated congressional debate over the sale of F-15s and AWACS sentry aircraft, although Riyadh paid for the platforms and committed not to transfer the technologies to third parties. Far more important, Western sales to Iran and Saudi Arabia further isolated Iraq, and encouraged its gradual migration toward the Soviet camp. The 1970s ended with the Soviet invasion ofAfghanistan, placing Moscow less than 500 kilometers from the Gulf region. Simultaneously, the Soviet Union built a strong presence in South Yemen, posing a real threat to the Gulf states.

All of these factors ripened the Gulf states for potential conflicts, nestled between two international superpowers on the one hand, and two regional superpowers (Iraq and Iran) on the other.

* The Turbulent 1980-ε0-1988 Period

Just before the Shah of Iran was overthrown in 1979, his Western allies realized that they would eventually have to deal with a very independent Peacock Throne were he to remain in power. Simply stated, the Pahlavi dynasty’s hold on Iran and, indirectly on the Gulf region was powerful. Although the subject of heated debates, it now seems certain that Western elements, if not governments, encouraged opposition forces. By welcoming Ayatollah Khomeini into France, ostensibly on the grounds of human rights concerns, the West provided the austere cleric with a base of operations and quality media coverage of all of his activities. Even if Western governments believed that the Shah, with further assistance from Washington, would be able to contain the growing uprising, few were actually persuaded that returning him to Teheran—as in 1953-would save the Peacock Throne. In the event, Western hesitancy and miscalculations of the Khomeini fervor ensured the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

It is important to state without any ambiguity that the 1979 revolution distorted most Western calculations in the Gulf region. In fact, the revolution was perceived as the greatest threat to Western interests in the Gulf, even if later developments would alter this obtuse view. To be sure, the slogans of the new Islamic regime—to export the revolution to the Lower Gulf and, eventually, to the rest of the world—preoccupied many. In time, the revolution was accepted as a genuine domestic Iranian phenomenon, with legitimate aspects.

Still, to placate their miscalculation, Western powers, led by the United States, slowly developed a dual perception of threat by lumping Iran with Iraq in their regional formulations. Given that both countries expressed expansionist ambitions toward the Gulf, starting with the 1980 Iran-Iraq War, the dual approach seemed to function well. Moreover, with significant internal turmoil, it was reasoned that Iraq needed an external foe. As Baghdad did not detect any Western opposition to its choreographed intentions toward Iran—ostensibly to limit the spillover effects of the Islamic Revolution—Saddam Hussein’s regime committed one of several major blunders by invading its large and powerful neighbor.

The Iran-Iraq War lasted a full eight years before Teheran accepted a United Nations Security Council-brokered cease-fire resolution. Because so many events were directly tied to the war, a brief discussion of its three distinct phases is warranted.

1. In the first phase of the war, which lasted from 1980 to 1982, Iraq attacked Iran, voraciously destroying many Iranian border cities. Baghdad gained full control over the 30 kilometer Shatt al-Arab waterway, which it had agreed to share with Iran pursuant to the 1975 Algiers Accord, hastily arranged to end Iranian support to Kurdish separatist movements in the north. Between 1980 and 1982, various reports implied that Washington shared advanced satellite-gathered data with Iraq, ostensibly to “better defeat the Iranian foe.” In response, Iran threatened to close the strategic Straits of Hormuz, by sinking one or more ships that would have strangulated the oil lifeline.

The Gulf states, for their part, felt threatened by the war. Although they had no trust in the belligerents, they nevertheless were obligated to support Iraq financially—and in some instances, logistically—because Arab Iraq was engaged in a conflict with Persian Iran. If the 1979 Iranian revolution motivated Gulf rulers to act, the 1980 Iran-Iraq War provided them with the excuse to allay whatever mistrusts they may have had, to finally act collectively. Hence, in May 1981, Gulf rulers gathered in Abu Dhabi to formally announce the establishment of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC). Importantly, the first heads of state statement—as expressed in the founding charter of the institution—called on all six states to cooperate in all fields (eventually leading to a political unity). Not surprisingly, the language of the charter, and the resolutions and communiques that followed, were intentionally vague. Yet, security matters were the GCC’s primary concern, as the organization’s “efficacy” depended on fears of external threats. In times of peace, the mistrust and sensitivities among GCC states grew, but disappeared during periods of tension. Unfortunately, and because of evolving perceptions, there were no clear collective agendas, nor a shared vision for regional security among all member states. Each Gulf state looked at the GCC from a different angle. Several perceived the GCC as a tool to legalize their statehood. Others concluded that it was as good a platform as any to realize their political ambitions, while still others found it a useful vehicle for economic prosperity. Still, the Iran-Iraq War helped GCC states bring their concerns to the table, even if all of the many concerns that existed in 1981 were still present two decades later.

2. The next phase in the Iran-Iraq War, from 1983 to 1985, witnessed a relative lull in the fighting. Still, skirmishes continued, fueled by various efforts to avoid a settlement. Irrespective of motives, the war provided lucrative opportunities to sell arms and, as a strategic bonus, to weaken both antagonists. Under such circumstances, oil prices should have risen, but they tumbled instead. GCC countries, especially Saudi Arabia, increased their oil production to cover Iraqi and Iranian shortfalls. It was then argued that additional sales were required to meet financial obligations for massive weapons purchases, but in reality the increased production came to mollify American pressure. Washington persuaded GCC producers that lower prices would undermine the Iranian economy, further weakening the Iranian revolution and limiting the spillover effects on the Arabian Peninsula.

Throughout this period of time, and having realized its colossal error, Iraq desperately sought to end the war. As a tactical step, and in yet another mistake, Baghdad targeted Iranian oil installations. Teheran retaliated by launching attacks on Iraqi tankers in the north, thereby initiating the so-called tanker war, which in turn rekindled industrial countries' interest in the conflict.

3. Heavy fighting between the belligerents marked the last phase of the war, between 1986 and 1988. Various reports implied that the United States provided some sort of assistance to both countries—to Iraq because Washington still perceived the Islamic Revolution as a threat, and because of lucrative opportunities in a post-war environment; to Iran to wiggle through the murky Iran-Contra machinations, which promised to free Western hostages in Lebanon. In the event, in August 1988, Iran accepted Security Council Resolution 598 and agreed to a cease-fire.

Throughout this period, GCC states provided substantial financial, political, and logistical assistance to Iraq. In return, Iraq successfully portrayed itself as the defender of GCC states—from Iranian expansionist ambitions—even if Gulf rulers were always wary of President Saddam Hussein. Naturally, GCC financial and political support to Iraq antagonized Iran, whose regional ambitions remained intact.

* From One War to Another: The 1988-t·-1991 Period

Iraq portrayed itself as a winner in the long and protracted Iran-Iraq War. Millions of Arabs concurred. To be sure, the Iraqi army, straddled with an estimated million-strong population, emerged as a non-negligible force, with more experience than any of its neighbors. As a result of this “legacy,” President Saddam Hussein was expected to play a greater role in the region, even if the Iraqi economy was in ruins. Despite GCC states’ substantial financial support, Iraq demanded additional compensation for the alleged role played to defend them from Iran.

Simultaneously, Western countries, led by the United States, began to express their growing concerns about the world’s “fourth largest army.” This “anxiety” gained additional emphasis after Saddam Hussein’s April 1990 declaration when the Iraqi strongman threatened to destroy half of Israel by using his super-gun. Iraq further hinted that GCC countries, led by Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, were pumping additional oil to purposefully keep oil prices low— thereby undermining the already weak Iraqi economy. Baghdad demanded appropriate financial compensation.

Naturally, this situation was not acceptable to GCC states or leading Western countries, because any control over the lucrative oil reserves of Arabia would mean that almost 60 percent of the world’s oil reserves would be under Iraqi control. Hence, a new tactic was pursued by the West to frustrate Iraq and isolate it politically and economically from the Gulf states. Western powers accentuated the fear of a putative Iraqi takeover of the Gulf states. In turn, these steps enhanced existing tensions between Iraq and various GCC countries, as both sides fell into a trap. Accusations and counter-accusations among them ended in the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990, plunging the whole region into a much greater disaster than the Iran-Iraq War had produced. Once again Baghdad miscalculated, since Iraqi officials believed Western countries would turn a blind eye and allow the invasion to proceed unchecked.

Against this most ominous threat, GCC rulers placed aside differences and united to face the aggression. In the months preceding the 1991 War for Kuwait, Baghdad returned large portions of the Shatt al-Arab waterway to Iran— ostensibly to win Iranian support—but, at very high financial and political costs, Iraq was defeated and ejected from Kuwait in March 1991.

* The Post-1991 Period

The War for Kuwait established certain concrete truths in the Gulf region that must be acknowledged if future similar tragedies are to be avoided:

First, the dangers to regional states come from within the region. Although the Soviet Union and the United States attempted, at one point or another, to interject the Cold War into the area, the two contemporary and devastating wars were initiated by a Gulf state.

Second, GCC states remained vulnerable to outside threats, whether they originated from Iran or Iraq, as corollary, regional antagonisms accelerated foreign deployments on the Arabian Peninsula, further increasing tensions.

Third, GCC countries cannot protect themselves without substantial foreign assistance.

Fourth, all of the weapons systems that were procured by GCC governments —at substantial costs—did not prevent an actual invasion.

Fifth, GCC states were too politically weak to face the challenges posed by the two regional powers without foreign assistance.

Sixth, GCC countries lost confidence in each other, given fundamental differences on how best to tackle domestic and regional threats. In the event, GCC governments could not react positively to emerging situations, falling back on Western policies that were not always in their best interests. The fact that the United Nations sanctioned the War for Kuwait did not diminish the veracity of this variable, as subsequent entanglements between Iraq and United Nations inspectors amply demonstrated. While divisions and mistrust existed throughout the Arab world, what distinguished GCC states was precisely the promise that there was far more among them that existed in common than separated them. A full decade after the end of the War for Kuwait, both Iraq and the GCC countries are still paying a heavy price, given that both are relatively isolated from each other, Baghdad is under severe economic sanctions (with devastating consequences for its population), the adjusted real price of oil is at an aH-time low, and GCC states are straddled with considerable financial burdens. Without any regional stability.

* The Elusive Search for Stability

After the War for Kuwait, GCC states entered yet another stage in their elusive search for regional stability. Three specific outlooks may be identified to analyze this investigation.

The first outlook depends primarily on key Western powers to prevent any Iraqi and Iranian expansionist ambitions from materializing. This is the most realistic outlook because of the balance of international and regional powers in favor of the West. Given that the current international system hovers around a unipolar orbit, regional initiatives will not be encouraged or tolerated with ease. Washington’s so-called dual containment policies—toward Iran and Iraq—fall within this outlook. As clear evidence of the approach, both Iran and Iraq suffer under strict embargoes. For their part, Gulf states expressed a similar position, albeit in different ways, by accepting “security pacts” and “military exercises” with the United States and other Western powers. To be sure, these recent developments marked a sharp improvement in military equipment and training for GCC countries, but Western powers benefited as well because of rapid deployment opportunities for their air, land, and naval forces.

The second outlook is that the security of the Gulf is part of Arab national security. In the post-1991 period, this approach was articulated through a very limited Arab participation, namely by Syria and Egypt. The so-called GCC2 approach was to “reward” Damascus and Cairo for their participation in the liberation of Kuwait. Given fundamental differences between the Gulf and the Levant, the “Damascus Declaration” is now almost forgotten, except on rare occasions when a shadowy and inconsequential meeting occurs. The reason for this lapse is due to the fact that most signatories have lost the initiative to search for an Arab solution to what ails Arab states. Moreover, not only was the declaration’s timing ill-considered—made at the height of the crisis, when the region was in a state of doubt and insecurity—but it was also shepherded by Americans rather than Arabs. At the time, and since then, both Egypt and Syria pursued their own private agendas, which did not coincide with those of GCC states. Not surprisingly, the GCC+2 outlook caused uneasiness in Iran, which regarded this new Arab alliance as a danger to her putative role in the Gulf region.

The third outlook, though least accepted, is in fact the most realistic because of geographical and historical truths as well as the lessons learned from both wars. This outlook states that the threats come from within the region and that the security of the GCC is the responsibility of the six member states themselves. Oman championed this perspective during His Majesty Sultan Qaboos’ chairmanship of the GCC Security Committee (formed in 1990 after the Kuwaiti invasion). The proposal called for a global security concept that would be based on an independent deterrent capability—an army under a professional leadership. More importantly, the proposal called for the creation of a regional cooperation mechanism to include all Gulf countries. In the event, the proposal was not accepted because of past failures, especially under Saudi leadership, within the modest Dara al-Jazirah (Peninsula Shield) force that is based in Hafr al-Batin, Saudi Arabia. It must be clearly stated that one of the major reasons that the concept was not seriously considered, despite its merits, was due to Saudi Arabia’s keen desire to retain the leadership of the force. There was also the fear of additional financial responsibilities, to be borne mostly by Saudi Arabia, even though the proposal rested on a large Omani constituency.

The dangers of all the above three outlooks are clear. The first tolerates and encourages Western powers to secure their interests in the region without necessarily protecting or serving Gulf states. The danger of dependency on outside forces to provide security does not agree with the fact that the real threat to regional stability comes from within the region. Therefore, the continuous reliance on outside powers actually increases tensions, by jeopardizing the interests of local populations. Clearly, various social and financial implications exist that make such a continuous reliance extremely costly. One example of this phenomenon is the comparison of Gulf financial reserves before and after the 1991 war. Another is the addition of regular invoices submitted by Washington to GCC capitals for various American attacks on Iraq.

* Challenges and the Lack of Stability

Against this background, it is criticd to identify the challenges facing Gulf states—as seen by a GCC citizen—to decipher how best to address them and secure effective stability. Two specific types of challenges, internal and external, are identified to better ascertain what needs to هط done.

 Internal Challenges

Among the more important concerns that face GCC leaders and populations are:

1. Border disputes and differences that have led to mistrust between member states. Lingering disputes, which are periodically resurrected, tend to create a sense of instability that does not endear GCC citizens to each other.

2. Vacillating economic conditions that prevent the development of longterm policies. In the aftermath of the 1974 oil boom period, and the advent of genuine free trade, GCC citizens seek to increase their access to local, regional, and international markets. They aim to eliminate existing restrictions that prevent genuine expansion. The economic structure, which currently depends on only a single source of income—oil—cannot be in GCC citizens’ long-term interests.

3. Fast-rising demographic conditions. Increases in GCC populations, with a high percentage of teenagers with minimal job opportunities, will surely mean severe socioeconomic problems unless such needs are addressed in toto.

4. The quantitative and qualitative demographic differences that should be managed and, over time, addressed honestly. The makeup of populations throughout the region reveals that vast gaps exist between “neighbors.” Iran, Iraq, and Yemen enjoy large populations, compared with much smaller figures for GCC states. Equally important are the large percentages of expatriate workers, especially from Asia, who are a potential security risk because of cultural, political, and socid implications. Outside forces, ranging from international organizations to human rights movements, are pressuring GCC countries to provide their labor pools with political rights. Such developments may well leave serious political, as well as cultural, legacies that could ultimately change the Arab Islamic culture of the region.

5. Education throughout member states that should encourage modernization, substantial economic knowledge, and versatility to allow each citizen to reach his or her full potential.

6. The need for accelerated economic integration, as well as a collective strategy and vision among GCC states, to eliminate narrow and obtuse individual country initiatives.

 External Challenges

Equally important are the external challenges, which are complex in nature compared with internal ones:

1. The need to recognize that globalization, with its various and evolving conditions, will provide international enterprises far better opportunities than any single GCC entity might be capable of. Therefore, it is vital that GCC states enter the global environment united, to better serve their citizens.

2. Human rights concerns. As alluded to above, leading industrialized countries, especially in the West, are constantly coercing GCC governments to address these matters in haste. While human rights issues are critical, GCC governments and populations cannot be expected to shepherd any policies with the speed or emphasis not of their choosing. It is important to nurture—through education—a sustained effort to have real and effective human rights initiatives.

3. Middle East peace activities, and what they imply as a new map of the region emerges, giving Israel a major role to play in regional affairs. The Gulf states are part and parcel of the Arab world and have a real stake in a just and lasting peace settlement that will not infringe on Palestinian rights.

 A Future Stability Outlook

Undoubtedly, the lack of a clear collective vision is one of the main reasons why GCC efforts—to achieve regional stability—have not been successful, to date. A successful effort to achieve a fair regional security system necessitates a clear vision, to differentiate between static and dynamic factors and to balance regional and international responsibilities.

Clearly, the chief regional static factor is geography Despite changing political systems, economic conditions, and the formation of alliances, regional geographic units remain the same. For example, while the political system in Iran changed, the country remained intact. Even if its putative alliance with the West was dropped by the Islamic regime, Teheran sought to trade with its neighbors, and beyond. Thus, regional political units require that stability be made in relation to, and in cooperation with, all states. Short of that, any long-term regional stability system will be impossible to achieve.

Moreover, it is also necessary to recognize the ability of GCC countries to play a regional role to achieve such stability, which would not be possible without their full participation. In other words, and while GCC governments face various internal challenges, nothing prevents them from active participation in genuine and effective regional initiatives to include Iran, Iraq, and Yemen. Naturally, the more GCC countries have confidence in themselves, the more they can contribute to regional stability. Still, it is important to translate this confidence to a clear and collective vision on the basis that every party in the region, irrespective of its political system and the consequences of previous conflicts, carries its responsibility toward achieving peace and security.

The idea of direct and open discussions—with full transparency—between regional countries is of paramount importance in achieving region' harmony and stability. GCC states should not wait for outside powers to come and act as mediators for solving local issues, including critical border disputes, demographic challenges, and joint economic policies. Conflicts between regional countries, such as the islands dispute between the UAE and Iran, or the conflict between Iran and Iraq, can indeed be resolved with direct diplomatic discussions. What are simply required are firm commitments to rapidly translate agreements into tangible realities.

* Conclusion

Although what follows are not intended to be final positions, an effort is made to raise certain ideas for discussion, to further gel the stability and security concerns identified above. Without a doubt, effective and long-term solutions will necessitate the participation of all Gulf citizens in frank discussions. As discussed above, three specific areas require Gulf states' attention, to bring prosperity and peace in the region.

1. Internal actions within individual states. All Gulf countries are vulnerable to international pressure, as their economies depend on one source of income. Clearly, each GCC state should put far more effort into diversifying its economy. Toward that end, it has to be realized that the private sector has reached a certain stage of maturity, and its leaders recognize their responsibilities. To date, private sector leaders have not been involved in decision making, which affects their performances. In some cases, the public sector acts as a competitor to the private sector, a situation that is prevalent in several GCC countries. Such practices should stop, to let captains of industry assume their fair share of responsibility for their economies. In turn, private sector leaders should take an active role in whatever negotiation may be under way, including the various applications to the World Trade Organization. In short, the public sector should no longer be a sole player in shaping GCC states' economies, a role that may have been justified three decades ago but is no longer sustainable. By unleashing the private sector to perform at its optimum rate, GCC governments would greatly alleviate the existing burden of "guaranteeing" a job for every citizen. Rather, the onus should be on the individual to take part in the economy, add value, and preserve the state's resources.

Equally important in every GCC country are the critical demographic imbalances due to percentage of expatriate workers in the labor pool. It is a fundamental requirement that measures must be taken to encourage citizen participation in the labor pool, while every effort must also be made to guarantee the social rights of expatriate workers. Moreover, specific policies must be adopted to secure their safety while in the Gulf, and to further encourage spending a greater percentage of what they earn locally rather than transferring huge financial resources out of GCC economies. Parallel to these effects, GCC governments must encourage the flow of human resources among GCC states, and provide equal rights to all GCC citizens. This would encourage the movement of local manpower among GCC countries, thus reducing the reliance on expatriate workforces.

On the political side, a lot needs to be done as well, led by institution building. Parliaments must be elected to exercise a fair share of responsibilities. Existing Shura Councils must be strengthened and their jurisdictions expanded, to allow these nascent institutions a larger and more active role in governing the affairs of GCC states' citizens. Freedom of expression and a free press should not only be guaranteed but also encouraged. These tools in the hands of responsible citizens will ensure that decision makers are performing at their optimum, especially within the bureaucracy, where auditing initiatives must be introduced to eliminate corruption. As important, GCC officials and citizens must welcome the creation of research centers to harvest the intellectual capital to better serve their respective societies. GCC intellectuals should be encouraged to voice their opinion freely to better serve their societies and leaders.

All of these actions would help to build a strong state where every citizen would feel that he/she is part of the decision-making process.

2. Intra-GCC actions. Similarly, action would be required among GCC states to encourage collective initiatives, because the six member states share far more in common than almost any other regional grouping. Toward that end, there should be concerted efforts to diversify GCC sources of income, by encouraging private institutions to amalgamate. Competition between GCC industries should be lifted. Instead, GCC industries should complement each other, led by petrochemical conglomerates that would coordinate and cooperate to compete internationally. The transport service, including airlines, should also be coordinated and possibly amalgamated to form stronger competition on a worldwide scale. Telecommunication is yet another field in which cooperation and coordination would bring greater benefit to all GCC countries.

On the social side, the free flow of population among GCC countries should be allowed to flourish, with equal rights guaranteed to all GCC citizens. This would truly create equilibrium in the labor force.

As discussed earlier, and despite the wealth they derive from petroleum sales, GCC countries are weak and must cooperate to thrive. Measures need to be taken to bring about confidence and trust among states by eliminating “sensitivities.” These include solving border disputes irrespective of their historical legacies, given that lingering disputes prevent genuine cooperation in so many vital areas.

In short, there should be real transparency among GCC states in all sectors, including the military. It is necessary to have a real defense strategy to defend the region, based on genuine needs, not only on high spending programs. Coordination on such levels is indeed possible, as GCC military programs, though modest, have demonstrated.

3. Intra-regional. Finally, to ensure genuine regional stability, GCC leaders and populations must recognize both their specific strengths and weaknesses.

Three important neighbors with varying interests in the Arabian Peninsula must be recognized. Iran, the largest in terms of size and population, with its undeniable economic capabilities, has its own ambitions in the Gulf. Iraq, the second largest country, also with its economic strengths, may be currently strangulated but cannot be denied a long-term role—despite a very narrow access to the sea. It has been proven throughout history that every Iraqi government has treated this issue as a strategically vital one. Yemen, though economically weak, has the largest population of any Arabian Peninsula state; its instability would directly affect every Gulf state.

To attain any semblance of prosperity and peace, it is necessary for the GCC to have a common policy to deal with the many challenges it faces. This policy should originate from within the Gulf states themselves, without any third party involvement. All three neighbors—Iran, Iraq, and Yemen—should be greeted and entrusted with a role in regional affairs. Ideally, there should be transparency among the GCC states and the three neighbors, especially in the military sector. The purpose of such open dialogue would be to eliminate any apprehensions that one party might harbor against another. Such open dialogue would encourage the resolution of all border disputes among the eight countries.

To achieve harmony with and the confidence of their neighbors, GCC states must therefore create a new regional entity consisting of Iraq, Iran, Yemen, and the six Arab Gulf states. The emerging entity should first concentrate on economic activities, similar to ASEAN or even the Common Market in its earlier periods. The new regional bloc would dispose of significant financial resources, population, and economic potential and would represent a great market for industrialized economies. In turn, major industrialized powers will take local needs into special consideration, as they do with the Southeast Asian consortium.

In general, there should be concerted efforts in closing the gaps among the nine regional states, to establish prosperity and stability throughout the region. This task mainly lies in the hands of intellectuals, who will need to have frank and direct discussions to influence decision makers in their respective countries. Delays in starting such debates will further postpone the time when the interests of all nine countries—without the need for external mediators—may be best served. In the end, such an effort will prove to be far less expensive, not only in financial terms but also in terms of human lives.

 Chapter 24: The Arabian Gulf At The New Millennium: Security Challenges

Hassan Hamdan Al-Alkim

Gulf security has been a major concern for the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) states, Iran, Iraq, and the West, especially the United States. Perspectives on Gulf security, however, have always differed, and while analysts argue that there are three general categories of threat that could disrupt Arabian Gulf oil supplies, the dangers that loom over the horizon are far more serious than generally assumed. To be sure, “the overt use of force by regional hegemons armed with WMD [weapons of mass destruction]; domestic instability and terrorism within the Gulf states themselves; and conflict between regional and outside powers over control and access to the Caspian Basin” are all potential instigators of instability.[723] Yet, the GCC countries themselves, until the 1990–1991 Gulfcrisis, were never united in their perceptions of threats to regional security. Earlier, that is, prior to the 1979 Iranian revolution, they accepted the American perception, and relied on the U.S. security doctrine. Nevertheless, the collapse of the Shah’s regime and the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq War, as well as the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, brought the security dilemma to the surface.

* Regional Security

A specific apprehension of the Iranian revolution inspired greater cooperation between Iraq and the Arab Gulf states, compelling the latter to accept the Saudi perceptions of both external and internal threats. Indeed, the formation of the GCC, as an umbrella for cooperation and coordination of defense and security policies among member states, was seen as the ideal vehicle to fill the power vacuum and maintain the status quo. Yet, the Kuwaiti predicament has presented the GCC states with a new security conundrum. On the one hand, it exposed the unreliability of the Baathist government, while it offset the balance of power in the sub-region, presenting Iran as the most powerful country in the area.

On the sub-regional level, therefore, GCC states faced a triple security dilemma: Iran, Iraq, and Yemen. To be sure, maintaining warm bilateral relations with the three sub-regional states would be the appropriate option, but in fact, relations between the GCC states and both Iran and Iraq have never been stable. Iran's perception of Gulf security is based on the idea that it is the sole responsibility of littoral states. Iranian officials believe that there are three states of importance for any Gulf security arrangement, namely Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia. Thus, any arrangement that does not coincide with this perspective would not be acceptable to Teheran, and this, in turn, explains Iran's opposition to the Damascus Accord (or the GCC 2 scheme that purported to invite Egypt and Syria to help defend the conservative Arab Gulf monarchies), as well as all U.S. regional security doctrines.[724]

In the event, a basic element in a post-war security structure was likely to be an improved and expanded GCC force, probably incorporating contingents from Egypt and Syria, to serve as a partial deterrent or trip-wire against future aggression from Iraq or conceivably Iran. Simultaneously, and directly due to the 1991 war, U.S. foreign policy has shifted from paying lip service, to the notion of genuine collective security. As a result, "the Pentagon pays out between $30 billion and $60 billion a year to defend the Gulf, a formidable sum for protecting the import into the U.S. of some $30 billion worth of oil."[725] Importantly, North American and western Europe respectively import a mere 20 percent and 29 percent of their oil needs from the Gulf, whereas Asia imports a whopping 74 percent. World demand for oil is projected to increase from 71.6 million barrels per day (mbpd), in 1997, to over 115 mbpd by the year 2020. While the Gulf region can meet much of the industrial world's growing demand for energy, such unfettered access requires a modicum of regional stability.[726] Toward that end, Washington proposed several steps to promote stability in the Gulf, including

- improving GCC states' overall defensive capabilities and accelerating the integration of their plans and programs for territorial defense;

- strengthening U.S. military ties with the GCC states;

- maintaining a limited military presence on the Peninsula;

- working with the GCC states to develop a greater role for regional and extra-regional powers such as Egypt, Syria, Britain, and France.

For its part, the Clinton administration proposed a new regional security policy, dual containment, which could just as well be labeled the Clinton Doctrine. Dual containment, ostensibly of both Iran and Iraq, was followed by former New York senator Alphonse D'Amato's congressional resolution that further tightened the economic noose around Iran's neck. As a result of these policies, hardliners in Teheran shrugged off economic stagnation, blaming Washington for all their ills.[727] Ironically, dual containment focuses on both Iraq and Iran, as the main sources of the threat to Gulf security—while nothing is mentioned of Israel—even if the 1991 War for Kuwait militarily neutralized Iraq.[728] Strangely, during his visit to the UAE in October 1999, Secretary of Defense William Cohen stated that Israel posed no threat to the states of the region.[729] Yet several GCC states do not share this American perception.[730] The UAE deputy prime minister, for example, argues that both Iraq and Iran must be engaged. In Shaykh Sultan bin Zayed's own words, "At the end of the day, GCC states are faced with the simple fact that both Teheran and Baghdad are neighbors, even if several of their current policies pose serious challenges."[731]

Still, and despite these measured assessments, Iran continues to pursue a policy of military intimidation toward the GCC countries, all to achieve specific economic objectives. This argument is further substantiated by the fact that Iran's proven reserves amount to about 9 percent of world oil reserves, and 15 percent of world proven gas reserves."[732] By announcing a 12—mile nautical zone, Iran claimed sovereignty over the oil fields on and around various islands that pepper the territorial waters of several Arab Gulf states.[733] It also initiated a $1.7 billion development program on the Iranian side of an oil and gas field that is predominantly under Qatari territorial waters.

These developments notwithstanding, the end of the Iran-Iraq War and Iraq's encroachment on Kuwait provided specific incentives for Teheran to reassess its foreign policy initiatives. In fact, both conflicts played a significant role in Iran's rapprochement with the Arab Gulf states, further accelerated by the May 1997 election of Mohammed Khatami as president. Khatami succeeded in restoring Iran's ties with several Arab neighbors, especially Saudi Arabia, where he paid a state visit in 1999. The AE, though maintaining diplomatic ties with Iran at the ambassadorial level, is the only GCC member state to be left with political differences, due to the latter's 1971 occupation of three disputed islands, namely Abu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunbs.[734] Despite this new thinking, Khatami's initiatives did not clear existing ambiguities in Iran's foreign policy.[735] Abu Dhabi holds the view that "Iran poses a significant and growing military challenge to Gulf security. By holding regular military maneuvers in Gulf waters, most of which test Teheran's offensive capabilities, Iran sends the wrong message."[736]

Given these recent developments, and the existing gap between the parties, foreign powers, including the United States, found it easier to act as suppiementary forces to enhance GCC states' intrinsic capabilities. An "over-the-horizon" American presence, and access to local bases, has been agreed to on a bilateral basis between Washington and several GCC countries. In the aftermath of the 1991 War for Kuwait, leading commentators have argued that a more prominent role by Arab states such as Yemen, Jordan, Egypt, Syria, and a rehabilitated Iraq, would be an alternative to total dependence on the West. Moreover, the absence of a stable balance of power in the Arab Gulf region has also necessitated the integration of Yemen within the sub-regional system, to further enhance GCC states' ability to maneuver. Although Sanaa could not be seen as a supplementary power, it could be part of future arrangements for sub-regional security set-ups. Other alternatives may well include a fourfold security arrangement, to maintain the status quo. Rather than concentrate on a GCC+2 scheme, this arrangement may require a six plus three (6+3) equation that would include the GCC states as well as Iran, Iraq, and Yemen.[737] Under such an arrangement, a genuine equilibrium of power in sub-regional politics may well emerge in the Arab Gulf region. Such a scheme is certainly intended to offset Iran's numerical superiority over individual Arab Gulf states, by creating an Arab axis, but it would also deter Yemen from cooperating with Iraq, or vice versa, if either decided to advance its national interests at the expense of any GCC member state. The proposal here is not to minimize the Arab role in Gulf security arrangements, or to call for isolationism. Rather, because Gulf security and Arab unity are interdependent, a GCC+3 arrangement would meet the needs of all three concentric circles, namely the Gulf circle, the Arab circle, and the international circle.

* Harmony and Conflict

Gulf states' relations with each other have never been stable. In fact, political interactions have gone through different phases, as the rivalry for hegemony among sub-regional powers—Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia—proved to be a constant irritant to the smaller shaykhdomsd[738] For most, the absence of a regional balance of power inspired policies toward each other, and the outside world. Furthermore, Iran's relations with the Arab states of the Gulf demonstrate the complexity and multidimensional aspects of Arab-Persian interregional relationships. On the one hand, "the connection includes cultural and social ties as well as active and substantial trading links. On the other hand, the relationship faces mutual distrust and misperception."[739]

Among the major determinants that affected the area's harmony was the American "twin pillar" policy that purported to bring Saudi Arabia and Iran into an alliance that would secure the region from outside threats. Nevertheless, the 1979 revolution shifted this balance of power to a Saudi-

Iraqi association that was devised to frustrate the objectives of revolutionary Iran. Saudi Arabia and the states of the Lower Gulf, with the exception of Oman, took sides and supported the Iraqi war efforts against Iran. Most supported Iraq's war efforts both politically and financially. In fact, the GCC states contributed an estimated $200 billion to Iraq, with Saudi Arabia alone assuming the lion's share—a whopping $25 billion.[740] In addition, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia allocated 300,000 barrels of oil per day for Iraq, to compensate for the decline in the latter's exports. Riyadh even permitted the construction of an Iraqi pipeline across the Kingdom to carry 19.5 million barrels a day to the Red Sea to avoid the Iranian blockade.[741]

Although leading Gulf officials maintained that Iraq presented intrinsic value, the GCC-Iraq relationship was valuable but perplexing. As the UAE deputy prime minister, Shaykh Sultan bin Zayed, argued, "GCC states' objectives were clear: support Baghdad because of its intrinsic strategic value and foster ties between Arab Gulf societies and the Iraqi people."[742] In the event, the nascent GCC-Iraq alliance was short-lived, due to the latter's invasion of Kuwait.

Another key determinant was the Iran-Iraq War, which led Saudi Arabia and its neighboring Arab Gulf states to increase cooperation not only for mutual defense and security, but also on a broad spectrum of political and economic issues through the formative years of the GCC. The Iran-Iraq War provided the Arab Gulf states with an opportunity to check the new Iranian "threat" and, simultaneously, exclude Iraq on account of its confrontation. By agreeing to form the GCC at the time they did, member states removed the potential fear of domination that either Iran or Iraq could have exercised on the regional security body. Indeed, GCC states addressed on 21 May 1984 a collective letter to the president of the United Nations Security Council, calling on the latter to shoulder its responsibilities envisaged under the UN Charter, further illustrating the value of their arrangement without either Iran or Iraq.[743] They condemned Iran's provocative acts of aggression and warned against its recurrence. It is interesting to note, however, that the 1 June 1984 resolution condemned the attacks—and demanded that they should cease forthwith—without mentioning Iran by name.[744] On the other hand, the GCC states, out of their desire to keep open channels with Teheran, pursued a dual policy toward Iran. As one observer concluded, "GCC states did not want to abandon all means of contact with Iran, a long-term insurance policy with their larger neighbor."[745] In fact, the Saudi fear of potential Iranian retaliation against GCC states' oil installations may have even encouraged Riyadh to export refined products to Iran to make up for the shortage of petrochemicals.[746]

It must also be added that Baghdad's preoccupation with the war helped Riyadh nudge the Gulf security organization under its protective umbrella, even if Saudi Arabia had concluded an important "bilateral" agreement with the Iraqi government. In 1989, King Fahd and president Saddam Hussein agreed in Baghdad to delineate the territorial boundaries between the two countries and coordinate various security ties. At the time, this accord was heralded as an epoch-making event, given the paucity of such harmony between the two largest Arab Gulf states. Baghdad, however, unilaterally nullified the agreement after the eruption of the second Gulf Crisis.

Today, territorial problems present the most important contentious issues hindering the development of stronger relations among Gulf states. In part, the region witnessed two devastating wars in the last decade, as testified to by how short-lived the "coalition" between Iraq and the GCC countries was. Kuwait's production of $25.5 billion worth of oil from the disputed al-Rumailah oil field, for example, proved to be one of the major Iraqi grievances in the recent crisis. This concrete illustration further revealed the extent to which ostensibly minor disputes took on gigantic proportions, with devastating consequences. To be sure, the Iraqi-Kuwaiti territorial dispute is a long-standing one, and successive Iraqi governments—ever since the 1920s—have laid claim on the Shaykhdom. Though the Iraqis have consistently laid their claim on historical grounds, the geographical location of both countries played paramount roles in shaping both states' foreign policies toward each other. For all practical purposes, without Kuwaiti territorial concessions, Iraq is a landlocked country. Its outlet to the Gulf is a 26—mile narrow corridor, mostly made of shallow waters that are unsuited for port construction or navigation except for small vessels.[747]

This unsettled border dispute, coupled with the 1989–1990 increased oil production by several Arab Gulf oil-producing countries, prompted the Iraqi government to adopt a hostile posture toward the GCC states. In his 17 July 1990 Revolution Day speech, the Iraqi president blasted Kuwait and the UAE as American stooges, allegedly for pumping additional crude to keep prices low.[748] Even if this bombastic statement was rhetorical in nature, Iraq's invasion of Kuwait on 2 August 1990 forced GCC countries to shift their foreign policy orientations from an "alliance" with Iraq to an "alliance" against it. Saudi Arabia was determined not to let Saddam Hussein dictate war or peace in the future. King Fahd, for one, was adamant during the GCC 1990 Doha summit conference, stressing that there could be no "compromise" with Baghdad on the territorial integrity of Kuwait or on political concessions that could be seen as a reward for the aggressor."[749] It must be emphasized that the outcome of the 1991 Gulf War, as well as the UN-orchestrated territorial agreement delineating the Iraqi-Kuwaiti border, does not put an end to this festering territorial dispute. The fact that the agreement was imposed on Iraq carries within itself a proven recipe for failure.

It may also be useful to state that the Iraq-Iran, Iraq-Kuwait, and Iraq-Saudi Arabia border disputes are by no means the only territorial problems in the area. The UAE, for example, has territorial disputes with Saudi Arabia, Oman, and Iran, even if the latter's occupation of Abu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunb is the most serious. Ironically, and by failing to reach an arrangement with the UAE over the three disputed islands, Teheran delays the normalization of its relations with Abu Dhabi. Noticeably, Iranian intentions were clarified with the August 1992 Abu Musa encroachment, when Teheran took several unilateral actions. By engaging in such acts, the Islamic government showed continuity with its monarchical predecessor in its claim to be the region's paramount power.

Finally the Bahrain-Qatar territorial dispute was brought to an end. Fortunately, both countries accepted the International Court ofjustice (ICJ) ruling in April 2001. The penultimate chapter of this territorial dispute reflects the new spirit brought about by the new leaders in both Bahrain and Qatar and marks the beginning of a new era in the two countries' bilateral relations. The two Amirs expressed their desires for closer cooperation, exchanged state visits, and established a joint committee—under the leadership of the Heir Apparents—to delineate their borders accordingly. Other positive developments include the settlements of the Saudi-Qatari and Saudi-Yemeni territorial disputes through bilateral negotiations. Oman and the UAE, for their part, are in the process of finalizing pending territorial differences. Nevertheless, despite recent developments, territorial problems continue to be the major obstacle facing regional integration and security.

Perhaps the most striking illustration of how these unsettled border disputes create an environment of continued political tension is the ongoing regional arms race. Increased defense budgets in every Gulf state provide ample evidence for this trend. Throughout the 1990s, Gulf states imported advanced weaponry, at extremely high costs.[750] Importantly, the United States—despite earlier commitments to freeze military shipments to the Middle East as a whole—ranked ahead of France, Russia, and China in terms of its military contracts.[751] By encouraging these sales, Washington benefits far more than the Gulf states, given the myriad problems in absorbing such sophisticated systems. It is worth underscoring that the direct result of this approach contradicts solemn American commitments to de-militarize the region, and encourages the use of force in foreign policy, which, in turn prompts greater regional instability.

 The Iranian Challenge

As analyzed above, revolutionary Iran displayed continuity with its monarchical predecessor in its claim to be the region’s paramount power.[752] According to one observer, and despite the great shift from a monarchical to a revolutionary republican system, Iran’s goals in the region have neither shifted nor changed.[753] Moreover, the new Iranian government posed a threat of a different nature to the Arab Gulf states, as it emphasized its commitments to various Shia communities sprinkled throughout the region. It is alleged that several Shia “disturbances” may have been orchestrated from Teheran.[754]

To be sure, Iran’s foreign policies are not minimalist, and continue to be bellicose, “animated by general and diffuse ambition, and ... reactive and opportunistic.”[755] Undoubtedly, the advent of the revolution confronted the Arab Gulf states with new problems: It transformed Iran from a strategic shield to a potential threat and placed the smaller states between two mutually hostile regimes. Other equally distressing activities and policies included:[756]

- Iran’s continued occupation of the islands of Abu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunbs;

- Ongoing Iranian programs to develop a conventional military arsenal and to acquire weapons of mass destruction, including the ambition to acquire nuclear weapons;

- Iranian sponsorship of extremist groups and covert operations around the world;

- Iran’s active role in attempting to destabilize Arab Gulf governments;

- Iran’s attempt to dominate the Gulf region as the sole hegemonic power.

To be sure, “the very size and weight of Iran will keep alive fears of a constant ambition to exercise Iranian hegemony in the Gulf,”[757] and in light of Iraq’s uncertain future, Iran’s potential role in Gulf politics cannot be neglected.[758] In the aftermath of the Iraqi defeat, Gulf states in general and the UAE in particular concluded that Teheran was trying to see how far it could push its luck as the emerging dominant regional power. The fear is that Iran, in a bid to establish its dominance over the region, may install Silkworm missile batteries on Abu Musa with which it could control the entrance of the strategic Straits of Hormuz.[759] On 16 November 1996, the former Iranian navy commander Ali Shamkhani acknowledged that Iran had placed missile batteries on the disputed islands.[760] It was also alleged that Iran would use Abu Musa as a base for the three submarines obtained from Russia, to command the entrance of the Gulf. Satellite images of the three disputed islands, however, refuted U.S. allegations that they were militarily fortified.[761] Still, the Iranian military build-up enhances such apprehensions.

Despite GCC states’ accelerated military purchases of sophisticated weapons systems, the Iranian military build-up—and its oft-declared and discussed policy to acquire a nuclear capability—increases overall suspicion on the Arabian Peninsula. Iran's defense budget for 2000, for example, stood at $7.5 billion, up from $5.7 billion in 1999—a nominal increase of some 25 percent. Official figures indicate that Iran's defense spending has almost tripled since 1993.[762] Although Iran may well be engaged in a re-building policy in the aftermath of its losses during the Iran-Iraq War—when it allegedly lost an estimated 40–60 percent of its military arsenal—Teheran has opted to pursue a 15—year military build-up program with an emphasis on air defenses.[763] The Iranian armed forces personnel in 2000 was around 515,000. An additional 125,000 troops were available within Revolutionary Guards units, with reserves estimated at 550,000.[764] It may be useful to underscore in this respect that both Russia and China, in part responding to the 5.ў. so-called dual containment policy toward Iran, have made a strong bid to restore and expand their involvement in the Gulf sub-region by opening up to Iran.[765] In recent years, Iran thus became capable of producing Russian-designed T72 main battle tanks (MBTs) and BMP-derivative Boragh armored personnel carriers (APCs), under Russian license based on a 1988—89 agreement.[766] The arms-package deal with Russia, signed in 1989, included 200 aircraft, 500 tanks, 5 submarines—carrying sophisticated sonar systerns and specialized mine-laying equipment and up to 24 mines, each with 1,000 pounds of explosive—and patrol boats armed with torpedoes.[767] In a further step, Iran and China concluded, in September 1992, a nuclear energy cooperation agreement under which Beijing undertook to provide a Qinshan-l—type 500 megawatt pressurized water reactor.[768] Moreover, the Pentagon believes that Iran is receiving radar testing devices, navigation and avionics equipment, oscilloscopes, logic analyzers, fiber optic cables, digital switches, high-speed computers, remote sensors, and jet engines, all of which have dual military uses.[769] Some observers have further concluded that Iran obtained missiles of different types.[770] What is important in this respect is that the overall significance of the Iranian rearmament initiatives lies in the fact that Teheran ordered equipment designed to take control of the waterway. Clearly, such a projection of power could enable the Islamic Republic to secure its position as the sub-regional superpower of the Gulf.

The Iranian nuclear program constitutes another controversial issue between Iran and the GCC countries. While some analysts argue that Iran is not in a position to finance a large nuclear project,[771] because of the difficulty in acquiring the necessary technology—and because allegedly it does not have a sufficient number of scientists—Teheran surely reached the conclusion that it must acquire such weapons at all costs. This conclusion was made even more urgent after the Iraqi defeat at the hands of the UN-sanctioned U.S. led coalition.[772] One can argue that the American policy toward Iran is unworkable. A clear parallel may be drawn with the American containment policy applied over half a century against the former Soviet Union. In the event, the success of that containment policy was due to Soviet domestic factors rather than any other initiatives. While it could be argued that the Soviets were forced to reallocate their resources and heavily invest in the military establishment—at the expense of political, economic, and social development—many other forces were at play as well. Likewise, one could posit that a world economic recession, coupled with increasing demand for oil, the desire for hard currency by the newly independent former Soviet republics, the absence of an effective world government, and the post-war situation in both Iran and Iraq, will also ensure that dual containment will not be effective either.

The hesitation and the lack of leadership demonstrated by the Clinton administration enhance the argument that American policy toward Iran proved to be inappropriate. Leading American analysts have labeled dual containment more of a slogan than a strategy,[773] while others concluded that the policy was a geopolitical gimmick.[774] In fact, dual containment has had a minor effect on Iran’s foreign relations, because the American identification of Iran as one of the chief threats to global security has not prevented leading world powers from developing close ties with Teheran.[775] In 1999, Iran succeeded in nornulizing ties with several Arab Gulf states, European countries and Japan, most of which are U.S. allies that opted to pursue independent approaches. Another reason why U.S. foreign policy has not been successful in addressing its outstanding conflict with Iran —-let alone to make a breakthrough toward it—can be attributed to the duality in Washington’s perception of how to properly handle relations with Teheran. While the Clinton administration sent cooperative signals to the Iranian government, official American statements about Iran were, nonetheless, more frequently tainted with negative attitudinal connotations. While hawkish congressional stances compounded the difficulty with which Washington was contriving a coherent policy toward Teheran, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright seemed to be bridging the gap with Iran. To be sure, the State Department could not ignore the missive that 28 congressmen sent, when they emphasized that “American policy toward Iran should make significant steps in the direction of supporting democracy and human rights in Iran. In addition, increased potential for instability in Iran should lead US to encourage Iranian opposition forces that are conducive to consolidating stability in the long-run."[776] On the other hand, Madeleine Albright expressed her dovish attitude in a March 2000 address to the American-Iranian Council. She expressed the U.S. administration's intention to relax the unilateral American economic restrictions imposed against Iran on importing certain products, including Persian carpets, caviar, and cashew nuts. Albright further expressed regret that past U.S. policies had been designed to side with Iraq during the latter's war with Iran, and for the U.S.-engineered coup d'etat against Dr. Mohammed Mossadeq to reinstate the Shah in 1953.[777] These were significant admissions that revealed far more than was generally acknowledged.

 Winds of Change

Democratization and human rights issues acquired significant importance in the post-1990 "new world order." In fact, they came to be the main source of political legitimacy, at least as perceived by the United States. The Gulf states, as part of the global village, could not afford to remain indifferent to the political changes influencing world politics even if democratization presented a further challenge to the regime's security. With the exception of Iran, none of the other Gulf states could be viewed as being "democratic." Whereas Iraq is ruled by a totalitarian regime, Iran seems to be on the road to democracy. Though political parties continue to be controlled, and candidates for official posts are carefully scrutinized in the Islamic Republic, Iranians have the right to elect their representatives and president. The degree of freedom enjoyed in Iran was amply revealed in the aftermath of the 1997 presidential election that catapulted Mohammed Khatami to the highest non-religious post. The choice of Khatami, against the will of the Faqih and the religious establishment—who lent their support to Parliament speaker Ali Akhbar Nateq Nouri—enhanced the argument that Iran was on the road to democracy. In the words of one observer, "Iran's savvy population is taking stands, making demands, and even defying the ruling theocrats."[778] As if it were the icing on the democratization cake, the Iranian parliament approved, in August 1999, a bill limiting the power of the Council of Guardians to exclude candidates for future parliamentary elections.[779] The results of the February 2000 parliamentary elections, which ushered in a slew of reform-minded candidates, further strengthened this phenomenon.

In contrast, GCC political systems are closed and based on hereditary rule, and while the winds of change seem to have affected the people of the Gulf, they have yet to influence their governments. Since the second Gulf Crisis, Gulf citizens have started to question the “wisdom of their far-sighted leaders,”[780] raise the necessity of political reforms, and encourage more political liberalization. The governments’ responses to such public demands have differed from one country to the other, with some embarking on parliamentary experiences (Kuwait) and other adopting less radical initiatives by setting up consultative bodies (Oman, Saudi Arabia, and the UAE).[781]

Under the circumstances, the prospects for democracy in the GCC states, at least within the coming decade, are not promising. Measures adopted by some governments do not meet the aspirations of the masses. Gulf citizens are not optimistic about a gradual and peaceful transition to a power-sharing form of government because regimes “think only of how to maintain power.”[782] Yet, the decline in oil revenues, as a result of oil market instability and the fluctuation of the price, coupled with the financial and social costs of the second Gulf Crisis, convinced several GCC states to address serious budget deficits. Others assumed debts that, at least in recent memory, were not common. Only the UAE seems to have emerged unscathed by these economic pressures. In this case, the country’s position as the financial power center flows from massive holdings of liquid unofficial overseas assets, rather than from income exclusively generated from oil products. The precise size of these sources of income are not made public, but Western sources estimate that in 1999 the figure hovered around 350 billion, with a return income in the same year around $15 billion.[783] Except for the UAE, therefore, and to cope with mounting deficits, GCC states must either increase taxation, or look for the private sector to assume a greater burden. In both instances, governments would have to concede some of their prerogatives to the private sector, following the well-known adage that there can be “no taxation without representation.” Hence, the source of income that enabled ruling families to deny their subjects basic political rights is slowly “persuading” them to concede to future public demands for political participation. Consequently, it should come as no surprise when major political and social changes occur that, by definition, may be destabilizing. [784]

Examples of first changes are numerous. Qatar recently experienced an election at the local government level when, for the first time, Qataris were given the right to choose their representatives to the Municipality Council. As a follow-up, the Amir set up a committee to enact a constitution for the country, which would include a freely elected council with legislative powers. The Qatari ruler spoke privately of no other alternative but democratization as the only viable option for future security. Similarly, Bahrain is experiencing a period of transition toward democratization. Likewise, the new Emir of Bahrain, Shaykh Hamad bin Isa, promised to start a new mode of governance based on the principles of democratization and mutual respect for human rights. He pardoned most political dissidents, freed all political prisoners, and called for the creation of elected local councils. The composition of the Bahraini appointed National Council included for the first time a Christian, a Jew, an Indian dissident, and women. In April 2001, a national referendum on the proposed charter was held, marking the beginning of a new era in Bahraini political life. In the event, Bahrainis voted overwhelmingly—by a whopping 98 percent—in favor of these proposed reforms. Consequently, Heir Apparent Shaykh Salman bin Hamad, presided over a 12 member committee to finalize the application of the National Charter by 2003. These epoch-making developments notwithstanding, Bahrain is also experiencing genuine freedom of speech and associations, long denied for various reasons. In the spring of 2001, a human rights committee was also officially "licensed" to operate freely in the shaykhdom. Despite these positive steps on the road to democratization in both Bahrain and Qatar, much remains to be accomplished, with Saudi Arabia carefully assessing and—to date—tolerating the level of liberalization in the smaller Gulf states.

Ironically, and although the Kuwaiti parliament denied women the right to vote, Bahrain and Qatar decided to grant women equal political rights.[785] The UAE, though continuing with its appointed Federal National Council (FNC), recently tolerated for a while a certain degree of media freedom. The new trend rattled a few ministerial cages in the process by allowing the media to "criticize freely."[786] Still, the move was short lived as more than 18 members of the educated elite were denied access to contribute to local newspapers. Indeed, the democratization process in the UAE is slow, and the government—perhaps because of the country's demographic composition—is reluctant to follow the Bahraini and Qatari approaches. Nevertheless, discussions on the necessity to open up the political system are gaining momentum. Ras al-Khaimah Heir Apparent Shaykh Khaled bin Saqr Al Qasimi called in January 2000 for an elected FNC. It must be pointed out that women in the UAE enjoy almost equal rights and opportunities with men, although there is still room for progress. In the event, the U.S. annual congressional report on human rights praised the way women were treated in the UAE, certainly in comparison to neighboring countries.[787]

Although democracy must find its roots internally, the role played by the United States in the Gulf region easily lends itself to accusations of a double standard on the issue of democracy. Undeniably, the U.S. presence in the area is perceived as a protective shield for GCC political systems. In the past, Gulf regimes relied on the British to secure their survival, whereas today Washington is the guarantor of their destinies. Intentionally or not, the United States is providing these regimes with a security umbrella, rather than helping an evolutionary change toward democratization. Indeed, as several analysts have argued, Washington may well have an extremely limited ability to shape or respond to internal developments affecting Gulf regimes.[788] Yet, the hesitation to encourage democratization may well be designed to prevent Islamist forces from coming to power, on the assumption that they will be against U.S. vital interests in the region. Still, as the only U.S. vital interest in the area is oil, it may be worth repeating that any and all who rule will have little choice but to export the commodity if for no other reason than national survival. This truism notwithstanding, both Americans and Gulf Arabs are victims of false analogies made by the pro-Israel lobby in Washington. It would be unforgivable if America's commitment to democratic principles in the region were in vain. Although leading analysts posit that Washington should adhere to its democratic principles and encourage the development of democratic institutions and practices in the area, the American policy—defending regimes in the Arabian Gulf—is placing American prestige and credibility on the line.[789] Lest one overlook certain basic principles, the lack of accountability, checks and balances, the rule of law, political freedom, and respect for human rights would all inevitably cause domestic instability. One may accurately argue that many of the crises experienced in the region arose because authoritarian regimes did not encourage the steady development of political rights and privileges.[790]

In the end, “constitutional democracy” based on the principles of Shariah (Islamic law) could be seen as detrimental for security and stability for countries in the Gulf sub-region. A real and effective democracy in the GCC states requires the fulfillment of three concentric conditions:

- the redefinition of ties between rulers and the ruled;

- the separation of private and public wealth; and,

- the institutionalization of the democratic process.

The achievement of these goals is not feasible unless these countries undergo a social and political transformation of their governing values. Nevertheless, a reading of current political developments reveals that although democracy may not be realized within the coming decade, it is acquiring a significant importance in GCC states’ political lives, further adding challenges to each regime.

* U.S. GulfPolicy

The linkage between vital U.S. interests and Arabian Gulf security construed greater American involvement in the Gulf sub-region.[791] The American policy toward the Arabian Gulf is driven by two factors: securing the free flow of oil and ensuring Israeli security. Gulf countries have perceived the American presence in the area differently. While Iran and Iraq view the American presence in the Gulf as a destabilizing factor, GCC states perceived Iranian and Iraqi regional policies as the catalysts that brought American forces into the region to act as their security shield. Following the collapse of the Shah’s regime in 1979, Washington initiated and refined a set of new policies, to further secure its national interests in the Arab Gulf.

To be sure, the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait prompted greater U.S. involvement in the Gulf sub-region when, for the first time, American-GCC security linkages were publicly acknowledged. On 7 August 1990, President George Bush ordered the deployment of U.S. military aircraft and troops into Saudi Arabia, ostensibly to defend it against potential Iraqi incursions. On 19 August, Bahrain and the UAE permitted the deployment of Arab and "friendly" forces on their soil.[792] Within a few weeks, US. allies pledged $54 billion to offset deployment costs, led by Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the UAE, which, together contributed $56.9 biHion.[793] Undeniably, the crisis provided the U.S. president with the justification to send American troops to the Gulf and waive the congressionally imposed cap on deliveries ofF-15 aircraft to Saudi Arabia.

Since 1991, Washington has become the first arms supplier to GCC states, particularly Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. The U.S. adopted a comprehensive approach to strengthening their capabilities as the Bush administration argued that a comprehensive program of well-conceived arms sales would contribute to their stability. The emphasis was on collective action to promote standardization and inter-operability.[794] The US. commitment to enhance GCC states' defensive capabilities is a presumptive indication of the concern for GCC-US. political and military ties. In March 2000, Washington further agreed to the sale of 80 F-16 fighters to the UAE, worth an estimated $6.5 billion.[795] Continuing U.S. arms transfers to the GCC states, however, could well undermine Washington's credibility as it calls for restraint on the part of other arms suppliers to the Middle East.[796] Ironically, the infusion of arms deliveries to Iran, by a variety of exporters, will almost certainly ensure greater instability.

There is no doubt that successive American presidents have reiterated the U.S. commitment to defending Gulf allies. By January 1999, U.S. forces in the Gulf included the U.S. Fifth Fleet, various amphibious vessels with an estimated 27,000 American military personnel, and 126 combat aircraft. In addition, Washington was capable of calling on its naval assets deployed in the Mediterranean and at incirlik Air Base in Turkey.

This overt U.S. involvement in the Gulf presents another challenge for future regional security and stability. While the U.S. military presence invigorated tensions between the GCC states and their larger neighbors, Gulf analysts have warned that the military deployments could shift into a permanent residence.[797] The strong 5.لا. military presence and the subsidies incurred by local governments, coupled with unstable oil prices and the arms race, limit local resources, affect development, and threaten legitimacy. They also instigate power struggles within ruling families on the assumption that the U.S. will side with those who support U.S. Gulf policy. Following the second Gulf Crisis, Washington became more committed to maintaining the status quo than to promoting democracy in the area. In fact, the U.S. concluded bilateral security and defense agreements with individual GCC states, creating greater dependency on the US. for each regime's security. Consequently, GCC ruling families became more reluctant to accept concessions and introduce democratic measures.

On the global level, the American hegemony over the Gulf area produced wide-range international criticism. The European Union (EU) deplored U.S. Gulf policies and concluded that the "dual containment" policy was dangerous and self-defeating.[798] For their part, the Chinese regarded "dual containment" as a unilateral initiative, and they, jointly with Russia, disapproved of the American military presence in the Gulf.[799] Given the area's resources, and the increasing dependence of leading world economies on Gulf oil, this may well lead to a renewed competition among the main international actors, ensuring further instability.

* The Israeli Connection

As stated above, the pro-Israel lobby in Washington, aiming at securing greater U.S. commitments for Israeli security, is exaggerating the linkages between the latter's security and American vital interests in the Gulf. As a result, Washington is devoting more resources and time than is required. In fact, the U.S. is taking Israel's side in the Arab-Israeli conflict, and is accused of a double standard. Although the United States is free to pursue its desired policies, its commitments to the Middle East peace process are distorted, precisely because of the influence of a very strong pro-Israel lobby.[800] Notwithstanding this truism, leading analysts have cautioned that "Israeli security, however important, does not represent an extra dimension of U.S. Gulf policy."[801] According to another astute observer, "Europeans blame the U.S. for making Israel its primary interest in the Middle East, raising serious Arab concerns about U.S. even-handedness."[802]

Given these interpretations, and based on the overwhelming sentiments throughout the Arab and Muslim worlds, few should be surprised that the seenario anticipated in the case of failure (of the peace process) would be a radicalization of Arab politics. An Islamist tendency is currently sweeping the region and will surely gain in strength. Although it may be possible to contemplate a "geometric progression," through a unity scheme between the Islamists and residual pan-Arab nationalists against their political regimes, such a union is not required for serious if not cataclysmic changes. For millions of Arabs and Muslims, regional stability in the Gulf is tightly connected to the progress achieved in the Middle East peace process. The GCC states could not be immune from such political turmoil if such a scenario were to manifest inflicting serious instability throughout the area.

The 1990–91 Gulf crisis caused a change in GCC countries' attitudes toward the Arab-Israeli conflict. Both the stance of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) and the American role in restoring Kuwaiti sovereignty inspired permanent changes. These changes were best manifested in their acceptance of the American Middle East peace initiative. They attended the October 1991 Madrid Peace Conference and participated in the various multilateral peace talks. When relations with the PLO became strained, GCC states decided to freeze their annual financial assistance, following the American advice to enlist PLO support. In the event, the ninth round of bilateral peace talks, held in Washington in April 1993, promised to resume financial assistance to the PLO, further illustrating the close cooperation between GCC states and the United States. The Palestinians were wooed back to the peace table.[803] Shortly thereafter, GCC states—except for Saudi Arabia and the UAE—began to relax their boycott laws imposed against Israel. Oman was the first GCC country to start formal contacts with Israel dating back to 1985. Since 1991, relations between the two countries have been promoted to a commercial level. Likewise, Qatar decided to exchange formal commercial ties with Israel, and it was reported that Doha would sell natural gas to Tel Aviv. In fact, and despite regional pressure on Qatar, the latter kept its official contacts with Israel. The Qatari Foreign Minister Shaykh Hamad bin Jaber Al Thani met, in May 2001, with his Israeli counter part Shimon Peres in Washington, DC. and offered to host a meeting in Doha between Arafat and Peres to discuss the peace process. Kuwait, for its part, decided to lift the names ofAmerican companies from the boycott list. According to well-placed sources, most of the minesweepers operating after the Kuwait liberation were brought from Israel through Germany. In February 2000, Shaykh Salman bin Hamad Al Khalifah, the Bahrain Heir Apparent, spoke of a possible opening of ties with Israel.

Despite the peace agreements concluded between some Arab countries and Israel, and the ongoing negotiations between Syria and Israel, the Arab-Israeli conflict continues to be a further challenge to Gulf security. The linkage between Gulf security and the Palestinian question has multiple dimensions. On the one hand, there is the Israeli threat to the vital installations of the Gulf states. On the other hand, there is the fear that a deadlock on the Palestinian issue could cause Palestinian movements to take subversive action against the Gulf countries.[804] To be sure, Israel includes Saudi Arabia in its strategic attention, as it fears that the Saudi arms build-up could end in unfriendly hands.[805] A well-argued study has concluded that such military wherewithal may well have encouraged Israeli forces “to frequently over-fly the area, occasionally going to such lengths as dropping empty fuel tanks on [Saudi military air fields to demonstrate their capabilities.”[806] In fact, Israel threatened on 26 March 1988 to launch a pre-emptive air strike against the Saudi Silkworm missiles.[807] In turn, the Saudi monarch declared on 8 April that “the missiles do not carry nuclear warheads and they will not be used against Israel.”[808] Riyadh, upon American advice, decided on 26 April 1988 to join the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, largely to ease Israeli anger.[809]

As these brief illustrations indicate, the outcome of the Middle East peace process would inevitably affect GCC states’ foreign policy orientations. The success of the peace talks would mean that, at least for GCC governments, the conflict is essentially over.[810] On the other hand, the success of the peace talks does not mean simply reaching a peace accord. Rather, it requires normalization of relations in all fields, including the political, economic, and cultural spectrums. In other words, accepting Israel as part of the Middle East region will not be an easy task. This would require changes in both the Arab and Jewish perceptions of each other. Such changes would further require a review of “information” about each other as well as dramatic alterations in textbooks that are replete with erroneous data and analysis. In short, the requirements are a “peace of cultures” as well as the settlement of festering but manageable disputes.

Simultaneously, normalization might stipulate political discontent among social forces, especially among Islamists and residual pan-Arab nationalists. It would ultimately lead to a radicalization of Arab politics and probably the demise of existing political regimes. In turn, such dramatic developments could bring the peace agreement to a standstill and possibly revoke it. Clearly, the Israeli refusal to concede to Palestinian calls for self-determination ignited the intifada twice, in 1987–1994 and again starting in September 2000. Under the circumstances, Gulf states had few options and, to buttress the Arab position, supported the Palestinian resistance. Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the UAE transferred more than 200 billion dollars to the Al-Aqsa Fund. It is now amply clear that Prime minister Ariel Sharon’ s policy of escalation—and Washington’s unequivocal support to Israel—will ultimately affect GCC-US. relations. On May 18, 2001, Heir Apparent Prince Abdallah bin Abdulaziz Al Saud turned down an invitation from President George w. Bush to visit Washington. Likewise, GCC governments are increasingly under pressure to adopt specific measures against the US., for siding with Israel. Arab media sources are, once again, discussing how oil may be used as a strategic weapon.

These developments notwithstanding, and despite the possibility of an eventual peaceful settlement, a taboo would continue to exist, namely the Israeli nuclear capability. It could be argued, however, that, the Israeli nuclear capability would act as a deterrent force to preserve Israeli security and territorial integrity. On the other hand, maintaining an Israeli military superiority would fuel further arms races in the region, justifying radical forces to oppose the putative peace accord.

* Conclusion

The different challenges facing Gulf security reveal that democratization presents the most important challenge facing Gulf states at the turn of the millennium. Changes in Gulf states’ political systems seem to be inevitable. In fact, it is amply clear that long-term regional security and stability cannot be fostered through a dependence on foreign powers. Stability is invariably connected to democratization and political legitimacy. Ideas of political participation, democratization, the necessity to reform, and social justice are spreading among Arab Gulf elites. At present, citizen demands for the reduction of ruling-family privileges meet deep resistance, but it is in the interests of the US. to encourage an evolutionary political development throughout the Gulf region. While the Islamist threat to the free flow of oil is a myth—it is an Israeli invention supported by the pro-Israel lobby in Washington—the fact remains that popular demands are based on genuine needs. Future leaders—who come to power as a result of democratization or who evolve and introduce genuine reforms—would still have to sell their oil since there are no alternatives. Thus, a constructive engagement of moderate Islamist forces may well be an alternative option to prevent extremism. At the same time, the U.S. is required to review its Middle East policy and pressure Israel to fulfill its obligations, as well as accept the right of the Palestinians for self-determination to limit growing tensions within allied Gulf societies. By pursuing such policies, Washington will ensure its access to the Gulfs petroleum resources while remaining true to its cherished principles, and at a smaller financial burden.

[723] Geoffrey Kemp, “The Persian Gulf Remains the Strategic Prize,” Survival 40:4, winter 1998/99, p. 137.

[724] Al-Arab, 10 December 1992.

[725] Graham E. Fuller and Ian D. Lesser, “Persian Gulf Myths,” Foreign Affairs 76:3, May/June 1997, pp. 42–52.

[726] Kemp, op. dr.و pp. 136–38.

[727] Shahram Chubin and Jerold D. Green, “Engaging Iran: US Strategy,” Survival 40:3, autumn 1998,10. 153.

[728] Ali Ahmed Al-Ghafli, “Al-Illaqat Al-Khalijiyyah Al-Amirikiyyah” [Gulf-U.s. Relations], in Al-TaqrirAl-IstratijiAl-Khaliji, Sharjah, UAE:Al-Khalij, 2000, p. 213.

[729] Al-Ittihad, 16 October 1999.

[730] Zbigniew Brzezinski, Brent Scowcroft, and Richard Murphy, “Differentiated Containment,” Foreign Affairs 76:3, May/June 1997, p. 21.

[731] Sultan bin Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, “Gulf Security: The View from Abu Dhabi,” in Joseph A. Kechichian (ed.),H Century in Thirty Years: Shaykh Zayed and the United Arab Emirates, Washington, DC.: Middle East Policy Council, 2000, p. 275.

[732] Simon Serfaty, “Bridging the Gulf across the Atlantic: Europe and the United States in the Persian Gulf,” The Middle Eastfournal 52:3, summer 1998, p. 341.

[733] Shamlan al Essa, “Al Khilafat al Hududiyyah wal-Iqlimiyyah bayna al-‘Arab wal-Iraniyyn,” Al Illaqat al Arabiyyah al Iraniyyah (Arab Iranian Relations], Beirut: Center for Arab Unity Studies, 1996, p. 444.

[734] Hassan H. al-Alkim, “The Islands Question: An Arabian Perspective,” in Gary Sick and اة\\’آلحا١ عاً ٢ل. Potter (eAs.١, Sec 1الا inThe Persian Gulf: Origins, Obstacles and the Search for ConsenSUS, New York: Palgrave, (forthcoming).

[735] Shamlan al-Essa, op. (it., p. 69.

[736] Sultan bin Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, op. cit., p. 275.

[737] For more details, see Hassan H. al-Alkim, The GCC States in an Unstable World, London: Al-Saqi Books, 1994,pp. 145–148.

[738] David Long, “Saudi Arabia and its Neighbors: Preoccupied Paternalism,” in Richard Sindelar andj. E. Peterson (eds.). Crosscurrents in the Gulf New York: Routledge, 1988, p. 190.

[739] Anwar Gargash, “Iran, the GCC States, and the UAE: Prospects and Challenges in the Coming Decade,” in Jamal s. al-Suwaidi (ed.), Iran and the Gulf: A Search for Stability, Abu Dhabi: The Emirates Center For Strategic Studies and Research, 1996, p. 136.

[740] Al-Ittihad, 17 January 1991.

[741] Hassan H. al-Alkim, “al-Tllaqat al-Arabiyyah al-Khalijiyyah ma’ Iran: Ru’yiah Mustaqbaliyyah” [Arabian Gulf Relations with Iran: A Future Perspectivel, Arab Journal for International Studies 3:1, winter 1990, p. 24.

[742] Sultan bin Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, op. cit., p. 276.

[743] United Nations, Document 5/16574, New York, UN, 21 May 1984.

[744] United Nations, Document S/RES/552 (1984), New York, UN, 21 May 1984.

[745] Abdul Ridha Assiri, Kuwait’s Foreign Policy: City-State in World Politics, Boulder: Westview Press, 1990,1. 102.

[746] Middle East Economic Digest (MEED), 29 November 1986, pp. 4–5.

[747] Hassan H. al-Alkim, “al-Illaqat al-Arabiyyah al-Khalijiyyah ma’ Iran: Ru’yiah Mustaqbaliyyah”, op. cit.\p. 6.

[748] The Washington Post, 15 January 1991.

[749] The Soviet Union and the Middle East 6:12, 1990, p. 25.

[750] The Military Balance 1998/99, London: IISS, 1998, p. 118.

[751] Simon Serfaty, op. cit., p. 347.

[752] Shahram Chubin, op. cit., p. 65.

[753] Anwar Gargash, op. cit., p. 138.

[754] Shahram Chubin, “Iran and Regional Security,” Survival 34:3, autumn 1992, pp. 6466

[755] Ibid, p. 68.

[756] Jamal s. al-Suwaidi, “Gulf Security and the Iranian Challenge,” Security Dialogue 27:3, 1996, p. 211.

[757] Charles Tripp, “The Gulf States and Iraq,” Survival 34:3, autumn 1992, pp. 52’53.

[758] Shahram Chubin, “Iran and Regional Security,” p.62.

[759] The Sunday Telegraph, 27 September 1992.

[760] Al-Ittihad, 17 November 1996.

[761] Al-Khalij, 11 March 2000.

[762] The Military Balance 1998/99, p. 117.

[763] Anthony Cordesman, Dirasat ‘Alamiah: al-Qudrat al-Askariyyah al-Iraniyyah [Iran’s Military Capabilities], Abu Dhabi: The Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research, 1996, p. 18.

[764] The Military Balance 1999–2000, p. 131.

[765] John Calabrese, “China and the Persian Gulf,” The Middle East Journal 52:3, summer 1998, p. 354.

[766] The Military Balance 1998/99 p. 117.

[767] The Sunday Telegraph, 27 September 1992.

[768] The Military Balance 1999/2000, p. 131.

[769] Ibid.

[770] Anthony Cordesman, op. cit., pp. 70, 88, and 104.

[771] Ibid, pp. 122–124.

[772] Hassan H. al-Alkim, “The United Arab Emirates and Subregional Powers,” in Joseph A. Kechichian (ed.), يحد Century in ThirtyYears: shaykh Zayed and the UnitedArab Emirates, Washington, D.C.: Middle East Policy Council, 2000, pp. 185–186.

[773] Zbigniew Brzezinski, Brent Scowcroft, and Richard Murphy, op. cit., p. 20.

[774] Fuller and Lesser, op. cit., p. 47.

[775] Ali Ahmed Al-Ghafli, op. cit., p. 210.

[776] New York Times, 18 March 2000.

[777] Al-Ittihad, 16 October 1999.

[778] Robin Wright, “Iran’s New Revolution,” Foreign Affairs 79:1 ,January-February 2000, p. 136.

[779] Medhat Ahmed Hamad, “Iran 1999–2000,”) in Al-TaqrirAl-Istratiji Al-Khaliji, op. cit., p. 177.

[780] The Financial Times, 21 December 1999.

[781] For more details on the Omani experiences, see Abdullah Juma Al-Haj, “The Politics of Participation in the Gulf Cooperation Council States: The Omani Consultative Council,” The Middle East journal 53:4, autumn 1996, pp. 560–571.

[782] Los Angeles Times, 14 April 1991.

[783] The Financial Times, 21 December 1999.

[784] Fuller and Lesser, op. cit., p. 44.

[785] Mohamed Al-Said Idris, “Majlis alTa’awun Al-Khaliji 1999–2000,“1 in Al-Taqrir Al-Istratiji Al-Khaliji, Sharjah, UAE, 2000, p. 131.

[786] The Financial Times, 21 December 1999.

[787] Al-Ittihad, 20 February 2000.

[788] Fuller and Lesser, op. cit., p. 44.

[789] Madeleine Albright, “The Testing of American Foreign Policy,” Foreign Affairs 77:6, November-December 1998, pp. 63–64.

[790] Abdul Khaliq Abdallah, al-Nizam al-Iqlimi al-Khaliji [The Gulf Regional System], Beirut: Al-Mu’asasah al-Jama’iyyah Li-dirasat wal-Nashr, 1998, p. 29.

[791] Hassan H. al-Alkim, “The Gulf Subregion in the Twenty-First Century: 5ل ٢ Involvement and Sources of Instability,” American Studies

International Journal, vol. 38:1, February 2000. George Washington University.

[792] The Washington Post, 15 January 1991.

[793] Congressional Research Service, Document on Persian GulfWar: US Costs andAllied Financial Contributions, Washington D.C.: CRS, IB 91019,21 September 1992.

[794] Congressional Research Service, Document onArms Sales to SaudiArabia: Current Status, Washington, D.c·: CR5, IB 91007, 25 February 1993.

[795] Al-Ittihad, 5 March 2000.

[796] Congressional Research Service, Document on Middle East Arms Supply: Recent Control Initiatives, Washington, D.C.: CRS, 113 91113, 22 March 1993.

[797] Ali Ahmed Al-Ghafli, op. cit., pp. 216—17.

[798] Simon Serfaty, op. cit., pp. 344–45.

[799] John Calabrese, op. cit., pp. 354–61.

[800] William Wallace and Jan Zielonka, “Misunderstanding Europe,” Foreign Affairs 77:6, November-December 1998, p. 74.

[801] Fuller and Lesser, op. cit., p. 45.

[802] Simon Serfaty, op. cit., p. 339.

[803] Washington Post, 20 April 1993.

[804] Hassan al-Alkim, The Foreign Policy of the United Arab Emirates, London: Al-Saqi Books, 1989, p. 175.

[805] William Quandt, SaudiArabia in the 1980s: Foreign Policy, Security and Oil, Washington D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1981, p. 61.

[806] Al-Khalij, 27 March 1988.

[807] 9 April 1988.

[808] Hassan H. al-Alkim, “Bi’at Sun’a al-Qarar al-Khaliji al-Saudi” [The Environment of Saudi Foreign Policy], Arabjournal of Political Science, number 7, November 1992, p. 66.

[809] For more details, see al-Alkim, The GCC States in an Unstable World, p. 120.

[810] Interview with Dr. Adnan Abu ‘Udah, the Jordanian permanent representative to the UN, New York, 29 April 1993, as cited in ibid.

 Chapter 25: Outlook for Iranian-Gulf Relations: Greater Cooperation or Renewed Risk of Conflict?

Shireen T. Hunter

Since President Muhammad Khatami came to power in Iran in August 997:, there has been a noticeable improvement in the character of Iran's relations with the Gulf Arab states, after nearly two decades of intense mutual animosity and acrimony caused by the 1979 Islamic Revolution and its fall-out. The only exception to this general trend has been the United Arab Emirates (UAE), which, because of sharp disagreements over the disputed islands of Abu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunbs, still has tense relations with Iran. However, this is not an unusual circumstance. Historically, while certain common factors have affected Iranian-Gulf relations, the character of Iran's ties with individual Gulf states has had its own special characteristics. Iran's ties with Iraq are also very tense. Iranian-Iraqi relations have their special dynamics, whose discussion is beyond the scope of this chapter. Nevertheless, it is impossible to analyze the future of Arab-Iranian relations in the Persian Gulf without accounting for the Iraqi factor.

Notwithstanding tensions with Iraq and the UAE, amelioration in Iran-Gulf relations, and especially Iranian-Saudi links, has been particularly impressive. In view of the legacy of Ayatollah Khomeini's deep aversion toward Saudi Arabia and its leaders, improvement of Saudi-Iranian relations has been a significant development, especially since this policy has had the support of all of Iran's major political factions, including the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.[811] This means that the improvement in Saudi-Iranian relations need not be contingent on the absolute ascendancy of reformist elements. The first important manifestation of improved Iranian-Gulf relations—and Iranian-Arab relations— was the December 1997 summit of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), in Teheran during Iran's presidency of OIC. A large number ofArab and Islamic heads of state and prime and foreign ministers took part in the conference. Most significant was the presence of Saudi Arabia's Heir Apparent, Prince Abdallah bin Abdul Aziz, because it signaled Saudi Arabia's seriousness to respond positively to President Khatami's declared policy of "tension reduction" (tashanoj-zadai) and the replacement of a posture of confrontation with that of dialogue, both regionally and internationally.[812]

The next important step was the visit of former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani to Saudi Arabia in February 1998, during which he met with key Saudi leaders. The only discordant note throughout the trip were some antiShia comments made by a Saudi cleric. Rafsanjani also made a side trip to Bahrain. Given the strained Iranian-Bahraini ties since the advent of the Islamic Revolution, this visit was quite significant. Between 1994 and 1996, Bahrain experienced difficult social and political developments, notably agitation by its Shia population. Iran was accused of encouraging and helping these disruptive elements and, according to some, instigating them. Rafsanjani's visit was intended to indicate that Iran was willing to open a new chapter in the two countries' relationship. By agreeing to receive Rafsanjani, the Bahrainis showed their willingness to put ties on a new footing. In view of significant Saudi influence over Bahraini policies, the trip also indicated Riyadh's tacit approval of better Iran-Bahrain ties.

Rafsanjani's trip was the culmination of a decade of slow but consistent efforts by Teheran to improve relations with the Gulf states. These efforts were the outcome of a process, of questioning the wisdom of past policies that Iran underwent, following its defeat by Iraq and the signing of the humiliating ceasefire agreement of August 1988. As a result of this process Iran realized that its ideologically driven regional policies, and its provocative actions and rhetoric against its Gulf Arab neighbors, had calamitous consequences, notably the extensive financial, political, and military support that the Gulf Arabs extended to Iraq during its eight-year-long war, even though Iraq was the aggressor.

After the end of the Iran-Iraq War, Ayatollah Rafsanjani admitted that Teheran had created unnecessary enemies—more by its rhetoric than by its actions, since, as Professor R. K. Ramazani has pointed out, often Iran's bark was worse than its bite. During the 1990s Iran pursued less ideological policies in general toward its Gulf Arab neighbors. For most of the 1990s, however, neither Iran's domestic politics nor regional and international conditions permitted any major breakthrough in Iranian-Gulf relations. Rather, relations were marred by the slow pace of the de-ideologization of Iranian foreign policy and continued disagreements within the Iranian leadership. Other constraints included sharpening dissension about post-Gulf War security arrangements in the region, especially the role of extra-regional powers, and most notably that of the United States; the continuation of certain Iranian actions, such as the holding of anti-American political rallies during Hajj ceremonies, which were jarring to Saudi sensitivities; the revival of the dispute with the UAE over the three Persian Gulf islands; and growing tensions with Bahrain because of allegations that Iran was involved in anti-government disturbances. The victory of the anti-Saddam Hussein coalition in the 1990–91 Gulf War—by drastically weakening Iraq—followed by the collapse of the Soviet Union, reduced the necessity of placating Iran. Between 1991 and 1994, with progress on the Arab-Israeli peace, prospects for regional cooperation in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA) also improved, thus further diminishing the urgency for the Gulf and other Arab states to improve relations with Iran.

* Shifting Political Landscape

By 1996 three major developments had altered the strategic landscape and had caused the Arab states to reassess their policy options, including their approach toward detente with Iran. First, the assassination of the Israeli prime minister, Itzhak Rabin, and the rise to power of Likud Party leader Benjamin Netanyahu set back progress on the Arab-Israeli front because Likud historically has had a less flexible approach toward peace with the Arabs. The slowing of the peace process undermined the credibility of ideas regarding region-wide economic cooperation schemes.

The second development was the growing economic, political, and military cooperation between Israel and Turkey, which has developed into a strategic partnership.[813] This development is potentially threatening both to Iran and to the Arab states. This partnership initially caused serious alarm in Egypt and several other Arab countries. But, Egyptian anxieties later subsided following President Mubarak’s meeting with Turkish president Suleiman Demirel.[814] Jordan is a de facto member of the Turkish-Israeli partnership, and Turkish-Jordanian relations were further cemented by the visit ofjordan’s King Abdallah II to Ankara on 7 March 2000.[815] Whatever the long-term ramifications of the Turkish-Israeli alliance for Iran and the Arab states, its immediate impact was to enhance their desire for improved relations.

The third development was the coming to power of President Khatami, whose new policy of “tension reduction” provided a more auspicious atmosphere for improved ties with Arab states. The relative thaw in U.S.-Iranian bonds following Khatami’s victory meant that Washington would not oppose better Iran-Arab ties. The assumption of a more significant role in managing Saudi policies by Heir Apparent Prince Abdallah, who is more interested in improving intra-Muslim cooperation, was also a contributing factor.

 Acceleration of the Pace of Improvement

The second important milestone on the road to better Iranian-Gulf relations was President Khatami’s visit to Saudi Arabia and Qatar in May 1999. Following these visits, the Iranian side was initially eager and optimistic about the speed with which it wanted to ameliorate relations, including in such controversial areas as defense. The Arab side, however, was more cautious. Thus, Saudi authorities, although characterizing Khatami’s visit as very positive, cautioned that time and effort were needed to restore confidence in the relationship. However, by July 2000, Saudi Arabia and Iran were reportedly close to signing an agreement on security cooperation. But Prince Naif, Saudi Arabia’s minister of interior, emphasized that this agreement was aimed at fighting crime, terrorism, and drug trafficking, and should not be viewed as a regional defense pact.[816]

President Khatami’s visit was followed by return visits to Iran by senior Saudi and other Gulf officials. Defense Minister Sultan bin Abdul Aziz—who, according to some reports, was initially lukewarm toward establishing better ties with Iran—visited Teheran in May. Other Gulf dignitaries who visited Iran in 1998—99 included Kuwait’s Heir Apparent and prime minister, Shaykh Saad Abdallah Salim Al Sabah. In the event, Shaykh Al Sabah cut his formal state visit short, because of the death of the ruler of Bahrain. Thus, he made a brief stopover at Teheran airport on 6 March 1999, but the gesture clarified Kuwait’s willingness to further explore the Iranian reconciliation strategy.

Bahrain’s foreign minister visited Teheran in May 1999, when the two countries agreed to exchange ambassadors. There have also been reports that Omani and Qatari leaders intended to visit Iran. In fact, the Emir of Qatar visited Iran in July.[817] The process of Iranian-Gulf reconciliation, however, has not extended to all countries. An especially sour note was the continuation of the frigid and acrimonious relationship between Iran and the UAE, which disapproved of Iranian-Gulf relations before the issue of the three disputed islands was resolved. The ﻯﻼﻋ clearly expressed its displeasure to its GCC partners. Reportedly, the ﻉﺎﺟﻼﻋ foreign minister said that Iranian-Gulf reconciliation would come at his country’s expense; this view was rejected by the Saudi defense minister. [818] In order to prove that what Arab countries view as the UAE’s sovereign rights over the disputed islands would not be sacrificed for the sake of better relations with Iran, the GCC and the League ofArab States (LAS) reaffirmed their support for the UAE’s claim to the islands in various communiques. The victory of Iranian reformists in the February 1999 parliamentary elections was positively received by the Gulf states, on the grounds that this would strengthen President Khatami and would enable him to continue his reconciliation policy. Still, several Gulf states, notably the UAE, have unreasonable expectations about the effects of the reformists’ victory. Even the most liberal parliament would not be capable of relinquishing what Iran considers to be its sovereign rights over the two Tunbs and part of Abu Musa. [819] Yet UAE newspapers, such as Al-Khaleej, opined that for the reformists, “the key test will be whether Iran revises its policy toward the three UAE islands and accepts a political dialogue on the issue.”[820] However, not all channels of communication between Iran and the UAE are closed.[821]

 A Still Fragile Reconciliation

Recent improvement in the atmospherics of Iranian-Gulf relations, although a considerable achievement after two decades of intense animosity, is still fragile. A return to the high tensions of the first decade of the revolution and the misgivings of the 1990s is unlikely, but the establishment of full trust and the setting up of a solid framework for cooperation between Iran and the Gulf states will take time and effort. Especially important will be the evolution of Iran’s domestic politics, notably whether reformists will be able to translate their popular support into institutional power, thus enabling them to pursue their conciliatory policy toward their neighbors. In view of the Persian Gulfs special strategic situation, which attracts intense interest by extra-regional powers, the future of Iranian-Gulf relations will also depend on the impact of exogenous forces, which historically have determined the character of Iranian-Gulf relations more than the indigenous dynamics of the Persian Gulf region. Given the U.S. preponderance in the Gulf, the state of U.S.-Iranian relations and the American approach toward Iran’s regional role will be decisive.

In view of the foregoing, it is necessary to analyze those underlying forces before sketching potential courses that Iranian-Gulf relations may follow in the foreseeable future and assessing prospects for cooperation or risk of renewed discord. These underlying forces can be divided into the following categories: (1) factors indigenous to the Persian Gulf region; (2) factors related to the broader Middle East region and its eastern and western peripheries, including the dynamics of Arab-Iranian interaction and the character of intra-Arab relations; and (3) factors related to the characteristics of the international political system and the policies and interests of its principal actors.

* Indigenous Dynamics of the Persian Gulf Region

Certain specific characteristics of the Persian Gulf region have historically exacerbated the conflictual dimensions of Gulf-Iran relations. In general, they have constituted an undercurrent of suspicion that has made cooperation problematic and, whenever achieved, limited and short-lived. The following are the most significant of these characteristics:

 Physical Disparities

The Persian Gulf littoral states vary greatly in their size, their population, the magnitude and diversity of their natural resources, and their diverging economic needs. Tables 25.1 and 25.2 illustrate the extent of these disparities. Three countries—Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia—dominate the northern and southern littorals of the Gulf in terms of size and population.

The high percentage of non-indigenous population in some Gulf states is a source of discomfort and a potential security concern as illustrated in Table 25.3. With the reduction in the number of non-Gulf Arabs, this security dimension of non-indigenous populations has somewhat lost its importance. In some of the Gulf states, such as Kuwait, Qatar, the UAE, and Bahrain, Iranians form part of this non-indigenous population.[822]

Since the movement of peoples and cultures across the Persian Gulf has historically been a two-way traffic, there are also Arab elements on the Iranian side of the Gulf, with the highest concentration in Khuzistan Province. People from the southern coasts could freely travel to Iran and live there without any limits as late as 1945. It was only in the 19505 that Iran introduced border controls in the Persian Gulf.[823] The disparities have had significant implications for Gulf states' security concerns and perceptions of potential threats, and their views regarding the most appropriate national and regional policies. The two largest Gulf states, Iran and Iraq, have favored the development of strong national defense capabilities and have opposed the presence of extra-regional forces. Smaller Gulf states, which, because of indigenous manpower problems, are not capable of creating sufficiently strong national defense forces, have welcomed the presence of friendly extra-regional forces as counterweights to the power of larger regional states.

With the increase in its indigenous population, Saudi Arabia has gradually come to favor a stronger national defense, despite some lingering ambivalence. Following the 1991 Gulf War, King Fahd stated: "We in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia have made a decisive decision to immediately embark on expanding and strengthening our armed forces, and providing them with the most effective and most advanced land, sea, and air weapons the world has produced."[824] Nevertheless, even in Saudi Arabia's case, close defense cooperation with major powers remain an important component of national defense strategy.[825]

Table 25.1 Size of Countries

| Country | Size in Sq. Kilometers |

| Bahrain | 620 |

| Iran | 1,648,000 |

| Iraq | 437,162 |

| Kuwait | 17,820 |

| Oman | 212,460 |

| Qatar | 11,437 |

| Saudi Arabia | 1,960,582 |

| United Arab Emirates | 82,880 |

Source: CIA World Fact Book

Table 25.2 Population of Countries

| Country | Population |

| | Nationals | Non-Nationals |

| Bahrain | 629,090 | 227,801 |

| Iran | 65,179,752 | |

| Iraq | 22,427,150 | |

| Kuwait | 1,991,115 | 1,220,935 |

| Oman | 2,446,645 | n.a. |

| Qatar | 18,885 | 542,657 |

| Saudi Arabia | 21,504,613 | 5,321,938 |

| United Arab Emirates | 2,344,402 |

Source: CIA World Fact Book

This fact became quite clear during the Iran-Iraq War, when Iran’s reliance on its larger manpower potential proved no match for Iraq’s more plentiful and modern weaponry. Currently, GCC countries possess more sophisticated weapons and spend more on defense than does Iran. Nevertheless, it is still a fact of international life that smaller and less populous countries feel wary of their larger neighbors. As a large country, Iran has often suffered from this basic characteristic of international relations, when its legitimate defensive actions have generated equally legitimate and understandable concerns among its southern neighbors. In the past the existence of Iranian communities in the Gulf Arab states has caused concern that they might act as a fifth column for Iran, or, as some radical Arab states claimed, try to undermine their Arab character. In the 19605, Egypt’s Nasser claimed that Iran wanted to create another Palestine in the Gulf. Indeed, as pointed out by two keen observers, “the theme constantly emphasized by Cairo was the similarity (explicitly stated) of the Iranian and

Table 25.3 Ethnic Composition of Non-Nationals in Percentages

| | Bahrain | Kuwait | Oman | Qatar | Saudi Arabia | UAE |

| South Asian | 13 | 99 | n.a.{2} | 36 | 20) | 60 |

| Iranian | 8{3} | 4{4} | 1 | 10) | — | 11{5} |

| Other Arab | 10 | 55 | — | — | 6 | 12 |

| Other | 1 | 17 | 27 | 28 | 2 | 3 |

Sources: CIA World Fact Book and from Anthony Cordesman’s calculations.

{2} Cordesman does not cite South Asians for Oman, but according to the CIA World Fact Book, there are Indians, Pakistanis, Sri Lankans, and Bangladeshis in Oman.

{3} If it is considered that a good portion of native Bahrainis are of Iranian origin (David Holden, Farewell to Arabia), the percentage of Iranians in Bahrain increases.

{4} In Kuwait, too, some Kuwaiti nationals are of Iranian origin.

{5} Cordesman does not mention any Iranians in the UAE, but according to the CIA World Fact Book, 23 percent of the UAE population is other Arab and Iranian. Since Cordesman puts the other Arabs at 12 percent, this means that 11 percent are Iranians, which is a conservative estimate. According to the CIA World Fact Book, Persian is the second (after Arabic) most widely spoken language in the UAE.

Israeli states, their alleged collusion, and the analogies between Iranian immigration to the Gulf States and the Zionists’ earlier immigration to Palestine. This posed, it was alleged, a threat to the Arabism of the Gulf.”[826]

After the Islamic Revolution, Iranian communities were viewed as a source of subversion. Iran’s efforts to export its revolution, and some Iranian involvement in subversive activities in Kuwait, Bahrain, and Saudi Arabia, strengthened these feelings. Thus, during the 19805, a number of Iranians residing in Kuwait were expelled. The significant Arab population in Khuzistan created the misinterpretation in Baghdad that, in case of conflict with Iran, it would enjoy the support of Khuzistani Arabs. Iraq, however, was sorely disappointed in this expectation. The vast majority of the long-established Iranian communities on the southern shores of the Persian Gulf, too, have either supported the established order or been politically quiescent. They did not respond to the Iranian revolutionaries' calls for the overthrow of the Gulf Arab governments.

Therefore, it could be argued that under the right circumstances and with the elimination of other sources of tension, these communities could contribute to Iranian-Gulf reconciliation and cooperation.

 Disparity in Energy Resources and Economic Needs

Currently, the principal source of wealth in Iran and in the Gulf Arab countries is their energy resources. However, there are vast disparities among them in terms of the ratio of reserves to population and economic needs. Iran's position stands in sharp contrast to that of other Gulf states, including Iraq, as Table 25.4 illustrates. Iran's oil resources are not insubstantial, variously estimated at between 90 and 100 billion barrels, but they are minuscule in terms of size of population, which is still growing, albeit at a slower pace. Therefore, unless Iran reduces domestic oil consumption and revitalizes its fields, it will run out of petroleum resources in two or three decades.[827] Consequently, since the late 19605, Iran's preference has been for an oil pricing policy that would maximize revenues and provide it with sufficient investment funds, reducing dependence on oil through industrialization, while Gulf Arabs have tended to favor lower oil prices.[828]

Table 25.4 Persian Gulf: Proven Oil Reserves. (As of the End of 1997)

| Country | Reserves in Billion Barrels |

| Iran | 89.7 |

| Iraq | 112.0 |

| Kuwait | 96.5 |

| Oman | 5.1 |

| Qatar | 3.7 |

| Saudi Arabia | 261.5 |

| UAE | 97.8

| Total | 666.5 |

Source: BP/Amoco Statistical Review 1999

Countries like Saudi Arabia, with much larger resources and smaller populations, have favored relatively lower oil prices. Saudi Arabia has used this advantage as a means of putting political pressure on Iran. This was the case during 1985–86, when Riyadh used its “oil weapon” as a means to weaken Iran. The impact of these basic differences was quite evident during the latest meeting of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) in March 2000, to decide on the timing and extent of changes in production, ostensibly to lower oil prices further. Thus, Saudi Arabia was more willing to increase production sooner, while Iran favored a more limited increase at a later date.

 Sectarian Differences

The Persian Gulf is also a cultural and religious frontier, with Shia/Iranian elements dominating the northern shores and Sunni/Arabs the southern parts. Two factors complicate the sectarian picture in the Gulf and accentuate its potential for creating discord between Iran and the Gulf Arabs. First, in some Gulf states, notably Saudi Arabia, the dominant creed is the strict Wahhabi school of Sunni Islam, after its founder Muhammad bin Abdul Wahhab, which views Shias not merely as misguided Muslims, but as apostates. The politically disruptive potential of such sentiments became clear during Iran's then—President Hashemi Rafsanjani's trip to Saudi Arabia in February 1998, when, during his visit to the Prophet's Mosque in Madinah, the Saudi shaykh called Shias worse than infidels. Rafsanjani left the mosque, but continued his visit—a move that was criticized by conservative newspapers in Iran. They argued that Rafsanjani should have immediately returned home. Some even alleged that powerful circles in Saudi Arabia opposed to the rapprochement with Iran had instigated the shaykh's comments.[829] In return, Ayatollah Khomeini had accused the Saudis of not practicing real Islam, but what he labeled "American Islam." By applying such labels, he and other Iranian revolutionaries have wanted to delegitimize the Saudi leadership, and to question its pretensions to lead the Muslim world and to act as guardians of Islam's holy sites at Makkah and Madinah. Such statements, together with anti-American political rallies during the Hajj, exacerbated sectarian tensions.

Second, most of the Gulf Arab countries have substantial Shia minorities (close to 40 percent in Kuwait); and, in the case of Bahrain and Iraq, Shias constitute a majority. In Saudi Arabia the Shia minority, although relatively small, is concentrated in the oil-rich and economically important Eastern Province. Elements within these minorities harbor social, economic, and political grievances against the ruling elites, a situation that arouses the authorities' mistrust and leads them to view Shias as potentially vulnerable to Iranian manipulation. Indeed, whenever there have been disturbances by Gulf Shias, all the blame has been laid on Teheran's doorstep, and there has been little willingness to admit that Shias in several countries have real grievances. For example, during 1994–96, when Bahrain was faced with widespread political turmoil, despite the involvement of both Shia and Sunni groups in these troubles, Shias were mainly blamed for them. Bahrain's leadership also accused Iran of complicity in these difficulties and alerted U.S. officials. However, many observers have noted that "no proof existed that Tehran supported Hizbollah Bahrain or any other organization trying to overthrow the Al-Khalifas [sic]."[830] It is possible that Iran had a hand in these disturbances, but it could hardly have created them if local conditions had not been propitious. Several foreign observers and diplomats tended to believe that Bahrain's problems had more home-grown roots, and even some Bahraini Sunnis shared demands for political liberalization, the resumption of parliamentary politics, and the need to address grievances regarding their difficult economic and social conditions.[831]

Even in Kuwait, where the Shias are in a relatively better position, many suffer from discrimination.[832] The Iraqi Baathist regime’s anti-Shia policies had begun long before the Iranian revolution. Yet, during the Iran-Iraq War, especially the decisive battle for Basra, Iraqi Shias demonstrated that they were loyal Iraqi citizens.[833] However, it must be stressed that sectarian differences have never by themselves been sufficient to prevent amicable coexistence and even cooperation, when other conditions have been favorable.

 Arab-Iranian Cultural Rivalry

Cultural competition between Arabs and Iranians has deep and complicated historical roots, although there has also been much mutually beneficial interaction between the two peoples that few are willing to acknowledge. Indeed, during a January 2000 conference in Teheran on the Persian Gulf, one of the Omani participants admitted that “from the historical point of view, rivalry between Arabs and Persians goes back many centuries.”[834] Culture and politics are never totally separate, but with the rise of nationalism, they became particularly intertwined in the second half of the twentieth century. Both Iran and the Arab states experienced a period of intense cultural and political nationalism between the 1930s and the 1970s. The rise of pan-Arabism as a political and cultural ideology aimed at uniting the Arab world, but also with irredentist dimensions, adversely affected Iranian-Gulf relations.

The Persian Gulf, with its unique strategic position and its vast oil reserves, became a special focus of interest for Arab nationalists in Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. The result was a growing linkage between the Persian Gulf region and the rest of the Arab world, ultimately leading to the full integration of the Gulf Arab states into the Arab political system. This development had serious security implications for Iran, and wide-ranging, and at times contradictory, ramifications for the nature and pattern of Iranian-Gulf relations.

At one level, anti-Iran activities in certain countries caused tensions in Iran's relations with key Gulf states, such as Kuwait, where the large Palestinian community was highly receptive to Egyptian president Nasser's pan-Arab and antiIran propaganda. At another level, the common threat that radical Arab states in the 1960s and 1970s posed both to Iran and to the Gulf Arab monarchies enabled the latter to put aside their other differences and reach a degree of cooperation on security matters that they might not have otherwise achieved. The best example of such cooperation was that between the Shah of Iran and King Faysal of Saudi Arabia against the common "threat" ofArab socialism and ultranationalism aligned with the Soviet Union.[835]

The growing intrusion of other Arab states into the Persian Gulf region made Iran realize that it did not face merely the regional countries but a much wider Arab world. This fact became clear during the Iran-Iraq War, when all Arab countries—Syria and Libya being the only exceptions—lent their financial and military support to Baghdad. Two consequences have flowed from this reality. First, given the close connection between the Gulf region and the rest of the Arab world, the physical and power disparities between Gulf Arabs and Iran became less significant. Second, Iranian-Gulf relations became more vulnerable to the dynamics of intra-Arab politics, and subject to the requirements ofArab nationalism and Arab solidarity. A recent example of this situation was the 25 March 1998 resolution of the LAS, regarding the three disputed islands of Abu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunbs. According to the LAS resolution, "the Arab Foreign Ministers underlined the sovereignty of [the] United Arab Emirates over its three islands." The Council also denounced Iran's occupation of these islands and determined to keep the issue on the agenda of the United Nations Security Council until "Iran ends its occupation and the UAE restores full sovereignty over them."[836]

 Territorial Disputes

A number of territorial disputes and conflicting claims over various Persian Gulf islands have for a long time been a principal source of discord in Iranian-Gulf relations. The roots of many of these disputes lie in the very long history of Iran, with its many dramatic ups and downs, alternating periods of grandeur and decline, the intrusion of European powers—Dutch, Portuguese —into the region in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and, most importantly, British colonial policies over a period of nearly 150 years.

A detailed analysis of the historic and other causes of these disputes is beyond the scope of this chapter. Suffice it to say that, at least from Iran's perspective, since the late eighteenth century, the dominant trend has been a steady reduction of Iranian cultural and political presence in the Persian Gulf. Still, it should be noted that the British policy of a "systematic de-Persianization" of the region has played an important role in this retrenchment.[837] Indeed, this was reflected in such actions as closing Persian-language schools in Bahrain, importing teachers from Iraq and Egypt, and preventing the Iranian consulate in Baghdad from issuing identity cards to the large Iranian community residing in Iraq, especially in the holy cities of Karbala and Najaf.[838]

Nothing illustrates Iranian retrenchment in the Gulf better than the challenge posed to the historic name of this body of water. Yet Iran's sensitivity regarding the name of the Persian Gulf is often viewed as proof of its aggressive and hegemonic intentions toward its neighbors, rather than the natural reaction of a country that sees the delegitimation of its presence in a region with which it has interacted for nearly 3,000 years.[839] The de-Persianization effort did not start with the Iranian revolution, or even during the later years of the Shah's rule, when Iran assumed a more assertive posture in the region. While concern over the name of the Gulf may be an irritant, the following territorial disputes have had a more serious adverse effect on Iranian-Gulf relations.

Khuzistan/Arabistan. In the nationalist Arab mythology, after Palestine, two parts of what it sees as the Arab homeland have been usurped from Arabs because of foreign intrigues. One of them is the so-called Arabistan. The following statement made by Iraq's deputy premier and interior minister Salih Mahdi Ammash in 1969 illustrates this line of thinking. According to Ammash, "Iraq has never seriously differed with Iran over the Shatt al-Arab: it is Iraqi territory [emphasis added]. The difference should have been over Arabistan which is Iraqi territory annexed to Iran during the foreign mandate and which is called Ahvaz against the will of the Iraqi people."[840] Throughout the 1970s, Iraq sponsored a number of so-called liberation fronts, including the Ahvaz Liberation Front and the Arabistan Liberation Front. Baghdad Radio continued to push this theme through its reports from “occupied Arabistan.”[841]

Nor was this perception limited to Iraq. Indeed, even close Arab allies of Iran such as Jordan subscribed to this view. Thus, while the Shah of Iran and the late King Hussein maintained friendly ties, Jordanian schoolbooks showed Khuzistan as part of the Arab world, thus showing that Iran’s relations with the Gulf region cannot be separated from its broader interactions with the Arab world.

Several factors prompted Iraq to invade Iran in September 1980—including the fear of a spillover of the Islamic Revolution—but the belief in the “Arabness” of Khuzistan and the notion that a wrong was done to Iraq by not incorporating it into the new state that came out of the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, along with the desire to remedy this perceived injustice, played a significant role in Baghdad’s decision. This belief led Iraq to wrongly assume that Khuzistani Arabs would join Iraqi soldiers against their “Persian oppressors.”

Although the Khuzistan issue is not an immediate problem, it could become one once again, as long as there is no peace treaty between Iran and Iraq. Baghdad has not unequivocally renounced its claim to Khuzistan, and the Arab view is that the region remains a usurped part of the Arab homeland.

Bahrain. Next to Khuzistan, conflicting Arab and Iranian claims toward Bahrain were a major source of discord in their relations until 1971, when Iran abandoned its claim to the island under British pressure, and because it lacked the means either of enforcing its claim by force or of changing the British view.

As a face-saving device, Teheran accepted a referendum carried out under the auspices of the United Nations to determine the will of the Bahraini people. In reality, however, Iran was not consulted on the arrangements for the island’s future. This was in sharp contrast to the activities under way between Bahrain and other Arab states. Even before the announcement of the British decision to withdraw its military presence, visits were exchanged between Bahraini leaders and other Gulf officials, all of whom, especially Saudi Arabia, pledged their support to Manama. Still, Iran contributed to the failure of various Arab schemes to create a more robust federation in the Lower Gulf. In addition to the shaykhdoms that finally formed the UAE, and left on their own, chances were good that the federation would have also included Qatar and Bahrain. By opposing the latter's incorporation in such a scheme, the federation of nine was reduced to a federation of seven. Nevertheless, the impact of Iranian opposition should not be exaggerated. Rather, differences among the Gulf shaykhdoms, notably Bahrain and Qatar, and the ambivalence, and perhaps even opposition, of Britain and Saudi Arabia to the emergence of a potentially more powerful Arab grouping were the primary reasons for the failure of the more ambitious federal scheme.

In the event, the political and emotional cost of "abandoning" Bahrain has never been fully appreciated by outsiders, since they considered Iran's pretensions for calling Bahrain its fourteenth province something of a sad joke or a sign of the Shah's growing megalomania. Yet, the costs have been heavy, especially in light of events that followed Iran's relinquishing of its claim to the island-state, most notably the physical and political linking of Bahrain to Saudi Arabia. From the Iranian perspective, the building of a causeway linking Manama to Dammam has made it a Saudi appendage. Indeed, at the time, Iran's news media characterized the building of the causeway as "the annexation of Bahrain by Saudi Arabia."[842] Such developments, coupled with the absence of any significant Iranian presence in Manama, intensified the feeling that this loss was another stage in the long process in the Iranian political and cultural retrenchment on all its frontiers, including the Persian Gulf. Meanwhile, on the other side, there is a feeling that Iran is still hankering after Bahrain, and would like to increase its influence there. After the Islamic Revolution, some unfortunate statements were made by a minor religious figure, Ayatollah Sadegh Rouhani, to the effect that he would lead a movement to annex Bahrain unless its rulers adopted an Islamic form of government. Although these comments were immediately repudiated by the Mehdi Bazargan government, they intensified misgivings about Iranian aspirations.[843]

Yet, for Iran, the Bahrain problem as a territorial question is settled, and any effort by Iran to reverse Manama's independence would not only end any hope of Iranian-Gulf reconciliation, but would also subject Iran to severe international pressures, especially from the United States, given Bahrain's importance as the home of the U.S. Fifth Fleet. It would also justify the worst fears of Iran's neighbors about its expansionist nature. Nevertheless, within an atmosphere of reconciliation, and in conjunction with confidence-building measures, it would not be unreasonable for Iran to expect to have a more substantial and legitimate economic and cultural presence in the country.

Troublesome Islands. With the Bahrain issue settled and Iraq incapable of launching another attack on Iran in the foreseeable future to take over Khuzistan, the only remaining territorial conflict that has the potential of delaying, and perhaps even stopping, the process of Iranian-Gulf reconciliation is the Iran-UAE dispute over the three islands of Abu Musa and the Greater and Lesser Tunbs. The roots of this dispute also lie in British imperial policies and their efforts at controlling as many of the Persian Gulf islands as possible, as well as expanding British control in southern Iran. This British policy was prompted by two aspirations: 1) to gain total control of sea approaches to India; and 2) to prevent any risk that Russia might gain a foothold in this region.[844] The Anglo-Iranian crisis over the Tunbs and Abu Musa began in 1903, when the government of India ordered the occupation of Greater Tunb and Abu Musa by and in the name of the Shaykh of Sharjah. According to British Foreign Office documents, the occupation took place in late June and early July in the form of instructions to the Shaykh of Sharjah to hoist his flag there.[845] This British action was clearly taken out of concern for imperial purposes and not out of a belief in the sovereignty of the Shaykh of Sharjah over the islands. Indeed, it is ironic that the action should have taken place under the orders of Lord Curzon, Viceroy of India, who in 1892 had produced a map that clearly showed the islands as belonging to Iran. Later, of course, the British tried their hand at historical revisionism.[846]

At any rate, this action created a dispute between Iran and Britain that lasted until 1971. Weak as Iran was, it never abandoned its claim to these three islands. As one Iranian scholar has pointed out, "Britain wanted the islands to belong to the Shaykhdoms more than the Shaykhdoms themselves. For example, in 1939, the Shaykh of Ras al-Khaimah decided to surrender the possession of the Tunbs to Iran, as he thought that they were legitimate Iranian territory. The British intervened to disallow the move, forcing the Shaykhdom to keep its flag on the island."[847] The need for a solution became more urgent in the late 60s, when Britain decided to withdraw from East of Suez.

Iranian diplomacy in handling the Bahrain and three islands questions was not particularly skillful. At a minimum, Teheran should have insisted on clear and legally binding agreements with Britain on the islands, rather than accepting informal or semi-formal compromises, before settling the Bahrain question and the whole issue of creating a federation out of several shaykhdoms. Iran surrendered its leverage by giving up its claim to Bahrain and by recognizing Qatar's independence. In exchange, it only "repossessed" the Tunbs with tacit British approval. By agreeing to vague arrangements and taking possession of the Tunbs, Iran thus made itself vulnerable to charges of unlawfully occupying Arab lands. In the case of Abu Musa, by contrast, there is at least a memorandum of understanding.[848] This is in total contrast to the resolution of the Abu Dhabi-Saudi Arabia dispute. The British convinced Abu Dhabi to give up its claim to areas coveted by Riyadh so that it could have access to the Persian Gulf. Indeed, Saudi Arabia had made it clear that it would not agree to the formation of the UAE federation without the satisfaction of its demands.[849]

The dangers inherent in the ambiguous Anglo-Iranian arrangements have become clear in the last eight years, as the UAE has launched an all-out campaign against Iran. The event that triggered the latest crisis was the decision of the Iranian authorities in Abu Musa to expel 100 foreigners working for the UAE in April 1992. Iran justified this action on the grounds that the foreigners were involved in espionage and, moreover, that they did not have Iranian visas in their passports. In August 1992, Iranian authorities refused to allow foreigners without Iranian visas to enter the island, thus forcing a UAE vessel to turn back.[850]

The Iranian foreign minister, Ali Akbar Velayati, tried to soothe the UAE's concerns and attributed the Iranian actions to junior officials. Teheran also offered to engage in bilateral negotiations to untangle any differences and to clarify procedures to prevent the recurrence of such incidents.[851] Still, Iran was adamant about its sovereign rights over the islands. In the event, the UAE seized on these incidents to reopen the whole issue of the islands, and brought the question to the United Nations.[852] Some Arab countries, including Egypt, became involved in the controversy as well. Radio Cairo compared Iran’s actions to the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. Western media outlets adopted a similar line, as demonstrated by the NewYork Timesر which maintained that “Abu Musa is the largest of the three islands belonging to the Emirates occupied by Iranian troops in 1971,” thus implying that Iran should give them up.[853] Several Iranian scholars have maintained that the Bush administration supported the UAE’s claim.[854] This would not be surprising, because it fits well within the overall hardening of the U.S. position toward Iran, which began under the Bush administration. Although the worst fears of a possible military confrontation have not materialized, the UAE has maintained its stand. Currently, it claims that all ofAbu Musa’s inhabitants are Arab and, moreover, that Iran is building underground military fortifications on the island.[855]

Given the strength of feelings of both sides, the risk of military conflict should not be dismissed. At the very least, serious Iran-UAE tensions would put severe limits on the extent of Iranian-Gulf reconciliation and the stabilization of the region. Already the UAE has begun to improve its ties with Iraq in order to counter Iran’s reconciliation with the Gulf states.[856] Moreover, this issue could be manipulated as justification for a more severe punitive policy toward Iran, such as military strikes against key installations.

* Forces Related to the Broader Middle East Region and Its Periphery

The foregoing has illustrated that, historically, forces and dynamics exogenous to the region have affected Iranian-Gulf relations. In particular, these ties were affected by the dynamics of intra-Arab politics and the Arab-Israeli conflict, including, since 1991, improved prospects for Arab-Israeli peace. Gulf Arab states’ energy resources had since the 19505 made them a focus of attention and a target of envy for more powerful, but economically less endowed, Arab countries. The dominant Arab nationalist view in the period from the 1950s to the 19705 was that the oil resources of the Persian Gulf Arabs belonged to the whole of the Arab nation and should be equally shared among it.[857] Gamal Abdel Nasser’s efforts to destabilize the Saudi monarchy and his forays into Yemen were, in part, prompted by a desire to gain access to the Gulf region’s oil resources. Other revolutionary regimes, including that ofAbdul Karim Qasim in Iraq, intimidated Kuwait and extorted large amounts of financial assistance.[858] During the 1990–91 Gulf crisis, Saddam Hussein exploited the theme of rich versus poor to garner additional sympathy for Iraq and increase resentment for Kuwait and the conservative Gulf monarchies among Arabs and Muslims.

Iran was not immune to the animosity, negative propaganda, and even active subversion of radical Arab states, most notably Nasser’s Egypt, as well as Iraq, Syria, Libya, and the Palestinian movement. One aspect of this propaganda was to portray Iran as a threat to the Gulf Arab states, a danger to the Arab character of the Persian Gulf region, and, in general, an enemy of Arabs because of its close ties with Israel. Yet, the argument is not convincing because Turkey has had closer relations with Israel and, indeed, had recognized it, while Iran had not done so. Yet, Turkey was never the subject of intense Arab animosity, as was Iran. Even today, close Israeli-Turkish relations, the massing of Turkish troops on the Syrian border over the Ocalan affair, and Turkish threats to curtail water supplies to Syria and Iraq have not ignited similar Arab passions. Nor do many Arabs worry about the fate of Iskanderun Province and its Arab inhabitants (an estimated 3 million), in sharp contrast to the case of Khuzistan or the uninhabited Tunbs. The main reason for such diametrically opposing perceptions of Iran and Turkey lies in the geopolitical and economic characteristics of the Persian Gulf—hence the eagerness of major Arab countries, notably Egypt and Syria, to establish their presence in the region and to acquire influence over Gulf Arab states. This desire became quite clear following the end of the 1991 Gulf War, when various schemes were considered for the post-war security structure of the Persian Gulf. One suggestion included the stationing of Egyptian and Syrian troops in some Gulf states.

The GCC-+-2 scheme did not materialize, but both Syria and Egypt have become involved in Gulf security affairs in the context of the March 1992 Damascus Declaration. By contrast, there has been no structured process of dialogue between Iran and the Gulf states on Gulf security, what this attitude amounts to is the denial of a legitimate role for Iran in the Gulf and the contention that the Persian Gulf is an integral part of a purely Arab geographic sphere in which Iran has no place.

Ironically, since the end of the 1991 Gulf War, and improving Arab-Israeli relations, Iran's excessive zeal to support the Palestinian cause has become a source of irritation in the latter's relations with some Arab countries. This may be one reason why Cairo has been at best ambivalent about better Iranian-Gulf relations. Surely cordial Iranian-Gulf relations—should they be achieved— would reduce Egypt's overall regional importance and its influence in the Gulf.[859] Syria has parlayed its good relations with Iran into greater influence throughout the region, by playing the role of mediator and conciliator. Yet even Syria has not favored very close Iranian-Gulf relations, since this would reduce its own regional weight, and, despite its so-called strategic alliance with Iran, it has also supported UAE claims to the three islands.

There is another way in which intra-Arab politics affect Iranian-Gulf relations, and that is related to intra-Arab political and economic institutions, notably the League of Arab States. These institutions' main goal has been the greater integration and eventual unification of the Arab states in the framework of something akin to the European Union. Therefore, they are not open to non-Arab countries. These are regional Arab organizations, such as the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) and the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU), which have their own specific dynamics, although they are considered as building blocks of this broader intra-Arab network.

This situation makes Iran's inclusion in regional schemes of economic and security cooperation quite difficult for the Gulf Arab states, even if Teheran's policies were to radically change. Iraq, an Arab state, does not suffer from this handicap, and would be a natural candidate for inclusion in the GCC under a different regime. The obstacles for such a union would be intra-Arab rivalry and/or opposition from Western powers, which might conclude that a GCC that included Iraq would be too strong and, hence, undesirable even if friendly toward them. Nor are these merely theoretical issues. In the last few months, there have been reports in the Iranian press that Qatar has expressed the opinion that Iran should be invited to join the GCC.[860] The accuracy of such reports is doubtful. But they reflect the reality that such notions are not beyond the realm of the possible, although because of intra-Arab politics and international systemic factors, quite unlikely even in the long term. Problems, disagreements, and diverging interests in the close periphery of the Gulf region, such as South Asia, between Iran and some key Gulf Arab states, including Saudi Arabia and the UAE, have in the past added to tensions between them and could hamper the future reconciliation.

 Impact of International Factors: Great-Power Policies

Because of the high degree of outside interest in strategically important regions such as the Persian Gulf, the great powers exert a determining influence in shaping the dynamics of regional politics, choices, and options available for local actors. The foregoing has illustrated how, during the past 150 years, outside interests and great-power rivalries have shaped the political geography of the Persian Gulf. But the most intense period of great-power rivalry in the Persian Gulf region was the Cold War era.

The dynamics of the Cold War, especially the balance of terror between East and West, affected the strategies of the two competing camps toward the region. Unwilling to risk a direct confrontation, both camps tried to establish their own special partners. The series of alliances that the Soviet Union developed in the Arab world with Egypt, Syria, Iraq, Libya, Algeria, and the Democratic Republic of South Yemen were balanced by the U.S. policy of creating “regional pillars”— especially in the Persian Gulf—-stark examples of competition by proxy. Since the Soviet Union championed the cause ofArab nationalism, Cold War rivalries had a deleterious effect on Iran’s relations with a number of Gulf states, notably Kuwait. Western promotion of Iran as a principal pillar of Gulf security in the late 19605 and early 1970s had adverse consequences for both its internal stability, as demonstrated by the 1979 revolution, and its relations with the Gulf Arab states. Ultimately, it even created tensions in Iran’s ties with its main allies, notably Britain and the United States, because it gave the impression that Teheran was becoming too ambitious, eager to be treated as an ally and not a surrogate.

This perception was inevitably brought to the fore by the conflict that exists between the interests of a great power with global interests and those of a regional power—actual or potential—because secondary powers tend to limit great powers' freedom of action. The Shah's insistence that the security of the Persian Gulf should be the responsibility of "riparian states" was a good example of a policy favored by a potential regional power but objectionable to great powers because as a rule they are averse to regional collective security and defense systems in which they have no role, or only play the role of primus inter pares. For example, when Malaysia hinted at the idea of creating a collective security system for the ASEAN countries in the early 1990s, Washington opposed the concept. Similarly, the US. is ambivalent about an independent European Security and Defense Identity (ESDI), if it were to develop in a way that would dilute the role of NATO and hence U.S. influence on the Continent.

Therefore, Iran's pretension to play the role of ally rather than surrogate led radical Arab countries to intensify their subversive activities against Teheran. Moreover, although several Western and Arab commentators maintained that the Gulf states perceived pre-revolutionary Iran as a "shield" against radicalism, at the time they did not express this opinion openly. Rather, they interpreted Iran's new role as an indication of the reawakening of its expansionist impulses. When Iranian troops assisted Oman in combating Dhuffari rebels, the Gulf states did not react with appreciation but, like radical Arabs, interpreted the actions as further signs of its imperial ambitions.

 Post-Soviet System

The bipolar international system of the post-war world and the existential and global East-West competition had many negative effects for Iran, which was a focus of the East-West rivalry because of its unique position as a formidable buffer between the Soviet Union and the Persian Gulf, and a viable counterweight to Iraq, then a close Soviet ally. Yet the intense great-power rivalry offered Iran room to maneuver, and limited the major powers' ability to pressure it beyond a certain point. This logic was apparent in the U.S. reaction, at least from 1979 to 1986, when Washington treated Teheran with a good deal of forbearance, and even tried a rapprochement, which ended in the Iran-Contra debacle.

It was not until 1987, when East-West relations had already begun to thaw, that the U.S. position decidedly shifted in favor of Iraq—in the Iran-Iraq War—since Washington no longer feared potential Soviet inroads in Iran. The Gulf states were conscious of this fact, despite all the difficulties that the revolutionary regime created for them. The existence of the Soviet counterweight also placed limits on the ability of Western powers to project force, or to pre-position weapons, to areas located in the proximity of the Soviet Union—the only exception being the main Central European theater.

In the context of the Persian Gulf, and because of the Soviet-radical Arab forces connection, the Gulf Arab states did not desire a direct Western presence. Rather, they pushed for an “over the horizon” strategy. It is worth noting that the first major foray of U.S. naval forces into the Persian Gulf—to escort Kuwaiti tankers—began in 1987, when East-West relations began to improve. The East-West progress of the 1980s and the early 1990s certainly facilitated military operations during Desert Shield and Desert Storm. In short, even before the collapse of the Soviet Union, sharp improvements in East-West ties had vastly improved the geostrategic position of the West and its regional allies.

The Soviet Union’s collapse in December 1991, coupled with the steady erosion of Russia’s military and economic powers, further enhanced Western advantages. In the Middle East/Persian Gulf regions, this dramatic systemic shift weakened the position and influence of radical pro-Soviet countries and those hostile to the West such as Iran, while enhancing the positions of pro-Western states such as those of the Gulf Arabs.

First, the elimination of the Soviet counterweight enabled Washington to establish its military presence in the Persian Gulf, in the form of the Fifth Fleet and the pre-positioning of military hardware and personnel in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Bahrain. Second, it enabled Washington to pursue a severe punitive policy toward Teheran, despite the fact that there had been some moderation in Iran’s external behavior. Third, and despite Iranian neutrality during the 1991 Gulf War—as well as its unqualified support for Kuwaiti independence and territorial integrity—the U.S. position toward Iran hardened almost immediately after the allied victory, when President George Bush did not follow up on his promise that “good will begets good will.” Thus, the foundation of what came to be known as the policy of “dual containment” in the Clinton presidency was laid during the Republican administration.

Iran’s Gulf neighbors benefited from these systemic shifts in several ways. First, they no longer needed to worry about the reaction of Arab radical forces in charting their regional and international policies. Second, they could openly enter into military and security arrangements with Western powers. Third, the U.S. military presence became a deterrent against Iran and Iraq. Fourth, Washington’s containment policy meant that Iran could not effectively rebuild its military forces.

All these factors contributed to the cool response that the Gulf States offered to Iranian overtures, despite the fact that Iranian neutrality had contributed to the allied victory. These changed circumstances also contributed to the UAE’s decision to reopen the islands issue and pursue it as far as necessary, short of military confrontation, at least in the immediate future. Indeed, according to one observer,

His [Shaykh Zayed’s] choice of 1992 to make an issue out of Abu Musa was dictated more لأ the circumstances in the region than لأ Iranian actions [emphasis added]. The Iranians had been militarizing the islands throughout the eighties, during the Iran-Iraq War, and he did not make an issue out of it. He did not even make an issue out of it during the Kuwait crisis of 1990–91. He waited until all that was over, and in 1992, when he had the support of the international community, he made an issue ofAbu Musa and the Tunbs.[861]

Systemic factors, especially the policies and attitudes of the current dominant international actor—the United States—will play a crucial role in either encouraging or hampering better relations between Iran and the Gulf Arabs. At present, the American attitude seems to be ambivalent. On the one hand, a more positive and friendly Iranian attitude toward the Gulf states would ease their security concerns and enhance their stability, something that Washington would favor. A sharp improvement in such relations, on the other hand, could reduce the need for a large-scale U.S. presence in the region and erode its ability to pressure Gulf Arab governments on issues such as levels of oil production, prices, and purchases of US. military hardware. It is perhaps with these concerns in mind that the U.S. secretary of defense, William Cohen, on a visit to the Persian Gulf in April 2000, warned Gulf Arab leaders about the continued security threat that Iran posed to them and, therefore, the need for better defense technology in the region. Cohen's visit and his statements came at a time when Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Oman were beginning a dialogue on security and defense issues.[862]

* Conclusions and Outlook

The character of relations between Iran and the Gulf Arab states, since they began to interact regularly starting in the late 19505, has been determined by the interaction of a complex set of factors—ethnic, cultural, religious. Other factors, including ideological and political consequences of the process of development and modernization such as the revolutions that swept the Arab world in the 1950s and 1960s and the Iranian Islamic Revolution of 1979, also left their impact. Since the Arab part of the Gulf is organically linked with the rest of the Arab world at various levels, these relations have also been subject to the dynamics of intra-Arab politics. Most important, however, in the last two centuries the nature of the international political system and the policies and practices of its principal actors have affected the character not only of Iranian-Gulf relations but also of the basic political patterns of the region. In coming years, systemic factors will surely continue to impact Iranian-Gulf relations. The key factor will be whether current U.S. supremacy will continue or whether counterweights—or at least serious competitors—will emerge to balance the sole remaining superpower. Equally important, policies pursued toward Iran and the Gulf states, at least for the foreseeable future, are not likely to change, because no such counterweights are on the horizon. Therefore, U.S. policies toward the region, the role of Iran, and the state of U.S.-Iranian relations will play key roles in determining the extent and pace of improvement in Iranian-Gulf relations. Should there again be a crisis in US-Iranian relations, in all likelihood the process of improving Iranian-Gulf ties would be halted. Such a development might even involve a risk of conflict. A crisis over the three islands could provide the spark for such a contest.

Because the state of U.S.-Iranian politics will be affected to a great extent by the state of Iranian internal politics, the evolution of the latter in the direction of reform and liberalization would have a crucial impact in determining the course of Iranian-Gulf ties. Developments in the broader Middle East region, especially the fate of the Arab-Israeli peace process and the prospects for Arab-Israeli economic cooperation, will also affect the course of Iranian-Gulf relations. Brighter prospects on this front might dampen enthusiasm for better ties with Iran. Finally, the fate of the Iraqi regime is another factor with considerable implications for Iranian-Gulf relations. The displacement of Saddam Hussein and the installation of a moderate, pro-Western regime in Baghdad could reduce the impetus for the Gulf states to improve ties with Iran.

In short, the future of Iranian-Gulf relations is contingent on many imponderables. What is certain is that the establishment of mutual trust and the development of an appropriate framework for cooperation will be a lengthy and uneven process. It is highly unlikely that Teheran will be incorporated into some kind of new security structure in the Gulf. Yet, under a positive scenario, mechanisms for consultation and cooperation on security matters and conflict prevention and resolution of disputes could certainly be envisaged. Yet even if the pace of Iranian political reforms were to remain slow, a return to the tension-ridden period of the 19805 and 19905 is very unlikely. Still, real and lasting reconciliation, and the creation of a true Arab-Iranian cultural, economic, and political zone of cooperation, will be a lengthy process. Nevertheless, the continued trend toward reconciliation during 1999–2001, exemplified by the signing of a security agreement between Iran and Saudi Arabia—as well as the visit of Prince Naif to Teheran in the spring of 2001—coupled with expressions of regret by Kuwait for having supported Iraq during the Iran-Iraq War, justify a degree of optimism about the future.

[811] In his last testament, Ayatollah Khomeini stated that Iran might one day even make peace with Saddam Hussein, but never with Saudi Arabia.

[812] For an excellent analysis of the ideological foundations of President Khatami’s foreign policy, see R. K. Ramazani, “The Shifting Premise of Iran’s Foreign Policy: Towards a Democratic Peace," The Middle East journal 52:2, spring 1998, pp. 177–87.

[813] On Israeli-Turkish cooperation and its ramifications, see Daniel Pipes, "A New Axis: The Emerging Turkish-Israeli Entente," The National Interestو number 50, winter 1997–98, pp. 31–36

[814] On the evolution of Egypt's views on closer Turkish-Israeli ties, see "Egyptian Foreign Minister on Peace Process, Other Issues," Foreign Broadcast Information Service (FBISf-NESA, 98—093, 4 June 1998. On this occasion, Foreign Minister Amr Musa said that "Turkey knocked on the wrong door when it wanted to return to the Middle East and committed a strategic error with the Arabs when it concluded its strategic alliance." The League of Arab States (LAS) also expressed hope that "Turkey will reconsider the relations of military cooperation with Israel, particularly at a time when the Middle East Peace Process is clearly facing a logjam because of Israel's policy," FBIS-NESA 98—084, 27 March 1998. According to the leading Egyptian analyst, Dr. Abdel Monem Said, while speaking on 24 March 2000 in Washington: "Initially there was a big alarm in Egypt about the so-called alliance between Israel and Turkey. After studying it, Egypt realized that it is simply a normal level of military cooperation between states that does not fnretn لاأة ا١١لهاً party. That helped smooth problems in the relationship between Egypt and Turkey [emphasis added]," Washington Institute for Near East Studies, PolicyWatch, number 442, 24 March 2000. Other meetings included that between Turkish foreign minister Ismael Cem and President Husni Mubarak, as well as several exchanges between Turkish and Egyptian military officers.

[815] On King Abdallah's visit to Turkey and the wide-ranging discussions that took place between him and President Demirel, covering a wide spectrum from water to joint investment and security cooperation, see "Demirel, Jordanian King Address Business Council," FBIS-NESA 2000–0208 8 March 2000.

[816] “Iran’s Shamkhani: No Limits to Ties with Saudi Arabia,” FBIS-NESA 1999–050, 1 May 1999. And on Prince Naif s statement, see “Saudi Interior Minister on Yemeni Treaty, Security Pact with Iran,” FBIS-NESA, 11 June 2000.

[817] “Iran: upcoming Visits by Qatar, Oman Leaders Eyed,” FBIS-NESA 2000–0127, 27 January 2000. According to the English-language daily Teheran Times, “Omani Sultan Qaboos and Qatari Emir Shaykh Hamad bin Khalifa Al Thani have expressed their intention to visit Iran.” On the Amir’s visit, see various FBIS/NESA reports on 17 and 18 July 2000.

[818] Douglas Jehl, “Overtures from Iran Ignite a Bitter Debate among Arab States,” NewYork Times, 9 June 1999.

[819] Since the 18 February 1999 “reformist” victory, the conservative-dominated Council of Guardians has been canceling the results of many elections. These actions have caused popular protest throughout the country. See “Guardians Council Defends Vote Cancellation,” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty Iran Report 3:15, 17 April 2000, p. 2.

[820] “Islands Dispute Will Prove Acid Test for Iran’s Reformers: UAE Paper,” Agence France-Presse (AFP), 22 February 2000.

[821] On Iran-UAE contacts, see “Iranian Official Meets UAE Defense Minister in Dubai,” BBC Worldwide Monitoring/Middle East, 3 February 2000. The Kuwaiti paper al-Qabas reported that according to the UAE defense minister, Shaykh Muhammad bin Rashid Al Makhtoum, the Iranian-UAE relation “was and still is very good.” Xinhua News Agency, 18 January 2000.

[822] The exact number of Iranians among those who have kept their distinct characteristics and those who have become “Arabized” is not known. What is known from Arab and other sources is that Iranian communities have existed in the Lower Gulf for a thousand years. For more details, see Pirouz Mojtahed-Zadeh, “Perspectives on the Territorial History of the Tunb and Abu-Musa Islands,” Hooshang Amirahmadi (ed.). Small Islands, Big Politics, New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1996, p. 36. Exact current figures for Iranian communities in the Lower Gulf are not available. Moreover, there is a general tendency in recent Arab and Western assessments to give a low estimate of the number of people of Iranian origin. But the pre—late 1960s literature indicates the existence of large Iranian communities. According to David Holden, “a strong strain of Persian blood among Bahrain’s people and a majority of Shiites over Sunni Muslims both derive from the Persian years.” See David Holden, Farewell to Arabia, London: Faber & Faber, 1966. In Kuwait, an Iranian community had existed since 1776. According to H. R. p. Dixon, in 1953, the Persian community numbered 30,000. There have also been substantial numbers of Iranians in Dubai and Qatar.

[823] Rupert Hay, The Persian Gulf States, Washington, D.C.: The Middle East Institute, 1959, p. 148.

[824] “King Fahd Speaks on War Outcome, Government,” FBIS-NESA 91–073, 16 April 1991.

[825] For an excellent discussion on Saudi Arabia’s evolving national security strategy, see Joseph A. Kechichian, “Trends In Saudi National Security,” The Middle East journal 53:2, spring 1999, pp. 232–53.

[826] Shahram Chubin and Sepehr Zabih, The Foreign Relations of Iran: A Developing State in a Zone of Great Power RivalryBerkeley/Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1974, p. 148.

[827] See the interview with Iran’s deputy oil minister, “Iran News Say Domestic Oil Consumption Too High,” FBIS-NESA 95–070, 25 March 1998.

[828] William Drozdiak, “Bowing to US, OPEC Agrees to Hike Output; Saudi Arabia, Iran Divided,” Washington Post, 29 March 2000.

[829] On the Iranian reaction to anti-Shia comments, see Seyyed Mohammad Safizadeh, “Diplomacy with a Smile,” Abrar, as reproduced in FBIS-NESA, 13 March 1998. The author argues that since the Wahhabi shaykh called Shias worse than infidels, Rafsanjani should have cut his visit short. See also “Iranian Clerics Sanei, Lankarani Respond to Saudi Shaykh,” FBIS-NESA 95–071, 13 March 1998.

[830] Mark J. O’Reilly, “Oil Monarchies without Oil: Omani and Bahraini Security in a Post-Oil Era,” Middle East Policy 6:3, February 1999, p. 78.

[831] David Gardner, “A Raise of the Stakes: Neighbors and Allies are Watching Closely as Bahrain’s Rulers Resist Demand from Shia Moslems for Democratic Reforms,” The Financial Times, 12 April 1996. According to the London-based paper, “the gap is growing between the rulers and the people of this island, and not only the Shias, says one Sunni businessman.”

[832] Shafeeq Ghabra, “Kuwait and the Dynamics of Socio-Economic Change,” The Middle Eastjournal 51:3, summer 1997, pp. 367–68.

[833] On Saddam Hussein’s anti-Shia policies, see Hanna Batatu, “Iraq’s Underground Shia Movements: Characteristics, Courses and Prospects,” The Middle East Journal 35:4, autumn 1981, pp. 57894.

[834] “Omani Air Force Official on Iran, Gulf States’ Ties,” FBIS-NESA 2000–0205, 5 February 2000.

[835] Judith Perera, “Together Against the Red Peril: Iran and Saudi Arabia, Rivals for Super-power Role,” The Middle East Magazine, number 43, May 1978, pp. 16–25.

[836] On the LAS resolution, see “Egypt: Arab League Resolutions, Recommendations,” FBIS-NESA 95–054, 25 March 1998.

[837] Davond H. Bavand, “Bar-rosie-Mabani Tarikhi va Hoquqi-e-Jazayer-e-Irani-eTonb va Abu Musa” [The Investigation of the Historical and Legal Foundations of the Iranian Islands of Tunb and Abu Musa],Jmeh-eSalem 11:7, December 1992-January 1993, pp. 6–19.

[838] Fereydoun Adamiyat, Bahrain Islands: A Legal and Diplomatic Study of British-Iranian Controversy, New York: Praeger, 1955.

[839] “An Egyptian official yesterday criticized statements made recently by President Khatami that the [Arabian] Gulf will remain ‘Persian.’” See “Egypt: Official Critiques Khatami over ‘Persian’ Gulf,” FBIS-NESA 2000–0121.

[840] Quoted in Chubin and Zabih, op .cit., p. 183.

[841] Ibid.

[842] FBIS-MEA, 28 January 1982.

[843] R. K. Ramazani, Revolutionary Iran: Challenge and Response in the Middle East, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986, p. 49.

[844] Pirouz Mojtahed-Zadeh, op. cit., p. 46.

[845] Ibid.

[846] The following is an example of such an endeavor. “In the second half of the XVIIIth century, the Arabs of the Pirate (later called the Trucial) Coast of Arabia occupied the islands of Tonb (also called Tunb, Tamb, and Tomb) [and] its dependency, Nabiyu Tanb Abu Musa and Sirri; it seems probably they did so in the very confused period subsequent to the death of Nadir Shah.” Quoted in ibid., from the Confidential Document (17188) of H.B.M. Government “Persian Frontiers,” 1947, par. 72.

[847] Ibid.,pp. 48–51.

[848] Mohammad Reza Dabiri, “Abu-Musa Island: A Binding Understanding or a Misunderstanding,” The Iranianjournal of International Affairs 5:3 and 4, fall/winter 1993/94, pp. 575–83.

[849] Bruce R. Kuniholm, “Great Power Rivalry and the Persian Gulf,” in Robert F. Helms II and Robert H. Dorff (eds.). The Persian Gulf Crisis: Power in the Post-Cold War World, Westport, Connecticut: Praeger, 1993, p. 50.

[850] “Iran Silent on Expulsions,” NewYorkTimes, 16 April 1992. See also Youssef M. Ibrahim, “Iran Is Said to Expel Arabs from Gulf Island,” NewYorkTimes, 16 April 1992.

[851] Iran Focus, November 1992.

[852] General Assembly Document A/47/316, Resolution 5223/98/3, New York: United Nations, 13 September 1992.

[853] “Iran Silent on Expulsions,” NewYorkTimes, 16 April 1992.

[854] Hooshang Amirahmadi, “The Colonial-Political Dimension of the Iran-UAE Dispute,” in Amirahmadi (ed.). Small Islands, Big Politics, p. 14.

[855] The UAE foreign minister Rashid bin Abdallah Al Nuaymi “urged Al-Sharq al-Awsat not just to publish the pictures of the surface of the Abu Musa (as it did in its issue last Tuesday 9th March) but to show the military fortifications underneath the surface of the island. He asserted that there is not a single Iranian on the three islands, whose inhabitants are one hundred per cent Arab” added]. This statement is astonishing after 30 years of joint Iranian-Sharjah administration of the islands. See “UAE to Accept Iran’s Offer of Island Talks If Put to Tripartite Commission,” BBC Worldwide Monitoring/Middle East, quoting Al-Sharq al-Awsat, 12 March 2000.

[856] “Paper Views Gulf States Move Toward Closer Ties with Iraq,” FBIS/NESA, 27 April 2000: “The ceaseless efforts by the Emirates to get closer to and elevate ties with Iraq are in a way looking for new allies among Middle Eastern countries hostile to Iran.”

[857] On the Arab nationalist view on oil, see Emile Bustani, Marche Arabesque, London: Robert Hale Ltd., 1961. See also David Hirst, Oil and Public Opinion in theArab World, London: Faber & Faber, 1966.

[858] According to David Holden, the Kuwait Fund loans were “unofficially but with perfect clarity understood from Casablanca to Baghdad to have been the first installment in Kuwait’s protection money.” See Farewell to Arabia, p. 169. For more details on the use of financial assistance to enhance security, see Shireen T. Hunter, OPEC and the Third WorldzThe Politics ofAid, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.

[859] On Egypt’s aversion to better U.S.-Iranian relations that would positively impact on Iranian-Gulf ties, see Eric Hoagland, “US Perspectives on Persian Gulf Security,” The Iranian Journal of International Affairs 5:3 and 4, fall/winter 1993/94, p. 664.

[860] “Iranian Official on Iran-Gulf Cooperation,” FBIS-NESA 2000, 7 February 2000.

[861] William A. Rugh, “Past, Present, and Future Leadership,” in “Symposium: A Century in Thirty Years: Shaykh Zayed and the United Arab Emirates,” Middle East Policy 6:4, June 1999, p. 31.

[862] Howard Schneider, “Cohen Warns Gulf States on Dealing with Teheran,” Washington Post, 10

 Chapter 26: What Makes the Gulf States Endure?

J. E. Peterson

What has been—and, for that matter, will continue to be—the path followed by the Gulf monarchies, and why has it been so successful? That is the key question that drives any consideration of the strength and durability of the six states that make up the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC): Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates (AE), and Oman. Ironically, many observers have long regarded the Gulf states as anachronisms, propped up only by oil money and overdue to disappear into the dustbin of history at any time. Yet, the Gulf states not only have survived, they have endured and prospered. Why is this the case?

The central question of this essay is not easy to answer. A simple answer might be that the Gulf states have endured because they are sound regimes based on durable political construction. When compared to their neighbors in the Gulf, the Middle East, Africa, and Asia, there is more than a modicum of truth in this response. Yet, it simply restates the obvious. At the risk of sounding tautological, the Gulf states are likely to endure because they have endured already. Over a few short decades, they have faced down successive challenges of modernization, radical pan-Arab nationalism, and Islamic revivalism. They have demonstrated that they possess the qualifications necessary for survival.

Still, they are monarchies in a world that has rejected monarchies. Granted, there is much about these states that does seem anachronistic and part of a bygone era. For example, the conservative and largely traditional societies, the uncertain criteria for succession, the favored—and resented—status of the ruling families, and the combination of rule by and benefits to what is essentially an oligarchy of political and economic elites. Still, it is also true that these states have seen unprecedented political and social change. The newly built cities of the Gulf, with their expansive boulevards, modern buildings, and crowded shopping malls, vividly illustrate the types of changes that have occurred. At the same time, however, conclusions drawn from these more superficial transformations may give a misleading impression of the persistent continuity in Gulf society.

From another angle, the region’s media emphasis on the daily “court report” and the outwardly unaltered structure of the regimes undoubtedly obscures the great extent of change that has occurred already. The first step in properly answering the question of what makes the Gulf states endure must, therefore, be to examine the intrinsic nature of these regimes and the characteristics that set them off from other countries.

* The Fate of Monarchies in the Gulf, 1900–2000

It is worth restating the obvious in a slightly different context. The Gulf states are both Arab and Muslim states, which has endowed them with a profound legacy of political and social norms. Significant among these are Arab and Islamic concepts of legitimacy being invested in rulers who are strong and capable, who govern according to the precepts of Islam (i.e., they permit that which Islam allows and prohibit that which Islam forbids). In this sense, contemporary Arab monarchies can be seen as the heirs to the Umayyads and the Abbasids. The test of legitimacy therefore lay as much in the power and capability of the regime as in its inherent right to rule. When regimes became weak or ineffective, rulers who were stronger and more capable replaced them, as happened in this century across the Gulf with the replacement of the Qajar regime by Reza Shah and the creation of his own Pahlavi dynasty. The emergence of the Gulf states in the last century or more owes much to the appearance of strong leaders, who were able to forge durable tribal coalitions and establish dynastic rule over the proto-states they had formed.

Britain encouraged the existing inclination toward hereditary rule, in imitation of its own monarchy. At the end of the First World War, Britain attempted to replace weak Ottoman authority in the areas under its control with local monarchies—such as the Hashemites in the Hejaz, and subsequently in Trans-jordan and Iraq, the Sanusis in Libya, and the descendants of Muhammad Ali in Egypt. These particular experiments were not very successful, as illustrated by the disappearance of four of the five monarchies. In Arabia, the Hashemite Kingdom of the Hejaz failed because of the emergence of a stronger regime, the resurgent Al Saud under the redoubtable Abdul Aziz bin Abd al-Rahman (more commonly known in the West as Ibn Saud). In Oman, Britain encouraged the evolution of a hereditary monarchy out of the historical tradition of a sectarian imamate. Elsewhere along the Arab littoral, Britain fashioned treaty relationships with the shaykhly families of the predominant tribes, and these gradually meta-morphosed into monarchical forms of government, particularly after rulers became the direct recipients of oil revenues.

Until just a few decades ago, all the littoral states of the Gulf were monarchical. But in 1958, a military coup produced an Arab nationalist, socialist regime in Iraq, and in 1979 political and social upheaval forged an Islamic revolution in Iran. Nevertheless, and despite the divergent ideological threats posed by these changes to the north, aided at various times by active intrigues of new regimes in Baghdad and Teheran, the Gulf states survived, prospered, and endured. Predictions that they would disappear have been ubiquitous over the past decades— particularly from the time of British withdrawal through the Iranian revolution. Luck may, in part, be responsible for their persistence, but a more fundamental reason lies in the deep differences between the Gulf states, on the one hand, and Iran and Iraq on the other.

* What Makes the Gulf States Different?

There are many fundamental reasons why the Gulf states are different from their northern Gulf neighbors. Inherent differences overlaid with variant historical experiences—even when just the twentieth century is considered—have determined evolutionary divergences in social and political organization. Both Iran and Iraq evince complex societies with many different sectarian, linguistic, ethnic, and occupational communities—in contrast to the relatively uniform societies in the Gulf states. Even more obviously, the Gulf states tend to be much smaller in both geographical size and population. As a consequence, societies have been more homogenous, cohesive, and, in a sense, more controllable. Smaller populations also meant that the impact of oil wealth was felt more strongly and positively throughout the population.

Furthermore, Iran and Iraq long enjoyed, at least in relative terms, a measure of economic diversity and development, enabled by such factors as natural resources and education. On the other hand, a principal distinguishing characteristic of the Gulf states before oil was extreme poverty, which retarded economic development and severely restricted education. The Gulf states remain poor in natural resources—with the notable exception of crude oil and in some cases natural gas—and this factor restricts both the direction and the scope of their post-oil development.

Consequently, delayed development in the Gulf states allowed little scope for ideological ferment and discontent. It is no accident that Bahrain is the only country in which serious discontent has occurred. Bahrain was the first country among the Gulf states to enjoy the oil income that prompted significant socioeconomic change. At the same time, however, Bahrain’s oil bonanza has been modest and so the distribution of oil wealth has been the slightest there.

Until recently, only Iran and Iraq could be classified as nation-states because of their size, sophistication, experience, interaction with the outside world, and so on. This not only meant that ideologies found fertile ground but that the simultaneous suppression of social complexity and political participation resulted in the revolutionary experience in Iran and in the emergence of a repressive dietatorship in Iraq. The Gulf states, on the other hand, retain many aspects of the traditional nature of their societies, accompanied by an attendant patrimonial form of politics. Rulers are essentially regarded as legitimate, and protests by intellectuals and others discontented with the political systems generally focus on the elimination of imperfection and injustice in the existing systems. Most are not demanding a change of systems.

* How Did the Gulf States Change?

Despite their outwardly traditional character, the regimes in the Gulf states have undergone considerable change in the last half-century. While less altered in appearance than other Middle Eastern entities, Gulf regimes are far from the traditional forms of government that existed before oil. All have undergone roughly similar phases in the transformation from minimalist polities to full-fledged national governments.

The first of these steps was the pre-oil conversion of tribally based systems into quasi-state entities. Broadly speaking, the process was similar in all six states, although the path followed in each country was unique. For Saudi Arabia, the transformation came about through the pivotal role of King Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman. Basing his claim to leadership—and legitimacy—on the historical role of his family, the Al Saud, and in spreading the message of reformist Wahhabi Islam, young Abdul Aziz recaptured the family’s capital of Riyadh from his enemies and set about constructing a new state. Within a few decades, his new state had spread from its Najdi center to the shores of the Gulf in the east, and to the Red Sea in the west. Further expansion to the north, east, and south was prevented by the British presence, direct or otherwise, on these land frontiers, as well as by Yemen’s mountain fastness (even though Abdul Aziz incorporated much territory along the border).

Oman too underwent transformation. Although comprising a unique national identity and effectively independent for more than a thousand years, the country’s political system evolved from the more traditional Ibadhi imamate to a more purely secular-based sultanate, nurtured at first by its overseas interests and then kept alive largely because of British support. Even though Oman retained its independence, tenaciously at times, Britain played an important role in forging a new expression of statehood through its financial and military support during two civil wars on the threshold of the oil era. Like Saudi Arabia, Oman had its own strong ruler in Said bin Taymur, who held the country together during trying times by force of personality as much as anything else.

The smaller states, the emirates, grew in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, more directly out of tribal politics. The emergence of dominant tribal clans and their supremacy was solidified through British recognition of Trucial shaykhs in the nineteenth century. New territorial states coalesced around these shaykhs, their clans, tribal allies, and small but pivotal settlements with significant merchant communities. By the dawn of the oil era, a clear-cut system of small states, under British protection but responsible for their own internal affairs, had put down roots.

Although the basic political outlines remained set, with hereditary rulers drawn from fixed families, the introduction of oil income dramatically enlarged the role of the sovereigns, set ruling families apart from the rest of the population, and consohdated power in their hands. Payments made to rulers, first as concession fees and then as royalties on oil production, reinforced the shaykhs’ traditional role as benevolent fathers of their communities, responsible for members’ material needs. It affirmed the rulers’ position as the paramount political authorities, stronger than ever before. It consolidated the primacy of the ruling families—officially in the government and unofficially in their economic prosperity and social elite status.

Oil income provided the opportunity for established merchant families and then for new entrepreneurs to expand their businesses and acquire unheard-of wealth, but always in cooperation with ruling families. It also had the side effect of cementing ties between ruling families and merchants whose origins lay outside the tribal community—such as the Shia in Kuwait, the Hawala in Bahrain, and Iranian and Indian merchants throughout the Gulf. Thus, the ruling families provided the protection that these groups needed to conduct their business, and in return, rulers and ruling families often exploited them for loans. Importantly, many rulers conducted their own commercial interests through these merchants.

Not least of course, oil income to the Gulf states percolated throughout the small populations and raised standards of living immeasurably. This, in turn, strengthened the loyalty of populations to rulers who seemingly had fulfilled their part of the “social contract” by distributing oil benefits and maintaining an atmosphere conducive to the pursuit of material ends within a traditional framework.

Another profound effect of oil revenues was the creation of modern governments. The traditional situation whereby individual rulers were able to oversee the behavior and welfare of all their constituents, and to respond with financial assistance or punitive measures whenever required, soon disappeared. The initial rush to create infrastructure improvements—including roads, harbors, schools, dispensaries, bridges, and airports—created a demand for qualified individuals, beginning with expatriates, to supervise foreign contractors. As projects grew in number and in scope, government departments were created and training and educational programs for Gulf citizens initiated. Where rulers were unable to bridge the chasm between minimalist forms of governing and the delegation of authority to formally constituted and specialized bodies, they were deposed, as in the cases of Shaykh Shakhbut bin Sultan ofAbu Dhabi and Sultan Said bin Tay-mur of Oman.

* Why Have the Gulf States Endured?

Given the unique and legitimate origins of the Gulf states, and their adaptability, the next obvious question is how have they managed to endure throughout the dual pressures of external ideological challenges and internal socioeconomic changes? Perhaps the first relevant factor is that, above all, the Gulf regimes have been competent. They have been responsive—or at least have sought to be responsive—to the needs and demands of their constituents. Just as the shaykh of the tribe assumed the function of, and was regarded as, a father for the members of the tribe, the rulers of the Gulf states have assumed the role of fathers of their national communities. Continued legitimacy depended on protecting the position of the community vis-â-vis the outside world as well as providing protection and justice for members of the community. Just as the head of a family, the shaykh/ruler was responsible for the material well-being of his constituents, which meant sharing his prosperity when appropriate. In the oil era, this responsibility translated into the construction of universal social welfare systems.

At the same time that rulers and regimes sought to preserve the traditional basis of legitimacy, they also endeavored to create a newer, more modern basis by satisfying new demands and criteria on the part of their constituents. Regimes were not shy about impressing their virtues in the minds of their people. Citizens were buffered from the chaos surrounding the Gulf. Within limits, regimes generally permitted their people to conduct their lives and business in relative freedom. The alternative to their benign paternalism, they suggested, was the oppression and uncertainty found in neighboring countries.

Although ultimate decision making in all these states was restricted to the rulers and their immediate families, the small population base and emphasis on education combined to allow talented individuals from many different backgrounds to participate in all levels of government. On many issues, these individuals shaped the debate, and lent their weight to the selection of optimal choices. Above all, the regimes benefited from an emerging culture of materialism and the resultant popular perceptions that the existing systems were responsible for the comfortable standards of living created in the 1970s. The failure of some groups to participate equally in the new prosperity and then the decline of benefits relative to expectations in the 1980s and 1990s have typically resulted in the criticism of certain abuses within the existing systems, not for their wholesale replacements.

The banding together of these six states into the Gulf Cooperation Council in 1981 also has played a supporting role. Despite the early protestations that the GCC was formed to address a multitude of economic, social, and political concerns, it is clear that the primary motivation was to create a defensive alliance in the face of worrisome events in Iran and Iraq. Regional security issues continued to predominate in GCC agendas, especially during and after the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait, even though effective security integration still eludes the Riyadh-based organization. Although GCC security arrangements play only a minor strategic role in the defense of the region, they have imparted a strong psychological impact that, arguably, has carried over into other spheres.

A generation or more of Gulf citizens has grown up with the GCC and the idea that the group of six Gulf states comprises a common identity nearly as profound as the underlying Arab and Islamic identities. Individuals visit and mix with their neighbors in the GCC far more than in the past. People are more inclined to travel within the Gulf for business, shopping, entertainment, and sightseeing, thus adding local destinations to the older ones of Cairo, Beirut, and London. Ties between social and public entities such as professional organizations, universities, and athletic teams have become the norm.

In the economic sphere, the drive toward integration has been long and rocky, and even the interim goals of common tariffs and a common market have yet to be achieved. Nevertheless, barriers are falling and the rights of travel, residence, employment, and ownership between GCC states have taken strong root. Intra-GCC investment and joint business opportunities are on the rise, stimulated perhaps equally by government encouragement and commercial promise. Government reluctance to end protection and subsidization of internal industries appears to be the single most restricting factor in further economic cooperation, but even this is under pressure. In this respect, such an attitude perhaps reflects a more fundamental concern over the submergence of national sovereignty, so recently attained, in an uncertain GCC entity that must inevitably be dominated by Saudi Arabia at the expense of the interests of the other, smaller five.

It must also be said that the durability of the Gulf states has been enhanced by their strategic alliances with the West. This should not be allowed to obscure the deep and profound interaction between the Gulf states and the rest of the Arab world, nor the position of the Gulf states in the Islamic world. After all, much of the wisdom and sweat expended on creating the recent appearance of the Gulf states belongs to expatriate Arabs and Muslims. Yet, the relationship of the Gulf states with these spheres has been troubled, and frequently marked by mutual suspicion. While grateful for the assistance provided, the Gulf states remain wary of adverse political trends emanating from the region. The persistent divisions between the Gulf states and the northern Arab world were vividly illustrated in 1990 by the affirmative reaction of many Arabs to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

On the other hand, the Gulf states have continued to develop and strengthen relations with western Europe and the United States. The interlocking occurs on many levels. While the uninterrupted supply of oil is the West's most obviOUS interest in the Gulf, the region depends on that same oil for the lion's share of its income and prosperity. For decades, a pattern has been established for the recycling of oil income into infrastructural development, consumer goods, and arms that in turn benefits Western economies. Even before the Kuwait War, the Gulf states' purchase of Western arms and military equipment strengthened the perceived guarantee that the West would intervene to defend the Gulf states against all threats. In fact, payment of top price for materiel, the purchase of more arms and especially equipment than can be used profitably by indigenous forces, and agreements for American and other Western uses of local facilities are all aspects of the formal and/or implicit contract between protectors and protectees.

Thus, it can be said that the military or security connections drive the political relationships, particularly at the top levels. But it should not be forgotten that many of the political, military, and commercial elites of the Gulf received their education or training in the West and retain strong cultural affinities with it. There exists considerable cause for disagreements; still, there is little doubt that Gulf states' populations often regard the West in positive terms.

The price regimes have paid for their reliance on Western governments has been relatively mild—so far. They have suffered some abuse for being American lackeys and must fight off both external and domestic criticisms of continued close alliance with Israel's biggest supporter at a time when Middle Eastern peace prospects appear to flounder. Most have steadily distanced themselves from the UN sanctions regime on Iraq. Indeed, Western criticisms on concerns such as human rights, the lack of formal democracy, and poor treatment of expatriate workers has been largely muted and has not affected government-to-government relations between the GCC and the West.

* What Must the Gulf Monarchies Do to Survive in the Future?

Success in the past of course is no guarantee of survival in the future. To retain an approximation of their present form and function, Gulf monarchies must continue to adapt and change. Regime responses must include the recognition that their populations are changing. The rapid growth of population, with annual rates approaching 4 percent in all the Gulf states, means that emphasis on the personal touch—so important in relations between ruler and ruled, as well as between any two Gulf citizens—will no longer suffice. Growing numbers of people and divergent patterns of education mean that younger generations no longer know all their counterparts. The physical spread of Gulf cities, sprouting ever farther flung housing areas and choked by automobiles, means that traditional daily visits between family members are observed less. Even the personal contact between citizen and his or her government weakens, as busy bureaucrats end up dealing with streams of visitors they do not know. Thus, the growing complexity of government and of public issues means that rulers and senior officials become increasingly over-worked and that rulers and their families grow more distant and aloof as monarchical trappings put down roots.

But Gulf populations are changing in more ways than just sheer size. The expansion and encouragement of education inevitably changes perception of government-constituent relations. Increasing numbers of educated, middle-class, and politically aware citizens are no longer content with the father-child model, and demand greater say in the increasingly difficult choices their countries must make. Throughout the Gulf, one universal source of friction is the privileged status of ruling families, which number in the thousands in some Gulf states. The need to curb the excesses of some family members, and to restrict their many privileges, is not only demanded by political sensitivities but also required by changing economic circumstances.

Ruling families, elites, and general populations alike must deal with the fact that the rush of wealth of the ‘70s was an aberration, and sounder policies must apply on a permanent basis. It is understandable that societies suddenly exposed to immense wealth after long periods of poverty should embrace materialism so fiercely. But it is also clear that the existing emphasis on materialism must be tempered with more spiritual, intellectual, and artistic aspirations. Furthermore, insofar as oil is a depreciating asset, Gulf societies must evolve from rentier societies to productive ones. The example of how Japan developed with few natural resources often has been invoked in the Gulf but rarely examined seriously, let alone acted upon. Instead, all too often, Gulf societies betray an extreme dependence on the state, the result of the government being the source of almost all income and the orchestrator of the social welfare system.

Given these key factors, what productive role can the GCC play in this process? Can the GCC be a tool of integration, allowing countries to achieve a sort of social “economy of scale”? Can the opening of borders result in healthier competition and the emergence of the fittest and best qualified? Or will the Saudi big brother crush independent initiative and resolve? So much of what has preoccupied the GCC has remained unfulfilled rhetoric, and the actual accomplishments have been so far achieved through the time-consuming and costly process of consensus building.

Looking farther afield, while there apparently is no other choice than to maintain the strategic alliance with the West, and especially the United States, it is also important to ask whether such a dependent relationship is healthy in the long run. It can only be noted with uneasiness that the United States, as the world’s lone superpower, has begun to act more like the global bully. A fundamental emphasis on preserving the status quo has discouraged Gulf rulers from initiating significant reform, while U.S. politicians, seeking to maintain an undisturbed strategic relationship, look at the short-term advantages of dealing with the status quo and avoid the long-term quandaries of pressing for change no matter how necessary.

The 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait illustrated how little had changed in Gulf/Arab relations in half a century. The same battle lines were drawn, the same divisions between “haves” and “have-nots” came to the fore, and the same slogans were shouted. While the bonds between Gulf Arabs and northern Arabs are indisputably fundamental, the relationship in practical terms is fraught with suspicion and often disdain. As an integral part of the Arab world, the relationship between Gulf Arabs and northern Arabs must be propelled to a more harmonious and mutually beneficial level.

Finally, the essential relationship between the Gulf states and the rest of Asia needs re-examination. For the most part, relations with Asia remain minimal or circumscribed. East Asia is a trading partner and only occasionally enters into strategic calculations, such as the Saudi purchase of Chinese missiles as a counter to dependence on the West. South Asia is the source of labor—professional, skilled and unskilled—without which the citizens of the Gulf states would find it difficult to maintain their lifestyles. But Gulf societies have developed a deep prejudice against South Asians, and the only strategic relationship, shaky as it is, is with Pakistan. That, however, is a relationship without much hope for conCrete benefits, given the history of chronic political turmoil in Pakistan and its embroilment in crises closer to home.

Furthermore, economic factors—the trade of crude oil and LNG exports for consumer goods, technology, and industrial involvement—necessitate a closer, permanent relationship with Asia. Already, Dubai looks to the example of Hong Kong and Singapore as a model for its development. Political considerations apply as well, ranging from concern over developments in Muslim areas such as Chechnya, Afghanistan, and Kashmir, to emerging perceptions of an Indian Ocean Rim identity.

Not surprisingly, the Gulf states must look to their own devices when assaying their future. Dire predictions of doom, collapse, and revolution have swirled around the Gulf states since before British withdrawal from the region in 1971.

Without a doubt, they will continue into the future. What the Gulf states must therefore do is continue building on the traditions of the past to transform themselves into entirely new entities in the future.

Undoubtedly the grip of rulers and ruling families on their countries will loosen,just as it has occurred already with the rocky but entrenched institution of the Kuwaiti National Assembly, the introduction of new consultative councils in Oman and Saudi Arabia, the reforms of cabinet composition in Saudi Arabia and Qatar, and the emergence of the first wave of a new generation of rulers in Bahrain and Qatar. Even the paternalistic role of ministries of information will continue to be eroded by the effects of increased travel and greater penetration of societies by satellite television and the Internet. Old-fashioned bureaucrats are gradually being supplanted and younger scions of family firms are branching out into new and uncharted commercial waters. The Gulf states will change, but chances are that the change will be gradual, consensual, and peaceful.

* Bibliography

[Editor’s Note—John E. Peterson was kind enough to suggest several titles in this partial bibliography, which assembles recent publications on the Persian Gulf region. Additional materials are included in each chapter.]

<biblio>

Abir, Mordechai. Oil, Power and Politics. London: Frank Cass, 1974.

——. Saudi Arabia: Government, Society and the Gulf Crises. London: Routledge, 1993.

——. Saudi Arabia in the Oil Era: Regime and Elites■, Conflict and Collaboration. لآ٢>١ال١أحةا,٢ذ٢ةأزهة٢د٠٦ح؟>أ- view Press, 1988.

Aburish, Said K. The Rise, Corruption and Coming Fall of the House of Saud. London: Bloomsbury, 1994.

Al-Alkim, Hassan Hamdan. The Foreign Policy of the United Arab Emirates. London: Saqi Books, 1989.

——. Ehe GCC States in an Unstable World: Foreign-Policy Dilemmas of Small States. سا٢دًارل٩؟ل Rooks, 1994.

Amuzegar, Jahangir. Managing the Oil Wealth: OPEC’s Windfalls and Pitfalls. London: I. B. Tauris, 1999.

حسحلآ0ا١,١أ٦خ٢١حا H. ARAMCO, the United States, and Saudi Arabia: A Study oj the Dynamics of Foreign Oil Policy, 1933—1950. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981.

Assiri, Abdul-Reda. Kuwait’s Foreign Policy: City-State in World Politics. Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1990.

Badeeb, Saeed M. The Saudi-Egyptian Conflict Over North Yemen, 1962—1970. Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1986.

Bligh, Alexander. From Prince to King: Royal Succession in the House of Saud in the Twentieth Century. New York: New York University Press, 1984.

Bulloch, John. Reforms of the Saudi Arabian Constitution. London: Gulf Centre for Strategic Studies, April 1992.

Chaudhry, Kiren Aziz. The Price of Wealth: Economies and Institutions in the Middle East. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Cave Brown,Anthony. Oil, God, and Gold:The Story ofAramco and the Saudi Kings. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1999.

Anthony H. Cordesman, The Gulf and the Searchfor Strategic Stability. Boulder: Westview Press, 1984.

—. Saudi Arabia: Guarding the Desert Kingdom. Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1997.

Crystal, Jill. Oil and Politics in the Gulf: Rulers and Merchants in Kuwait and Qatar. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Darwish, Adel, and Gregory Alexander. Unholy Babylon:The Secret History of Saddam’s War. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1991.

Dekmejian, R. Hrair. Islam in Revolution: Fundamentalism in the Arab World. Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1985, 1989.

Ehteshami, Anoushiravan and Gerd Nonneman with Charles Tripp. War and Peace in the Gulf: Domestic Politics and Regional Relations into the 1990s. Reading, England: Ithaca Press, 1991.

Fandy, Mamoun. Saudi Arabia and the Politics of Dissent. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999.

Farsy, Fouad al-. Modernity and Tradition:The Saudi Equation. London: Kegan Paul International, 1991.

Freedman, Lawrence, and Efraim Karsh. The Gulf Conflict, 1990–91. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993.

Gause, F. Gregory, III. Oil Monarchies: Domestic and Security Challenges in the Arab Gulf States. New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1994.

■ Saudi-Yemeni Relations: Domestic Structures and Foreign Influence. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

Heard-Bey, Frauke. From Trucial States to the United Arab Emirates:A Society in Transition. 2nd edition. London: Longman, 1996.

Hart, Parker T. Saudi Arabia and the United States: Birth of a Security Partnership. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Heller, Mark, and Nadav Safran. The New Middle Class and Regime Stability in Saudi Arabia. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University, Center for Middle Eastern Studies, 1985.

Helms, Christine Moss. The Cohesion of Saudi Arabia: Evolution of Political Identity. Baltimore and London: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1981.

Henderson, Simon. After King Fahd: Succession in Saudi Arabia. Washington, D.C.: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1994.

١عخآلاد١1ءلأة ةحأتآ ٢رلأ. All in the Family: Ruling Dynasties, Regime Resilience and Democratic Prospects in the Middle Eastern Monarchies. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999.

Hiro, Dilip. Desert Shield to Desert Storm:The Second Gulf War. New York: Routledge, 1992.

Holden, David and Richard Johns. The House of Saud:The Rise and Rule of the Most Powerful Dynasty in the Arab World. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1981.

Huycttc, Summer Scott. Political Adaptation in Saudi Arabia: A Study of the Council of Ministers. V>oi.ev١ Colorado: Westview Press, 1985.

Katz, Mark N. Russia and Arabia: Soviet Foreign Policy toward the Arabian Peninsula. Baltimore, Maryland: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986.

Kechichian, Joseph A. (ed.). A Century in ThirtyYears: Shaykh Zayed and the UnitedArab Emirates. Washington, DC.: The Middle East Policy Council, 2000.

Oman and the World :The Emergence of an Independent Foreign Policy. MR 68ORC. Santa Monica, California: RAND, 1995.

------- “” · Succession in Saudi Arabia. New York: Palgrave, 2001.

Kelly,J. B. Arabia, the Gulf and the West:A Critical View of the Arabs and Their Oil Policy. London: Weilden & Nicolson, 1980.

Khoury, Philip s., and Joseph Kostiner (eds.). Tribes and State Formation in the Middle East, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1990.

Kostiner, Joseph. The Making of Saudi Arabia 1916–1936: From Chieftaincy to Monarchical State. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Lawson, Fred H. Opposition Movements and US. Policy toward the Arab Gulf States. New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1992.

Long, David E. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Gainesville, Florida: University Press of Florida, 1997.

. The United States and Saudi Arabia: Ambivalent Allies. Boulder and London: Westview Press, 1985.

Munif, Abdelrahman. Cities of Salt. New York: Vintage International, 1989.

. The Trench. New York: Pantheon Books, 1991.

‘· Variations on Night and Day. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.

Naqeeb, Khaldoun Hasan al-. Society and State in the Gulf and Arab Peninsula. London: Routledge; Beirut: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 1990. Tr. by L. M. Kenny Niblock, Tim (ed·). IraqzThe Contemporary State. London: Croom Helm, 1982.

------- ■■■■■“· Social and Economic Development in the Arab Gulf. London: Croom Helm, for the University of Exeter Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, 1980.

——. State, Society and Economy in Saudi Arabia. London: Croom Helm, for the University of Exeter Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, 1982.

Nonneman, Gerd. Iraq, the Gulf States and theWar.A Changing Relationshir 1980—1986 and Beyond.Lorr- don and Atlantic Highlands: Ithaca Press, 1986.

Peck, Malcolm c. The United Arab Emirates: A Venture in Unity. Boulder and London: Westview Press and Croom Helm, 1986.

Plascov,Avi. Security in the Persian Gulf: Modernization, Political Development and Stability. Totowa, New Jer- sey:Allanheld, Osmun & Company, 1982.

Peterson,J. E. The Arab Gulf States: Steps toward Political Participation. New York: Praeger, 1988. Published with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Washington Papers, number 131.

Pridham, B. R. (ed.). Oman: Economic, Social and Strategic Developments. London: Croom Helm, for the University of Exeter Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, 1987.

Al-Qasimi, Sultan Muhammad. The Myth ofArab Piracy in the Gulf. London: Croom Helm, 1986.

Ramazani, R. K. The Gulf Cooperation Council: Records and Analysis. Charlottesville, Virginia: University Press of Virginia, 1988.

———. Revolutionary Iran: Challenge and Response in the Middle East. ١ ةذآ\ن0أ٠,٦١١حoاד٦ns Hopddns Urn- versity Press, 1988.

Al Rasheed, Madawi. Politics in an Arabian Oasis :The Rashidi Tribal Dynasty, London and New York: I. B. Tauris & Co. Limited, 1991.

Rumaihi, Muhammed. Beyond Oil: Unity and Development in the Gulf. London: Al Saqi Books, 1986.

Al Saud, Khaled bin Sultan (with Patrick Seale). Desert Warrior: A Personal View of the GulfWar by thejoint Forces Commander, New York: HarperCollins Publishers, Inc., 1995.

John Sandwick (ed.). The Gulf Cooperation Council: Moderation and Stability in an Interdependent World. Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1987.

Shaw, John A., and David E. Long. Saudi Arabian Modernization: The Impact of Change on Stability. New York: Praeger, with the Georgetown University Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1982. The Washington Papers, number 89.

Sick, Gary G., and Lawrence G. Potter (eds.). The Persian Gulf at the Millennium: Essays in Politics, Economy, Security, and Religion. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997.

Simons, Geoff. Saudi Arabia:The Shape of a Client Feudalism. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1998.

Skeet, Ian. Oman: Politics and Development. London: Macmillan, 1992.

Wilkinson, John c. Arabia’s Frontiers: The Story of Britain’s Boundary-Drawing in the Desert. London: I. B. Tauris, 1991.

YanvanCLML Changed Identities’.The Challenges of the New Generation in Saudi Arabia. London; ١م0١لةأ bnsd- tute of International Affairs, 1999.

Yassini, Ayman Al-. Religion and State in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1985.

Zahlan, Rosemarie Said. The Making of the Modern GulfStates: Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Oman. London: Unwin Hyman, 1989. Rev. ed. Reading: Ithaca Press, 1998.

———. The Origins of the United Arab Emirates: A Political and Social History of theTrucial States. London*. The Macmillan Press Ltd., 1978.

</biblio>

* Index

<biblio>
Abaya 116, 123,124,126

Abdallah II, King of Jordan 429

Abdul Aziz, Mullah Uthman 59, 61

Abrahamian, Ervand 104

Abu Dhabi 162, 164, 232, 285, 360, 383, passim .

Abu Dhabi Investment Authority (ADIA) 167

Abu Musa Island (UAE) 216, 225,231,316,319,353,

363, 387, 394, 409, 427, 439, 440, 445, passim

Adelkhah, Fariba 194

Al-Din,Ayatollah ‘Ala’ 59

Al-Jazeera (television network in Qatar) 195,197–198,

319,322

Afghanistan 47, 71, 101459 ,396 ,370 ,356 ,314 ,270 ,126 و

Ahvaz Liberation Front 437

Al-Ahmar, Abdallah bin Husain 298

Ajman 163,166, 319

Albanians (Kosovar) 100

Albright, Madeleine 415

Algeria 83,101

Algiers (1975) Agreement 8990, 226, 355,356

Ali, Rashid 84,85

Ali, Salem Rubai 267, 292

Almaty 373

Alwani, Taja Jaber 61

Amara (Iraq) 59

American Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA) 331

American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) 330, 333,345

Amini, Ebrahim 25

Ammash, Salih Mahdi 437

Amnesty International 297

Amolijavadi 9

Ancel, Jacques 214

Anderson, Benedict 20)1

Anfal campaign (Iraq) 92

Anglo-Persian Oil Company (APOC) 327

Al-Anisi, Muhammad Yahyah 292

Antar, Ali 294

Arab Court ofjustice 245

Arab Cooperation Council 271,294

Arab League. See League of Arab States

Arab Maghreb Union (AMU) 442

Arabian Peninsula

and bilateral boundary agreements 220–221

and border disputes 213–235

and internal political affairs 282–283

Arabistan Liberation Front 437

Arak 23,49

Araki, Ayatollah 7

Aramco 118,119

Ardebili,Abdol Karim Musavi 10

Aref, Abdul Salam 86, 87

Argentina 89,336

Armenians (in Iraq) 67

Armilia patrol 344, 345

Aron, Raymond 90

Asabiyah (in Kuwaiti politics) 306

Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) 405, 443

Ashura 284

Asir Province, Asiris 100, 114, 11 6277 ,230 ,214 ,119 و

Al-Asnaq, Abdallah 292

Association of Combatant Clerics of Teheran 16,18

Association of the Seminary Teachers of Qom 25

Assyrians 67, 79, 84–86, 91

Astana 373

Axelgard, Frederick w. 90

Ayubi, Nazih 99

Al-Azhar University (Cairo) 61

Azerbaijan 331

Azeri-Qomi, Ayatollah 8

Azeris 388

Aziz, Tariq 71,72, 90, 274

Al-’Azm, Sadeq 199

Baath Party (Iraq) 39, 56, 59, 60–61,62, 65–66, 68,71, 73–74, 84, 86, 87, 88, 90 and policies towards Shia clergy 58–60, 80

Bab al-Mandeb 3

Baghdad 66, 70

Bahjat, Mohammed Taqi 8

Bahonar, Reza 17, 21

Bahrain 95, 139, 163, 281,417,428, passim

and 1981 coup attempt 285

and consultative council (majlis) 189, 284, 323

and economic dependence 179

and Hawala 455

and integration in global economies 181—182

and internal constraints 177–190

and nationalist consciousness 180–181

and political crises 184

and political reforms 187–189

and Qatar border dispute 218–219

and relations with UAE 320

Bahrain Freedom Movement (BFM) 335

Al-Baid,Ali Salem 299

Bakhtiar, Shahpour 36–37

Baker, James 272

Al-Bakr, Ahmed Hassan 86, 395

Balfour-Paul, Sir Glen 225

Baluchis 181

Bani Sadr,Abol Hassan 38–39

Bank for International Settlements (BIS) 146

Baqi, Emad ad-Din 20, 21,23

Barazani 71,74,75

Basij [Mobilization of the Oppressed/paramilitary force]

14,25,39,43–45

Basra 59, 73,238, 435

Batatu, Hanna 86, 88

Bazaar, Bazaaris 104

Bazargan, Mehdi 438

BBC 199

Beduns 181

in Bahrain 188

Belgrave, Sir Charles Dalrymple 225

Bengio, Ofra 88

Bin Baz, Abdul Aziz (theologian) 200, 202–203, 306, 320

Bin Laden, Usama 105, 376

Boll, Heinrich [Institute in Berlin] 22

Bonyad-e Mosta’azafin [Foundation of the oppressed, or

Bonyads] 18,19,26,27,331

Border and territorial disputes in the Arabian Peninsula

213–235

Al-Borujerdi, Murtada 59

Brinton, Crane 105

Bubiyan island (Kuwait) 227, 228

Buraimi 168,328

Burqa 124

Bush, George H.w 345,419, 444

Bush, George w. 422

Caldeans (in Iraq) 67

Camp David agreements 54–55,164

and Al Saud reactions to 54

Carter Administration/Doctrine 269,356,360,393

Caspian Basin/Sea 98, 331,374, 407

Caucasus 213, 374

Central Asia

and economic and trade ties with Gulf states 373–374 and Islam 372–373

and petroleum 374

and transportation problems

Chechnya, Chechens 100, 101,376, 459

Chile 104

China 373,412,414

CNN [Cable News Network] 14,178,199

Cohen, William 408,445

Co-integration error-correction (of Saudi economy)

139–140

Committee for the Defence of Legitimate Rights

(CDLR) 335

Commonwealth 326

Cook, Robin 332

Cossack Brigade 34, 50

Cox, Sir Percy 238

Cuba 104

Curzon, Lord 356, 439

Dahuk (Iraq) 75

Damascus Declaration 222, 322

D’Amato, Alphonse 408

Dara al-Jazirah (Peninsula Shield) 318,321,401

Âl-Da‘wa Party 57,58,71,80

Democratic Republic of Yemen (DRY) 275, 299

Desert Shield, Operation 345, 444

Desert Storm, Operation 345, 357,444

Dhahran 118,119,122–23

Diri’yah 127

Diwaniyas 184

Dual containment 331,337, 357, 360, 400,408,415,420, 444

Dubai 113, 162, 163,164,285, 342,354,459, passim and Internet City 166

Duwaima Island 216

Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO) 370

Egypt 85,106,112, 113,114, 177,195, 266, 313, 400, 408, 429, passim and 1960s presence in Yemen 266–268

Ebadi, Shirin 22,23

Ebrahimi, Farshad 22, 23

Emami, said 15

Empty Quarter (Rub al-Khali-Saudi Arabia) 114, 220, 223.273

Eritrea 266,275

European Community 326, 329, 344,420

Eshkevari, Hassan Yusuf 5–6,9,22

Fadlallah, Muhammad Hussein 60

Fatimid dynasty (909–1171) 12

Fallahian,Ali 14,18

Fandy, Mamoun 99

Fasht al-Dibal 218, 234,320

Faysal I, King 84

Faysal, Ghazi bin 84, 85

Faysal, Toujan 199

Faw Peninsula 229

Ferghana Valley 373, 374

Fiqh (jurisprudence) 8

Firuzabadi, Hasan 46

Firuzkuh 23

Foran,John 107

France 89,412

Frederick the Great (1712–1786) 196

Front for the Liberation of South Yemen (FLOSY) 267

Al-Futuwwa [paramilitary Iraqi youth organization] 84

Fujairah 163,319

Ganji,Akbar 20,21,22,23

Gachsaran 23

General Congress Party (GCP) 295, 298

Germany 326,336

Al-Gharawi, Mirza Ali 59

Al-Ghashmi, Ahmed 269

Gibbon, Edward 90

Glaspie, April 227

Goldstone, Jack 97–98,107

Golpaygani, Ayatollah Mohammed Reza 3

Gorbachev, 25

Greece 10)1

Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) 95,116, 139, 140, 147

<right>
,442 ,432 ,407 213,216,270, 281,335, 356, 397و
</right>

451,456, passim

and 1971–1979 period 395–396

and 19801988 period 396–398

and 1988–1991 period 398–399

and Arab politics 322

and challenges and the lack of stability 401–403 and class structure 286—287

and confederation 315–316

Gulf Cooperation Council (continued)

and economic and oil policy trends 322 and external challenges 402 and elusive search for stability 400–401 and foreign policy trends 321

and future trends 322–323, 393–406 and impact of U.S. policies 351–363 and internal dynamics and foreign policies 313–323 and internal challenges 401–402 and internal security agreement (ISA) 315 and intra-member state ties 316–320

and outlook 402–403

and political evolution 313–323

and political institutions 304

and political participation 287–288 and post 1991 period 399–400 and pre-1971 period 394–395 and Shia communities 283–286

and structure 515–316

and trends in unity 288–291

GCC 289,400,408, 409,441

<right>
410 3 ;GCC
</right>

Gulf Security and the UAE vision of 383–392

Gulf States

and Britain 334340

and Commission for the Settlement of Disputes 232,234 and democratization 416–418 and disparity in energy resources and economic needs 433–434

and endurance 451460

and fate of monarchies 452—453

and internal pressures/arms sales 359 and institutions 303–311, 361, 404 and Iranian challenge 413–415

and Israel 420422

and link with Palestine 333–334 and militarization 359–360 and political tensions 360361

and population figures 177 and physical disparities 431–433 and regime competence 455–458 and regional stability 356–362 and sectarian differences 434–435 and security challenges 407–423

and territorial disputes 436–440

and ties with Arab World 358 and ties with Central Asian Republics 367–377 and ties with Russia 367–377

and unemployment 360 and US. policies 360, 418–420 and U.S./U.K. rivalries 330

Habermas,Jiirgen 197

Hafr al-Batin 401

Hajj 113, 117,428,435

Hajjarian, Said 15,19, 20

Al-Hajri, Abdallah 268

Halabja (Iraq) 59

Al-Hakim, Sayyid Mahdi 58

Al-Hakim, Sayyid Muhammad Baqir 60

Al-Hakim, Ayatollah Muhsin 57, 58, 6061, 74

Al-Hamdi, Ibrahim 269

Hanafi (doctrine) 372

Hanbali (doctrine) 306,318

Hanish islands 275, 276

Hashemi, Faezeh 18

Hashemite (monarchy in Iraq) 56

Hassan II, King of Morocco 206

Al-Hawali, Safar 200

Hawar islands 218,221, 232,234, 320, 328

Hezbollah, Ansar-e [Helpers of the Party of God] 15, 22, 338,435

Hejaz Province, Hejazis 100, 125

Henderson, Ian 344

Al-Hilli, Hussein 60

Hormuz, Straits of 276,285, 397, 413

Al-Humoud, Awad 186

Huraybi, Hassan 297

Hurd, Douglas 344

Husain, Sadiq Abdallah 298

Husain, Tawfiq 84

Hussein, Hujja Muhammad 59

Hussein, King (ofjordan) 437

Hussein, Qussay 72

Hussein, Saddam 55, 62, 67,68, 71,72, 73, 76–77,79, 81,

,336 83,86,87و 90, 102, 271,272,278,286, 332و

337,384, 395, 411,428, 446, passim

and expansion of Iraqi military power 88–89 and the Iranian Revolution 89–91 and the War for Kuwait 91–92

Ibadhi, Ibadhism 202–203, 285, 308, 454

Al-Idrisi,Ali 264

Al-Idrisi, Muhammad 264

Ikama 125

Image (in Saudi socio-political context) 111

Imam-ejome (Friday preachers) 4

incirlik, (Air Base-Turkey) 419

India 161–162,177,322,326

Indochina 101—102

International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) 243244

International Court ofjustice (ICJ) 218,220, 221,232, 239,317,320,360,387,412

International law, limitations of 226–229

International Monetary Fund (IMF) 135

Iran 68, 69, 73, 75, 80, 89, 90, 104,163,177,322و

passim

and 1997 presidential elections 194

and 2000 parliamentary elections 13–27 and Anglo-Soviet invasion of 1941 35 and Arab cultural rivalry 435–436 and Arab Gulf States 14, 427446

and armed forces 34 future outlook 47–50 and Bahrain 438–439

and law and order 42–43

and role of clergy in 38

and Central Asia 370–371

and civil-military relations 31–51

the first republic, 1979–1988, 37–39

the second republic, 1989—1996, 4043

the third republic 1997–2000,43–47 and clerical establishment 3–11 and Council of Guardians 4,13,17,18,21,23,25,26, and conservatives in 2000 elections 17–18, 21–26 and constitutional revolution 34 and constitutional theocracy 9 and debate on Islam, Fiqh and secularization 9–10 and democracy 3 and Executives 6, 17,18 19

and Expediency Council 26 and Majlis 13,14–15,16–17, 20,21, 23,26, 27, 48 and military affairs 31–51 and power of “Guide” 4 and press under Khatami 14 and putative defense cooperation with Saudi Arabia 126–127 and reformists in 2000 elections 18–19

and (1979) revolution 387

and role of clergy in politics 4–7 and role of press in 2000 elections 19–20 and Servants of Construction 16 and Sharjah Memorandum of Understanding 229–230 and Supreme Council of Armed Forces 37 and (new) theologians 9–10 and treaty of friendship with USSR 89 and ٢ل٨ط islands disputes 216–218,439–440

Iran Liberation Movement 16

Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988)31,38,41,59,71,91,226,

232,397, passim

Iraq 31,277, 428, 457, passim and 1990 invasion of Kuwait 272–274

and the Assyrian affair 84—86 and Baath Party role in civil military relations 86—88 and clergy 55–63

and domestic politics 65–82

and France 89

and General Intelligence Directorate 87 and ideology in military 83–84 and Jews 86

and Kurds 75,78, 81

and Kuwait boundary 219–220

and the military 70, 83–93, and ministry of endowments and religious affairs and non-aggression pact with Saudi Arabia 124 and “oil-for food” regime 332 and Royal Military Academy 86 and security apparatus 70–71 and Shia clergy 55–56 political activism of 56–58

population 78–81

and Shias of Iranian origin 71

and Soviet Union 89

and State relationships with ethnic communities 68–69 and Sunni elite 66

and Sunnis 55

and ulama 55

and weapons of mass destruction 242–243

and youth vanguards 87

as a landlocked country 227–228

Iraq-Kuwait boundary 240–242

Iraqi Communist Party 71,80, 85, 86, 87

Iraqi Islamic Party 61,81

Iraqi National Congress (INC) 69, 81

Irbil 75

Al-Iryani, Abdul Karim 273–274, 275, 278

Islam and democracy 194—195

Islamic Unity Movement [Harakat al-Wahda] 61

Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA) 45

Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps, see Revolutionary Guards

Ismail, Abdul Fattah 267294 ,292 و

Israel 86, 89,99, 112,275, 322, 338, 395, 408, 429, 457, passim

Jaafar, Ayatollah 59

Jala’ipur, Hamid-Reza 20

Jani,Yacoub 186

Jannati, Ayatollah 21

Jaradeh shoals 218,234,320

Jeddah 113, 119,185, 276

Jones, Stephen 214

Jordan 112, 119, 189, 429, 437

Kadivar,Jamileh 17

Kadivar, Mohsen 4–5, 8, 9,10,11,15, 17

Kamil, Hussein 332

Kant, Immanuel 197

Kar, Mehrangiz 22

Karbala 62,79,437

Karbaschi, Gholam Hosain 14,18

Al-Kassim, Faisal 197, 199

Kashani, Emami 9

Kazakhstan 373, 374

Kazim, Safian 199

Al Khalifah (Bahrain) 188, 225, 317,320, 435

لم٨ Khalifah, Hamad bin Isa 323,362

Al Khalifah, Isa bin Salman (1961’1999) 362

Al Khalifah, Salman bin Hamad 421

Khadmiya (Iraq) 79

Kha(ji 318

Khafus incident 219, 220, 317

Khamenei, Ayatollah Ali Hossein 3–4,5, 6,7,8, 14, 15, 16, 23, 24, 25,26, 41, 45, 46–47, 427

ALKhalili, Ahmad bin Hamad 202

Khalkhal, 23

Khalkhali, Mohammed Sadeq 6

Kharazi, Kamal 332

Kashmir, 459

Khatami, Ayatollah Mohammed 4–5, 6, 7, 10,13,15,17,

<right>

,331 ,286 ,46–47,48 ,43 ,37 ,25,26 ,24 18, 20, 21, 22و

</right>

384, 387, 409, 416, 427, passim

and presidency 13—16 and revolutionary guards 44–46 and 1999 visit to Saudi Arabia 429–430

Khatami, Reza 16

Khuzistan (Arabistan) 39, 431,433, 437–438

Khoeiniha, Mohammed 6

Khoi, Abdul Majid 59

Khoi, Ayatollah Abol-Qazem 4, 20, 58, 59, 60, 74

Khoi Foundation 59, 80

Khomeini, Ayatollah Ruhollah 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11,14, 16, 25, 36, 37, 39, 41,49, 80, 89, 104, 337, 370, 396, 427, 434, passim

Kirkuk (Iraq) 70, 79

Kirkpatrick,Jeane 103

Korea (North) 126

Kosovo 101–102

Kostiner,Joseph 104

Kurds 57,59,61,66,69,71,72, 92,passim and Failis 71

and insurgencies in Iran 38 and Johoosh (tribal leaders) 74

Kurdistan Democratic Party 91

Kuwait 84, 91,95354 ,281 ,195 417 ,409 ,360 ,و 101, 102و 106, 139, 173و, passim

and economic dependence 179

and integration in global economies 181–182

and internal constraints 177–190

and Iraq border problem 237–245 and Islamists 185–186

and “liberation” cost 179–180

and nationalist consciousness 180–181

and parliament (National Assembly) 185, 305–306, 460

and political crises 184

and political institutions 304307

and political reforms 185–187

and prisoners/missing persons in 1991 War 243–244 and relations with Bahrain 319

Kuwait (continuedj

and relations with Oman 318

and relations with Qatar 318–319

and relations with UAE 318

and tribal factors in political life 305–306

Lankarani, Fazel 6, 8

League of Arab States 237,242–243, 245, 268, 272, 322,

430,442, passim

and military intervention in Kuwait 238–239

Lebanon 71,314

Libya 104,164

Lingah 162

Liwa 168

Lomperis, Timothy 102

Loujian, Khalifa 186

Luce, Sir William 225,238

Maadan (Iraq) 69

Maarib 294

Madinah 11 3126,264,434,435 ,117,121 و

Magid, Esmat Abdul 244

Maidan Saleh 121,122

Al-Majid,Ali Hassan 91

Al-Majid, Husayn Kamil 91

Al Makhtoum 163

Al Makhtoum, Rashid bin Said 163

Makkah 113,117,121, 264, 355,356, 368,435

Malaysia 155

Malek, Reda 199

Marja’e, Marja’, Marjal al-taqlid, Marja‘iyya [Imitation,

Imitator] 7, 55, 57, 58, 60, 79, 81, passim

Al Masaari, Muhammad 335

Mashad 17,49,60

Mat’ams (in Kuwait) 184

MBC (Middle East Broadcast Corporation) 200

Media in the Arab world 193–195

Meshkhani,Ali Akbar 9

Militant Clerics Association 5

Minbar 205

MohajeranAtaollah 13,15

Mohtashemi, Ali Akbar 6

Montazeri, Hossein Ali 6, 720 ,8 و

Morocco 112,195,206

Mossadeq, Mohammed 35, 327, 328,337, 363, 394, 415

Mosul (Iraq) 70,79, 238

Mottahari, Morteza 11

Movahedi-Kermani, Mohammad Ah 17

Al-Mudarris, Abdul Karim 60

Musavi, Mir Hossein 4

Muscat 195

Muslim Brotherhood 56, 57, 58,306

Muslim Brotherhood (in Iraq) 61, 62

MuslimWorld League 137,163

Mutawwa (“morals” security forces in Saudi Arabia) 122

Muthanna Club 84

Muwahiddun (Wahhabis) 318

Nafisi, Abdallah 200

Al Nahyan 162, 327

Al Nahyan, Shaykha Fatima bint Mubarak 173

Al Nahyan, Sultan bin Zayed bin Sultan 408,410

Al Nahyan, Zayed bin Sultan 163,164,168, 173,318,

327, 383, 387,391,445, passim

Najaf (Iraq) 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 74,79,437

Al-Najafi, Bashir Hussein 59

Najran Province 265

Al-Naqeeb, Khaldoun 178

Nasriyah (Iraq) 59

Nasser, Gamal Abdel 106, 266,303, 432441 و

Nateq Nouri, Ayatollah 6,43, 416

Netanyahu, Benjamin 429

Nicaragua 104

Nouri,Abdollah 10,14,17, 19,23

Nouri, Ali Reza 17

Oman, Sultanate of 95,101,139, 173, 195,273, 281,360, 443, passim

and consultative council 307–309, 460

and Dhuffar/Dhuffari rebellion 443 and gender factors in Shura council 308

and information and authority 193–207

and mass higher education, language and community

195–96

and political authority 205

and relations with Bahrain 319

and relations with Israel 361

and relations with Qatar 319

and relations with UAE 319

and religious and political expression 201–204,308 and state consultative council 205,304 and tribal factors 308

and UAE border accord 219

The Opposition Direction 197, 199,200

Orbit Communications 199

Organization of African Unity (OAU) 232

Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC) 270 and 1997 Teheran Summit 14,427

Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) 88,126,434

Oslo Accords 183

Ottoman Empire 56,347

and succession patterns 12—13

and Iraq 66

Pahlavi, 31,34,38, 50

and Mohammed Reza Shah 3389,105 ,51 و 37-38و,

206,228, 282,328, 355, 393, 394, 415, 437, passim

and role in Iranian military 35–36 and Reza Shah, 32–33,3435, 50,328, 336

Pakistan 31, 270,322,459

Palestine 73442 ,338 ,330 ,84,86 و

Palestine Liberation Organization 420

Palestinian National Authority 200

Parsons, Sir Anthony 329

Pasdaran, see Revolutionary Guards

Pastor, Robert 104

Patriotic Union of Kurdistan 71,91

People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) 268,

269,270,281,295,395, 443,passim

and Communist Party 267

Peres, Shimon 421

Persia, Persians 38206 و

Philippines 104, 125

Pickering, Thomas 227

Portsmouth Treaty 85

Prescott, Victor 214

Qaboos, Sultan of Oman 282, 298, 303,307, 327,357,

400, passim

Qaboos, Sultan (University) 195,202

Qajar 34,224,336

Qat 295

Al-Qatabi,Abdallah 308

Qatar 95, 163,173,281,360, 409,430, passim and censorship 195

and consultative council 310311

and information and authority 193–207

and mass higher education, language and community 195–96

and ministry of information 195

and relations with Bahrain 319–320

and relations with Israel 361

and relations with UAE 320

and satellite television 196–201

Al-Qaradawi, Yusuf 199

Qassem (Qasim), Abdul Karim 86, 239,441

Al Qasimi,Al Qawasim, 163,219, 224

Al Qasimi, Khaled bin Saqr 417

Qazvin 42, 49

Qom, 45, 46, 60, 79,368

Qomi, Ayatollah Mohammed Tabatabai 3–4,7

Al-Rabi’i, Abdul Razzaq 60

Rabin, Itzhak 429

Rafiqdoust, Mohsen, 46

Rafsanjani, Ali Akbar Hashemi 4, 6,16, 18, 20, 23,25, 37, 39,42–43,286, 428, 434, passim

Rahami, Mohsen 22, 23

Rahimi, Azizollah Amir 43

Ramadan, Taha Yasin 87

Ramadi (Iraq) 61

Ras al-Khaimah 163,166,219,224,319,373,417,439, passim

Al Rasheed 335

Red Sea 114,116,119

Regression analysis (of Saudi economy) 131–158

Representation (in Saudi socio-political context) 111,

Republican Guards (Iraq) 74, 91–92

(Special) Republican Guards (Iraq) 92

Revival Movement [Harakat al-Nahda] 61

Revolutionary Command Council (RCC-Iraq) 87

Revolutionary Guards [Iran], 14,15,17,18,19, 20,21,

24,25, 26, 38,39, 4444,46,47, 49, passim

and corporate interests 40–42

Rezai, Mohsen 18,40,44

Rida, Hujja Muhammad 59

Riyadh 119

Rouhani, Sadegh 438

Royal Military Academy (Sandhurst) 335

Royal Saudi Air Force (RSAF) 105, 149

Royal United Services Institute (RUSI) 332

Rub al-Khali. See Empty Quarter

Ruhani, Hasan 17

Al-Rumaihi, Muhammad

Al-Rumailah oil field 411

Rushdie, Salman 6,14,330, 337

Russia, Russians 100

Al Sabah (Kuwait) 186,284,289,318,322, passim

ʌJ Sabah, Saad Abdallah Salim 430

Al Sabah, Sabah al-Ahmad 186

Sabians (in Iraq) 67

Al-Sadr, bint al-Huda 58, 89

Ai-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir 57, 58,74, 79, 89

Ai-Sadr, Sadiq 59,60

Safari, Latif 21

Safavi, Rahim 15,44

Al-Sahlani,Ali 59

Al Said, Said bin Taymur 454

Al-Said, Nouri 8485 و

Salafiyah Movement 284, 306

Saleh,Ali Abdallah 269,271,274,276,277,278,291–292,

298,317, passim

Sallal, Abdallah 267

Sanaa 216,294

Sanabani,Ali Mahdi 292

Sanabani, Muhammad 292

Sana’y, Youssof 6, 10

Al-Saqr,Jasim 186

Al Saud 98,107,119,277

Al Saud, Abdallah bin Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman (Heir Apparent) 14,115,234,286, 422, 427, passim

Al Saud, Abdul Aziz bin Abdul Rahman (King 1932–1954) 98, 119,126,264, 303,304,309,327, 336,347,452, passim

Al Saud, Bandar bin Khaled 114

Al Saud, Fahd bin Abdul Aziz (King 1982·) 114,273, 304, 309,344,411,431, passim

Al Saud, Naif bin Abdul Aziz 276, 429,446

Al Saud, Saud bin Abdul Aziz (King 1954–1964) 309

Al Saud, Saud bin Faysal bin Abdul Aziz 286

Al Saud, Sultan bin Abdul Aziz (Defense Minister) 116, 276,429, passim

Al Saud, Sultan bin Salman 116,120

Saudi Arabia, 193,199,203,234,269,275,277,281,292, 396,409, 434, passim and agriculture 142–143

and Central Asia 370–371

and clean tourism 114

and construction 144–145

and conservative forces 309

and consultative council 103, 309–310, 460

and consumption 153

and defense expenditures 132–139

and economy 131–158

and electricity, gas, and water 145–146 and expatriate workers 120,125 and financial sector 146–147

and global capitalism 111–113 and Gulf region (leadership role in) 351 and investments 152–153

and liberal factors 309

and minerals and mining 144 and “muddy edges” of controlled tourism 121–125 and National Guard 106 and national identity 111—113

and national museum 119–120 and non-oil development issues 139–140 and non-oil manufacturing 143–144

and oil boom 131–158

and opposition forces 98–107,114 and patterns of growth and expenditures 132–139

and photography 122–123

and private expenditures 148–153 and regional factor in Shura 310

and relations with Bahrain 317

and relations with Oman 317–318

and relations with Qatar 317

and relations with UAE 316–317

and relations with Yemen 263–278 and religious factor in Shura 310 and “rentier” state 131,158 and role of military in future uprising’s 105–107

and role of women 120,124125

and role in 1994 Yemen civil war 275 and security issues 123–124 and service sector 147–148

and State breakdown 96–98 and susceptibility to revolution 95–107 and tourism 111—128

and tourism itineraries 119–121

and tourism monopoly 125—126 and transportation and communications 146 and wholesale and retail trade 145

Saudi Arabia (continued)

and Yemen border dispute 214–216

SAVAK 36

Al-Sawaf, Muhammad Mahmud 57, 58

Schutz, Alfred 201

Schwarzkopf, Norman 356

Serbs 100

Shabestari, Mohsen Mojtahed 5–6, 9, 10

Shamkani,Ali 413

Shariah (Islamic) law 418

Shariat-Madari, Ayatollah Mohammed Qazem 3, 7

Sharjah 163,164, 166, 219, 224, 319, passim and 1971 Memorandum of Understanding with Iran

2299

Sharon, Ariel 422

Shatt al-Arab 90, 213, 218,226, 227, 228–229, 234,339و

355,397,399,437

Shaybah (UAE-Saudi Arabia border oil fields) 223, 294

Al Shaykh family, 15,35, 84

Al Shaykh, Saleh bin Abdul Aziz bin Muhammad bin

Ibrahim 35

Shawkat, Sami 84

Shia 104, 181,203, 455, passim and clergy (in Iran) 5 and riots in Saudi Arabia 355

Shiraz 17,49

Shirazi, Sayyid Hassan 58

Shirazi, Makarem 8

Shura, 55

Sidqi, Bakr 84,85

Singapore 155,459

Sirri island 225

Sistani, Ayatollah Ali 55,60,79

Society of Militant Clerics 16

Soroush Abdul-Karim 8,11

Soviet Union 25, 35, 268, 326, 336,428, passim and role in Yemen 268—269

Stockpol, Theda 96–98

Sudan 104

Al-Sudayri, Salman 116

Suhaili, Turki 200

Sulaymaniah 75

Sunni 181, passim

Sunni-Shia factor (in Kuwaiti politics) 306, passim

Sunni clergy 55

Supreme Council of the Islamic Resistance in Iraq

(SCIRI) 61,80

Syria 339,400,408

Tabatabai, Sayyid Zia 34

Taif, 1934 Treaty of214, 229,230, 264–266,274

Tajikistan 371

Talabani 74, 75

Taleban 47,126,376

Taleqani, Mahmud 8

Tammuz 1 (Osiraq nuclear reactor) 89

Teheran 17,49

Teheran Militant Clergy 5

Teheran University 19, 23

Thatcher, Margaret 324

Al Thani (Qatar) 196,285, 327

Al Thani, Hamad bin Khalifah 196, 310,320,421, passim

Tikrit 61,67,86

Al-Tikriti, Usama 61

Tilly, Charles 99

Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons 244, 421

Tunb Islands (UAE) 216,225, 316,319, 353, 363, 387,

394, 409, 427,439, 440, passim

Al-Turabi, Hassan 200

Turkey, 31, 69, 75, 331, 339,429, passim

Turkmenistan 374

and leadership 375

Turkomans (in Iraq) 67, 79

Ulama (plural of‘alim-religious scholar), 55, 58,200,202, 286, passim

‘Ulum, Bahr Al-(family) 59

‘Ulum,Bahr Al-,Ayatollah Mahdi 61

‘Ulum, Bahr Al-, Muhammad 61

Umrah (minor pilgrimage) 117

Umm Qasr (Iraq) 227,228

Umm al-Qiwain 163, 319

United Arab Emirates (164,273,281 ,95,139,140 (427 ,383 ,345,373 ,تلهلآ, passim

and birth of 163–164

and British rule 161–163,351 and defense policy 390

and economic development 164–169

and education 170

and Federal National Council (FNC) 165,173 and foreign policy 391

and GCC alliance 386

and intentions in Gulf region 385–386 and Iran 386387

and Iraq 387–388

and islands disputes 216–218 and Jabal Ali Free Zone 166,167

and role of women 172–173

and Palestinian Question 388–389 and Saadiyat Free Zone 166

and social development 169–173 and social and economic policies 161–174

and strategic aims 384–389

and territorial disputes 412

and vision for Gulf security 389–391

and Western powers 388–389

United Kingdom [Britain] 35, passim and arms trade with Gulf states 344–346 and foreign policy in Gulf 325–334, 329–330 and legacy in Gulf region 352–354 and policy differences with 5.J. over Iran 330–332 and policy similarities with U.S. over Iraq 332–333 and relations with Gulf States 325–347

and role in Bahrain 361–362 and role in Gulf boundary disputes 224–229 and triple containment policy 353

United Nations Development Program (UNDP) 296

United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation

Commission 220, 228–229, 234,237

United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection (UNMOVIC) 333

United Nations Security Council 223, 239,345,411

and Resolution 687 240, 243, 245–253 (text)

and Resolution 1284 242–243,253–260 (text), 333

United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) 92

United States, passim and Fifth Fleet 419, 439, 444

and Gulf policies 418–420

and policy perceptions in Gulf region 357–358 and presence in Gulf (1971–1990) 354–356

and “Twin Pillar” policy 355–356,360, 410

United States Central Command (USCENTCOM) 356

Uzbekistan 373,374

Va’ezain, Mashallah Shams ol- 21

Velayat-e Faqih (Rule of the Jurisconsult) 3, 6, 7–9

Velayat-e Motlaq-e Faqih (Absolute Rule of the Jurist) 8

Velayati,Ali Akbar 4, 440

Versailles 881

Vietnam 102

Al-Wandawi, Munir 86

War for Kuwait

and socio-political implications 183

Warbah island (Kuwait) 227, 228

Western European Union (WEU) 344

Wickham-Crowley, Timothy 105

Wilson, Harold 394

World Bank 147

World Trade Organization (WTO) 111, 154, 404

Wright, Sir David 341

Yahyah, Imam of Yemen 264–165

Al-Yamamah (arms program) 333,340–342,345

Yanbu 116

Yazdi, Misbahi 9,11

Yazidis 67

Yemen, Republic of 177, 206, passim and 1990 unification 271–172, 291–299 and 1994 civil war 214, 274—277 and fate of its expatriate workers 272—273 and impact of oil 271 and impact of War for Kuwait 271—274 and relations with Saudi Arabia 263–278 and ties with Israel 277

Yemen, Arab Republic 106, 266, 270, 281, passim

and 1962 revolution 266–271

and political stability 297–299

Yemen Socialist Party (YSP) 294,298

Zadeh, Mohsen Said 5, 9, 10

Zahedan 49

Zibakalam, Sadeq 20

Zubarah 218,225,234,320

</biblio>

* [About the Author]

JOSEPH A. KECHICHIAN is the CEO of Kechichian & Associates, LLC, and a fellow at the Gustav E. von Grunebaum Center for Near East Studies, University of California, Los Angeles. He published Oman and the World: The Emergence of an Independent Foreign Policy (1995), edited A Century in Thirty Tears: Shaykh Zayed and the United Arab Emirates, (2000), as well as Succession in Saudi Arabia (Palgrave, 2000). A contributor to various periodicals, his essays have been published Middle East Policy, The Middle East journal, Middle East Insight, The journal of Developing Societies, Conflict, Conflict Quarterly, The Muslim World, The Journal of South Asian and Middle Eastern Studies, The International journal of Middle East Stuadies, and Third World Quarterly, among others. He regularly writes for the Paris-based Arabics Trends.

#title The Public Sphere in Muslim Societies

#author Miriam Hoexter, Shmuel N. Eisenstadt & Nehemia Levtzion

#date 2002

#source <[[https://archive.org/details/publicsphereinmu0000unse] [archive.org/details/publicsphereinmu0000unse]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-23T16:07:41

#authors Dale F. Eickelman, Shmuel N. Eisenstadt, Daphna Ephrat, Haim Gerber, Miriam Hoexter, Nimrod Hurvitz, Aharon Layish, Nehemia Levtzion, Daniella Talmon-Heller

#topics Politics, Philosophy, Anthropology

#publisher State University of New York Press

#isbn 9780791453681

#cover m-h-miriam-hoexter-shmuel-n-eisenstadt-nehemia-lev-4.jpg

#DELETED x

#notes Book Series: SUNY Series in Near Eastern Studies. Arabic text hasn’t faired well in the PDF conversion and so would need checking over.

 [Front Matter]

 [Book Series Title Page]

SUNY series in Near Eastern Studies

Said Amir Arjomand

editor

 [Book Title Page]

The Public Sphere

in Muslim Societies

Miriam Hoexter, Shmuel N. Eisenstadt,

Nehemia Levtzion

Editors

STATE UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK PRESS

THE VAN LEER JERUSALEM INSTITUTE

 [Copyright]

Published by

State University of New York Press, Albany

© 2002 State University of New York

All rights reserved

Printed in the United States of America

No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission. No part of this book may be stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means including electronic, electrostatic, magnetic tape, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise without the prior permission in writing of the publisher.

For information, address

State University of New York Press,

90 State Street, Suite 700, Albany, NY 12207

Production, Laurie Searl

Marketing, Anne M. Valentine

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The public sphere in Muslim societies / edited by Miriam Hoexter, Shmuel N.

Eisenstadt, Nehemia Levtzion.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-7914-5367-7 (alk. paper) — ISBN 0-7914-5368-5 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Islam and state. 2. Islam and justice. 3. Sociology, Islamic. 4. Islam—Essence, genius, nature. I. Hoexter, Miriam. II. Eisenstadt, S. N. (Shmuel Noah), 1923-III.

Levtzion, Nehemia.

BP173.6 .P83 2002

306’.0917’671—dc21

<right>

2002021111

</right>

10987654321

 Contents

Acknowledgments vii

Note on Transliteration ix

Foreword: The Religious Public Sphere

in Early Muslim Societies 1

Dale F. Eickelman

Introduction 9

Miriam Hoexter and Nehemia Levtzion

1 The MIHNA (Inquisition) and the Public Sphere 17

Nimrod Hurvitz

2 Religious Leadership and Associations in the Public Sphere of Seljuk Baghdad 31

Daphna Ephrat

3 Religion in the Public Sphere: Rulers, Scholars, and Commoners in Syria under Zangid and Ayyubid Rule (1150–1260) 49

Daniella Talmon-Heller

4The Public Sphere and Civil Society in the Ottoman Empire 65

Haim Gerber

5The QA’DI ‘‘S Role in the Islamization of Sedentary Tribal Society 83

Aharon Layish

6The Dynamics of Sufi Brotherhoods 109

Nehemia Levtzion

7The WAQF and the Public Sphere 119

Miriam Hoexter

8 Concluding Remarks: Public Sphere, Civil Society, and Political Dynamics in Islamic Societies 139

Shmuel N. Eisenstadt

Works Cited 163

List of Contributors 185

Index 187

 Acknowledgments

The present volume is the outcome of a two-year workshop held at the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute, as part of a program on “Collective Identity, Public Sphere, and Political Order,” under the auspices of the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute, the Swedish Collegium for Advanced Study in the Social Sciences in Uppsala, and the Max Weber Kolleg at Erfurt University.

The papers elaborated at the workshop were presented in their final form at an international conference held at the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute in October 1997. The participants of the workshop were joined at this conference by Professor Ellis Goldberg of the Center of International Studies, Princeton University, Professor Dale F. Eickelman of Dartmouth College, Professor Wolfgang Schluchter of the Max Weber Centre for Cultural and Social Study, Erfurt University and Heidelberg University, and Professor Bjorn Wittrock of the Swedish Collegium for Advanced Study in the Social Sciences in Uppsala.

The editors are grateful to the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute, and to its director, Dr. Shimshon Zelniker, for hosting the workshop. The Institute also covered the language editing and secretarial expenses connected with the production of the manuscript. A special note of appreciation goes to Evelyn Katrak, the language editor, to Sara Soreni, director of publications, and to Esther Rosenfeld for overseeing the preparation of the diskettes.

 Note on Transliteration

As the book is intended for a wide audience, including non-Middle East and Islam specialists, we used minimal transliteration for Arabic names and terms. All Arabic terms appear in italics, ‘ is used for the Arabic letter ‘ayn and ‘ for hamza. No sub- or superscripts are used, except in Aharon Layish’s essay, where full diacritical transliteration is required because of the legal nature of the text. Turkish words and names were usually transliterated according to the system used in modern Turkish.

 Foreword: The Religious Public Sphere in Early Muslim Societies

DALE F. EICKELMAN

The search for distinctive public spheres in premodern Muslim majority societies is a relatively recent undertaking. Until recently, historians and social theorists alike were deflected from considering such a possibility by conventional assumptions concerning the characteristics of “traditional” societies in general, and Muslim societies in particular. The contributors to this volume argue that “traditional” Muslim society had diverse and changing varieties of public spheres, the manifestations of which have been as far-ranging as the ideas and expression of Islamic civilization itself.

So pervasive was the impact of the early or “classical” formulations of modernization theory from the 1950s until the 1970s that they blocked more nuanced social and historical thought about the nature of the religious, educational, social, and economic structures in “premodern” societies. Thus, one leading modernization theorist in the 1960s saw the Muslim world as facing an unpalatable choice between a “neo-Islamic totalitarianism” intent on “resurrecting the past” or a “reformist Islam” that would open “the sluice gates and [be] swamped by the deluge.”[1] In the late 1970s, assumptions about Islam’s role in the development process remained similarly unnuanced: “In an industrializing nation, the gap between political and religious authority ... becomes progressively greater,” whereas “Islamic influence and control are strongest when maintaining the status quo in a backward community.”[2] Such ideas have retained their vigor in some circles. In Ernest Gellner’s Conditions of Liberty, the last book published during his lifetime, he reiterated his long-standing convictions about “Muslim society.” He preferred the single, society, to the plural, societies, in writing about Islam because he regarded Islam as imposing “essential” constraints on the conduct and thought of those committed to it.[3]

Modernization theory framed not only the work of social theorists but also blocked historians from imagining the possibility that “traditional” empires, societies, and religious formations could be as dynamic as their presumed “modern” counterparts. Thus, in both popular thought and in many historical analyses, a prevalent negative view of the possibilities of evolution of the Ottoman Empire discouraged consideration of possible continuities between the religious empire and the ensuing secular republic. Few considered the possibility that the former, even though demonized by early modernizers, may have contained many of the seeds for the development of the latter. Recent studies of the dynamics and demographics of Ottoman households, for example, show significant and gradually evolving continuities in the transition from empire to nation. There was no sharp break as asserted by reformers such as Mustafa Kemal Atatirk (1881–1938) and those influenced by the implicit and explicit assumptions of modernization theory.[4]

The notion of the public sphere, much like the narrower but more pervasive concept of civil society, reemerged as a key concept only in the past decade.[5] Some social theorists trace its origins to the eighteenth century. In Immanuel Kant’s essay on the Enlightenment, for example, the notion of “public” is represented by the words of a writer appearing before readers independent of authoritative intermediaries such as preachers, judges, and rulers. “Public” thoughts and ideas presented in this manner are thus judged on their own merits. Implicit in this notion is the idea of a public space separate from both the formal structures of religious and political authority and the space of households and kin.[6] The notion is closely associated with the work of Jirgen Habermas, although his development of the idea is largely based on European societies and in the eyes of many is linked to the emergence of a certain form of bourgeois society and the “rational-critical” discourse possible within it.[7]

Habermas’s approach to understanding the idea of the public sphere is closely tied to developments in Europe since the early sixteenth century. More directly useful for understanding the public sphere in other regions of the world—including premodern Muslim societies—is the approach of Eisenstadt and Schluchter.[8] In developing the notion of early modernities—note Eisenstadt and Schluchter’s use of the plural—they stress that culture is created, contested, and in flux for both “traditional” and modern societies. Societies and civilizations develop not autonomously, but through a “continuous interaction between the cultural codes of these societies and their exposure to new internal and external challenges.”

Such an idea is not entirely novel. Eisenstadt and Schluchter note that Max Weber's discussion of the role of sects in generating heterodoxies and movements of protest took account of the tensions internal and external to given social settings that gave rise to new cultural interpretations and practices. This understanding of the dynamics of "traditional" societies fits well with contemporary understandings of "classical" Muslim civilization. For example, a recent majesterial study of urban forms in Islamic countries argues that the urban process during the first four Islamic centuries was one of "adaptation and accretion rather than creation." This process resulted in highly complex and diverse forms generally adapted from preexisting Hellenic-Byzantine, Iranian, and other traditions.[9]

Nimrod Hurvitz (this volume) offers a strong historical analysis of a key incident in early Islamic history, the inquisition (mihna) of 833–848. His analysis foregrounds the contours of a religious public sphere. Hurvitz reminds us in the process that the existence of a religious public sphere involves not only a struggle over people's imaginations, but a contest over boundaries—in this case between the ruler and his subjects. In the fifteen years of the mihna, four successive caliphs supporting the scholastic theologians' faction among the 'ulama', decreed that Muslims had to accept the belief that the Qur'an was created in spite of intensely held popular support for the traditionalist view that it had always existed. This authoritarian imposition of doctrine through state violence and torture met fierce resistance and the effort was abandoned after 848. The result was to enlarge the space in which 'ulama' defined religious doctrine and set limits to a field of public action in which subsequent caliphs and other temporal rulers intervened only with caution, but generally left alone.

Hurvitz's narrative points to the existence of a religious public sphere offering a wide-ranging flow of "discursive social action" in which all members of the social community continuously observed one another, enforcing orthodoxy through informal consensus and an informal shared hierarchy of leaders of influence. The mihna sought to destroy the shared understandings and expectations of this religious public sphere but in the end failed to do so. As in the Buyid dynasty of tenth- and eleventh-century Iran and Iraq, recurring crises of royal authority coexisted with economic prosperity and an orderly social life made possible by shared understandings of trust, loyalty, and patronage. These understandings and networks of obligations implied a moral order distinct from state or royal authority that extended beyond the bonds of family, tribe, and loyalty.[10] These networks of obligations and their associated moral order imply the existence of a public sphere that is stable, but not static. This public sphere offered a framework for discourse and practice beyond shared households and immediate localities, and facilitated discussions of the common good and of boundaries of inclusion and exclusion. Similar arguments can be made for Cairo as depicted in the Geniza documents[11] and for the informal understandings and shared sense of community based on religious learning as portrayed by Michael Chamberlain for medieval Damascus.[12]

Daphna Ephrat’s account of Seljuk Baghdad (this volume) also points to the existence of a religious public sphere in which a diversity of communities participated. This sphere was defined by the participation of Sufi orders, khanqahs, and intertwined networks of madrasas and madhhabs at the intersections of religious, political, and social life, largely distinct from formal, state-controlled institutions, and capable of maintaining the social order and preserving stability.

The network of understandings she describes was fixed and enduring in overall structure, but not without creative and occasional destructive tensions. The various madhhabs varied in their internal coherence and organization, and relation to political authority. In general, however, she argues that rulers refrained from taking a stand in theological controversies among the various schools and factions, intervening only when such disputes led to public disturbances. By the end of the eleventh century, inter-madhhab rivalries weakened, and the religious elite informally combined to set the tone for the public order. By the end of the twelfth century, however, Sufi orders began to replace the madhhabs in providing a pervasive framework for communal action and social affiliations, often cutting across ties of language, community, and class.

Both the madhhabs and the Sufi orders shared a common element. Ephrat writes of the “informality” of the traditions of learning and the enduring ties between masters and disciples in both institutions as a key to understanding how social action was legitimated. In a parallel fashion, Daniella Talmon-Heller (this volume) explores patterns of leadership within the Hanbali community in Syria under the Zangids and Ayyubids. In her case, the direct evidence for “popular” religious understandings and the full extent of understandings and practices in the public sphere is uncertain. Yet her account of the Hanbali community is made all the more dynamic and vivid by a fresh exploration of the available evidence.

The new approach she takes reminds me of a conversation in the early 1980s with Peter Brown, the historian of early Latin Christianity. I mentioned how surprised I was to find references in his Cult of the Saints to Moroccan saint cults of the twentieth century.[13] He replied that his reading of these ethnographic texts stimulated him to look in new ways at the sparse and often recondite evidence available to him for early Christianity. Similarly, the idea of the public sphere—in this case a religious public sphere—has allowed historians of premodern Muslim societies to make better sense of the underlying social and normative patterns embedded in often difficult source material.

The significance of “informal” ties for creating a stable religious public sphere becomes more salient when the concept of “institution” is taken at its root meaning—an accepted and socially legitimated means of accomplishing a task—rather than as a formal, chartered group “authorized” by some central authority. Seen in this light, the ties between master and disciple acquire a substance and concreteness as basic as that exemplified by such legally recognized institutions as waqfs or madrasas. In this respect, anthropologist Abdel- lah Hammoudi argues that the master-student tie in Sufism serves as the key metaphor and practice by which authority is legitimated throughout the Arab world in general, and Morocco in particular, to the present, notwithstanding the formal trappings of parliamentary and other representative institutions.[14]

Emendations and additions to the purportedly invariant and complete shari’a have occurred throughout Islamic history, particularly since the midnineteenth century. Muslim jurists have rigorously maintained the pious fiction that there can be no change in divinely revealed law, even as they have exercised their independent reasoning (ijtihad) to create a kind of de facto legislation.[15] In practice, however, this "independent" judgment was linked to a community of juridical peers and the shared norms and understandings of the community. As Haim Gerber (this volume) says of the public sphere in Ottoman society, the shari'a as practiced varied considerably from locality to locality because of these local understandings and judges, although appointed by the ruler, operated in a manner that was free from the intervention of the central government. Moreover, qadis exercised an influence that ranged beyond the shari'a itself, and could appeal to the whole of Islamic history and to popular usage to enforce an Islamic moral order as locally understood. Guilds, although recognized by the Ottoman administration, similarly operated in an autonomous manner, punishing infractions by their members, defining acceptable practice, and settling disputes. Pious foundations (awqaf) enjoyed a similar autonomy.

Aharon Layish's description of the role of the qadi in the process of sedentarization in modern Libya and the Judean desert shows structural parallels to Gerber's account. Again, he stresses that the shari'a as practiced developed outside the control of the ruler. Qadis were enjoined to enforce a codified statutory law—in the Judean desert: the Ottoman Family Rights Law of 1917, the Jordanian family laws of 1951 and 1976; and in Libya from 1972 onward, when the first codification of the law of personal status took place. Nonetheless, qadis still had a measure of autonomy with regard to noncodified elements of the shari'a, especially in matters of marriage and divorce. The contexts described by Layish are ones in which the implicit assumption is that tribal practice is removed considerably from the shari'a. Qadis in practice used their own discretion to bridge shari'a and social reality. Although this bridging is more pronounced in tribal settings such as Libya and Judea, qadis in settings as distinct as urban Saudi Arabia and Iran (where, however, judges apply a codified family law) employ a similar discretion.[16] Layish's discussion suggests that the role of qadi is a central one in creating a public sphere in a tribal society, and that the public sphere has expanded with Islamization since the nineteenth century. Qadis are appointed by the state, but they have a moral autonomy and their legitimacy in the eyes of the public is based on the perception that they operate in an autonomous sphere.

The complementary discussions by Nehemia Levtzion on Sufi orders and Miriam Hoexter (this volume) on waqf indicate the new ways in which historical evidence is analyzed in light of concepts such as the public sphere. Levtzion argues that in the eleventh century the roles of Sufi shaykh and shari'a scholar began to be seen as compatible. In some respects, the synthesis that he describes echoes Peter Brown's account of saints in early Latin Christianity.[17] Levtzion reminds us that beliefs held by the elite are significantly constrained by popularly prevailing ones—a point also raised in Hurvitz's discussion of the mihna and, more particularly, in Talmon-Heller's description of the role played by the general public in shaping religious practices.

In a masterful account that traces the changing form of Sufism over the centuries, Levtzion indicates how Sufi shaykhs and Sufi orders mobilized popular support, operating variously as a source of stability, as an outlet for personal and collective grievances, and as a means of articulating social and religious norms. For some, this pervasive popularity constituted a betrayal of the spiritual promise of Sufism. The late Fazlur Rahman went so far as to say that the popular mystical understandings of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries gave rise to charlatans and "spiritual delinquents."[18] Levtzion describes the major shifts of some Sufi orders toward more formal and hierarchical organization in the eighteenth century, allowing some orders to serve as vehicles for social and political change.

Notwithstanding these transformations, the common element in Sufi organizations before and after the "watershed" transformations of the eighteenth century was the tenacity of the master-disciple relationship and its potential for legitimating wider various forms of religious and political authority. As Levtzion emphasizes, Sufi orders reached out to a variety of constituencies— traders, townspeople, peasants, and people of varying social classes, regions, and economic condition—using not only madrasa Arabic but also the vernacular languages of the region. Ruling authorities were often deeply suspicious of the orders because of their autonomy and capacity for independent action, linking the local with much wider spheres of influence. In a remarkably parallel fashion, Vincent Cornell’s work on sainthood in Morocco similarly indicates how saints or “pious ones” (salihun) involved not only a closeness to the Divine presence (walaya) but also the exercise of worldly authority (wilaya). Saints embodied a just moral order, and both in action and as cultural metaphors set limits to the abuse of authority and contributed to the creation of Morocco’s sharifian state.[19]

Finally, Miriam Hoexter’s analysis of waqf suggests how this pervasive institution was multifaceted and voluntary, creating a public space that was independent from that of state authority. Her useful review of trends in waqf studies in recent years indicates their multiple dimensions for understanding everything from gender roles to the creation of public space, affirming a space for social and economic action situated between households and the ruling sphere alike and generating revenues to sustain autonomous institutions.[20]

One interesting issue that her study delineates is the pervasiveness of a tacit bargaining between rulers and society, generally but not exclusively through the ‘ulama’. “Tacit bargaining” in this case does not mean a direct ongoing contest between rulers and ruled, but a recognition of the widespread popular support for waqf as an institution and the implicit limits that it placed on the scope of royal authority. As Hoexter explains, rulers were major donors and used awqaf as an instrument of public policy. However, because of the rules of the institution, the ownership of endowed assets was withdrawn from the donor and placed (according to the Hanafis) in God. The rule of inalienability, the necessity to secure the authorization of a qadi for any transactions in waqf property (such as exchanges or long-term deals), and the community’s vested interest in the institutions created by endowments gave rise to a continuous discourse, or tacit bargaining, between rulers and society. The administration of the largest endowments was controlled by the state, but even the state was subject to scrutiny and moral approbation.

Because of the proliferation of endowments and their prominence in the public space, this implicit discourse, or tacit bargaining, formed a major element of the public sphere. Much of this discourse was instigated by the community and the solution to problems involved a combined effort of the community, the ‘ulama’, and the rulers. This ongoing discourse and the fact that rulers constructed a large number of endowments with their own funds, rather than simply using state revenues to build mosques or other public buildings, created a bond of shared values between rulers and society. This bond was based on the ideology and practice of waqf—serving the interests of the umma and defining the proper social order. It also contributed to legitimating the ruler in the eyes of society. In exploring this theme, Hoexter thus challenges an earlier widespread conception of a complete separation and estrangement between rulers and society—as embedded in the idea of “Oriental despotism.” Creating and respecting waqf properties proved a ruler’s concern for the needs and well-being of the umma.

The contributors to this book document the existence of a religious public sphere in premodern Muslim societies, one neither fixed in content or boundaries, but fluctuating significantly over different historical periods. The actors in these religious public spheres were not always united and the boundaries of this sphere were often permeable, but it was set apart from the sphere of royal authority and more diverse than a single household, extended family, or kin group. In most Western contexts, religion has been formally consigned to the private sphere. In Muslim majority societies, the boundary between public and private is often more blurred than in Western societies and rarely fixed.

Such blurring of lines—or, intermediate, connective spaces—reminds us of the impossibility of distinguishing sharply between public and private and point to more important continuities between one sphere and another. The result is to suggest new understandings of the role of religion in society. A long tradition of Western scholarship has recognized the role of the ‘ulama’ in Muslim majority societies as intermediaries between royal authorities and localities. The notion of the religious public sphere expands and completes this picture and suggests the basis of autonomous moral authority on which this public sphere was based. It also suggests the ways in which this religious public sphere varied over time, linking diverse communities in a common social imaginary.

[1] Halpern 1963, 129.

[2] Bill and Leiden 1979, 69.

[3] Gellner 1994, 211.

[4] Duben and Behar 1991.

[5] For example, see Colas 1997.

[6] See Chartier 1991, 23–28,

[7] Calhoun 1992, 7.

[8] Eisenstadt and Schluchter 1998, 5.

[9] Wheatley in press.

[10] Mottahedeh 1980.

[11] See Goitein 1967 for a depiction of the complex and wide-ranging trade patterns based on such shared understandings.

[12] Chamberlain 1994.

[13] Brown 1981.

[14] Hammoudi 1997.

[15] See Eickelman and Piscatori 1996, 26, and Vogel 1999.

[16] Vogel 1999; for Iran, see Mir-Hosseini 1999.

[17] Brown 1981.

[18] Rahman 1979, 185.

[19] Cornell 1998.

[20] Hoexter 1998b.

 Introduction

MIRIAM HOEXTER AND NEHEMIA LEVTZION

The essays included in this volume were presented and discussed at an international workshop on the Public Sphere in Muslim Societies, held at the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute in October 1997. The workshop concluded two years of deliberations on the public sphere in general and its application to Muslim societies in particular, by a study group whose participants then presented their papers. They were joined by international scholars represented in this volume by Dale F. Eickelman. Their comments added substance to the project’s aim to develop the concept of the public sphere in Muslim societies.

For the purposes of this volume we have adopted the definition of the public sphere put forward by Shmuel N. Eisenstadt and Wolfgang Schluchter. They define the public sphere as a sphere located between the official and private spheres. While both the official and the public spheres work for the common good, the public sphere recruits its personnel from the private sphere, not from the ruler’s domain. The public sphere is thus autonomous from the political order, and “its influence rests on interpretations of the common good vis-ȯ-vis the ruler, on the one hand, and the private sphere, on the other.”[21] The concept of the public sphere adds a new dimension to the discourse on civil society. It shifts the emphasis from the political authorities to society and stresses the close connection between the autonomy of this sphere and the idea of the social order as promulgated in a specific society or culture without necessarily developing in the direction of Western political institutions.

The foreword and concluding chapter expand on the theoretical and comparative perspectives. The other chapters are case studies stretching from the ninth century to the twentieth. They certainly do not cover all periods or all regions of the Islamic cultural area; but they all refer to institutions that were central to Muslim societies during most periods and in most parts of the Muslim world. Each chapter deals with a specific period and region and treats specific aspects of the public sphere. Much of the discussion centers around issues, events or institutions connected with Islam. However, rather than a system of worship, confined to the private sphere,[22] the emphasis in all chapters is on Islam as a regulator of the social order. We thus focused on the role of the shari’a as an autonomous civic force; the ensuing autonomy of institutions and social groupings based on the shari’a and their dynamics; the role of the community in the public sphere; and the nature of the interaction between the society and the ruling authorities. We have been inspired by the approach of Marshall Hodgson, who identified three religiously sanctioned institutions that held together all groupings of the umma (the community of believers) in the town: the shari’a laws, the waqf foundations, and the Sufi brotherhoods (tariqa, pl. turuq).[23] All three institutions figure prominently in the essays.

Umma and shari’a are central conceptions running through the discussion in virtually all the chapters included in the present volume. The umma—the community of believers—was accorded central importance in Islamic political thought. Not only were the protection and furthering of its interests the central concern of the ruler, the individual Muslim, and the ‘ulama’; the umma‘s consensus (ijma’) on the legitimacy of the ruler as well as on details concerning the development of social and cultural norms was considered infallible. The community of believers was thus placed as the most significant group in the public sphere, and above the ruler (see Miriam Hoexter).

The shari’a—the sacred law, or the rules and regulations governing the lives of Muslims, derived in principal from the Qur’an and hadith[24]—was developed by fuqaha’ (jurists) and was basically an autonomous legal system, independent of the ruler’s influence. Above and beyond being a legal system, the shari’a embodied the values and norms of the social order proper to the community of believers and became its principal cultural symbol. The sacred nature of the shari’a is deeply entrenched in the public sentiment of Muslim societies. The sanction of the sacred law has contributed to the formation of a Muslim public opinion and endowed institutions and social groupings based on the shari’a—such as the qadi, the mufti, the schools of law (madhahib)— with a high degree of autonomy vis-0-vis the ruler. It has also accorded moral authority to the ‘ulama’—the shari’a specialists-who have asserted their position as authorized interpreters of the shari’a law and custodians of the moral values underlying the ideals of social order of the umma.

As Nimrod Hurvitz shows, the ‘ulama’ secured themselves this role early in Islamic history. In his reinterpretation of the inquisition (mihna) he argues that already in the early ninth century the articulation of religious dogma was the domain of the ‘ulama’.

The failure of the mihna, in which caliphs attempted in vain to enforce acceptance of the theological view of one faction of the ‘ulama’, gave further substance to the division of responsibilities between the ‘ulama’ and the rulers. It also secured the autonomy of the ‘ulama’ in centuries to come.

The large measure of autonomy enjoyed by ‘ulama’ in subsequent centuries—not only in matters of doctrine, but also in the exercise of their daily duties—is demonstrated in a number of papers. Daphna Ephrat relates that once an ‘alim in Seljuk Baghdad was appointed to teach in a madrasa endowed by a ruler, he enjoyed “academic freedom” in the admission of students and in all matters related to the content of his teaching. He could even influence the selection of his successor. The independence of the ‘ulama’—whether or not they held official positions—in the context of the Ottoman Empire is discussed by Haim Gerber. Although dependent on the ruler for his appointment, the qadi enjoyed a large measure of autonomy in the administration of justice in his court. In both substance and procedure, he followed the shari’a law and the ruler did not usually intervene in its day-to-day administration (see Ephrat, Gerber, and Aharon Layish). An in-depth analysis of the qadi’s function is given in Layish’s chapter. Discussing the role of the qadi in the process of sedentarization of tribal societies in Libya and the Judean Desert, he explains how the qadi’s court became a distinct arena of the public sphere, free from the ruler’s intervention. He demonstrates the measure of discretion of qadis in reconciling shari’a and custom, thus creating a favorable climate for members of a tribal society to apply to shari’a courts and eventually bringing tribal society within the orbit of normative Islam.

Ephrat, Layish, and Daniella Talmon-Heller articulate the broader public mission of the ‘ulama’ and their ethic of public service, which consisted of providing guidance to the community concerning the proper norms of social, moral, and legal behavior. Indeed, their manifold functions—as judges, muftis, teachers, guardians of orphans, leaders of prayers, preachers—brought the ‘ulama’ into daily contact with the people and made them natural leaders of public opinion and informal representatives of the community.

‘Ulama’ sometimes converted their charisma into social, economic, and even political power, and became leaders of autonomous organizations. Two categories of such organizations are represented in the present volume: the schools of law (madhahib) and the Sufi brotherhoods (turuq). As Ephrat and Nehemia Levtzion demonstrate, these organizations performed a variety of social functions and became major foci of communal life. They developed and restructured themselves according to their own dynamics, and their relative importance in the public sphere changed in the course of time.

Ephrat dwells on the change from factionalism and violent clashes among adherents of the different madhahib from the ninth century onward, to a spirit of cooperation and tolerance in the twelfth century. By that time the social importance of the schools of law had diminished, and their place as principal actors in the public sphere was gradually taken over by the Sufis. Only the Hanbalis retained a high degree of cohesive communal life in later periods. This is also illustrated in Talmon-Heller’s study of a Hanbali community, whose members migrated from their villages in the region of Jabal Nablus to Damascus in the middle of the twelfth century, where they continued to lead their own organized community life, led by authoritative shaykhs. Under Zangid and Ayyubid rule she found no similar organization of community life among the adherents of the larger Shafi’i and Hanafi schools of law in Syrian cities. Relations between schools of law in that period were definitely less strained and violent than in Seljuk Baghdad.

The integration of Sufism into the mainstream of Islam in the eleventh and twelfth centuries was marked by the emergence of Sufi brotherhoods (turuq) as new social institutions, where disciples were inducted and trained by their masters. Gradually, Sufi brotherhoods also recruited lay people, and Sufism moved from the private to the public sphere. For six centuries, from the twelfth century to the eighteenth, Sufi brotherhoods were central to the life of the individual and the community. Levtzion analyzes the development of Sufi organizations and structures at different periods, as well as patterns of relationships between Sufi brotherhoods and the state, ranging from withdrawal and autonomy to dependency. In the eighteenth century, Sufi brotherhoods transformed into large-scale, cross-regional organizations. Brotherhoods penetrated into the countryside and mobilized the common people by addressing them in the vernacular language and articulating their grievances. As this process seems to have been associated with the decline of states, one may say that the public sphere created by the brotherhoods expanded at the expense of the official sphere.

The role of waqf foundations in the public sphere is discussed by Gerber and Hoexter. Throughout the premodern Islamic world, endowments were made by all strata of the Muslim population. They provided for the financing and maintenance of a host of public services and did so through an institution whose rules had remained, across the centuries, an integral part of the shari’a. Following Hodgson, Hoexter describes the waqf as a major tool through which the Islamic idea of the social order proper to the umma was implemented. She discusses the ideology underlying the Islamic endowment institution, its impact on the formation of the urban public space, its contribution to the crystallization of autonomous groups within the community of believers, and the nature of the discourse between the society and the ruling authorities generated by the waqf.

The role of the community in the public sphere and the nature of the interaction between the society and the ruling authorities are of central importance to an understanding of the dynamics of Muslim societies. They are discussed in virtually every chapter.

The community of believers exercised its influence in the public sphere in several ways. Gerber discusses the measure of autonomy of more or less structured organizations, such as professional guilds and neighborhoods. He and Hoexter dwell on the importance of endowments made by members of guilds and neighborhoods, groups of common origin, the ashraf (descendants of the Prophet), etc., in providing them an independent economic basis. Furthermore, they show how, through endowments, these groups enhanced group identification and social interaction among their members and became influential factors in the public sphere.

The concept of the public sphere may address also the role of the common people, or the uninstitutionalized community, and its participation in molding or changing social and normative practices. Talmon-Heller gives several examples of the active participation of the general public in twelfth- and thirteenth-century Damascus in the shaping of religious practices that became sunna for most believers. The community often succeeded in doing this in the face of initial strong opposition of ‘ulama’ backed by the ruler. One of the most striking examples is that of saint worship and the visitation of tombs, which in turn contributed greatly to the growing popularity of devotional Sufism, as argued by Levtzion. Gerber shows how popular support contributed to the rise of the shari’a in the Ottoman Empire in the course of the fifteenth century, at the expense of the criminal law enacted by the state (qanun). The role of the community in the process whereby cash endowments were legalized in the Ottoman Empire (Gerber and Hoexter) is another case in point. All these examples point to the dynamics of a living tradition influenced to a large degree by public opinion. In addition, Gerber and Hoexter emphasize the variations in legal practice within the Islamic cultural area, influenced by local circumstances or resulting from different approaches to certain points of law prevalent among various local population. They also discuss some of the mechanisms that enabled the incorporation of changes in the shari’a: the ijma’-t—e consensus of the community of believers; the legitimization of custom (‘urf, ta’aruf, ta’amul) —both general and local; and appealing to the best interests of the community of believers. The central position in the public sphere accorded to the community of believers in Islamic thought and practice is thus highlighted.

The importance of the shari’a—not only as a practical guide encompassing the moral values and norms of the public order proper to the umma but also as a symbol of cultural identity—and the central position of the umma in the public sphere were found to have been crucial factors affecting the relations between rulers and society.

While the ruler was devoid of authority to determine the norms governing the public sphere, his responsibility to uphold the shari’a was the condition for the legitimization of his rule. This responsibility implied an obligation on the part of the ruler to make sure that the public sphere in the territory under his control was construed in conformity with the basic moral norms and values of Islam, and that the law was administered according to the specific rules of the shari’a. The ruler’s adherence to these norms and rules was the touchstone of his relations with the community under his control (see Hoexter).

To a large extent these principles determined the nature of the ruler’s involvement in the public sphere. The rulers’ degree of involvement in the public sphere and the nature of their relations with the community varied of course over the centuries and were largely dependent on their strength and the type of political regime.[25] Hurvitz shows how, as a result of the mihna, the space in which ‘ulama’ defined the doctrine was enlarged and limits were set to future intervention of rulers in this field of action in the public sphere. Indeed, except in cases in which a ruler claimed special spiritual powers— that is, declared himself a mahdi (a divinely guided ruler who would restore Islam to its original perfection)—instances of personal involvement by rulers in matters of doctrine in periods subsequent to the mihna must have been very rare. Discussing Seljuk Baghdad, Ephrat dwells on the nature of rulers’ intervention in the important ongoing debate between the schools of law (mad- hahib). The rulers kept aloof of the doctrinal debates; nor did they interfere in the formation or activities of social organizations based on madhhab adherence. Only when the rivalry between ‘ulama’ and their supporters took a violent turn and public order was threatened did rulers step in to restore peace and order. Interestingly enough, as Ephrat shows, while preferring Hanafi or Shafi’i ‘ulama’ in official positions, rulers often sided in such conflicts with their rivals, the Hanbalis—obviously because of their greater popular appeal and the large following they succeeded in mobilizing.

Rulers in all periods certainly issued decrees relating to the shari’a. However, as Hoexter points out, these decrees were not the result of a ruler’s own discretion, nor was he involved in the preceding doctrinal debate. The ruler’s decision was needed in order to clinch a lengthy discussion among the ‘ulama’; the decree was issued at the instigation of chief ‘ulama’ and was always based on a legal opinion (fatwa) given by a chief mufti.

As part of their duty to uphold the shari’a in the territories under their control, rulers certainly cooperated with ‘ulama’ in many ways. TalonHeller describes various aspects of such cooperation during a period in which Islam and shari’a were still in the process of taking root in the population and the orthodox doctrine was in danger of succumbing to various kinds of heterodox views, deviant groups, and eccentrics. She stresses the close cooperation of Ayyubid and Zangid rulers with ‘ulama’ in enforcing Sunni orthodoxy (ihya’ al-sunna) in their domains.

The personal piety or learning of a ruler, his public deference to revered ‘ulama’ and to religion in general, and, mutatis mutandis, victories in the name of Islam certainly contributed to public legitimization of a particular ruler. Endowments by rulers and their entourages for public purposes had a similar effect on the attitude of the community to its rulers (see Hoexter and Gerber). They symbolized the adherence of the endowing ruler to the norms of good order inherent in the ideology of the waqf, created a bond of shared values between the ruler and the community, and contributed to public legitimization of the endowing ruler. Here, as in other cases, the role of the shari’a as a symbol of cultural identity is highlighted.

Moreover, the rules of the waqf—which withdrew ownership of the endowed assets from the endower and placed transactions relating to the endowed properties under the authorization of the qadi—the proliferation of endowments, and the community’s vested interest in the institutions created and supported by waqfs brought about the active involvement of the ‘ulama’ and the community in the way large foundations were administered, and generated a continuous discourse between community, the ‘ulama’, and the rulers concerning major issues in the public sphere (Hoexter).

The picture that emerges from the contributions to this volume is that of a vibrant public sphere, accommodating a large variety of autonomous groups and characterized by its relatively stable yet very dynamic nature. The community of believers was the center of gravity around which activity in the public sphere revolved. Its participation in the formation of the public sphere was a matter of course; its well-being, customs, and consensus were both the motives and the main justifications for the introduction of changes in social and religious practices, in the law and policies governing the public sphere. The independence of the shari’a and the distribution of duties toward the community between the ruler and the ‘ulama’, established very early in Islamic history, were crucial factors in securing the autonomy of the public sphere and putting limits on the absolute power of the ruler.

The implications of these findings for earlier theories as to the nature of relations between society and its rulers are discussed by Gerber and Hoexter. Gerber disputes the concept of the Ottoman Empire as a state of unbridled Oriental despotism. Hoexter challenges the idea embedded in the “Oriental despotism” thesis—the notion of a total separation and estrangement of the society from its rulers, and the latter’s lack of concern for the community and its needs. Both point to the existence of a kind of social contract or a bond of shared values as the basis of state-society relations.

The absence of formal institutions in early Muslim societies has been the cornerstone of the thesis postulating a lack of civil society in premodern Muslim-majority societies and an extreme despotism on the part of the rulers. The papers that make up this volume demonstrate that formal institutions are not necessarily the only, and perhaps not even the most efficient way of securing an autonomous public sphere and mitigating the despotism of rulers. Indeed, informal relations and an ongoing discourse between society and its rulers governed the public sphere in Muslim societies. Social order, the dynamic participation of the community and its spokesmen in the public sphere, and discourse with the rulers rested on shared norms and values that created a bond of common cultural imaginary between ruler and society and placed limits on the absolute power of the ruler.

[21] Eisenstadt and Schluchter 1998, 10.

[22] For theoretical discussions of the religious public sphere and the blurred boundaries between private and public spheres—see Eickelman, Eisenstadt, and Hoexter in this volume.

[23] Hodgson 1974, vol. 2, 119.

[24] Calder EI².

[25] See Arjomand 1999 on the relationship between types of political regime and the use of endowments as instruments of public policy.

 Chapter One: The MIHNA (Inquisition) and the Public Sphere

NIMROD HURVITZ

The term public sphere acquired its currency and importance in the framework of European historiography, which focused on the formation of a bourgeois society.[26] However, the concept can take on a more general meaning if we extend it beyond any specific temporal and geographic features such as the European bourgeoisie in the modern era. The theoreticians and historians who coined this term and used it in their writings refer to the public sphere as a social space in which discursive interactions between large segments of the public take place. In his exposition of the multiple meanings of the term public, Jtirgen Habermas has emphasized that aspect of publicity in which the public functions as the “carrier of public opinion.”[27] In a study of the French revolution, Roger Chartier has referred to the public sphere as “a space for discussion and exchange removed from the sway of state power.”[28] The shaping of public opinion and autonomy from state influence are issues that need not be limited to the European experience. They are in fact also relevant to developments in Islamic societies. The concept of the public sphere can prove particularly useful in an exposition of the forces that shaped public opinion, laid the principles of religious discourse, and affected the efforts of scholars to maintain their intellectual independence.

In this chapter I will touch on these questions by focusing on a period of crisis that has been named by Muslim historians the mihna (inquisition). The mihna was initiated by the caliph al-Ma’mun in the year A.H. 218/ A.D. 833. Al-Ma’mun’s sympathy towards the mutakallimun (scholastic theologians) moved him to attack their intellectual opponents, the muhaddithun (traditionists). Using the caliphal role of defender of the true faith of Islam, he interrogated individual ‘ulama’ (scholars of religious sciences) with regard to their theological beliefs. The inquisitorial question touched on the createdness of the Qur’an. Each ‘alim (sing. of ‘ulama’) was asked if the Qur’an was created. Those who answered in line with al-Ma’mun and the mutakallimun’s point of view, that it was created, were released. Those that refused to state explicitly that it was created were put in jail, threatened, tortured, and even executed. Al-Ma’mun died four months after initiating the mihna, but the interrogations lasted fifteen years. Its administrators, after al-Ma’mun’s death, were a group of mutakallimun influential in the caliphal court. The mihna was brought to a halt during al-Mutawakkil’s reign (c. a.h. 234/ a.d. 848).

The unprecedented involvement of the rulers in the controversies of the ‘ulama’, and their attempt to influence the articulation of theological doctrine, raises a number of questions. To what extent did the ‘ulama’ actually have discursive autonomy during the first three centuries of Islam? What were the issues they discussed and what were the underlying premises of their discussions? How did the ‘ulama’ shape public opinion—both within their own ranks and throughout the community? In other words, what modes of supervision and coercion did the ‘ulama’ employ among themselves? I hope the ensuing analysis of the mihna will make it possible to sketch the contours and contents of the ‘ulama’‘s internal discourse in the early part of the third century A.H. and shed light on the contribution of the ‘ulama’ to the public sphere in Islamic societies.

 The Extent of the ‘Ulama’’s Discursive Autonomy

The study of the mihna is relevant to the inquiry into the public sphere because it enables us to examine the extent to which the ‘ulama’ were independent of the caliphs when forging Islamic doctrine. I would like to state from the outset that the present interpretation of the mihna differs from most accounts of this event.[29] In contrast to the predominant trend in modern historiography, which views the mihna as a clash between the caliphs and the ‘ulama’ over spiritual authority, I view the mihna as the culmination of a controversy within the ranks of the ‘ulama’. During the last decades of the second century A.H. and the first decades of the third century A.H., the ‘ulama’ were divided into two major trends, the proto-Sunni muhaddithun on the one hand and the mutakallimun on the other, each of which tried to shape Islam according to its own religious outlook. In the first stage of this struggle, the closing decades of the second century a.h. and the opening decades of the third century a.h., the muhaddithun placed tremendous pressure on the mutakallimun, refusing to associate with them or exchange religious ideas with them.[30] After decades of suffering at the hands of the muhaddithun, the mutakkalimun attained the active support of al-Ma’mun and implemented a new religious policy in which they interrogated, jailed, tortured, and even executed their opponents. I therefore view the mihna as the second phase in a decades-long struggle over the nature of Islam.

Al-Ma’mun’s intervention in the affairs and debates of the ‘ulama’ was a departure from the longstanding position of neutrality that previous caliphs had maintained.[31] However, according to my understanding of the mihna, Al-Ma’mun did not claim to be the sole guide in the sphere of spiritual matters, and did not see himself as opposed to the ‘ulama’. Rather, as will be demonstrated, he identified a clash between two factions of the ‘ulama’, in which he supported one of the sides and joined it. More specifically, the mihna was not perceived by its administrators as a challenge on the part of the caliphs against the ‘ulama’ but as an alliance between the caliph and the mutakallimun against the ascending proto-Sunni muhaddithun.

Another aspect of the mihna that had a bearing on the question of the caliphs’ relations with the ‘ulama’ is the change that occurred during the mihna.[32] The mihna ought to be divided into two stages. During the first, which lasted only four months, al-Ma’mun initiated the interrogations and conducted them. Either he or his political representative in Baghdad, the governor Ishaq b. Ibrahim, questioned the ‘ulama’ personally. After four months al-Ma’mun died. His four-months-old religious policy cannot be ascribed to his successors during the next fourteen years of the mihna. The next caliph, al-Mu’tasim, relinquished the position of interrogator, and from that point on, the mihna was run by the chief qadi, Ibn Abi Du’ad, who was a Mu’tazili.[33] He and a handful of pro-kalam (theology) qadis interrogated and tortured the mihna’s victims, while the caliph neither put an end to the policy nor participated actively in it. As a result, shortly after the mihna was instigated by Al-Ma’mun, the caliphs receded to the background and it took on the features of a struggle of the muhaddithun against the mutakallimun.

An important aspect of this reinterpretation of the mihna is the history of the relations of the ‘ulama’ and the caliphs in the early ‘Abbasid era. The prevalent view, which assumes a history of subdued tensions, has lately been challenged by M. Q. Zaman. In his analysis, Zaman writes about the superiority of the ‘ulama’‘s spiritual status over that of the caliphs. The ‘ulama’ are described as being competent, while the caliphs attempt to acquire such competence;[34] the ‘ulama’ “are the locus of religious authority,” while the caliphs aspire to gain such authority.[35] Following Zaman’s analysis, I would like to emphasize the status of ‘ulama’ as the spiritual authorities of the Islamic community and argue that by the second century A.H., the ‘ulama’ were sitting securely at the top of the Islamic spiritual hierarchy. The ‘ulama’ were by far the most important participants in legal or theological discussions; they compiled the canonic collections of traditions deriving from the Prophet (hadith), made the legal decisions, and articulated doctrine. Perhaps the most important feature of their spiritual authority is that it was recognized by the caliphs themselves. Abu Yusuf’s introduction to the Kitab al-Kharaj serves as a fine example of the ‘ulama” s widely recognized spiritual supremacy.[36]

In Abu Yusuf’s opening statement of the Kitab al-Kharaj, he presents himself as more knowledgeable than the caliph, Harun al-Rashid: “The Commander of the Faithful, may Allah strengthen him, has requested me to compose for him a comprehensive book... A book for him to study and act upon.”[37]

According to this remark, Abu Yusuf wrote, and the caliph studied his writings. A few pages later, this subtle hierarchy of religious knowledge and spiritual authority is reiterated: “Yea, I have written for you what you have commanded, and have expounded and explained it to you. Learn it, ponder it and re-read it until you remember it.”[38] Abu Yusuf’s conception of his own intellectual superiority comes across quite clearly in this remark. He knows and explains, while Harun al-Rashid listens, reads, and studies. He concludes in the authoritarian tone of classroom teacher: “Learn it, ponder it, and re-read it.”

Abu Yusuf’s tract is full of comments about the ruler’s wisdom. Nevertheless, as we read the introduction we can discern that he considered himself superior to the ruler in spiritual and religious matters. Abu Yusuf creates an implicit dichotomy between the spiritual and the sociopolitical spheres. He places the ruler at the top of the political one, but political clout does not entail religious knowledge nor spiritual authority. Furthermore, it does not ensure the best rewards in the world to come. On the Day of Judgment the caliph’s social and political standing will be of no importance. Says Abu Yusuf: “He [Allah] judges people on the Day of Judgment, according to their actions and not according to their status.”[39] In the final analysis religious and spiritual uprightness will determine the caliph’s fate in the next world, and these depend on his knowledge and understanding of religious and spiritual matters, which he can acquire from such scholars as Abu Yusuf. This view was not limited to Abu Yusuf. We have every reason to believe that Harun Al-Rashid read this introduction and agreed with its premises. On the basis of this example, as well as others, I conclude that the caliphs did not consider themselves to be competing with the ‘ulama’ for spiritual authority. There was a clear division of labor and responsibility, and the caliphs did not infringe on the ‘ulama’ ‘s status as the community’s spiritual guides.

The mihna and its background, according to my understanding of this event, reveal that for the most part the caliphs were reluctant to get involved in doctrinal controversies and incapable of imposing their will in the rare instances they did interfere. The reluctance of the early ‘Abbasid caliphs to intervene in the elaboration of doctrine, and the failure of those that tried, reveal the strength of the ‘ulama”s hold in this arena. They articulated doctrines, determined the principles of religious discourse, and decided on the reputation and standing of religious leaders. One of the most valuable insights to be acquired from the mihna is that the ‘ulama’ had vast areas of intellectual maneuvering in which they were practically unchallenged.

 Controversy Within Autonomy: Determining Islamic Religious Discourse

Autonomy hardly implies harmony. A prevalent notion about the ‘ulama’ that needs to be rectified relates to their unity. Most accounts of the mihna describe the ‘ulama’ as a unified body that opposed the rulers and strove to attain an agreed-upon political aim. This is hardly the case. ‘Ulama’ is a label that refers to learned individuals who were members of a number of intellectual and ideological movements. Each of these movements was busy debating other groups of ‘ulama’, articulating its own theological doctrine, jurisprudential outlook, views on Qur’anic exegesis, and other contested issues. Not only were the ‘ulama’ splintered into numerous intellectual and ideological groups and movements, they did not establish any overall organization. As a consequence, they could not reach an agreed-upon decision or lead a concerted struggle against the rulers.

Islamic doctrine is, in large part, the outcome of the controversy between these trends and groups; their ability to persuade one another or defeat one another in the battle for public opinion determined the Islamic belief system. Barring ideologies that jeopardized the regime, such as certain Shi’i and Khawarij sects, the rulers did not intervene in the struggles that took place between these groups. In the course of their internal debates, the ‘ulama’ of the formative period decided on the issues of contention, determined the means of proof, articulated the beliefs, and wrote the books that would become canonic in Islam.

In the letter that set the mihna rolling, al-Ma’mun is clearly conscious of these rivalries between the different strands of the ‘ulama’. He is also painfully aware that the faction he supports, the mutakallimun, is losing out to the muhaddithun in the battle for public opinion. He begins his discourse on the muhaddithun by describing the incompetent masses whom they lead astray. The “lower strata of the commonality,” he lashes out, are incapable of comprehending religious truths.[40] He then shifts his focus to the intellectual leadership of the masses, those people who “consider themselves adherents of the sunna.”[41] Al-Ma’mun is clearly disturbed by the success of these self-styled “adherents of the sunna” and dedicates a large part of his letter to outlining how they arrived at this position and how they abuse it.

These self-styled “adherents of the sunna” have consolidated their social and spiritual position by winning over influential groups among the people, one such group being individuals “who lead an ascetic life.” The ascetics’ tendency to support the self-styled “adherents of the sunna” has enhanced the latter’s position and placed them in a position of “leadership and [won them] a reputation of probity.”[42] Furthermore, “their testimony had been accepted because they [the ignorant ones or the people of false belief] have declared them [those who claim to be the people of truth] to be veracious witnesses, and the prescriptions of the Book have been put into effect through [those who claim to be the people of truth].”[43]

The meaning of this comment is not quite clear. Al-Ma’mun makes the point that his opponents enjoy the standing of religious authorities. What does he mean, however, by “testimony”? My understanding of the term is in the context of hadiths and the developing ‘ilm al-rijal- a branch of knowledge concerning information about hadith transmitters.[44] Since one of the crucial aspects of a hadith is its transmitters, the “testimony” that al-Ma’mun mentions may be the evidence touching on the trustworthiness of the transmitters of hadith. In other words, al-Ma’mun is complaining that it is his opponents who determine what is authentic and what false in the vital field of hadith due to their ability to determine who are “veracious witnesses.” Alongside that, because they have become the authoritative interpreters of the Qur’an, it is they who put the “prescriptions of the Book ... into effect.” In other words, al-Ma’mun is linking his initiation of the mihna with his opinion that the selfstyled “adherents of the sunna” have come to dominate the religious scene of Islam.

Like al-Ma’mun, Hanbali sources describe the mihna as part of a debate between two factions that have opposing views about theology. On the surface stood the inquisitorial question: was the Qur’an created? But the powerful undercurrent that raised this question to the surface was the profound disagreement over the status of theology. In the course of Ibn Hanbal’s interrogation—a rare record of a direct exchange between the muhaddithun and mutakallimun—we come across such remarks by Ibn Hanbal as: “Give me anything from the Book of Allah or the sunna of his messenger.”[45] Such a remark is a reaction to his interrogators’ efforts to draw him into a theological debate. Ibn Hanbal’s refusal to participate in the debate and his insistence on remaining within the confines of scripture indicate that he does not think his opponents’ conclusions constitute articles of faith. Ibn Hanbal insists that his interrogators should base their opinions on the Qur’an and sunna, the sanctified sources of Islam. In other words, Ibn Hanbal and his mutakallimun interrogators were debating the very principles of theological inquiry.

Ibn Hanbal’s obstinacy stretched Ibn Abi Du’ad’s patience to its limits; at a certain point the chief qadi retorted: “And you, do you limit yourself to the Book of Allah or the sunna of his Messenger?”[46] Ibn Hanbal replied: “Of what is Islam made besides the Book and the sunna ? You have invented (ikhtara’ta) a personal opinion and interpreted an interpretation which you propagate [lit. to which you call] to the people.”[47]

Ibn Hanbal’s reply does not address Ibn Abi Du’ad’s accusation. It merely emphasizes the dichotomy of scripture and personal opinion. Theological investigation falls under the rubric of personal opinion. Ibn Hanbal is willing to accept theological truisms if, and only if, they are clearly stated in the Qur’an and sunna. However, he is unwilling to consider the results of theological investigation as theological truth, precisely because they do not derive directly from a sanctified text. If a particular theological problem has to be investigated, it means that it did not appear in a clear manner in the texts. Consequently, the conclusions of such an investigation cannot be considered an article of faith. From this point of view, personal opinion—which is the human imagination that concocts theological questions, the human faculties of reason that answer these questions, and the human vanity that embraces these answers and promotes them to the status of absolute truth—cannot be put on a par with scripture. Ibn Hanbal was concerned with demarcating the sphere of articles of faith, not with proving his own opinion correct. He ignored Ibn Abi Du’ad’s impatient accusation because he thought it did not matter how he or his opponents built their arguments. By definition, the whole discussion, including Ibn Hanbal’s own opinion, could not be treated as a component of faith.

In contrast to Ibn Hanbal, who was not concerned whether a believer understood the articles of faith, al-Ma’mun thought that comprehension of the articles of faith is the most important aspect of belief. In his first mihna letter, al-Ma’mun writes: “For there can be no good works except after sure faith, and no sure faith except after fully apprehending the true nature of Islam.”[48] For a mutakallim such as al-Ma’mun, true Islam hinges on apprehension. It is not enough to follow the ordinances of Islamic law and morality. If believers do not understand what they are doing and why they are doing this, if they do not use their minds, then their faith is incomplete. The contrast between the muhaddithun and mutakallimun is stated by the Mu’tazili al-Jahiz:

And the traditionists (ashab al-hadith) and the masses (wa’l-‘awamm) are those that follow blindly (yuqallidun) and do not infer (wa-la yuhassilun), and they do not choose, [yet] blind acceptance is objectionable according to rational reasoning, and forbidden by the Qur’an (manhi ‘anhu fi a-Qur’an), as you can see they [traditionists] have reversed (‘akasu) the matters, and violated norms. We have no doubt that he who examines and investigates and compares is in the better [position] to understand and arrive at the truer argument.[49]

Al-Jahiz is pointing here to the heart of the matter. He contrasts blind following with rational reasoning. Blind following, which he ascribes to the muhaddithun, means relying on scripture without straying off into the terrain of theological speculation. To some extent, Ibn Hanbal would agree with this description of the muhaddithun. However, whereas he would feel that to “follow blindly” the scripture is to take the right path, al-Jahiz assumes that this is “forbidden by the Qur’an.” Al-Jahiz argues that “rational reasoning” is the utmost expression of belief, whereas Ibn Hanbal believes that true doctrine is in the canonized books of Islam and cannot be uncovered by rational speculation.

Although Ibn Hanbal and Jahiz discuss the mihna from contrasting points of view, and although each of them tries to promote his understanding of the event, both of them associate the mihna with the debate over theological proof. Despite their disagreement over the status and importance of theology, they agree that it is their disagreement over what constitutes an article of faith that lies at the foundations of the mihna. Al-Ma’mun’s harsh denunciation of his opponents’ inability to handle theological subtleties is in line with Ibn Hanbal’s and al-Jahiz’s view of the mihna’s causes.

The sources that describe the mihna, be they Hanbali or Mu’tazili polemics, emphasize two crucial points. First, the mihna was a consequence of a debate over the standing and importance of theological investigation. It seems clear to writers of both persuasions that the inquisitorial question only opened a door that led to a much wider and more meaningful issue: the nature and standing of theology. Second, the debate was between two camps of ‘ulama’. Most caliphs, including some of those that reigned during the mihna, were either too ignorant of and disinterested in such matters or too smart and politically savvy to get involved in the cross fire of the ‘ulama’. It was the ‘ulama’, knowing enough and caring greatly about Islamic religiosity, who battled among themselves over the premises of religious discourse.

 Discourse Into Power

The violent religious policy of the court and the mutakallimun was not merely a reaction to the debates that raged over the nature of theology. It was also a response to the heavy price that the mutakallimun had paid in the period preceding the mihna.

Al-Ma’mun’s criticism of the self-styled Sunnis in his first mihna letter hints at these persecutions. One of his most important observations is that in the years preceding the mihna an aggressive campaign was waged against his allies. This point is raised in several parts of the letter, though in a somewhat obscure manner. In his descriptions of the self-styled “adherents of the sunna,” Al-Ma’mun points out two of their characteristics: First, they falsely believe themselves to be “people of divine truth.”[50] With this, I presume, Al-Ma’mun could live. The second characteristic, his enemies’ assertion “that all others are people of false beliefs, infidelity and schism,”[51] was much more difficult to put up with. These accusations, which the muhaddithun aimed at their intellectual opposition, indicate that the muhaddithun were intolerant of interpretations of Islam other than their own, and that they played a zero-sum game: either a scholar accepted their religious outlook or he was excluded from the scholarly milieu and, in certain instances, from the Islamic community altogether. In more concrete terms, al-Ma’mun’s remark refers to a protracted campaign on the part of the self-styled Sunnis, who accused their intellectual and ideological rivals of infidelity (kufr).

Al-Ma’mun was outraged by the self-styled Sunnis’ conduct, and in his fury he wrote that they are “the tongue of Iblis, who speaks through his companions and strikes terror into the hearts of his adversaries, the people of God’s own religion.”[52] Here, as before, al-Ma’mun divided the Islamic community into two factions. The bad guys, whom al-Ma’mun labels self-styled “adherents of the sunna” and I identify as muhaddithun, are described as “the tongue of Iblis.” The good guys, to whom al-Ma’mun belonged and I identify as the mutakallimun, are described as “the people of God’s own religion.” The new piece of information that al-Ma’mun adds to this dichotomy is a reference to the terror that the companions of Iblis (i.e., the muhaddithun) struck in the hearts of “the people of God’s own religion.” This is a dramatic accusation and a key to understanding the mihna’s background. What did al-Ma’mun have in mind when he used the word “terror”?

I believe that when al-Ma’mun accused his opponents of terrorizing his allies, he was referring to the attempts by the muhaddithun to marginalize and discredit the mutakallimun and exclude them from the professional milieu and even from the overall Islamic social fabric. The muhaddithun used two forms of sanctions. First, they put up social barriers between the mutakallimun and the rest of the community. For example, there were pronouncements by proto-Sunni ‘ulama’ that prohibited marriage or praying behind theological deviants.[53] Second, they applied professional sanctions against the mutakallimun. By resorting to a mechanism of supervision known as ‘ilm al-rijal, they succeeded in weeding out from the circles of hadith transmitters the followers of various theological and political trends—Qadaris, Murji’is, Shi’is, and Khawarij.[54]For example, around the end of the second century a.h., they discredited numerous Qadaris such as Mu’adh b. Hisham (d. 200/815), ‘Abad b. Mansur

(d. 152/ 769), and Thaur b. Yazid (d. 155/ 774), and in some cases brought to their eviction from the ranks of hadith transmitters.[55] After marginalizing scholars that ascribed to theological and political ideas that clashed with evolving Sunni ideas, the muhaddithun were able to shape the pliant religious doctrine of Islam.

According to our present state of knowledge it seems that the first books on ‘ilm al-rijal were composed during the first decades of the third century A.H.[56] However, scholars that have studied the development of ‘ilm al-rijal have observed that expertise in this field and the circulation of information about transmitters of hadith began in the second century a.h. In his monumental study, Muslim Studies, I. Goldziher writes:

Only when the invention of partisan and tendentious traditions had prevailed did anxious theologians pay closer attention to the informants of each saying with a view to making the validity of the hadith dependant on their quality. It seems to have been in the time of Ibn ‘Awn (d. 151), Shu’ba (d. 160), ‘Abdallah b. Mubarak (d. 181) and others of their contemporaries that criticism of the authorities begins.[57]

The founders of this branch of knowledge, which examines transmitters of hadith critically, died in the middle of the second century a.h., suggesting that criticism of transmitters was circulating between experts in the first half of the second century a.h. Much in line with this periodization that Goldziher offers, G. H. A. Juynboll assumes that “the starting date of systematic rijal criticism in Islam” was at about 130/747.[58]

The information that hadith critics collected about transmitters was of various kinds: biographical details (birth, death, teachers, disciples); intellectual ability (memory or loss of memory, the branches of knowledge mastered (hadith, fiqh, and ‘ilm al-rijal); theological beliefs; and jurisprudential approach. Clearly, anyone who mastered this field of knowledge had tremendous power in his hands because he could determine the professional reputation of each and every scholar and bring about his expulsion from the ranks of the scholarly community.

A brief glance at three scholars who died before the mihna was initiated can give us an idea of how ‘ilm al-rijal experts discussed the theological beliefs and jurisprudential outlook of their colleagues.

Abu Yusuf (d. 182), the chief qadi under Harun al-Rashid, was Ibn Hanbal’s first teacher. Nothing about Abu Yusuf’s behavior seems to have bothered Ibn Hanbal when he began his career. Later in his life, however, Ibn Hanbal was not very comfortable with this biographical detail and he remarked: “Abu Yusuf is the first (teacher) on whose authority I wrote hadith and I do not transmit on his authority.”[59] Ibn Hanbal distanced himself from his teacher because of Abu Yusuf’s jurisprudence: “Abu Yusuf is truthful (saduq) but it is inappropriate to transmit anything on the authority of the pupils (ashab) of Abu Hanifa.”[60] These remarks give us some idea of the scrutiny that each scholar underwent. But more important, they reveal the danger of being affiliated with the ahl al-ra’y (adherents of private opinion) who were often associated with the ashab of Abu Hanifa.[61] For certain scholars, even those who had been his students, Abu Yusuf’s jurisprudence was reason enough to marginalize him retrospectively.

Another problematic teacher was ‘Ali b. Hashim al-Burayd (d. 179).[62] Al-Burayd was known to have Shi’i sympathies. Some scholars, among them Ibn Hanbal, considered this a problem but were willing to transmit on his authority. Others thought his Shi’i sympathies went too far and, as a result, included his name in the Kitab al-Majruhin, a book that surveys problematic transmitters and elaborates their faults.[63] Another teacher whose ideological affiliation was problematic was Abu Mu’awiyyah (d. 185/195), the leader of the Murji’a in Kufa.[64]

The biographical dictionaries, which furnish us with information about these three scholars as well as thousands of others, drew information from numerous contributors. They are the written residue of ceaseless oral exchanges. ‘Ilm al-rijal constituted a constant flow of information that was verified and put to use in a manner that determined the professional relations between scholars. It is safe to assume that every scholar contributed to it, that every scholar was scrutinized by it, and that it touched on every issue that was deemed relevant to a scholar’s career. These discussions, in which scholars examined their colleagues, constituted a field of internal discourse, and served as a means of ensuring that unacceptable beliefs would not enter the belief system of Islam. If new beliefs were introduced, the scholars who embraced them knew they risked exclusion from the scholarly community. I would therefore conclude that ‘ilm al-rijal was a highly effective means of shaping the belief system of the ‘ulama’ and, as a consequence, the opinions and beliefs of the public. Al-Ma’mun realized that the muhaddithun’s control of ‘ilm al-rijal was the reason behind the mutakallimun‘s defeat in the battle over public opinion and thus initiated the mihna.

 Conclusion

Historians of the early ‘Abbasid era have noted that during that period the relations between the caliphs and the ‘ulama’ were, for the most part, untroubled. Some of these historians assume that behind the serene facade lurked hidden tensions, while others emphasized the cooperation between the caliphs and the ‘ulama’.[65] The revisionist interpretation of the mihna presented here is close to the latter. It assumes that the caliphs and ‘ulama’ acquired for themselves a hold on different spheres of influence and that both sides understood that the articulation of religious dogma was the domain of the ‘ulama’. In light of this division of influence and the cooperation between the caliphs and ‘ulama’, it is argued that the mihna is the outcome of religious clashes between different trends of thought among the ‘ulama’, and much less so, a consequence of the caliphs’ will to shape doctrine.

This interpretation emphasizes factional strife among the ‘ulama’ and the efforts of each trend to forge public opinion. It assumes that the articulation of doctrine by the ‘ulama’ was not a serene process since it was accompanied by confrontations between the varying ideological movements. Therefore, to understand the mihna and the dynamics within the public sphere, it is crucial to uncover how the different factions of ‘ulama’ built their power and how they used it.

Power in ‘ulama’ circles, was based on control of ‘ilm al-rijal. This was the medium by which scholars determined the status of their colleagues, and in some cases it was used to exclude scholars from the scholarly community. It was a fascinating system of self-supervision, in which every scholar was both supervisor and supervised. As details about scholars were passed by word of mouth, scholars who accumulated this knowledge and were considered authoritative experts in this field, had in their hands a devastatingly powerful tool. One of the consequences of this activity was the exclusion of whole groups and ideological trends from the community of believers.[66]

‘Ilm al-rijal was an effective tool for the shaping of public opinion. It determined the standing of scholars, and as a consequence the validity of the ideas they propounded, as well as the reception and dissemination of these ideas within the whole community. Historically, caliphs and their officials did not participate in this arena, as their opinions carried no weight in such matters. Against this background, the mihna can be perceived as an attempt to diverge from this policy of nonintervention and to retaliate against the effects of ‘ilm al-rijal, by supporting its victims. However, the caliphs failed, and their unsuccessful intervention in ‘ulama’ politics backfired on two levels. The first, it probably served as a warning sign to future caliphs and led to the decrease of their involvement in the partisan politics of the ‘ulama’. The second, the mutakallimun, whom the court supported throughout the mihna, were dealt a decisive political blow from which they never recovered. Though their doctrine and intellectual tradition were kept alive two or three centuries after the mihna, their leaders rarely acquired political influence after this episode. As a consequence, the hold of the ‘ulama’ on doctrinal aspects of the Islamic public sphere was strengthened, and within the ‘ulama’, the burgeoning Sunni element also grew stronger.

 Notes

I would like to thank the participants of the workshop “The Public Sphere in Muslim Societies,” held at the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute, for their remarks and comments.

[26] Habermas 1989, Calhoun 1994, Chartier 1991.

[27] Habermas 1989, 2.

[28] Chartier 1991, 20

[29] For a general overview of mihna see Hinds, EI²; on the interrogation of Ibn Hanbal during the mihna see Patton 1897; on the controversy over the createdness of the Qur’an see Madelung 1974; for a survey of modern historiography of the mihna see Nawas 1994.

[30] For a survey on Sunni attitudes toward kalam see Pavlin 1996. On the pre-mihna era see idem. 105–106. For a short remark on the tensions between the mutakallimun and muhaddithun see Pines 1996, 74. On this subject see also below.

[31] Crone and Hinds 1980, 93, observe that there were no confrontations between the caliphs and the ‘ulama’ in the early ‘Abbasid period, although they believe a confrontation was in the cards during that period. Zaman 1997, 102, 105, points out that up to al-Ma’mun, ‘Abbasid caliphs did not challenge the authority of the ‘ulama’.

[32] The caliphs’ change in attitude toward the mihna is noted in Zaman 1997, 112.

[33] On Ibn Abi Du’ad see K. V. Zettersteen and Ch. Pellat, EI²; for an interesting presentation of his contribution to the Mu’tazila see Ibn al-Nadim (d. end of fourth century a.h.; tenth century a.d.) 1970, 409. For an argument that he was not a Mu’tazili see Van Ess 1992, 481.

[34] Zaman 1997, 105.

[35] Ibid.

[36] For a similar reading of Abu Yusuf’s (d. 182/798) tract see Zaman 1997, 91–101.

[37] Abu Yusuf 1969, 35.

[38] Ibid., 39

[39] Ibid., 37.

[40] al-Tabari (d. 310/923) 1987, 200.

[41] Ibid., 201.

[42] Ibid., 202.

[43] Ibid.

[44] For a more detailed presentation of ‘Im al-rijal see below.

[45] Ibn Ahmad, Salih (d. 266/880) 1981, 56, 59, 60; Ibn Ishaq, Hanbal (d. 273/886) 1977, 49; for a Mu’tazili description of this interrogation see al-Jahiz, Abu ‘Uthman ‘Amr b. Bahr (d. 255/869) 1979, vol. 1, 292–96.

[46] Ibn Ishaq, Hanbal 1977, 51; Ibn Ahmad, Salih 1981, 56.

[47] Ibn Ishaq, Hanbal 1977, 51; a similar reply appears in Ibn Ahmad, Salih 1981, 56.

[48] al-Tabari 1987, 203.

[49] al-Jahiz 1979, vol. 1, 298.

[50] al-Tabari 1987, 202.

[51] Ibid.

[52] Ibid., 203.

[53] Ibn Ahmad, ‘Abdallah (d. 290/903) 1986, 103–106.

[54] For a statistical study of the decline in sectarian transmitters of Prophetic traditions see Melchert 1992. On the pressure that was placed by the muhaddithun upon the mutakallimun see the remarks by the Mu’tazili writer al-Jahiz 1979, vol. 3, 283–89. Even though al-Jahiz and al-Ma’mun do not mention ‘Im al-rijal, the practices that they attribute to the muhaddithun and their consequences fit this label.

[55] On all three see Ibn Hajar al-Asqalani (d. 852/1449) 1984. For Mu’adh b. Hisham see vol. 10, 196–97; for ‘Abad b. Mansur see vol. 5, 104–105; for Thaur b. Yazid see vol. 2, 33–35.

[56] Juynboll 1983, 164, 165.

[57] Goldziher 1971, 135.

[58] Juynboll 1983, 20.

[59] al-Khatib al-Baghdadi (d. 463/1072) 1966, vol. 14, 259.

[60] Ibid., 259, 260.

[61] Abu Hanifa and many of his disciples were reputed to have embraced theological ideas of the mutakallimun.

[62] Al-Khatib al-Baghdadi 1966, vol. 12, 116, 117; Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani, Ahmad b. ‘Ali 1984, vol. 1, 63.

[63] Ibn Hibban, Muhammad (d. 354/965) 1976, vol. 2, 110.

[64] Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani 1984, vol. 9, 120–22.

[65] On hidden tensions see Crone 1980, 77; On cooperation see Zaman 1997, 12.

[66] Melchert 1992.

 Chapter Two: Religious Leadership and Associations in the Public Sphere of Seljuk Baghdad

DAPHNA EPHRAT

During the eleventh century emerging social associations and institutions developed in Islamic societies to disseminate religious knowledge (‘ilm), apply the Islamic religious law (the shari’a), and harness mysticism. During this century, a period often called the “Sunni revival,” the four Sunni schools of law (the madhahib, sing. madhhab) were consolidated, the nuclei of the Sufi brotherhoods were formed, and the religious sciences colleges (madaris, sing. madrasa) and Sufi centers for devotion and learning (khawaniq, sing. khanqah, or rubut, sing. ribat), were founded. These developments took place against the background of the ‘Abbasid caliphate’s disintegration— process that began as early as the late ninth century—and the subsequent rise to power in the early eleventh century of a new Turkish sultanate, the Great Seljuks.[67]

This chapter, in seeking to evaluate the significance of religious leadership and associations in the public sphere, addresses several questions: to what extent did the religious leadership and the groupings that grew up around it enjoy autonomy vis-0-vis the central authorities, that is, develop and restructure according to their own dynamics, independent of the official sphere? Did the political rulers intervene in religious matters at all? Were the madhahib the nuclei of public sphere arenas and the focus of solidarity for local communities? What were the bases of solidarity that bound members of the legal schools together? Did the character and operation of religious association as an arena of public sphere undergo changes over time? These questions will be dealt with in the particular context of Seljuk Baghdad (from the Seljuk conquest of the city in 1055 to the dissolution of the Great Seljuks' empire in the mid-twelfth century). Significantly, the city of Baghdad, which more than any other Islamic city suffered from the upheavals and instability of this century, featured prominently in the madhahib's process of consolidation and the development of the madrasa into its "mature" form. Indeed, the madaris founded in Baghdad in the late eleventh century represented a new form of organization. For the first time schools were founded on the large Islamic endowments (waqfs) that had been given in perpetuity for the teaching of the law according to one of the four Sunni madhahib (the Shafi'i, Hanafi, Hanbali, and Maliki). The substantial waqfs endowed by the founders, often the Seljuk viziers and sultans, paid the salaries of the teachers and stipends for students, thereby increasing the new schools' attraction.[68]

Eleventh-century Baghdad, it is also important to note, was a city in which all four Sunni law schools were represented, and which retained its position as a major religious and intellectual center, a magnet for aspiring students, even as its central political and economic role was eroded. As the seat of the 'Abbasid caliphs and representatives of the Seljuk sultans, the caliphal city remained a major center of government as well.

 The 'Ulama' and The Official Sphere

Historians of medieval Islamic societies have largely agreed that with the emergence of the Seljuks as the new ruling elite in the central lands of Islam, patronage and sponsorship of Sunni religious institutions and the religious scholars, the 'ulama', reached unprecedented heights. This policy was nowhere more clearly revealed than in the foundation of madaris on substantial endowments, and the employment of their graduates as religious and civil officials. Given their traditional status in Islamic societies and the nature of the ruling elite during this period, the choice of the 'ulama' as benefactors of state patronage should not seem surprising. Deriving their moral authority and their standing from the shari'a, they were the sole civilian elite that could bridge the gap between the alien Turkish military elite and the indigenous population. Moreover, the ‘ulama’ could legitimize the Seljuk regime by enjoining obedience on the local population, as well as by performing a host of tangible and intangible services for the government. The heterogeneous character of their socioeconomic background and networks, and their close ties with the urban populace, further strengthened the position of the ‘ulama’ as a “glue,” intermediaries between the rulers and their subjects. For the ‘ulama’ came from, or had representatives in, all segments of the society, including the ruling elite.[69]

The ‘ulama’ of Seljuk Baghdad appear in our sources as administrators of mosques, schools, and orphanages—functions that put them in control of great corporate wealth. Occasionally, they also acted as patrons of local groups and spokesmen of the populace. They were, on several levels, a powerful political presence, taken very seriously by the political rulers, who sought their advice and support. Their ties with the urban populace took a variety of forms. As teachers they instructed the general Muslim community in the fundamentals of their religion. As qadis they administered religious law; as muftis they expounded this law by issuing fatwas (legal opinions). As pious and charismatic leaders they considered themselves responsible for correct Islamic behavior. As a group they shared an ethic of public service, providing educational, religious, and legal guidance for the Muslim community. Phrases such as “he informed the people” (afada al-nas), “the people derived benefit from him” (intafa’a al-nas bihi), and “he educated the people with fatwas” (‘arafa al-nas bi’l-fatwa) appear frequently in the biographies of ‘ulama’ of this period.[70] Accounts of ‘ulama’ deeply dedicated to public service further convey the impression of a group closely linked to the urban populace and playing a vital role in daily community life. Many ‘ulama’ are praised for their generosity to the poor. They are reported to have supported the needy from their own pockets or given them a portion of their income, and to have collected the poor tax (zakawat) and alms (sadaqat) and distributed the money to their poor followers (ashab).[71]

In the view of several scholars, while enhancing the position of the ‘ulama’ in the public sphere, state patronage—primarily through the foundation of madaris and employment of their graduates—sowed the seeds for the creation of a religious establishment incorporated into the governmental apparatus and dependent on the military ruling elite. To fulfill their religious and social roles, the ‘ulama’ depended not only on the central government for protection against external enemies but also on gifts and endowments supplied by the military elite, who controlled and manipulated the main resources of the society. The underlying assumption here is that the madaris were state instruments intended to control institutions of learning that would give the political rulers influence over the ‘ulama’.[72]

An inquiry into the pattern of appointment to lucrative posts—qadis in the main courts, teachers (mudarrisun, sing. mudarris) in the great colleges — and the prerogatives of their holders, is one way to assess the autonomy of ‘ulama’ placed at the head of the religious institutions vis-ɒ-vis the political rulers. To be sure, in theory, it was the political rulers—Seljuk sultans and their viziers—who appointed the qadi and the mudarris, paid their salaries, and dismissed them at will. However, the pattern of appointment, if there was any definite pattern, seems to have depended on personal ties between an individual patron and a particular religious scholar, rather than on ties of patronage binding the ‘ulama’ as a group to the official sphere.[73] Moreover, the biographies of the appointees reveal that in practice these appointments confirmed an existing leadership rather than created a new one. A considerable number of scholars who taught in the madaris of Seljuk Baghdad and served as qadis in the city’s courts had already acquired renown as great scholars of religious law in their time; these included the heads of the schools of law and the chief qadis of Baghdad and its environs. In fact, appointments to the posts of qadi and mudarris may even have been subject to the decision of the holders of these positions, who would naturally recommend their most qualified and closest disciples. Whether or not mudarrisun and qadis actually nominated their own successors, our sources attest that many disciples who were closely associated with their masters did eventually succeed them in their positions.[74] Yet the involvement of the ‘ulama’ in the appointment process could go beyond mere suggestions regarding which of their disciples were appropriate for teaching or judicial positions. In their endeavor to further their control over such important sources of patronage, the most reputable and powerful scholars passed their positions on to their own sons and relatives. This phenomenon of inherited high-ranking religious posts, already apparent in the late eleventh century, became more evident in the course of the subsequent century, the period that initiated the decline of the Seljuk Empire. Members of the ruling elite continued to build and endow madaris and assign scholars to religious institutions. However, as a result of the growing weakness of the central authorities, the ties of patronage between the rulers and the ‘ulama’ loosened and Baghdadi ‘ulama’ came to enjoy greater freedom in the choice of their successors and the administration of the religious institutions in general.[75]

Once a scholar was appointed to the post of teacher of the law in the madrasa he seemed to enjoy complete freedom in the admission of students, the sequence and method of all instruction, and the choice of treatises. Although the madrasa was founded for the teaching of the traditional religious and legal sciences (to the exclusion of the so-called “ancient,” rational sciences), what a professor taught was not closely regulated. He would teach what he knew, and there are no examples of a trustee (nazir, mutawalli)—the administrator of the waqf by which the madrasa was founded—complaining about the study content or reprimanding or dismissing a mudarris because he taught the “wrong books” or in the “wrong way.” Thus, there were teachers who, in their partiality to the rationalist fields, would teach them under the guise of the traditional Islamic sciences or through the ancillary subject of the popular sermon (wa’z), which in the Shafi’i madaris bore a theological message of a rationalist Ash’ari message. We can learn about such attempts primarily from accounts of the objections of the Hanbalis, who headed the movement of “the people of hadith” (ahl al-hadith).[76]

Although more dependent than the mudarris on the political rulers for his employment and status, the qadi enjoyed no less freedom in the administration of the shar’i court and the judicial procedures than did the mudarris in the instruction of the law in the madrasa. The sultan would appoint the qadi over the shar’i court while exercising “administrative” justice in the civil court (the mazalim) personally or through his agents. The law administered in the qadi’s court, as well as the rules of evidence and procedure, were those laid down in the shari’a. The qadi enjoyed full freedom in the administration of the shar’i law; there is no evidence of members of the ruling elite intervening in the application of the law. Held in a mosque, in his residence, or in some other duly appointed place, the qadi’s court was concerned primarily with family lawsuits and matters of personal status: the settlement of litigation, the execution of testaments, and matters of inheritance, escheat, and transfer of property. Taken together, the qadi’s roles and prerogatives made him a crucial figure in the public sphere of Seljuk Baghdad. Apart from his strictly judicial functions, the qadi was responsible for the administration of the affairs of orphans, widows, and others legally incapacitated. Moreover, the chief qadi (qadi al-qudat) was usually entrusted with the “general supervision” (nazar ‘amm) of pious endowments, in particular in mosques, and the estates of orphans and other persons, as well as with the supervision of officials in the legal administration, notably the market inspector (muhtasib). His supervision of the mosques sometimes included the power to nominate the preacher of the Friday sermon (khatib) and leader of the public prayer (imam), though in Baghdad the khatibship was often secured for the Hashimites, descendants of the clan of Muhammad. With regard to the administration and supervision of the endowments supporting madaris, there were a variety of practices during the Seljuk period. If the founder had not appointed a controller-supervisor of the endowment (nazir), the chief qadi administered the waqf directly; if, however, as happened in Seljuk Baghdad, each of these endowments had its private controller, the chief judge merely exercised general supervision over the administration of the waqfs.[77]

Due to the prestige and public respect enjoyed by the chief qadi, and the qadis in general, they occasionally acted as envoys and mediators. Already in 433/1041 the caliph, al-Qa’im, sent the famous qadi Abu al-Hasan Al-Mawardi as his envoy to the Seljuk chieftain Tughril Bey to inquire into conditions in the domains conquered by the Seljuks or the object of their future expansionist intentions.[78] After the establishment of Seljuk rule in Baghdad, leading ‘ulama’—chief qadi s, in particular-wee sent by the caliphs to intercede with state officials who overstepped their authority in Baghdad or oppressed the local population. For example, in 495/1101, when strife between the Baghdadi populace and the head of the local police (shihna) broke out, the caliph sent ad-Damaghani, the chief judge, to intercede.[79] In addition, chief qadis came to be involved in the contraction of marriage alliances between the houses of the caliph and the sultan, a matter that had significant political implications. Still, the most significant political role of the chief qadi was his participation in the oath-taking ceremony (bay’a), which confirmed the appointment and authority of a new caliph, at the side of the vizier, the head of the army, and other high military dignitaries. Following the conquest of Baghdad by the Shi’i Buyids (in 945) and throughout the Saljuk period, the chief qadi maintained this prerogative.[80]

If not through official appointment to high-ranking positions, was it through the incorporation of the ‘ulama’ into the official sphere that the political rulers created and dominated a religious establishment? My investigation has shown that apart from the ‘ulama’ assuming offices in the qadi- ship—a special category between religious scholarship and governmental service—the number of religious scholars who entered state bureaucracy as chancery and fiscal officials was relatively small. Thus, the ‘ulama’ of Seljuk Baghdad were far from being entirely integrated into the official sphere.[81] Rather, the overwhelming majority of the Baghdadi ‘ulama’ during this period were not employed by the state and did not hold any official religious or administrative positions. Among them were hundreds of hadith transmitters and teachers of the law in a variety of educational forums, who lived on individual donations and gifts or sustained their teaching activities with other professions (notably trade), and the muftis, who acted independently of all outside powers, especially governmental power. Muftis were not appointed by the state, their authority was based on their reputation as learned and pious men, their opinion had no official sanction, and a layman might resort to any scholar he knew and in whom he had confidence. During the Seljuk period the individual soliciting the mufti for his legal opinion remunerated him; but many muftis performed the service without charging a fee, especially when they had other means of support.[82]

Doubts about whether to associate with the government at all, which had characterized their predecessors under the ‘Abbasids, continued to disturb many ‘ulama’ during the Seljuk period and probably increased as a result of the nature of the ruling elite and the growing ties of patronage between the political rulers and the ‘ulama’. Such reoccurring phrases as “to pursue worldly success” (talab al-dunya), “to meddle in worldly matters” (dahkhl fi ashghal al-dunya), or “to mingle with the people of the world” (khalt abna’ Al-dunya) convey the criticism and disrespect felt toward ‘ulama’ who associated with men of wealth and power. In contrast, refusal to accept the financial patronage of the rulers, and abstention from any connection with them, became a source of pride, respect, and prestige. In their competition for public esteem many ‘ulama’ thus placed a high value on separating themselves from the moral corruption that tainted the state’s acts. Indeed, even those who benefited from state patronage by accepting paid positions, such as that of qadi, distanced themselves from the political rulers and from court life. At the same time, in their endeavor to draw themselves closer to the urban population, these religious and civil officials would use the endowments and gifts supplied to them to assume the role of patrons and benefactors of the people.[83]

It may thus be argued that in the long run, rather than increasing their dependence on the political rulers, state patronage allowed the ‘ulama’ to carry out their social roles independently of the official sphere. They enjoyed autonomy not only in the institutions related to the application and transmission of Islamic religious law but in the public sphere of Seljuk Baghdad as a whole. Moreover, due to their centrality in the public sphere, the ‘ulama’— both those who benefited from state patronage and those who refused any endowments or gifts from the rulers—could put pressure on the political authorities to enforce the norms of the Islamic community (the umma) laid down in the shari’a, of which they were the acknowledged interpreters.

 The Madhahib as Arenas of Public Sphere

By the twelfth century the four Sunni legal schools, the madhahib, had been consolidated as networks of masters and disciples, united on the ideological level by their adherence to the doctrines of their school’s founder and tied together socially by a variety of personal ties.[84] By that time Baghdad had become a major scene in the process of the crystallization of the Hanafi, Shafi’i, and Hanbali schools, both as legal bodies and as social networks. Members of these three legal schools dominated the application of religious law and transmission of the religious and legal sciences, though prominent representatives of the Maliki and Zahiri schools were still present in the city.[85] Most Shafi’i scholars in Seljuk Baghdad were transients and immigrants, drawn to the city primarily from Iran, as were many ‘ulama’ of the Hanafi school. In contrast, the Hanbali school in Baghdad during this period was dominated by native-born ‘ulama’ .[86]

Except for the ‘ulama’ of the Hanbali school of theology and law, which was often identified with the theological stream of ahl al-hadith, references to the theological inclinations of ‘ulama’ of the different legal schools are rare. What we do know, however, indicates that for the most part Ash’ari theology, which was often regarded as a compromise between rationalism and traditionalism, appealed to the Shafi’is, while those who inclined toward Mu’tazili rationalist theology were more likely to be Hanafis.[87]

Another difference among the Baghdadi madhahib relates to the kind of offices their scholars held and to their consequent relationships with the political rulers. Nearly a third of the Shafi’i and Hanafi scholars held paid civil and religious offices, often as professors in the madaris founded by the political rulers for legal scholars of the two schools, as well as various positions in the judiciary. The Shafi’is, who gained power under the vizierate of Nizam al-Mulk, predominated in the office of the mudarris. But after his death (in 1092), and up to the mid-twelfth century, the Hanafis were the most favored. The Hanbalis, who normally refrained from seeking the financial patronage of the political rulers, largely controlled the professorships in the great mosques as well as the khatibships, positions that were not subsidized by the state.[88]

That by the twelfth century the majority of the Baghdadi ‘ulama’, and probably those of other Islamic cities as well, belonged to one or another of the legal schools is evidenced by the growing number of scholars who are referred to in biographical dictionaries by their affiliation (nisba) to a madhhab. However, there is as yet no way of estimating what percentage of lay persons identified themselves with a specific school, nor of estimating exactly what this affiliation meant. Did they look to its scholars for guidance on proper Islamic conduct, its witnesses to register contracts and marriages, and its judges to mediate disputes? Did they have customs, leaders, and patrons of their own?[89] Nor do we know much about the internal structure of the madhahib. Circles of teachers and their students, along with legal functionaries such as deputies, notaries, and clerks in the service of the qadis, probably made up the core of the schools. It is also possible that from this core membership the law schools branched out to include a larger number of people who adhered to them on the basis of birth or the traditional membership of their quarter; they may have prayed in the same mosque, studied in the same Qur’anic school or madrasa under the teachers of their respective madhahib, even married each other. Bab al-Basra is a good example of a quarter associated with a particular school of law. Yet, though generally considered to be the Hanbali section of town, members of all legal schools taught or studied in the quarter’s mosques as a matter of routine.[90] Only when attempts were made to preach Ash’arism in the mosque of al-Mansur—the stronghold of the Hanbali community—did it become an arena of conflict between the religiously defined factions.[91] Moreover, people tended to settle in quarters according to common professional pursuits and/or geographical origins.[92] The issue of the various schools as social organizations in specific residential quarters is thus complex, and the resulting picture unclear.

In trying to evaluate the extent to which the legal schools in Seljuk Baghdad became the organized bodies in which society was structured, however, a distinction should be made among the three legal schools dominating religious learning in the city. The difference between the madhahib in terms of geographical origins, theological inclinations, and office holding must have affected the networks of social relations into which the schools' 'ulama' entered, and consequently their status and roles in the public sphere.

Since there are few biographical dictionaries of Hanafis, it would be difficult to describe any general features of this school in Baghdad. The many Shafi'i biographies, however, convey the portrait of an exclusive, elitist group of legal scholars, immersed in intensive study and transmission of the law in their study circles, teaching mosques, and madaris. It is also important to bear in mind that the majority of Shafi'is in Baghdad came from elsewhere, primarily the provinces of eastern Iran. Some settled in Baghdad and gained a reputation in their own small scholarly groupings, others moved to other Islamic cities or returned to their hometowns. To judge from the letter sent by al-Shirazi, the leader (imam) of the Shafi'is in Baghdad, to the Seljuk vizier (cited below), the school remained a minority community, unable to put down roots in the caliphal city and attract a large local following. The inclination of some leading 'ulama' of the school toward Ash'arism, and even more important, their financial patronage by the political rulers primarily through the foundation of madaris, certainly did not contribute to their popularity, serving instead as a pretext for their criticism by the Hanbalis and their followers. Naturally, the acceptance of paid religious and civil positions by many scholars of both the Shafi'i and Hanafi schools involved a certain degree of association with the political rulers. In contrast, only rarely do we find any references in their biographies to their association with other social groups, such as merchants or the common people.

Hanbalism—a school of law and theology—was the most localized and inclusive of the Baghdadi schools.[93] Preserving the old, informal style of scholarly association, the school was open to a relatively large number of part-time scholars, from various professional and social "classes," committed to the study and transmission of the Prophetic traditions. From its circles of masters and disciples, Baghdadi Hanbalism thus reached out to include a community of followers from among the unlearned people to become a genuinely popular movement.

Driven primarily by religious motives, Hanbali preachers and theologians sought a remedy for the decline of the ‘Abbasid caliphate and its capital by insisting on morality and individual action to combat religious and social unwarranted innovations (bid’a). It was this view of Islam’s glorious past, as well as the distance many kept from the government, that helped their movement gain many supporters.[94] Phrases such as “he guided the people” (sada Al-nas), “the people adhered to him” (‘akafa al-nas bihi), and the “Sunni gained victory with him” (intasara bihi ahl al-sunna), which appear in biographies of Hanbali ‘ulama’ as a matter of course, convey the impression of a group highly regarded by the populace and cultivating a large following.[95] Since they avoided the patronage of the political rulers, the Hanbalis depended on personal support among the school’s adherents to finance their activities and help the needy. Shaykhs with private means and wealthy patrons and supporters of the school founded educational institutions and provided financial support to teachers and students. Among the most generous benefactors of the Baghdadi Hanbalis was the wealthy merchant Shaykh al-Ajjal Abu Mansur b. Yusuf. Upon his death, a group of Hanbalis went to his grave, rubbed their cheeks against it, and cried: “O Master! ... Whom do we have who will assist the Muslims after you? In whom shall we seek refuge after seeking it in God?”[96] Designed to cater for the everyday needs of the school’s followers, such patronage undoubtedly reinforced the social identity and unity of the Hanbali school. Hence the importance of investigating the informal social practices that lie beyond the organizational forms.

Several historians have suggested that the foundation of the madrasa as a formally organized college for a particular school of law might have lent the madhahib a greater unity and identity, thereby contributing to their process of consolidation. United hitherto by the international system of scholarly connections, the legal schools found a new mode of organization for their legal instruction, religious propaganda, and political action.[97] Obviously, this interpretation of the social effect of the establishment of madaris is at odds with the view—frequently repeated in the literature—describing the transmission of religious lore as a highly personal process, one dependent entirely upon the relationships between individual shaykhs and their disciples.[98] Given this primary characteristic of the transmission of ‘ilm, scholarly groupings that constituted the core of the madhahib constructed their identities and loyalties around renowned shaykhs, rather than around educational institutions.[99] The situation in Seljuk Baghdad seems to have conformed to the latter description; the madaris had not yet come to monopolize or even dominate religious learning. Nor were the new schools centers around which scholarly networks were formed and crystallized. Rather, the transmission of Islamic learning and the social ties that grew up around it took place in a variety of study circles (halaqat, sing. halqa) convened wherever a celebrated shaykh sat.[100] It is noteworthy that the ‘ulama’ of the Hanbali school, the most coherent madhhab of all, were the last to adopt the madrasa as a teaching institution, and even when they did, most of the school’s teaching and preaching activities continued to take place outside the madrasa. As for the Shafi’is, given the absence both of traditional, well-established Shafi’i forums in Baghdad, and a large following amongst the Baghdadi urban populace, the madaris founded for them probably played a role in establishing and ensuring the position of their madhhab in the city. The Shafi’is and their local followers would rally around their madaris, thereby stressing their madhhab affiliation in the face of threat and danger— notably when the Hanbalis mobilized their following to wage a struggle against the Shafi’is following the latters’ attempt to preach Ash’arism in their madaris. In a letter sent by al-Shirazi (the schools’ leader) to the caliph’s vizier Fakhr Al-Dawla on one of these occasions, he complained, “[The Shafi’is] are but a small community, which enjoys neither sufficient followers nor governmental support to challenge their opponents. They therefore gather in their madrasa [the Nizamiyya madrasa], which was erected to serve their small community as a home (dar) and a place of refuge (malja’) in good and bad times.”[101]

Indeed, it was primarily on shared theological and moral concepts that the ties of social solidarity among the adherents of a madhhab were based, rather than, as one might have expected, on legal interpretation per se.[102] This further explains why the Hanbalis achieved greater coherence. While within the other legal schools there was still dissension between the rationalists (ashab al-ra’y, or Mu’tazilites), and the traditionalists (ahl al-hadith), the Hanbalis formulated a rather uniform position in matters of theology, dogma, and morality. Consequently, Hanbali preachers and theologians succeeded in becoming the dominant force in the movement for the restoration of Sunnism from its beginning in the late tenth century.

Thus, the Hanbalis, who were relatively removed from the ruling elite and its resources, developed to a greater extent than the other madhahib in Seljuk Baghdad a social organization around their networks of masters and disciples. This is not to say that the Shafi’i and Hanafi schools did not develop and restructure according to their own dynamics, or that their scholars did not play significant social roles as teachers, muftis, and qadis, as well as patrons and leaders of local groups.[103] Still, given their association with the political rulers, the elitist nature of their scholarly networks, and the theological dissension within their ranks, they did not develop into social organizations similar to that of the Hanbalis in Seljuk Baghdad.

 The Dynamics of Religious Factionalism

During the eleventh century the city of Baghdad still suffered from the severe religious factionalism whose origins can be traced back to the time of the “inquisition” (mihna) in the early ninth century. By the tenth century the Hanbalis had become the most vigorous and dynamic sub-faction among the Sunni population of Baghdad. At the heart of the conflict between the Hanbalis and their rivals in the caliphal city was the old disagreement between ahl al-hadith and ahl al-ra’y over the status of rational investigation. Fearing that rational inquiry into divine revelation would detract from the perfect integrity of the simple original faith, the Hanbalis led the movement of ahl Al-hadith, which insisted on finding hadith solutions to legal and theological questions whenever possible. Hence, in addition to taking it upon themselves to persecute the Shi’a, Hanbali popular leaders and theologians were occupied in fighting rationalism of all shades, trying to enforce their rigid orthodoxy on Baghdadi society, and honing the boundaries between the religiously defined groups. During the second half of the eleventh century the Hanbalis of Baghdad fought against the Ash’aris, deriving their support primarily from among the city’s lower classes.[104]

One of the most violent attacks of this kind occurred when the famous Ash’ari theologian and preacher Abu Nasr al-Qushayri al-Nishapuri arrived in Baghdad on his way to the hajj in 469/1076 and preached in the Nizamiyya madrasa, mixing theological remarks with his sermon. Mobilizing the masses, a group of Hanbalis waged a merciless war against the Shafi’is, accusing them of leaning toward Ash’arism. The riots were so violent that they are described in the sources as a fitna (lit. civil strife, rebellion). As the fitna intensified and a member of the Shafi’i school was killed, the Shafi’is fled to the Nizamiyya and closed its gates.[105] One poet, a witness to the violent riots, wrote to Nizam al-Mulk pleading with him to put an end to the fitna. “Order and security in the city have crumbled,” the poet warned, “... the soldiers are fighting one another ... and the people of Baghdad are oppressed and their honor has been trampled.”[106] The vizier then ordered that the Ash’ari preacher be removed from his lectern in the Nizamiyya and sent back home.[107] Again, in 475/1082, the Ash’ari theologian al-Bakri, who had previously accused the Hanbalis of heresy, was prevented by order of the vizier from preaching Ash’arism in the mosque of al-Mansur.[108] Several years later, in 484/1091, while visiting Baghdad, Nizam al-Mulk convened a group of Hanbalis to inquire into the theological debate between the Shafi’i and Hanbali schools regarding the Divine attributes. Ibn al-Jawzi, the Hanbali historian, responded to the accusation by the Shafi’is of the Hanbali anthropomorphization of God (tashbih, tajsim): “Those who associate with the political rulers and seek worldly benefits (talab al-dunya) have no right to fight us over theological questions.”[109]

These and similar accounts raise the question of the intervention of the political authorities in the internal debates between the religiously defined factions in Seljuk Baghdad. In contrast with several ‘Abbasid caliphs before them, Seljuk sultans and their viziers rarely participated in religious life; they knew very little about theological and legal controversies and did not strive to define Sunnism according to a centrally espoused dogma.[110] After all, as an alien political elite, the Seljuks could not raise similar religiously based claims to authority in religious matters. Indeed, except for one effort to exert religious control during the vizierate of Amid al-Mulk al-Kunduri, who in 1048 charged all proponents of Ash’ari theology in Nishapur with being heretical innovators, the Seljuks refrained from taking a stand in matters of local religious authority.[111] In other words, they did not strive to change the balance of power of the local factions. In a similar vein, Nizam al-Mulk’s preference for the Shafi’is as candidates for religious and civil offices was not intended to establish the Ash’ari “middle-road” orthodoxy, as has been asserted.[112] Nor was this preference designed to encourage the rivalries between the religiously defined factions in Baghdad, thereby strengthening the position of the central government vis-0-vis the ‘ulama’ .[113]

The main objective of Nizam al-Mulk and other members of the ruling elite was to put an end to, or at least reduce, the turmoil caused by debates among the local factions over proper creed and behavior. Hence, only when such debates involved large segments of the population posing a threat to public order, did the rulers step in to restore peace and order. On such occasions, they usually acted in favor of the religious faction that had already gained the largest local following. This may explain why, while patronizing the Shafi’is, Nizam al-Mulk took the side of the Hanbalis, their rivals in Baghdad, yielding to their demand to frustrate any attempt to preach Ash’arism in the city’s madaris and mosques.

During the last decades of the eleventh century, though still constituting a source of factionalism and causing occasional riots, the struggle against rationalism seems to have lost the vigor it had early in that century and consequently, its centrality in the public sphere. Simultaneously, a trend toward cooperation between ‘ulama’ of different schools of law and thought began to develop. In the unstable milieu created by the breakdown of the ‘Abbasid caliphate and the rise to power of an alien Turkish elite of military lords, there were ‘ulama’ who sought to maintain a unified Islamic community by delimiting a commonly accepted Sunni form of Islam and acting as a unified group. One of the most telling accounts attesting to collaboration for a common cause is that describing how al-Sharif Abu Ja’far, the head of the Hanbali faction, and Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi, the leader of the Shafi’i faction, struggled together against the spread of immorality, which was regarded as the reason for the great inundation of the year 464/1071. Mobilized by their shaykhs, the Hanbalis gathered in al-Qasr Mosque and called al-Shirazi and his followers to join them in their struggle against prostitution, the charging of interest, and the drinking of wine. The two shaykhs demanded that the caliph, al-Qa’im, destroy the brothels and uproot the other iniquities of the local population. At the same time, a letter was sent to the Seljuk sultan informing him of this demand.[114]

The creation of a commotion by people or groups with common interests distinct from those of the ‘ulama’ was another cause for collaboration between ‘ulama’ of different schools. This was the case when in 473/1080 the cloth merchant ‘Abd al-Qahir al-Hashimi became leader of the local futuwwa (association of young men, fityan). Having proclaimed himself the chief secretary (katib) of the fityan, he tried to control membership in the association by issuing a certificate of admission to each new member and even attempted to extend his leadership over futuwwa organizations in other Muslim cities. Urged by a group of Hanbalis, the caliph’s vizier ordered the head of the police (shihna) to subdue the leader (ra’is) of the fityan. Several fuqaha’ from different schools then issued a legal opinion ordering the fityan to end their disturbance (fasad) .[115] While reflecting the fear of leading ‘ulama’ that the association might become a source of factionalism and public disorder, this sole account of their attitude toward local popular forces may also testify to their endeavor to control the public sphere in the face of emerging rival groups.

In the course of the twelfth century the spirit of tolerance among members of the madhahib grew, and their popular activism began to fade away. A more equal distribution of remuneration by the political rulers among the schools contributed to the reduction of tensions among them and to a mutual recognition of legitimacy. The foundation of educational institutions for the instruction of the Qur’an and the hadith (dar al-Qur’an and dar al-hadith) during the late twelfth century stressed the shared traditions of the legal schools. Finally in 631/1232-1233 the Mustansiriyya madrasa was founded in Baghdad, comprising four madaris for the teaching of the law according to the four madhahib. Although the madaris remained open to their own adherents, the advent and spread of the multiple-system madrasa undoubtedly reduced the tensions among the schools and added a sense of unity among Sunni ‘ulama’.[116] However, given the weakness of the political authorities during the twelfth century, and the Seljuks’ noninterference in religious matters, the growing tolerance among the madhahib must have stemmed from a change in the internal dynamic of the ‘ulama’ themselves.

By the time the multisystem Mustansiriyya madrasa was founded in Baghdad, the debates over proper Islamic creed and behavior among the factions, named after the legal schools and led by their shaykhs, had faded away. Consequently, affiliation with the legal schools became increasingly formal, confined to the legal context. This change in the character and operation of the madhahib must have changed their position and role in the public sphere of Baghdad. Though leading ‘ulama’ within one or another of the madhahib continued to provide a variety of religious and social services for the Baghdadi Muslim community, at the end of the twelfth century the legal schools were no longer the leading factor in providing social affiliation and identity, and in creating a basis of factionalism.

 Conclusion

While focusing on the character and operation of religious leadership and associations in Seljuk Baghdad, this chapter has attempted to foster an understanding of the forces and dynamics of the public sphere in Islamic societies of the post-‘Abbasid era. At first glance, Baghdad was governed by an alien elite of military lords who, in their endeavor to establish their position in the caliphal city and ensure the obedience of its populace, tried to gain influence over the ‘ulama’ at the head of religious institutions and associations. However, a closer examination of the triangle formed by the rulers, the ruled, and the ‘ulama’ yielded a much more complex picture. Religious leadership and ‘ulama’-led associations were little affected by the policies of the Seljuks. Indeed, even ‘ulama’ who were incorporated into the official sphere carried out their religious and social roles independently of the political authorities. Being the sole group that could legitimize the alien regime, and as mediators between the rulers and the ruled, the position of the ‘ulama’ vis-0-vis the political authorities in the city’s public sphere was enhanced. Though lacking formal organization and means of coercion at their disposal, leading ‘ulama’ (the Hanbalis in particular) played a major role in the organization and shaping of communal life and became the foci of associations. The character of religious leadership and associations underwent changes in the course of the Seljuk period. At the heart of this process was the transformation of the legal schools from social solidarity groups into rigid professional bodies engaged in rigorous instruction and application of the Islamic religious law. By granting equal remuneration to the madhahib’s scholars in order to reduce the tensions among them, the rulers played a role in this process. But changes in the character and operation of religious leadership and association resulted from the changing dynamics within this group of ‘ulama’ itself.

In the late twelfth century a new religiously based social organization— the Sufi (mystic) brotherhoods, the turuq—assumed importance in the Baghdadi public sphere. Their beginnings had been modest, as religious and social life orbited around shaykhs who led an ascetic and exemplary life, refusing any worldly benefits. Significantly, authors of biographical dictionaries speak more about the outstanding zuhd (piety, asceticism) of these men than about their learning. They were endowed with baraka (divine blessing), performed miracles (karamat), and turned their residences (rubut) into centers of public preaching and distribution of charity as well as of pilgrimage to seek divine blessing.[117] Obviously strong links existed between a shaykh’s activities and his recognition in society; the more he provided for the spiritual and nonreligious needs of the common people, the more they gathered around him; the larger his following became, the more he was admired. Eventually, in the course of the thirteenth century, the Sufi brotherhoods were to replace the madhahib as the most significant religiously based and led social organizations in the public sphere. [118]

[67] For a perception of the eleventh century as a transitional period during which new forms of organization of religious and social life were laid see especially the introductory remarks and articles by Bosworth 1973, Bulliet

1973, Laoust 1973, and Mottahedeh 1973. See also Hodgson 1974, vol. 2, esp. 3, 8–9.

[68] The most important works on the madrasa are Makdisi 1961; 1971; 1981a.

[69] This is in concordance with the observations of Lapidus, who has offered us perhaps the most significant interpretation of the role and status of the ‘ulama’ in the later Middle Ages. Lapidus 1967, chapters 4 and 5; 1969, esp. 52–60. For a different interpretation see Bulliet 1972. Bulliet describes the ‘ulama’ of tenth-eleventh-century Nishapur as a civilian elite with “class” interests separate from those of other social categories, such as merchants and landowners. Made up of a small number of local families, this elite succeeded in guaranteeing its continuity by heredity. The different interpretations of the role and status of the ‘ulama’ must be related, at least to some extent, to the different political conditions in these cities. In contrast to Mamluk cities of the high Middle Ages, medieval Nishapur was placed under relatively indirect political control. Consequently, a “patriciate” evolved that enjoyed a greater degree of freedom and autonomy.

[70] For examples see Ephrat 2000, 136–37.

[71] Ibid.

[72] Watt 1968, 75–76 was the first to point out that education in the Nizamiyya madrasa (the most important madrasa of all) was designed to create an “orthodox bureaucracy.” Bulliet 1972, 73–75, claims that the Nizamiyya madrasa became a vital instrument of the policy of its famous founder, Nizam al-Mulk, in controlling what Bulliet labels the “patriciate” of Nishapur; and Leiser 1986, 18, notes that one of the reasons for founding madaris “was the desire of the ruling authorities to dominate, to a considerable degree, the religious elite.” Regarding the use of the waqf of the madaris as a political tool see also Arjomand 1999.

[73] The most telling example of such close association is that between Nizam Al-Mulk and the celebrated al-Ghazali. Upon the death of his master, the Shafi’i Ash’ari scholar al-Juwayni (known as Imam al-Haramayn) in 478/1085, al-Ghazali went to Nizam al-Mulk’s court at Isfahan and was sent by order of the vizier to occupy the chair of law in the Nizamiyya madrasa. Nizam al-Mulk inclined to Shafi’ism and, like al-Ghazali, was born and raised in a small village in eastern Iran. For the ties between al-Ghazali and Nizam al-Mulk see especially the biography of the former by al-Subki (d. 771/1370) 1966–1967, vol. 4, 101–22. Abu Bakr al-Khujandi (d. 552/1157), another mudarris in the Nizamiyya madrasa, also had close relationships with political figures. His biographer relates that he was so closely associated with them that “in the respect he gained he was more like a vizier than like an ‘alim.” Ibid., vol. 6, 134.

[74] For details see Ephrat 2000, 121–22.

[75] Ibid., 122–23.

[76] See for example the story below about the preaching of the Ash’ari Al-Qushayri in the Nizamiyya madrasa.

[77] For a general discussion of the prerogatives of the qadi under the Seljuks see Lambton 1968, 213, 227ff.; 1988, 72ff.

[78] Ibn al-Athir (d. 631/1233) 1965–1967, vol. 10, 28.

[79] Ibid., 117–18. One of the main functions of the shihna was to carry out the decisions of the qadi’s court when coercive force was necessary. On the office of the shihna see Lambton 1968, 244.

[80] See Saadeh 1977, 255–58.

[81] Of the total number of 121 ‘ulama’ whose religious or administrative positions are indicated in their biographies, only twelve held purely administrative positions. See Ephrat 2000, figure 6.1 (in chapter 6).

[82] For the position of the mufti during the Seljuk period see Makdisi 1981a, 197–200.

[83] The piety and generosity of the Shafi’i jurist and vizier Abu Shuja’ Al-Rudhrawari (known as Zahir al-Din), as related by Ibn Khallikan, serves as a good example: “He never left his house without having first read a portion of the Qur’an, paid the required alms-tax on all his property, and gave generous alms anonymously. After receiving a note informing him of a widow with four needy children, he ordered one of his servants to provide them with clothing and food. He then removed his own clothes and vowed neither to dress nor warm himself until the order was carried out.” Ibn Khallikan (d. 681/1282) 1970, vol. 5, 137.

[84] Studies on the consolidation of the legal schools up to the twelfth century include: Laoust 1959; Makdisi 1963; 1981a, 3–9; Bulliet 1972.

[85] During the eleventh century the Maliki school had its main centers in North Africa and Spain. In this century the Zahiri school’s importance gradually waned in Baghdad, and by the beginning of the subsequent century, it had disappeared completely from the city (the last representative of the school died in Baghdad around 475/1082). Its extinction in Baghdad, the cultural center of the Muslim world, marked a crucial phase in the process by which only the four schools that have survived down to our time remained. For the history of the Zahiri school in Baghdad see Makdisi 1963, 278–79.

[86] See Ephrat 2000, figures 2.2–2.7 (in chapter 2).

[87] Ibid.

[88] See ibid., figure 6.1 (in chapter 6).

[89] For historians who have tried to show that the schools of law were indeed meaningful social organizations in tenth to fifteenth-century urban Islamic societies, see Lapidus 1969; Bulliet, 1973; Makdisi 1981b. For a different interpretation see Chamberlain 1994, 2. It was the elite household, according to Chamberlain, that constituted the prime, if not sole, meaningful social framework in the high medieval Middle East.

[90] The most important mosque in Bab al-Basra, frequently mentioned in the sources as a meeting place for instruction and other scholarly pursuits of ‘ulama’ of all three legal schools, was the Friday mosque of al-Mansur. See Makdisi 1961, 4–6.

[91] See, for example, the story below about the preaching of the Ash’ari theologian al-Bakri.

[92] For example, according to al-Ya’qubi (d. 897/1491) 1892, 248, the entire area surrounding Bab al-Sham was inhabited by people from Balkh, Marv, and Bukhara. For other examples see Makdisi 1959, 180–88.

[93] Of the total number of 176 native-born ‘ulama’ in Seljuk Baghdad whose legal school affiliation is indicated in the sources, 91 were Hanbalis, compared with 38 Shafi’is, 24 Hanafis, 5 Malikis, and 2 Zahiris. See Ephrat 2000, figure 2.7 (in chapter 2).

[94] For the Hanbalis in Baghdad during the Seljuk period see Makdisi 1963; 1973; 1981b.

[95] See, for example, the descriptions of public demonstrations led by the Hanbali scholar Ibn al-Wafa’ in Ibn Rajab (d. 796/1393) 1952–1953, vol. 1, 52.

[96] Ibn al-Banna’ (d. 471/1078) 1956, part. 3, no. 100, 26.

[97] See, for example, Lapidus 1988, 165–66. Makdisi, 1981a, esp. 1–3, makes a clear distinction between schools of law and colleges of law. However, he too presents a parallel and interrelated development of the two types of institutions.

[98] Tibawi 1962 was the first to note that, for all the establishment of endowed and structured institutions of learning, Islamic education remained essentially informal, flexible, and linked to persons rather than to institutions. Most recently, Berkey 1992 has provided us with an extremely detailed and illustrative description of the informal character of Islamic education in Mamluk Cairo.

[99] This is in line with Mottahedeh 1980, which represents the most comprehensive study of the creation of networks of informal, personal ties (defined by family, ethnic origins, or sectarian homogeneity, or by a shared professional background) in the Buyid and early Seljuk periods. Taking over the role of formal and stable institutions, these networks constituted the nucleus of the social structure in the post-‘Abbasid era.

[100] For details see Ephrat 2000, 69–71. As Chamberlain 1994 has shown, even at a later period the madaris played a marginal role as far as the transmission of ‘ilm and the social relationships among the ‘ulama’ were concerned. Chamberlain 1994, esp. 69–90—referring to the period 1190 to 1350-stresses the marginality of the madrasa in the world of the ‘ulama’. The madrasa, Chamberlain asserts, was essentially a center for financial patronage, and, as such, had many uses that had nothing to do with education and the forging of relationships among the religiously learned.

[101] Sibt b. al-Jawzi (d. 654/1256) 1968, 187–88.

[102] Bulliet 1972 and 1994, focusing on the ‘ulama’ of medieval Nishapur, is probably the most important contribution toward the understanding of the meaning of affiliation to the legal schools and the source of conflicts between them. See his concluding remarks in Bulliet 1994, 110–11.

[103] For example, Abu Hamid al-Isfahani (d. 406/1016), who at the beginning of the eleventh-century instituted the Baghdadi method or system (tariqa) of Shafi’i law, is said to have been deeply committed to the spread of religious learning (nashr al-‘ilm) and other community services. People used to bring him their payments of the poor tax (zakawat) and alms (sadaqat) so that he could distribute the money. Besides distributing a monthly allowance to his poor followers (ashab), he donated money for the pilgrimage caravans. Eventually, “he became a leader in religious and worldly matters” (intahat ilayhi riyasat al-din wa’l-dunya). See Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 597/1200) 1940, vol. 7, 277. Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi, the leader of the Shafi’is in Baghdad up to his death in 467/1083 and the first mudarris in the Nizamiyya madrasa is also said to have combined the two leaderships. See Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1951, part. 8, vol. 1, 83.

[104] See especially Makdisi 1963; 1973; 1981b.

[105] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1968, 187.

[106] Ibid.

[107] Ibid., 188; and see also Ibn al-Jawzi 1358/1940, vol. 8, 305–306.

[108] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1968, 217–18; Ibn al-Jawzi 1358/1940, vol. 9, 34; Ibn Al-Athir 1965–1967, vol. 10, 124–25.

[109] Ibn al-Jawzi 1358/1940, vol. 9, 484.

[110] Chamberlain 1994, 167–78, makes the same observation with regard to the Mamluk authorities in high medieval Damascus. His examination of the contest over correct belief in Damascus during this period allows a great advance of our understanding of the relationships between the scholarly and ruling elites in pre-Ottoman Islamic societies.

[111] Al-Kunduri’s official ban forced hundreds of Ash’aris out of their posts and put many of them on the road to exile. For a detailed account of this episode see Bulliet 1973, 80–85.

[112] Watt 1968, 75–76, was the first to point out that by supporting Ash’arism, the Great Seljuks played a significant role in the process of Sunni revivalism. This view has been disputed by Makdisi 1973, 155–68, who argues that the renewed activity of Sunni Islam was independent of the Seljuks and Ash’arism.

[113] For a different view see Laoust 1973, 175–85.

[114] Ibn al-Jawzi 1940, vol. 8, 272; Ibn al-Athir 1965–1967, vol. 10, 99; Ibn Kathir (d. 774/1372) 1966, vol. 12, 105.

[115] Ibn al-Jawzi 1940, vol. 8, 326–27.

[116] For the foundation of the various educational institutions see Makdisi 1971, 83.

[117] For the proliferation of rubut in Baghdad and their consolidation as Sufi centers where a variety of educational and social activities took place see Amin 1965, 239–41. See also Jawad 1954.

[118] For the proliferation of the Sufi brotherhoods see Levtzion in this volume.

 Chapter Three: Religion in the Public Sphere: Rulers, Scholars, and Commoners in Syria under Zangid and Ayyubid Rule (1150–1260)

DANIELLA TALMON-HELLER

At least five tracts composed around the middle of the thirteenth century criticize the people of Damascus for preferring superogatory public prayers to the obligatory daily prayers: a manual for the inspector of public morality (muhtasib), polemical works against unwarranted innovations (bida’), and legal responsa (fatwas). The tracts mention salat al-tarawih—long nocturnal prayers held during the second half of Ramadan—the celebration of laylat Al-nisf min sha’ban—the night of the fifteenth of the month of Sha’ban, perceived as a time of judgment and mercy—and salat al-ragha’ib—a prayer said on the first Friday night of Rajab, on which it was also customary to fast and to light candles in mosques.[119]

Of the three practices it was salat al-ragha’ib that was attacked most vehemently, the main argument against it being the lack of evidence that the Prophet ever performed it or approved of it.[120] Scholars’ endeavors to stop this popular practice failed. They themselves admit that mosques were full and brightly lit on the night in question. One of the leading polemicists against salat al-ragha’ib quotes contemporary imams complaining, as it were, that they were actually forced to lead the prayers—commoners (al-‘amma) were so keen on performing them. A decree issued under the pressure of the ‘ulama’ by the Ayyubid ruler al-Malik al-Kamil (615/1218-635/1238) banning this prayer in 632/1235, must have been disregarded, as five years later one of the prominent scholars of Egypt and Syria at that time, ‘Izz al-Din al-Sulami, was still engaged in denouncing the prayer.[121] Apparently, people refused to give up what they thought to be a correct and meritorious act of religious devotion, in spite of scholarly reservations. Finally, the sultan permitted it anew, receiving authorization from the mufti Ibn al-Salah al-Shahrazuri (d. 643/1245), a scholar who was known to approve of a variety of modes of piety.

Al-Shahrazuri had simply labeled the prayers bid’a hasana (welcome innovation), admittedly on basis of a “weak” hadith (that is, a tradition deriving from the Prophet supported with a not very reliable chain of authorities). He explained that he would rather see the crowd praying than doing anything else.[122] Hence, as a result of pressure from below, the questionable prayers were legitimized through the orthodox mechanism of ifta’ (the issuance of a legal opinion), and a sultanic decree.

The whole episode offers us an opportunity to reexamine the complex relationships and interactions between four participants in the public sphere of medieval Muslim societies: rulers, scholars, the common people, and the religious law. The following study is an attempt to do so, focusing on religious life in the public sphere in Syria, from its unification by Nur al-Din b. Zangi (549/1154) until the Mongol conquest and Mamluk occupation (658/1260).[123] Two points will be stressed: the contribution of commoners and rulers to the shaping of religious norms, and the pious atmosphere prevalent in the public sphere.

Michael Chamberlain, who studied the inner dynamics of Damascene society between 1190 and 1350, claims that the rulers of Damascus usually refrained from taking a stand in matters of religion, and whenever they did step in, it was to end riots and secure peace and order, not to reestablish orthodoxy or to enforce a doctrine.[124] This chapter argues that Zangids and Ayyubids did take a stand in matters of doctrine and of popular practice, and played an active role in all types of religious institutions of their times.

Contemporary historians quote Nur al-Din (d. 569/1174) making a commitment to defend religion against anything opposed to it, and to “the spread of religious knowledge, the refutation of innovation and the manifestation of religion in all these lands.”[125] Both he and Saladin (570/1174-589/1193) were dedicated to jihad against Shi’is and Franks, referred to within the wider framework of ihya’ al-sunna —the revivification of Sunni Islam in face of enemies from within and without.[126] Their successors adopted this program, and implemented it (albeit with varying degrees of enthusiasm), pursuing various lines of action. It should be noted that most Ayyubid princes enjoyed a thorough religious education to begin with, and some of them even had justified scholarly pretensions.[127] Saladin was a firm supporter of Ash’ari theology.[128] Al-Malik al-‘Adil (592/1196-615/1218) opted for the strict enforcement of Muslim prohibition of liquor, moral laxity and non-shar’i taxes (to the degree that in his days Damascus was said to be “clean and pure”);[129] al-Malik al-Mu’azzam (615/1218-624/1227) vigorously advanced the position of his adopted Hanafi school of law;[130] al-Malik al-Ashraf (626/1229-635/1237) nurtured a somewhat populist public veneration of the Prophet and took to the persecution of dissenters from what was considered to have been the Prophet’s proper path.[131]

Most of them tended to intervene in cases of socioreligious conflict: tension between Hanbalis and Shafi’is[132] and between Sufis and anti-Sufis,[133] quarrels between two Hanbali factions,[134] or opposition to established leadership inside the Jewish community.[135] As we saw above, even the liturgy in the mosques was not beyond their sphere of influence.

More often than not, ‘ulama’ and rulers cooperated in order to strengthen what may be labeled the mainstream Sunni camp: shar’i-minded and paradoxically inclusive of Ash’ari theology, moderate Hanbali theology, and moderate Sufism.[136] Radical Hanbali theologians, ecstatic and antinomian Sufis, religious skeptics, Shi’is, so-called zanadiqa (heretics),[137] and plebeian claimants to prophecy were doomed to marginalization, if not punished in a more severe manner.

A dramatic example is the assembly (majlis) that convened in the citadel of Aleppo to decide the fate of the prominent Sufi and theosophist Yahya b. Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardi. Al-Suhrawardi was accused of deliberately violating the shari'a (inhilal), holding heretical theological views and treading the path of the pagan philosophers. The faylasuf (Arabic word for philosopher) was regarded as a threat to the authority of the 'ulama', thereby threatening the political establishment as well. Al-Malik al-Zahir of Aleppo (582/ 1186-613/1216) was well inclined toward him, but 'ulama', and following them Saladin, al-Zahir's father and superior, ordered his execution. Graced with making the choice of the method of his own execution, al-Suhrawardi starved to death in the citadel of Aleppo.[138]

The execution of a scholar was an extremely rare event under the generally tolerant Ayyubids, but an unfavorable attitude toward those suspected of philosophical inclinations was to spread in their domains, easy to detect in the discourse of contemporary biographers and chroniclers. Some such suspects were barred from teaching, or banished from town.[139] An acclaimed scholar of law and theology, Sayf al-Din al-Amidi (d. 631/1233), was accused of incorrect theological beliefs and slack practice. He lost his positions in madaris in Cairo and Damascus, on the orders of al-Malik al-'Adil and Al-Malik al-Ashraf.[140]

The provocative Hanbali scholar 'Abd al-Ghani al-Maqdisi may be located on the other end of the intellectual spectrum. A majlis that convened in the citadel of Damascus in the presence of the local governor in 596/1199 turned into an investigation of his theological beliefs by hostile Shafi'i jurists. 'Abd al-Ghani was accused of teaching gross anthropomorphism (tajsim) in his lectures, and pronounced an "innovator." The governor sentenced him to exile, and ordered that the pulpit upon which he used to teach be demolished. In addition to that, the Hanbalis lost the privilege of prayer behind an imam of their own in the great mosque.[141]

Shi'is were more vulnerable. Shortly after the conquest of Aleppo in 541/1147, Nur al-Din warned the local religious authorities that if anyone dare to pronounce the Shi'i version of the call to prayer, he would be thrown from the minaret, head down. Eleven years later, when Nur al-Din lay severely ill, the Shi’is did dare again. Unfortunately for them, Nur al-Din recuperated and immediately enforced the proper Sunni call to prayer again. As far as we know, no Shi’i muezzin climbed to the top of that tower.[142]

The most important representative of antinomian Sufism in Syria during Ayyubid times, ‘Ali b. Abi al-Hasan al-Hariri (d. 645/1247), had spent a few years in prison. Finally he was banished from Damascus, along with the Qalandar dervishes. He and his jama’a (group, community) of young people— a mixed crowd of ahdath (rabble, in this case) and members of Damascene elite families—were accused of moral laxity, negligence in prayer and scandalous attire. Their expulsion marks the disappearance of heterodox Sufism from Damascus for some thirty years, as far as we know.[143]

We know even less about uneducated, non-establishment charismatic figures that appeared on the Syrian scene once in a while. Sources tell us mainly about their persecution, if they mention them at all. One of them was an ‘ajami (foreigner) who appeared in Damascus claiming to be ‘Isa b. Maryam (Jesus). He is said to have “corrupted [the belief of] a multitude of the commoners” (afsada jam’an min al-‘awamm). In compliance with a fatwa that sentenced the man to death, the governor of Damascus ordered his crucifixion in 595/1199.[144] A “crazy prophet,” known for his power to grow fruit out of season, made similar claims to prophethood in the late 630s/1230s. Many villagers followed him until he chose to retreat to the village of Sifsaf.[145] A Maghribi who showed up in the village of Mashghara in the province of Damascus shortly before the death of Nur al-Din (569/1174) and declared himself a prophet, caused much more trouble, and was treated accordingly. His rural followers rebelled against their landlords and fled to the mountains. They were tracked down by the army in Northern Syria during the month of Ramadan 570/1175 and killed in a cruel manner.[146]

For mainstream ‘ulama’, however, it was a period of unprecedented prosperity, particularly in Damascus and Aleppo. Dozens of new religious institutions were established and hundreds of posts became available for men of religious training. Numerous well-known teachers and aspiring students from other Muslim countries visited these cities and often remained in them, to become teachers and religious functionaries, or to serve in the state administration.[147]

In our sources, rulers are depicted—whether by way of faithful recording or by way of skillful reconstruction (probably both)—as careful to demonstrate deference toward the authority of the mufti, the qadi, and the shari'a.[148] Nur al-Din is said to have insisted upon strictly enforcing shar'i regulations concerning hearing witnesses in court and limitations on punishment, to the extent that contemporaries in Mosul complained of an increase in crime in their locality.[149] More specifically, when he undertook the reconstruction of the great mosque in Aleppo, and the work involved demolishing a nearby market owned by a religious endowment, he first consulted a mufti.[150] Sibt b. al-Jawzi, a contemporary of al-Nasir Yusuf (648/1250-658/1260), the last Ayyubid to have had ruled over Damascus and Aleppo, claims that al-Nasir governed "according to the regulations (qawanin) of the religious law."[151]

In the period that stretches between those two rulers, Saladin had a qadi certify that he used his private money to purchase from the bayt al-mal (the treasury) property that had been Frankish prior to his reconquest of Jerusalem, before endowing it as waqf.[152] Al-Malik al-'Adil listened to the moralizing of 'Abd al-Ghani al-Maqdisi, who made bold and even violent criticism of any sign of moral laxity in Damascus, as defined by the strictest Hanbali standards.[153] Al-Malik al-Ashraf, who was eager to keep a sandal considered to be the Prophet's, waited until its holder bequeathed it to him upon his death (restraining himself from getting possession of it in other ways), and finally placed it in a public institution—the dar al-hadith—so as to make it accessible to all.[154] The puritan qadi, mufti, and khatib 'Izz al-Din al-Sulami (d. 660/1262) ruled against the interests of the military elite twice, but was heeded nonetheless. In the first case he disqualified the 'itq (manumission) of high-ranking Egyptian mamluk emirs. Reluctantly, they went through the ceremony again, this time "performed in a shar'i manner." He spoke out again in Aleppo, before a meeting of the members of the military and scholarly elite, convened in the face of the Mongol threat of 657/1259. The issue under debate was raising money for the defense of the city, and al-Sulami held that the people should be asked to finance the army only if the soldiers had already sold their silver and gold.[155] One must not conclude that freedom of speech in politicoreligious matters was unrestricted: an earlier conflict between ‘Izz al-Din Al-Sulami and the political authorities ended with his dismissal from the pulpit of the Great Mosque of Damascus, his imprisonment, and finally—his exile from the city. On that occasion he had used his Friday sermon to attack the ruler’s lenient attitude toward the sale of arms to the Franks, and the territorial concessions that he had agreed to make.[156]

To end this survey of pious behavior let us take a look at the conduct of al-Malik al-‘Adil in 596/1200, as it offers a fine example of a well-publicized show of respect toward the religious law, and of the intricate reciprocal relationship between rulers and ‘ulama’. In the course of securing his domination over the confederation his brother Saladin left behind, al-Malik al-‘Adil disinherited Saladin’s ten-year-old grandson from the sultanate of Egypt. He then brought together a group of fuqaha’ and asked for their legal opinion regarding the right of a minor to rule. They issued a legal opinion asserting that he was unfit. The chronicles do not speculate on their motives. They do tell us that Malik al-‘Adil’s address to the emirs began with the words: “You have heard the decree of the ‘ulama’, ” and ended with a demand for their oath of alliance.[157]

Respect aside, the livelihood of thousands of scholars depended on state pensions and awqaf endowed by rulers, or by members of their families, in favor of madaris,[158] assemblies for scholarly disputation (majalis al-‘ilm),[159] and the composition and dissemination of religious literature.[160] Patronage was selective, of course, and was used to enhance the position of certain groups, or to divide power. Affiliation with the “right” school of law at the right time, and proper familial ties, seem to have been major factors in determining an ‘alim‘s chances of finding favor with a patron.

Once in control of Syria, Saladin replaced Hanafis by Shafi’is in the senior religious posts of chief qadi, head of Sufi lodges (shaykh al-shuyukh), khatib, and nazir (inspector) of the great mosque. Shafi’is continued to hold those posts throughout the Ayyubid period, except under al-Malik al-Mu’azzam (615/1218-624/1227), who promoted members of his adopted Hanafi madhhab. Less prestigious posts, those of the muhtasib and the assistant to the chief qadi, were usually given to Hanafis, as were many positions in madaris and on diplomatic errands.[161]

Of major relevance to the central themes of this chapter is the fact that Ayyubid rulers extended their patronage to institutions of religious education and learning intended for the community of believers in general, thus benefiting in particular ‘ulama’ of lower rank and laymen. They endowed Qur’anic schools for children (makatib),[162] Sufi lodges (khawaniq),[163] shrines (mashahid and maqamat) and sacred relics, mosques, public assemblies of exhortation (majalis al-wa’z), and gatherings for hadith recitation.

A series of public recitations of the Musnad of Ibn Hanbal (d. 241/855) by Hanbal al-Rusafi (d. 604/1207) from Baghdad were supported by al-Malik al-‘Adil, and honored with his presence. Al-Rusafi was merely a minor functionary at one of the mosques of his home city, one “accustomed to a poorman’s diet of oats,” who happened to be the last person to have heard the entire Musnad from a well-known deceased scholar, and took to the road in order to pass it on. Although the text he recited—a compilation of hadith classified according to its transmitters, rather than by subject matter—can hardly be considered as ideal for popular consumption, a multitude of laymen showed up, rubbing shoulders with the sovereign and his entourage and with all the leading scholars of Damscus.[164]

Rulers contributed to the establishment, upkeep and growth of shrines, established throughout Syria during the twelfth and thirteenth century. Some were built on recently “rediscovered” ancient graves of prophets and sahaba, others on the graves of popular scholars, shaykhs, and martyrs. The initiative for the inauguration of new sites came from men and women of diverse social standing, military and civilian functionaries and members of their household, and common folk in the towns and villagers (often inspired by dreams).[165] Once erected, sites were preserved and continued to develop thanks to awqaf dedicated by rulers or members of the elite, and contributions of goods and labor offered by local residents and visitors.

The story of Mashhad Ruhin in northern Syria is a fascinating example. A clerk in the administration of al-Malik al-Zahir of Aleppo (582/1186-613/1216) happened to find himself at the site of what was then a deserted sanctuary, considered to be the grave of Quss b. Sa’ida (an early Arabian monotheist), on one of his business trips. Miraculously cured of a lingering disease, he thereon decided to dedicate his time and money to the rehabilitation of the sanctuary. After some time al-Malik al-Zahir paid him a visit, and endowed the site with the revenues of a nearby village. His heir provided for the salaries of caretakers. A cistern, a bath-house, and a khan were endowed by an emir, a daughter of some other emir, and the supervisor of the waqf, while a wall was added on by villagers.[166] It should be noted that in twelfth century Syria, personal pilgrimage (ziyara) to graves of holy men, and to shrines built to honor them or their relics, was hardly controversial. Most scholars allowed prayer, Qur’an recitation, dhikr (Sufi litany), votive offerings of oil and lamps, and service to other pilgrims in mashahid.[167] They themselves often sought the baraka (blessing) of such sites and recognized the possibility of encountering a mystical, or at least a highly emotional religious experience at them.[168] Yet while it is clear that rulers and scholars visited sanctuaries and played a role in the intensification of the cult of saints and pilgrimage to holy sites, they did not take the lead. Here, as in the case of the superogatory prayers, they joined in, or were led in, perhaps so as not to abandon the arena and let popular forces control it unchecked. Only in Mamluk times, particularly with the advent of mawalid (communal celebrations of the birthdays of saints), do we hear of vehement attacks on practices and excesses related to the cult of saints, but even then, outright denial of the legitimacy of grave visitation is rare.[169]

An arena more securely controlled by ‘ulama’, though by no means exclusively by them, was the mosque. Mosques were a favorite construction project of the Ayyubids, especially of al-Malik al-Ashraf. Seven out of fourteen religious institutions he had founded between 626/1229 and 635/1237 were mosques, three of them Friday mosques.[170] Yet mosques and mausolea with a prayer niche (sometimes even an imam) were also established by members of the urban elite, emirs and their wives, and even by shop owners and artisans who constructed or renovated small mosques with their own hands.[171] An uncommonly detailed and vivid account of such a project depicts a group of Hanbalis who had emigrated from villages around Nablus, then under Latin occupation, and resettled on Jabal Qasyun on the outskirts of Damascus. It will be discussed below.

But first we should pause to scrutinize our sources for information that may allow us to assess how accessible mosques were to laymen in towns and villages, and to what extent laymen indeed frequented them. Historiographic and epigraphic evidence tells us that a thick network of mosques was spread over Syria already in the sixth/twelfth century. Ibn ‘Asakir (d. 571/1176), the city’s leading historian and geographer, lists 420 mosques in Damascus and its suburbs. A list prepared by the later Ibn Shaddad (d. 684/1285) includes 660 mosques in Damascus, sixty-one of them in the suburbs.[172] Aleppo could boast of about two hundred mosques at that time; smaller towns and many villages of one or two.[173]

Direct information on mosque attendance in towns or villages is rare in our sources. Some chroniclers mention in passing that the great mosque (jami’) in a certain town or village was full for the Friday prayer.[174] Ibn Jubayr, the Maghribi traveler who visited Damascus in 580/1184, gives a lively description of gatherings in and around the great mosque of Damascus: people came and went the whole evening, some strolling along, some talking with friends, others reading. According to him, standing there, one could get the impression that any ordinary evening was the twenty-seventh of Ramadan.[175]

Prayer was but one of several activities conducted in the mosque. People assembled in mosques for the recitation (qira’a) and for the study (ta’lim) of Qur’an. According to Ibn Jubayr’s estimate, some five hundred men took part in a daily reading of a few short suras in the Friday Mosque of Damascus, and received a small allowance for it. Similar information can be found in Ibn Shaddad’s historical-geographical work, written ninety years after Ibn Jubayr's Rihla. He mentions children, among them orphans, who recited "Say: He is Allah, the One!" (the short sura 112) every evening.[176] On Fridays, Qur'an recitation was also held in khawaniq. Again, commoners took part. This can plainly be deduced from the bonus offered at the khanqah al-Sumaysatiyya to those who prayed for its founder at the end of the reading: loaves of white bread.[177] In the village of Busra (in the Hawran) a well-known exegete, Abu al-'Abbas al-Harbi (d. 600/1204), would explain Qur'anic passages after prayers.[178] Another scholar, 'Ali b. Muhammad al-Sakhawi (d. 643/1245), claimed that thousands of people read the Qur'an from cover to cover under his direction.[179] The pious and emotional 'Abd al-Ghani al-Maqdisi (d. 600/1203) read hadith in the jami' of Damascus on Thursday nights and on Fridays, moving the audience to delightful tears.[180] Half a century earlier his uncle, Shaykh Ahmad b. Qudama, had read hadith to villagers in the vicinity of Nablus,[181] and there are numerous other examples of such popular classes that were held in central and in peripheral mosques.

On top of all that activity, relics and sacred objects—such as the original copy of the Qur'an, supposedly sent by the Caliph 'Uthman to Syria,[182] the skull of Yahya b. Zakariyya' (John the Baptist),[183] or a few lines in the handwriting of 'Ali b. Abi Talib[184]—were kept in mosques, as repositories of divine blessing for the faithful. Thus, Muslims of diverse levels of religious learning could and did engage in the devotional and educational activities carried out in the precincts of the mosque, whether patronized "from above," or initiated "from below."

Similar things may be said about majalis al-wa'z-assemblies for public exhortation that were held on weekdays, or on special occasions, in mosques and in the courtyards in front of them, but also in cemeteries and various other open spaces. Chroniclers and biographers agree that their audiences were large and heterogeneous, composed of "the great and the humble," the young and the elderly, rulers and commoners, scholars and Sufis.[185] The preachers who delivered those sermons in Syrian towns in the Ayyubid period (and reached posterity in the writings of their contemporaries) were almost uniformly established scholars. They had acquired their preaching skills from respectable teachers, together with other branches of religious learning.[186] Often they had close relations with rulers, who graced their sermons with royal patronage and presence, and sometimes even dictated the subject matter.[187]

Sibt b. al-Jawzi (d. 654/1256), a grandson of the famous Baghdadi preacher and scholar Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 597/1200), was known as the most prominent wa’iz of his times. He settled in Damascus in 1206, and until his death fifty years later, Damascenes spent their Saturdays listening to his sermons (except when he traveled to preach elsewhere in Syria and the Jazira).[188] People refrained from work on those days. Some men and women, eager to secure themselves a good seat, even would spend the night before the assembly in the proximity of the Great Mosque, engaging in devotional practices. Sometimes only the musalla (a vast enclosure for special communal prayers) could accommodate the multitude.

According to Sibt b. al-Jawzi himself, in 607/1210 for example, he spoke in front of an audience of thirty thousand people, including the governor of Damascus and its dignitaries. Hundreds of youths, moved deeply by his words, repented, or at least made the symbolic gesture of clipping their nasiya (forelock) in public.[189] The pile of hair from the heads of penitents reminded him of a story told on the authority of Abu Qudama al-Shami a third/ninth century ghazi (raider), and he narrated it to his audience. A brief version of the rather lengthy story goes as follows. On his way to the Byzantine front, Abu Qudama met a woman who begged him to take her long beautiful hair and plait it into a rein for his horse, going to battle fi sabil Allah (for God). Abu Qudama hesitated, but could not resist her desperate insistence. Months later, he discovered that she had also sacrificed her husband and two sons for the sake of holy war.

This wonderful and terrible tale inspired the people, and filled them with religious emotion. The crowd surrounded Sibt b. al-Jawzi and escorted him to the musalla, where he continued his preaching. At the end of the day they were all on their way to raid Frankish territory.[190]

Sibt b. al-Jawzi was again asked by al-Malik al-Mu’azzam to rouse the people to jihad in 616/1219 (after the fall of Damietta to the Franks).[191] In 626/1229 al-Malik al-Nasir Dawud sponsored a sermon against the concession of Jerusalem to the Franks in a contract his brother, al-Malik al-Kamil, signed with the German emperor Frederick II. Somewhat apologetically Sibt b. al-Jawzi complied, and at the explicit request of the ruler of Damascus reduced “all the people of Damascus” to tears.[192] A few years later he led a rally of support for al-Malik al-Ashraf, then combating Jalal al-Din Mingburnu Khwarizmshah in Eastern Anatolia, and was just as effective.[193] Safely back, Al-Malik al-Ashraf urged Sibt b. al-Jawzi to propagate his favorite work on prayer and its merits (the Maqasid al-Salat of the contemporary ‘Izz al-Din Al-Sulami) through one of his sermons.[194] No doubt he, like many others, had appreciated the mobilizing power of the topics that Sibt b. al-Jawzi addressed— jihad, martyrdom, Sunni revival, and personal piety—and of the assemblies themselves, as powerful manifestations of unity and consensus within the public sphere.

Indeed, relationship between groups with conflicting theological views and between the four schools of law, were less strained, definitely less violent, than in ‘Abbasid or Seljuk Baghdad (discussed earlier in this volume). Subdivisions of the community of faithful continued to exist of course. Groups whose particular religious affiliation was contested, to some degree or other, by the majority, often had the advantage of a higher degree of organized communal life, self-conscious identity, group solidarity, and self-help. Religious leadership of such groups tended to be more involved in the lives of their followers, in matters both sacred and mundane.[195] That, as is well known, was typical of non-Muslim minorities, particularly of the Jews, [196] but Muslim minority groups exhibited similar characteristics. In twelfth and thirteenth century Syria the Hanbalis stood out in this respect, as I intend to show now.

In the middle of the twelfth century 160 men, women, and children left their villages in Mt. Nablus (Palestine), then under Frankish occupation, to journey to Muslim-ruled Damascus. They all shared an affiliation with the Hanbali school of law, and a trust in a local religious leader, Shaykh Ahmad b. Qudama. Upon their arrival in Damascus they enjoyed the hospitality of local Hanbalis. During the summer of 555/1160 Shaykh Ahmad visited what was to become the community’s new abode on Mount Qasyun on the outskirts of Damascus. After the landowner had showed him the site of an ancient mosque on the spot, Shaykh Ahmad went down to the river, performed the ritual ablutions, and returned to symbolically establish a mosque: he laid several stones on the place of the qibla (niche pointing toward Mecca), prayed and blessed the place. Only then did he order his people to begin construction work on the site. Working together, in an organized manner, they built their own homes and a mosque.[197]

Some forty years later, the people of that neighborhood undertook the establishment of a Friday Mosque. This ambitious project, however, was completed only after the governor of Damascus and the ruler of Irbil established awaqf to help finance the works.[198] By then, Shaykh Ahmad's son, Abu 'Umar, had inherited his father's formal roles of imam, khatib, and religious instructor, and his informal functions of intercessor with God, arbitrator in cases of inner strife, and pleader for his people at the courts of the rulers. It should be noted that this last function was probably not a particularly demanding one, as on the whole the relationship between the Hanbalis and Nur al-Din, and later with the Ayyubids, was good, and they were well integrated into Syrian society.

When Abu 'Umar's time came, other members of the community, either from among the emigrants or from the local Hanbali families, assumed leadership. Thus, for several generations to come, there was a continuous line of persons enjoying religious and secular authority in the community, to secure its marked Hanbali identity, shared performance of religious rites, and strong internal social bonds.[199]

I have not found evidence pointing toward similar organization of community life among the more numerous adherents of the larger Shafi'i and Hanafi schools of law in Damascus, or in other Syrian cities. Nor did the scholars who were considered to be the heads of those schools (ru'asa' al-madhhab) function like their Hanbali colleagues; they were mainly busy with scholarly work, writing, and teaching, and not with catering to the everyday spiritual and mundane needs of a community of believers.[200] Other minority groups, such as Sufis and small heretical groups that appeared from time to time on the margins of society, as we have seen earlier, seem to have resembled the Hanbalis in this respect. But this is an issue that deserves further study.

 Conclusion

Rulers, scholars, and commoners contributed to the construction of religious life in the public sphere in twelfth-thirteenth century Syria. Zangid and Ayyubid sultans and princes supported a wide range of religious institutions — majalis al-‘ilm, madaris and khawaniq, majalis al-wa’z, mosques, mashahid, and makatib— thereby nurturing various types of devotion and learning. They served not only as patrons (who selected their clients with care), but also as arbitrators. Rather than maintaining a “laissez faire attitude towards civil society,”[201] they pursued a quite consistent policy of supporting mainstream Sunnism and suppressing its rivals (referred to as ihya’ al-sunna and imatat Al-bida’ by contemporaries).

Rulers cooperated closely with ‘ulama’, bolstering their role as guardians of the religious law, and as propagators of Islamic norms in wider social circles. In their capacities as khatibs, qadis, muftis, and jurisconsults, as well as prayer leaders, popular preachers, reciters of the Qur’an, and humble transmitters of hadith in mosques, cemeteries, open public spaces, and the courts of rulers, ‘ulama’ secured the place of the shari’a as the symbol of the proper social order in the public sphere.

The air of piety, advocated by the ‘ulama and supported by the religious elite, seems to have been truly popular, and shared by members of society at large. Moreover, Muslims of different social strata, with or without proper religious education, participated in the ongoing process of the formation of religious belief and practice. Thus, what puritan ‘ulama’ might have defined as bid’a (and the modern scholar might label as “popular religion”), gradually became sunna for most believers.[202] The outcome of the debate over salat Al-ragha’ib discussed at the beginning of this chapter, the construction of mosques, mausolea, and shrines with the resources of individuals that did not belong to ruling military or scholarly elites, and the promotion of the cult of saint, are indicative of both phenomena.

 Notes

This paper is based upon parts of my “Society and Religion in Syria from the Reign of Nur al-Din to the Mamluk Occupation (1154–1260),” Ph.D. diss., The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Jerusalem 1999 (in Hebrew). I am grateful to Nehemia Levtzion for his helpful comments, to Michael Cook of Princeton University for revising my English, and most of all, to Miriam Hoexter, for her invaluable editing.

[119] Ibn al-Athir (d. 637/1239) 1939, vol. 2, 150; Abu Shama (d. 665/1268) 1990, 124–261; al-Sulami (d. 660/1262) in al-Subki (d. 771/1370) 1971, vol. 8, 251–55; al-Nawawi (d. 676/1277) 1999, 34–35. About the prayers see Kister 1971, 206–207; Wensinck EI and EI²; Fierro 1992, 224–26; al-Albani 1960–1961, 29–30, and Lazarus-Yafeh 1981, 39.

[120] Other arguments being that it was wasteful and extravagant, that people were misled into believing that it was a sunna (rather than an optional pious deed), that there were numerous shortcomings in specific details of its liturgy, and, notwithstanding, that it was prohibited to single out certain days for special worship. I am inclined to regard these claims as an expression of a deeply conservative impetus, engaged in the ongoing struggle against change and innovation (rather than seek for some hidden political motivation).

[121] Al-Subki 1971, vol. 8, 210. In another case, al-Malik al-Kamil demanded that members of all four schools of law perform the evening prayer in the Great Mosque of Damascus together rather than separately, as had been the norm (Abu Shama 1947, 166).

[122] Abu Shama 1990, 196, 209, 215; al-Albani, 1960–1961, 14–18.

[123] For a concise history of the Ayyubid confederation see Cahen EI²; for a full account see Humphreys 1977. Recent studies of twelfth- and thirteenth-century Damascus and Aleppo include the works of Gilbert 1980; Pouzet 1986, Chamberlain 1994, Morray 1994; Mouton 1994 and Edde 1999.

[124] Chamberlain 1994, 168–72.

[125] He is also quoted rating the rulers' duty of protecting religion above that of securing the roads against thieves and robbers (Abu Shama 1991, vol. 1, 363, 372, 377).

[126] An ideology promoted by 'Abbasid caliphs under Buyid rule at the beginning of the eleventh century and picked up by Seljuk sultans half a century later: see Mak- disi 1973; Humphreys 1989, 166; Ephrat 2000, 2–3.

[127] Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam was especially learned, as noted by Ibn Wasil (d. 697/1298) 1972, vol. 4, 208–18. So was al-Malik al-Mansur prince of Hama (587/1191617/1220): see Hartmann EI². See also Humphreys 1989, 167; Chamberlain 1994, 49, 169–70.

[128] Madelung 1985, 159.

[129] Sibt b. al-Jawzi (d. 654/1256) 1954, vol. 8, 640; Humphreys 1977, 146.

[130] Pouzet 1986, 69.

[131] Humphreys 1977, 209–13.

[132] Ibn Kathir (d. 774/1373) 1932, vol. 13, 38–39; Dhahabi (d. 748/1348) 1984, vol. 21, 463; Ibn Wasil 1977, vol. 5, 142.

[133] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 690.

[134] In the time of Nur al-Din: Ibn Tulun (d. 953/1546) 1949, 36; under al-Malik al-‘Adil: Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 469.

[135] Goitein 1970, 109 and 1971, 406.

[136] See an elaboration of this argument in Talmon-Heller 1999, 159, 165.

[137] For the terminology regarding heresy and the treatment of heretics in medieval Islam see Kraemer 1982; Lewis 1993; Pouzet 1986, 256–57.

[138] The case of al-Suhrawardi appears in several variations, in most contemporary and later biographical dictionaries, the earliest source being al-Bustan (Cahen 1937–1938). See in some detail Ibn Khallikan (d. 681/1282) 1972, vol. 6, 268–74; Dhahabi 1984, vol. 21, 207–11. Suhrawardi’s theosophy and fate have attracted a number of modern scholars, see bibliography in Ziai EI².

[139] See for example Ibn al-‘Adim (d. 660/1262), 1988, vol. 3, 1325; Abu Shama 1947, 216; Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 427.

[140] Ibn Khallikan 1972, vol. 3, 293–94; al-Subki 1971, vol. 8, 306. See also Ibn al-Athir 1939, vol. 2, 148–49 for instructions for the muhtasib dealing with similar cases.

[141] Abu Shama 1947, 16; Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392) 1953, vol. 2, 22–24.

[142] Ibn al-‘Adim 1968, vol. 2, 294, 308–10.

[143] Dhahabi 1985, vol. 23, 224–28; Ibn Kathir 1932, vol. 13, 173–74, 148; Humphreys 1977, 209–10; Bosworth 1976, 114. For information on the Qalandariyya see Karamustafa 1994, 39–44, 52.

[144] Abu Shama 1947, 16.

[145] See Bosworth 1976, 113.

[146] There are at least three versions of this story (Cahen 1937–1938, 140–41; Ibn al-‘Adim 1968, vol. 3, 25–26; Ibn Kathir 1932, vol. 12, 291).

[147] Elisseeff 1949; Gilbert 1977, 70–76 and 1980; Humphreys 1989, 164–65.

[148] A recent study of qada’ in Syria in a slightly later period confirms those findings, suggesting that there existed an efficient judicial system, entirely determined by Islamic law (Jokisch 1999, 514).

[149] The local shihna (head of police force) complained that al-zu’ar wa’l-mufsidin wa-qutta’ al-tariq qad kathuru (Abu Shama 1991, vol. 1, 376). See also ibid., 363–66, 373.

[150] Ibn Shaddad (d. 684/1285) 1953, 32.

[151] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 785.

[152] Frenkel 1992, 66.

[153] Ibn Rajab 1953, vol. 2, 13–14.

[154] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 713. Chamberlain suggests that he was simply too weak to act against the ‘ulama’ (Chamberlain 1994, 49).

[155] Al-Subki 1971, vol. 8, 216; Ibn Kathir 1932, vol. 13, 215.

[156] Al-Subki 1971, vol. 8, 243; Humphreys 1977, 266.

[157] Ibn Kathir 1932, vol. 13, 22.

[158] That was Ibn al-Jubayr’s impression: Ibn Jubayr (d. 614/1217) 1907, 275. It is thoroughly documented in all studies of the period. See in particular the detailed works of Humphreys 1989 and 1994, providing qualitative and quantitive data on patronage in Damascus.

[159] See examples in Abu Shama 1991, vol. 1, 327; Ibn Wasil 1972, vol. 4, 213.

[160] Saladin ordered an Ash’ari ‘aqida (creed) from a Shafi’i scholar (Abu Shama 1992, vol. 2, 302); al-Malik al-Mu’azzam financed a large compilation of Hanafi law and the teaching of Hanafi works (Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 427, 647; Pouzet 1986, 68); Al-Malik al-Ashraf sponsored the reading of the Maqasid al-Salat of Iz al-Din Al-Sulami (see below).

[161] See several examples in Pouzet 1986, 75–76, 66; Edde 1999, 366, 617; Humphreys 1994, 38–39.

[162] Elisseeff 1972, 138.

[163] See the testimony of Ibn Jubayr 1907, 275. Khawaniq probably accommodated elite and lower-class mystics and ascetics; a few were designed for women. We actually have very little information on this subject.

[164] Ibn al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 6, 2972–88. On the continuous value of the oral transmissions of written texts in later medieval Islamic culture see Ephrat 2000, 68–69.

[165] For some interesting examples see Ibn Shaddad 1991, 131, 152–55; Abu Shama 1947, 108; Ibn al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 1, 467, vol. 7, 3381–82, RCEA vol. 10, 66; Sauvaget 1941, 131; Humphreys 1994, 38.

[166] Ibn al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 1, 466; Sourdel 1953; Edde 1999, 433.

[167] Abu Shama 1947, 75; al-Nawawi 1999, 94; al-Sulami 1996, 325, 330. See also Taylor 1998, chapters 5 and 6, for a nuanced discussion of scholarly attitudes.

[168] See also autobiographical notes in Abu Shama 1992, vol. 2, 128; Ibn Al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 1, 462–66, vol. 7, 3440, vol. 9, 4062, vol. 10, 4419, 4621.

[169] See Taylor 1998, 64–65.

[170] Humphreys 1977, 211–12; Ibn Shaddad 1953, 59–60; 1956, 87; Gilbert 1977, 137.

[171] Morray 1994, 49, 94; Ibn al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 6, 2908; Abu Shama 1947, 29, 157; RCEA vol. 9, 32; vol. 10, 40, 142, 156, 183.

[172] Gilbert 1977, 80; Ibn Shaddad 1956, 91–166; Pouzet 1986, 143.

[173] Ibn al-‘Asakir (d. 571/1176) 1995, vol. 2, 288–321; Ibn Shaddad 1953, 59–93. For other towns and villages see Talmon-Heller 1999, 36–39. On the close links and cultural continuum between towns and adjacent villages in the medieval Middle East see Lapidus 1969, 54–57.

[174] Ibn al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 10, 4416; Ibn al-‘Asakir 1995, vol. 2, 321; Drory 1988, 95; Talmon-Heller 1994, 112.

[175] Ibn Jubayr 1907, 266. Ramadan 27th (laylat al-qadar) is held to be the night of the first Qur’anic revelation and a time of judgment.

[176] Ibid., 271–72, 291; Ibn Shaddad 1956, 81–83.

[177] Ibn Jubayr 1907, 289–90.

[178] Ibn al-‘Adim 1988, vol. 2, 764.

[179] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 759–60.

[180] Dhahabi 1984, vol. 21, 452. For more on the transmission of knowledge to commoners in Ayyubid and early Mamluk Damascus see Leder 1997.

[181] Ibn Tulun 1949, 27.

[182] Al-Harawi (d. 611/1215) 1953, 5; Ibn Jubayr 1907, 268.

[183] Ibn Shaddad 1991, 123, 459, 461; al-Harawi 1953, 4.

[184] Ibn Shaddad 1991, 131–32.

[185] Abu Shama 1947, 104, 195. On popular preaching (as opposed to the official sermon delivered by the khatib in the Friday mosque) see Pedersen 1948, 234–36; Pedersen 1953; Swartz 1982; Makdisi 1990, 173–75, 182–87; Berkey 2000; Talmon-Heller (forthcoming).

[186] Although medieval didactic literature sometimes attacks uneducated wu’az who spread unauthorized and incorrect religious learning (as stressed by Berkey 2000, 54–55), historical sources read for this study make no mention of sermons that communicated an unorthodox religious opinion, or a politically rebellious message. Quite the contrary.

[187] Dhahabi 1985, vol. 23, 97; Ibn Rajab 1953, vol. 2, 194–95.

[188] Ibn Kathir 1932, vol. 13, 58; Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 701.

[189] Ibid., 530; Abu Shama 1947, 48–49. On the nasiya see Goldziher 1967, vol. 1, 227.

[190] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 545. For a detailed account of this sermon and a few other sermons see Talmon-Heller (forthcoming).

[191] This bid was unsuccessful, however (Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 604; Abu Shama 1947, 17).

[192] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 654; Ibn Wasil 1972, vol. 4, 245; Humphreys 1977, 203. On propaganda for jihad against the Franks see Sivan 1968, 142–50. On earlier qussas and wu’az who promoted holy war see Pedersen 1948, 232; Berkey 2000, 57.

[193] Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 662.

[194] Al-Subki 1971, vol. 8, 239.

[195] Useful definitions of a “religious community” may be found in Weckman 1986–1987, and in Marshal 1994.

[196] For an exposition of this theme see Goitein 1971, introduction and 42–43; Cohen 1997, esp. 80–81.

[197] Ibn Tulun 1949, 37.

[198] Abu Shama 1947, 29; Sibt b. al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 510. RCEA vol. 9, 241–44, vol. 10, 90.

[199] Sourdel 1972; Talmon-Heller 1994, 107; 1999, 80–83.

[200] For biographical entries on prominent Shafi’i and Hanafi scholars see Al-Subki 1970, vol. 7, 132–36; Sibt ibn al-Jawzi 1954, vol. 8, 630; Ibn Abi al-Wafa’ (d. 775/1373) 1993, vol. 1, 337, vol. 3, 467; Abu Shama 1947, 167.

[201] Janet Abu-Lughod’s assessment of most medieval Muslim political authorities (Abu Lughod 1987, 162).

[202] See Jonathan Berkey’s thought-provoking discussion of sunna and bid’a in Berkey 1995, 40–41, 49–50.

 Chapter Four: The Public Sphere and Civil Society in the Ottoman Empire

HAIM GERBER

One of the more popular topics in historical sociology in recent years has been that of civil society or, more precisely, the attempt to trace autonomous aspects in earlier societies. Strong impulses in this direction have been the globally felt drive toward democratization and, more recently, the democratization of Eastern Europe. A useful added dimension to the discourse on civil society has been the topic of public sphere, which may be loosely defined as the area of societal activity that is relevant to the social and political order in general.[203] This addition links the sphere of autonomous social institutions and groups to the state in a more direct manner, and makes the topic of greater interest to the political sociology-inclined social historian. The idea of public sphere is also important in that it allows areas of social activity to be brought into the discussion, rather than just groups in the narrow sense.

These new approaches make the society itself the focus of study, though historians prefer to look at the political side of that society. Another approach that is striving to capture adjacent territory is the “new cultural history,” which seeks to assign an enhanced place to the symbolic and cultural aspects of a society and see them as the constitutive elements of the social structure, rather than as unimportant derivatives of material conditions, as was customary a generation ago.[204]

The Middle East is unquestionably an important focus for such studies. On the one hand, the number of studies anticipating democratization of Middle Eastern regimes is growing, though limited for the time being to explaining the difficulties involved in this process.[205] I have also tried my hand at such explanations. In my Social Origins of the Modern Middle East[206] I argued that it was social relations rooted in agrarian practices that determined the rise of a landed magnate class in the Middle East since the mid-nineteenth century and its fall shortly after World War II. I also attributed the democratic developments in Turkey to the absence in that country of a nationally important landed ruling elite comparable to those that appeared in Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. While these arguments seem to me as cogent today as they were ten years ago, I admit that this explanation is only partial. Other sociocultural institutions and traditions must also be investigated and brought into the picture. Thus, in the study of the social origins of Western democracy no one can afford to neglect the role of chartered medieval towns in creating the preconditions for the emergence of modern Western democracy. Such considerations make comparable Islamic institutions of evident interest to the social historian. This chapter will seek out such institutions and spheres in the history of the Ottoman Empire, and will make an effort to look at them through the eyes of the new cultural history rather than of the traditional social historian.

 State and Society in Classical Islam and the Ottoman Empire

I shall suggest here a new conceptualization of the role of the state in the Ottoman Empire vis-ɒ-vis civil society. In some important ways this relationship between the state and the society constitutes a major break with traditional Islam, a break that has not hitherto been fully analyzed.

On the whole, the pre-Ottoman Islamic Middle East was characterized by alienation and deep animosity between the political authority and the society-— at least its prominent representatives, the ‘ulama’. This alienation was due to structural causes that are rather well known, so that a summary of the issue will suffice here.[207] The starting point is that the state had no independent basis in Islam. An independent basis was accorded only to the umma, the community of believers, which was supposed to live not by the commands of the ruler but by the shari’a, the sacred law of Islam. This law was to be known through the Qur’an and the deeds and sayings of the Prophet, as reported by his Companions. The ruler had no role in this theoretical framework, though the situation was complicated by the fact that the first four rulers, or caliphs, were also Companions, who certainly did exert an effort to gain a say in fixing the contours of the community.[208] The religious nature of these rulers was accentuated by the fact that it was they who won for Islam the main body of its empire, thus proving the veracity of the Islamic message in the world. But soon afterward the conquests came to a halt, the rulers lost any direct connection to the Prophet, and on top of this, the law started to acquire professional characteristics, to be mastered only through arduous study. The ‘ulama’ on the whole won the day as far as the definition of the community was concerned, though the rulers often ignored this law in real life.

The rift created in this way was disastrously widened when the position of sultan came into being. While the sultan was the real ruler, it was the caliph who held a semblance of legitimacy, though it was realized by all that he was no more than a puppet. On the other hand the sultans wielded naked power, without any semblance of purpose or ideology.

These political developments were reflected in the political theory. The rift between the ‘ulama’ and the ruler created a strong sense of uneasiness on the part of the former in their relation to the latter, which reflected negatively on the legitimacy they were willing to accord him. Hence derives the scathing criticism of the rulers and of all those willing to serve under them as qadis or in any other capacity. Government employees were considered by many jurists to be corrupt to the point of being unfit to give testimony in court. On the other hand, the disintegration of the caliphate created a state of political instability and frequent changes of government everywhere. Strife and civil wars increased as the moral caliber of the rulers deteriorated. It was under these circumstances that the final stage of medieval Islamic political theory came into being, whereby the Muslim was called upon to realize that moral worth was no longer to be expected of any government, that rulership belonged to whoever managed to seize it by force, and that to prevent civil war it was best to obey any such ruler.

The Ottoman Empire presents us with a new political reality, one that can be summarized as: 1) The historical caliphate disappears, and there is no question that the Ottoman sultan is the successor of the caliph. 2) On the other hand, the rift at the top between an actual and nominal ruler has ceased to exist. The sultan is the real and nominal ruler, even at the nadir of the empire in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. 3) There is political stability as never before in Islam, particularly since the late fifteenth century: there is no change of dynasty; no instance of power usurped by force; no known plot to effect such a usurpation; not one real break in the orderly succession of rulers. All this is unprecedented in Islam, and extremely rare in world history. 4) With the rift between ‘ulama’ and ruler completely gone, the Ottoman state is on the whole highly legitimate. There are no known ideological attacks on its validity, whether by ‘ulama’ or by other intellectuals; no governor of any province is known ever to have entertained formal separation from the empire; no rebellion ever broke out that was directed against the state per se (the Christians in the Balkans are a case apart).[209] In fact, as remarkable as the low level of legitimation of the late classical Islamic state is the high level of legitimacy of the Ottoman state, even in its latter days. It certainly does not leave much room for the myth that “Islam cannot tolerate the state”; the far-reaching legitimation enjoyed by the Ottoman sultans is undoubtedly one of the most puzzling enigmas of Ottoman history. The explanation is to be sought, I believe, in the special role played by the empire in the history of Islam. 5) The Ottoman Empire never saw itself, or depicted itself to others, as just another state, certainly not as just another Turkish state (dawla turkiyya).[210] On the contrary, it was somewhat akin to a reenactment of the polity of the rightly guided caliphs, inasmuch as Islam never again, after its initial success, spread its message geographically in such tremendous strides as under the Ottomans. It is unlikely that the symbolism of the similarity between the first caliphs and the first Ottoman sultans was lost on Muslims everywhere, or on the dynasty itself. Moreover, even in relative decline, the Ottoman Empire stood as the only bulwark against the infidels. In other words, the Ottoman Empire was unique in Islam in being throughout its history the cutting edge between the dar al-Islam and the dar al-harb. This role was naturally an extremely potent factor in its legitimation. For the Ottomans, naked rulership, rulership for its own sake, would be repellent. Small wonder that from early on the Ottoman sultans considered themselves as caliphs, avoiding the subtle question of Qurayshi descent.[211] Small wonder, too, that sultans such as Selim I (r. 1512–1520) and Suleyman the Lawgiver (r. 1520–1566) had the audacity to see themseves as mahdis, or messiahs, saviors of Islam.[212] We have here a new model: the non-caliphal, religiously relevant state.

Strong leverages of legitimation, and a sort of semi-permanent state of emergency, certainly allowed the Ottomans to create a relatively strong and centralized state. But two factors worked against this. One was the technological limitation on the ability to control extended areas in the sixteenth century; the other was that a strong ideological-Islamic core (and commitment) necessarily meant something also in terms of internal organization. The outcome was a series of important social institutions that gave substance to the Ottoman public sphere and to civil society.

 Ottoman Law as Public Sphere

Looking at processes going on in the Ottoman public sphere, particularly in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, there are two important areas of interface between the public and the government that I propose to deal with —law and waqf. I propose first to analyze the structure of Ottoman law as it existed in the central area of the empire in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.[213] I shall then trace the trajectory traversed by this law from marginal significance in the fifteenth century to centrality in the later period; and lastly, I shall try to trace the social force, or forces, that brought about this change.

Ottoman law in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries can be analyzed under three headings: the nature of law actually enforced; the tribunal where the law was applied; and the procedure by which this tribunal enforced the law. A useful theoretical basis for this analysis is Max Weber’s scheme of the basic forms of law: Sultanistic law is seen as unstable law, dependent on the whim of the ruler at any given moment, utterly despotic in nature. Patrimonial law is defined as law that is the will of the ruler, though enacted in the form of stable and predictable law.[214] Even more famous, and just as pertinent, is Weber’s ideal type of qadi justice, which was seen as informal adjudication based on generalized ethical-political considerations, not on systematic reasoning and the application of a body of law.[215] It goes without saying that Weber’s model for Sultanic law was the Ottoman legal system, and that qadi justice was based on Islamic countries, among them the Ottoman Empire. I shall argue here that Weber was factually mistaken, although that does not detract from the brilliance of his models.

The picture that emerges from the actual documentation is that Ottoman law was neither sultanic nor patrimonial, but more reminiscent of Weber’s model of bureaucracy—characterized by objective rules, predictability, etc. The law that was enforced in Ottoman courts during this period was on the whole the shari’a, Islamic law.[216] This was especially so in areas of the law concerned with personal status, family, marriage, divorce, and inheritance. It is usually agreed that in the Islamic Middle East these areas were always taken care of by the shari’a. But surprisingly, areas of the law connected with economic life were also covered by the shari’a, with some local variations that may be deemed minor in nature. Bankruptcies, sureties, unpaid debts, partnerships, etc., were handled by the shari’a, despite the widespread consensus, formerly prevailing, that these areas of the shari’a were never part of living law in Muslim countries. Even more surprising, the main body of what may be loosely (and incorrectly) defined as the penal parts of the shari’a were in fact being enforced. The Ottoman state may well be the first state in Islamic history where this was the case.

The import of this finding for the topic at hand is that the main areas of the law enforced in Ottoman courts had nothing to do with the sultan—at least in the sense that he was not the source of legitimation of this law. At most, the sultan might help make the law effective in his state, but he was by no means considered above it, much less its source. Also of crucial importance is that what we have here is stable law—law liable to change over time but certainly not erratically, from day to day.

An important area of Ottoman law in this period was guild law, an institution not existing in classical Islam and therefore not forming part of the shari’a.[217] Today there is a widening consensus that guilds were nongovernmental institutions invented by the populace and thrust on the Ottoman state, which was forced to ratify and endorse them, at least as long as they did not directly contradict state interests.[218] Short of full-fledged charters, Ottoman guilds resemble medieval European guilds to a surprising degree.[219] Most guilds had a basic deed of agreement between the members, referred to in the documents as ‘ahd, mithaq, ittifaq, all conveying the idea of a pact, where guild regulations were set forth. These rules are always said to have been drafted by the members voluntarily and unanimously. There is no suggestion that they were imposed by the state. Many of these pacts even included clauses authorizing the collective to punish offenders. When a point of guild law was discussed in court, it was always a respectable member of the community who was called upon to state the law in the matter. Analytically, guild law was and remained an unwritten law (although written documents were extensively used to verify its content), but it was nevertheless stable and well structured, extremely important in the life of ordinary people living in the Ottoman city. And although it was often enforced by a state court, its legitimacy came from below, from artisans and merchants. The state was called upon to enforce these agreements because, as was endlessly reiterated, they expressed old relationships and old privileges. Sometimes privileges (such as nominations to head a guild) were awarded by the state under the false pretense that they were based on guild members’ agreement. When such cases were brought before the qadi, he had no hesitation in declaring the sultanic order baseless and void, and in all the cases I have seen, the central government fully concurred. The “old” had stronger legitimacy than the word of the sultan, so long as public order and war against the infidel were not involved. The guild constitutes a remarkable example of Ottoman law that was both well structured and not imposed from above by the state. As an institution, it is a major case disproving the claim, associated again mainly with Max Weber, that there were no corporate communities in Islam, and a major proof that some real autonomies did exist in the Ottoman Islamic city.[220]

Another area of Ottoman law that should be mentioned here is land law, which on the whole might be deemed to constitute an Ottoman invention, and as such, a sort of imposition from above. But it has to be borne in mind that in actuality, Ottoman land law was far from an Ottoman state invention. Formally it was an imposition, but in real life every province had its own preOttoman land law, which was confirmed after the occupation and simply went on being applied. It is possible that as time went by, a convergence took place. In any event, in the first Ottoman century wide differences existed in the nature of the land law from one region to another, attesting that even here the Ottomans were not driven by any “totalitarian” intentions. [221]

A second issue concerning the working of the Ottoman legal system in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is the nature of the tribunal that enforced this law.[222] While in earlier Islamic states the ruler had various personal tribunals invented and nominated by himself,[223] under the Ottomans the qadi, the Muslim judge, officiated as the sole authority in all legal matters. There is no trace of other state tribunals, and it is interesting that even old Islamic tribunals such as the mazalim and the muhtasib disappeared from the scene, the mazalim altogether[224] and the muhtasib as the performer of a judicial function. There are some hints that provincial governors sometimes performed ad hoc judicial functions, but rarely, and only as a usurpation of authority. The importance of this point in discussion of the public sphere lies, again, in that the qadi, though nominated by the sultan, is an old Islamic institution, whose legitimation did not derive from the ruler but from much deeper cultural sources—sources that the sultan could exploit but could not disregard or belittle. In fact, the Ottomans not only granted the qadi a monopoly over the judicial function, they also used him as the chief administrator of the Ottoman city. Almost every order addressed to the provinces that did not deal with military matters was addressed to qadis. The beauty of the arrangement from the point of view of the central government was that because of the technical-legal nature of the qadis’ education, they usually did not develop political ambitions within the city itself (they reserved such ambition for their career in the ‘ilmi way). For the Ottomans the outcome within the city was certainly efficacious, but it entailed a price—qadis and potential qadis had to be handled with great care and reverence. Hence, qadis enjoyed a wide measure of autonomy. Orders addressed to them never contained detailed instructions as to how to carry out their duties. They were instructed only to take care that justice was not obstructed or violated. Some of the tasks with which qadis were entrusted are truly awesome. An example is the distribution among the population of Bursa, for the year 1087/1676-1677, of a certain extraordinary tax. What transpires is that only the overall sum was set by Istanbul. Its actual distribution had to be worked out locally, among members of twenty-four central guilds, twelve hans, eleven collective residences (odaha), and fifty-five villages, obviously involving a major bargaining process. The court records of Bursa overflow with documents relating to this process. Important, and in my view highly symbolic is that the document presenting the final distribution in the qadi records shows it as having been reached ba ittifaq-i cumhur—that is, "by agreement of the public."[225] A tacit social contract surfaces here, something I shall return to later on. But the point is that somebody had to preside over the political process involved, and this was certainly the qadi, aided by other members of the ilmiye—no doubt, a key social group in the Ottoman city.

A third aspect of Ottoman law in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is the procedure used. An interesting discussion in the anthropological and sociological literature is this: Did the qadi actually enforce and apply the substantive law he was supposed to apply, or did a political and social bargaining process take place ending up in a compromise no more than marginally connected to the law. While the latter may apply in the case of Morocco[226] it certainly does not seem valid in our case. It is evident from the sources that we are much nearer to the pole of substantive law than to free-floating bargaining. Although we do not have transcripts of the deliberations but only after-the-fact summaries, it is important that the qadi puts the entire proceeding into the Islamic legal mold and treats it as a legal issue rather than as a subject of compromise. Sometimes compromise did interrupt the court proceeding, but it is indicative that it was never the qadi who effected the deal but always people from the outside. The importance of this point for the topic at hand is that a free-floating process of bargaining might easily mask sultanic elements of adjudication. Such a situation would also undermine the conclusion that Ottoman law was well structured and stable.

I want now to outline the historical process whereby Ottoman law developed from the fourteenth or fifteenth century to the eighteenth.[227] It is apparent from the sources that in the fifteenth century predominance of the qadi and the shari’a is absent. For example, the qadi, as in earlier Islamic states, did not deal with criminal matters but merely heard such cases and then transferred the matter to some other authority, the nature of which is not made clear in the sources. It must be assumed that this other authority was the provincial governor, simply because there seem to be no other candidates for the job.[228]

It is interesting of course to speculate what caused the rise of the qadi. My hunch is that as the evolution of the Ottoman Empire as a bureaucratic state went much farther than that of former Islamic states, it needed more highly articulated legal institutions than were formerly extant within Islam. It was no doubt in this way that the institution of Seyhtilislam developed as the head of the religious institution, and it was in this way, too, that the institution of ifta’, legal consultation, became part of the state bureaucracy, for the first time in the history of Islam. By the same token, a more highly structured judicial institution was needed, and the Islamic judge was readily available. It is also possible that the Ottomans elevated the qadi as part of their undoubted (though as yet insufficiently proven) concern to create a regime of checks and balances within their administration. The qadi was certainly a highly effective check on the power of the provincial governor.

That the qadis rose in status does not automatically mean that the shari’a rose with them. It certainly is not self-evident that the shari’a was strengthened from above, as one might expect in the context of the relations between state, law, and society. The fact is that at the same time that the role of the shari’a would seem to have been expanding the Ottomans enacted the criminal qanuns, so it would appear that they expected the qanun to serve as the state law for at least some time. But this never happened. I found that the penal qanun was never really applied. Heyd claims that in some cases qanun penalties were demanded but admits he did not see any evidence for this in practice except in rare cases.[229] Recent studies and collections of fifteenthcentury documents support this conclusion: not a single case of qanun penalty has been discovered.[230] It seems reasonable to suppose, then, that the shari’a rose because the qadis and the ‘ulama’ in general pushed it forward, and the Ottoman government did not see the issue as important enough to engage in an all-out conflict over it. It is my belief that this whole process of the rise of the shari’a was an expression of the deepening Islamic lifestyle that had probably been under way since the advent of Islam.

Some parts of this process clearly represent politics of law involving elements of the civil society that deserve a closer look. A major example is interest, a well-known anathema to traditional Islamic law. Somewhat enigmatically, the prohibition on interest was relaxed in the Turkish-speaking area of the empire at a very early period, sometime in the early fifteenth century; interest was accepted as legal, provided that the yearly increment was not called riba but muamele, nama, or rabh—all neutral terms conveying the meaning of profit. The new habit originated especially in the context of the cash waqfs that began to appear in the burgeoning empire in the fifteenth century. Legally these neutral concepts were considered valid tricks, though they were shockingly transparent. In any event, for the people of the time the legally problematic issue was that since waqf assets were supposed to be eternal and the value of money was notoriously unstable, cash money was not considered an appropriate object of endowment. It is here that early Ottoman jurists took the liberty of introducing a change and relaxation in Islamic law. The reasoning used by these jurists and other intellectuals of the time shows quite clearly that the innovation was accepted through pressure from below. Summarizing the position of Ebu Suud Efendi, the Ottoman Seyhlislam, Mandaville says: “What appears is an appeal to continued popular usage (ta’amul and ta’aruf), to the welfare of the people (istihsan), and to both throughout with a tone of ‘Let’s be practical,’ an appeal to common sense.”[231] What these fine words meant in real terms is made clearer in the detailed letter of a Sufi shaykh to the sultan, specifying that the cash waqf was the basis of the economic existence of the entire institution. Without cash waqfs Friday mosques would be deserted. More generally, says this shaykh, the law should be especially responsive to the people’s feeling: “God’s legislation has no other purpose than to ease the way of His servants through the exigencies of the time... One uses inadmissibility at times because it is better for the people of that time, at other times one does the opposite."[232] He further cites an opinion that says: "Be guided by whatever is more harmonious with how the people are living, what is kinder, better for them."[233] There is no doubt that the government was fully aware that tampering with the cash waqfs would cause severe social disruption; so despite the severe juridical controversy surrounding them in the sixteenth century, they continued to flourish until the end of the empire.[234] This entire issue goes a long way to show that popular feeling probably played a certain role in the rise of the shari'a, and the exact form this rise took.

The exact opposite occurred in Syria.[235] When the Ottomans came in 1516, they brought legal interest charging to a country unacquainted with developments in fifteenth-century Anatolia. The Syrian 'ulama' were outraged by the innovation and protested it to provincial governors, even to the sultan himself. When interest cases came before the courts in Syria it was specifically pointed out that the interest charged was on the sufferance of the sultan—in other words, that the court had nothing to do with it. More important, says Rafeq, the objection of the population and 'ulama' of Syria to the liberalization of interest accounts for the fact that the employment of interest was quite rare, and that cash waqfs did not appear in Syria. Rafeq's study is important in showing that popular as well as 'ulama' feeling played a role in the form the law was taking. It also shows that groups within the civil society were fully aware that what they thought about the law was meaningful, and that the central government was morally and politically obliged to take their view into consideration. Two other examples in the study are mentioned in this context: taxes on marriage contracts and the law imposing fines on villagers quitting their villages. In both cases the Syrian 'ulama' were publicly and vehemently critical of the Ottoman government. Another important point in Rafeq's study is that groups within the civil society were not afraid to speak out and criticize the Ottoman sultan over central state issues, and interestingly enough, nothing happened to them.

It might be claimed at this point that the 'ulama' did not really constitute an element of the civil society, but rather were part of the Ottoman government. I do not accept this suggestion. In my view, the state in the Ottoman Empire is the sultan. Any other starting point necessarily leads to a theoretical and methodological impasse. It is to be borne in mind, for example, that two parallel ‘ulama’ networks existed in the empire: one was an internal, Istanbul-based, madrasa system that led to the higher qadi-ships and thence to the office of Seyhtlislam; the other was a provincial, low madrasa, and low ‘ulama’ setup that led nowhere, recruited only local people, and had a very dubious formal standing, if any at all. The Syrian ‘ulama’ cited by Rafeq certainly did not see themselves as forming part of the Ottoman state, and this they explicitly declared. In fact under the Ottomans there are some remnants of the classical-Islamic pattern of complete dissociation between the state and the ‘ulama’. A remarkable seventeenth-century Palestinian example is Khayr al-Din al-Ramli, a mufti who held no official position yet issued a large number of fatwas to people who asked his opinion on all kinds of legal matters.[236] Moreover, his opinions attained fame, which in the course of time made him one of the most important intellectuals in the entire Middle East.[237] All along he remained completely unconnected with the state, though he fully acknowledged the legitimacy of the Ottoman dynasty, whom he saw as the legitimate upholders of Islam “in the present time.” Nevertheless, an important aspect of his legal activity is scathing criticism of various legal policies of the Ottoman state, such as tax farming—which in his view was tantamount to gambling and hence illegal enrichment[238]—and the prohibition on peasants leaving their villages without paying a fine to the fief holder.[239]

It might be contended that since al-Ramli only gave private written opinions, he did not have to fear the government. But this view seems to me unconvincing. Bearing in mind that he was already famous in his lifetime, it stands to reason that his fatwas would be well known over substantial areas of the Middle East. Yet, he himself did not seem to be under any threat or danger, and in fact no evil ever befell him. Were the Ottomans unaware of his criticism? Unlikely, in my view. Their restraint must be interpreted as an unwillingness to penetrate too deeply into the fabric of the civil society they governed.

It is questionable whether even the higher ‘ulama’ are to be viewed as forming an integral part of the state. In the eighteenth century this group formed a sort of ‘ulama’ aristocracy, which held a monopoly over high ilmiye posts in the face of resistance from all quarters.[240] In this connection it should be recalled that one of the more important phases in the rise of English democracy was the split between the English monarchy and the aristocracy. Analytically, it is hard to see the English aristocracy as less part of the central government than the Ottoman high ‘ulama’.

 The Waqf Institution as Public Sphere

The waqf [241] is clearly one of the most important public institutions in the Ottoman city, as in Islam in general. From very early on, people from all walks of life bequeathed all types of property to diverse beneficiaries, familial or charitable, for motives ranging from a deeply religious desire to perform charitable acts to a narrow, selfish wish to disinherit one’s daughters. Sociologically, it makes sense to talk about big waqfs and small waqfs; but whatever their size, they constituted important elements of the public sphere and of social organization that gave substance to civil society in the Ottoman Empire. So pervasive was the waqf institution in Ottoman society that one is almost tempted to view it as a key institution in the way the cockfight was seen by Geertz to be a key institution in Balinese society.[242] As such, it represents a theoretical problem to traditional social historians, who have tended to view society as an arena of purely selfish interests, with every action of the individual motivated by selfish, material interest. I believe the waqf institution was a major casualty of such an approach, a situation that can no longer be maintained.

Some of the big waqfs in an Ottoman town look more like a branch of the central government than an autonomous public sphere, but in reality the situation was much more complicated. Founded by the sultan himself, usually after the conquest of the place or upon ascending to the throne, every substantial Ottoman city had several such waqfs. Each contained, on the one hand, several villages (sometimes as many as twenty-five) and, on the other, several revenue-consuming institutions, such as the Friday mosque, poor kitchen, Qur’an school, madrasa, etc.[243] It must be significant that sultans opted to provide basic services in the form of personal bestowal rather than through a faceless bureaucracy, and it seems that the explanation must be sought in the symbolic link between the ruler and the ruled. The fact that these services also included food rations in the imaret (soup kitchen) is all the more symbolic here. By the Islamic law of waqf, all these institutions were knit together in one institution by a founding deed that was designed to ensure the perpetuity of the waqf. Once established, the waqf could not be annulled nor its funds diverted to any purposes other than those set out in the founding deed. These institutions provided the main services in the Ottoman city, and the main civic activity was obviously focused around them. True, they retained a strong connection to the central government, which nominated the managers. Nevertheless, these waqfs provided room for intensive civic activity, since the discretion of the managers was severely restricted by the founding deed and by considerations of Islamic equity and decorum. If the manager failed to provide food measuring up to the traditional standard in the waqf ’s kitchen, he immediately found himself sued in court by a group of respectable citizens, invariably headed by ‘ulama’, usually teachers in madrasas, the real public opinion leaders in a city such as Bursa. Every now and then waqf properties needed repairs, often of major proportions. To guard against accusations of corruption, managers—at least in seventeenth-century Bursa—carried out renovations only with the prior detailed authorization of the court, based on inspection of the site by a special committee in which ‘ulama’ always took part. Thus, although the manager was nominated by the central government, the local community, headed by the ‘ulama’, exercised a supervisory function every step of the way. The qadi records overflow with cases where citizens brought cases involving the waqf and not one ever suggested that it was not their business to do so. My understanding of this situation is that local communities saw themselves as having the de facto right to ensure that the affairs of the sultanic waqfs were run in the interests of the city’s inhabitants, and even by them.

Another important group of waqfs were those established by members of the Ottoman elite on their own initiative.[244] In fact, most of the big waqfs not founded by the sultans themselves were apparently founded by askeris, members of the ruling institution. It was widely believed in the past that such waqfs were not real charitable waqfs, as they tended to present themselves, but rather constituted a stratagem by the elite to divert state funds and privatize them. The main suggestion was that a substantial part of the revenues was earmarked for the family, including the practically unlimited cut of the manager, always a family member.[245] This view no longer seems tenable, at least on a statistical basis. In early Ottoman Edirne waqfs by askeris were patently charitable, seemingly no tricks involved.[246] Likewise, in Istanbul waqfs of the sixteenth century the private elements can be separated from the public ones, with no less than 80 percent of the revenue of waqfs established by askeris earmarked for public purposes.[247] It is thus simply not true that waqfs by askeris were designed to divert public funds. So how are they to be explained? Edward Thompson provides a possible clue in his explanation of the eighteenth-century English moral economy, as does Natalie Davis of the rites of violence in sixteenth-century France;[248] that both were designed to strengthen communal bonds. I suggest that something similar is to be observed in the Ottoman waqf institution. Members of the bureaucratic elite established charitable institutions to foster bonds of social connection based on sharing with the lower classes, to enhance feelings of community and ultimately legitimacy. While such an approach of government to the civil society is not particularly surprising or even noteworthy, for a regime as supposedly despotic as that of the Ottomans such an approach seems to me quite remarkable.

Small waqfs were also an important element of the public sphere, many of them being after all charitable by nature. A survey of small waqfs conducted in Bursa in 1077/1666-1667 may serve as an example.[249] It contained 374 separate waqfs, all purely charitable, many of them defined as an amalgamation of several small waqfs. The entire list may in fact represent up to two thousand separate endowments. For a city of some thirty thousand residents this is a huge number (the implied comparison is with a modern Western city of the same size, but that of course is a problematic comparison). Some are defined as mosque waqf, since of course every city neighborhood had a mosque and all were by definition maintained by waqfs. Most or all quarters also had what was called waqf-avariz—that is, waqf donated for the purpose of paying the avariz tax of the quarter, a tax levied on real estate and the main regular tax paid by the urban population in the Ottoman Empire during this period.[250] The fact that these waqfs were specifically established for the benefit of a group of people defined by a residential quarter is to my mind an indication that the quarter was considered a corporative group—by the populace, if not by the government. Similarly, many waqfs in sixteenth-century Istanbul not only were for the benefit of a quarter, but even nominated the entire body of the quarter's residents as collective inspectors, thus underpinning an obviously existing meaningful community in that city.[251] Moreover, unlike the Haramyn administration in Algiers,[252] in Bursa these waqfs were administered individually by managers, the great majority of whom were 'ulama'; the qadi exercised only a general supervisory function, this survey being itself an example of that supervision. Thus, we have here a large network of waqfs providing various services for the public and run by the public itself, with a minimum of intervention on the part of the central (or local) government. Assuming that all substantial towns in the Ottoman Empire had such extensive networks, it is obvious that small charitable waqfs constitute a major example of the autonomous working of civil society and the public sphere in the Ottoman Empire.

 The Historiographic Debate About Ottoman Civil Society

The existence of a public sphere and civil society in the Ottoman Empire is still debated among scholars. Sherif Mardin, in a study on Islam and civil society,[253] sets the West against the East in an all-embracing dichotomy. Western civil society is seen as a dream and a postulate, which consisted in "the idea that social relations are both sustained and energized by autonomous, secular collectives with legal personality operating within a frame of rationalized self referential law."[254] Since nothing of this was found in Islam, there was thought to be no trace of an autonomous civil society. The problem with this analysis is first of all that Mardin seems to idealize developments in the West. Yet civil society and secular and self-referential law were not born the mature concepts they are today; they developed only gradually, for the most part as ad hoc practical compromises between competing forces—as in the case of the monarch versus the aristocracy in England. It was a centuries-long battle between these two forces, and later a real fear of the power of the proletariat, that produced the English compromise, not a rosy liberal dream.[255] And just as Mardin’s picture of the West is idealized, so his view of the Ottoman Empire seems to be exaggeratedly negative.

Recent studies have done much, however, to dispel such old theories, according to which the Ottoman Empire was a state of unbridled Oriental despotism; the sultan had total power and the entire state was his personal oikos, to use the Weberian term for personal estate. Gilles Veinstein, who studied the sultanic orders of Suleyman the Magnificent (r. 1520–1566) noted the gap between the first part of the decrees and the second, more substantial, part.[256] In the first part, the sultan presents himself as a magnificent ruler, the like of whom the world has never seen, in terms of both strength and virtue. Clearly implied is that it is unthinkable that anyone implicated in an order will not do his utmost to carry it out to the full. But a careful reading leads to a different conclusion. Orders were very often not carried out and had to be repeated again and again. There is no telling how many of these orders were in fact never implemented. The author rightly concludes that the sultan’s ability to turn his words into actions was much more limited than he would have cared to admit.

Surprisingly, an earlier study by Sherif Mardin provides another basis for the realization that there were serious cracks in the wall of Ottoman despotism.[257] Here Mardin claims that a notion of implied social contract between the ruler and the ruled was embedded in the Ottoman political formula. This contract, which in his view was Islamic in nature, connected with the idea of hisba—that is, the obligation on the ruler to do what is right and forbid what is wrong—a well-known code in the classical Islamic outlook on life, at least as expressed by the ‘ulama’. Mardin adds that a component of this theory is that if the ruler does not perform this duty, the obligation passes to the community. He further claims that this implied contract is expressed in the revolts of soldiers and elements of the lower social classes that one encounters in the chronicles of the empire. But the truth is that these revolts do not usually invoke Islamic forms of legitimation; more often than not they make reference to violations of the old and accepted ways. For example, the reason for the killing of Seyhtilislam Feyzullah Efendi in 1703 was presented by the rebels as his violation of the traditional code of behavior expected of an Ottoman Seyhtilislam—that is, nonintervention in state politics.[258] Hence, while I fully accept Mardin's suggestion of the existence of an Ottoman social contract as the fundamental basis of state-society relations, the basis of this theory probably goes deeper: Barrington Moore saw such a contract as a universal component of the relations between rulers and ruled in all or most polities,[259] and this seems more appropriate for what we see in the Ottoman Empire.

That the sultan was not considered an unpredictable despot can also be gauged from a look at the Vienna Sikayet Defteri, a book containing some 2,500 complaints, all relating to the year 1675, sent by citizens from all over the empire to the sultan, about wrongs committed mainly by officials.[260] This book is but one of an entire series of such books, preserved in the Ottoman archives, attesting that the genre of complaint writing was extremely popular with the subjects of the Ottoman sultan. While this indicates that there were wrongs to be complained about, it is even more important that there existed channels to reach the highest possible authority in order to complain, and hope for the redress of wrongs. How many wrongs were actually righted we do not know, but that so many thousands of citizens in the empire each year tried this course indicates that they continued to see the sultan as a source of justice, over and above local power holders. Also important: the complaint was not thrown away but carefully written down, along with an order to the resident qadi to look into it and do what is right and just. That the flow of complaints did not dry up over the years must be interpreted to mean that at least a certain percentage of the complaints were resolved. Above all, nowhere in the entire body of complaints in the Vienna Sikayet Defteri is there any instance of the sultan defending an officeholder or giving his backing to suspected wrongdoing. The language of the orders impeccably follows Ottoman and Islamic law. Against the theory that the sultan was restricted by nothing[261] stands the theory that the sultan was severely restricted by the concept of adalet, justice. Judging by the public record, the second concept seems stronger.[262]

Another study highly pertinent to our discussion is a recent article by Halil Inalcik, which explicitly takes off from Max Weber's concepts of sultanism and patrimonialism, only to claim that while the official Ottoman discourse depicted the sultan as unfettered by any law or authority, reality was much more complicated. The masses possessed means to influence the sultan—for example, by deserting villages—and the government was not beyond heeding such possibilities.[263] The study also draws attention to an important though little studied Ottoman institution—the mesveret, a large-scale ad hoc consultative body of dignitaries that the sultans used to convene at times of serious international emergencies. Though these bodies had no official grounding, the right to express opinions on such occasions was free, and there is no doubt that an emergent consensus in such assemblies had a bearing on the sultan's subsequent decisions.[264]

However, it is a study by Suraiya Faroqhi that bears most directly on the topic at hand.[265] It is in fact a conscious effort to look for autonomous sociopolitical institutions in Ottoman society, and the outcome of the search is that autonomous elements were certainly not lacking. The janissaries and 'ulama' before the nineteenth century constituted semiautonomous forces; the provincial notables (a'yan) of the town of Ankara in the late sixteenth century got together to carry through a substantial civic project—the construction of a city wall; the a'yan of the little town of (orom convened and launched a complaint to the central government on town matters. These and a plethora of other examples show that cities and towns saw themselves as meaningful collectives, possessing a certain amount of authority and legitimate political power. In the face of this rich documentation, the old idea that the individual was only a member of the umma seems oddly simplistic, an ideological construct at best, that if not false in itself, overlooks other social and psychological levels of existence.

To conclude, there is ample evidence that Ottoman society featured several institutions that worked on the basis of autonomous powers and initiatives. A prime example is the case of the guilds, which developed voluntaristic regulations that only later were confirmed by the government. Such is also the case of socially central institutions such as the waqf and even of a politically central institution such as the law in general. Furthermore, towns and quarters emerge as collectives possessing meaning and value in the eyes of their members and even in the eyes of the government. The guild was the paradigmatic institution, expressing the entire gamut of the relations between the Ottoman government and the populace. By a tacit, symbolic, social contract, the government refrained from countering, undermining, or disregarding customs, privileges, and rules of conduct favored by the citizens, as long as these did not directly contradict the security of the state or Islamic moral conduct in general.

[203] See Somers 1995; Calhoun 1993.

[204] Hunt 1989; Somers 1995, 127–29.

[205] See Norton 1995; Deegan 1994.

[206] Gerber 1987.

[207] See Siegman 1964; Crone and Hinds 1986;Lambton 1981; Lindholm 1996.

[208] This is the specific topic in Crone and Hinds 1986.

[209] This is particularly true from about the mid-sixteenth century on. See Fleischer 1992.

[210] See Haarman 1988, who correctly emphasizes the big difference between the role of “Turkish” states versus that of the Ottoman state in Islam.

[211] See Imber 1992.

[212] See Fleischer 1992.

[213] See Gerber 1994.

[214] Weber 1964, 347.

[215] Weber 1969, 213, 229, 264, 317, 351.

[216] Gerber 1994, chapters 1 and 2.

[217] Gerber 1988, chapter 3; Gerber 1994, chapter 4.

[218] Ze’evi 1996, 154ff.

[219] The next paragraph is based entirely on Gerber 1994, chapter 4.

[220] See Eickelman 1964 for a good example of the literature using the supposed lack of guilds in Islam as a springboard for the argument that it is pointless to seek autonomous institutions under Islam.

[221] See Gerber 1987, chapter 2.

[222] Gerber 1994, chapter 2.

[223] Ibid., 60–61.

[224] It is true that the imperial divan also functioned as a court, but this took place only on rare occasions.

[225] Bursa Sicilli (hereafter BS), B103/316, 91b, 1087/1676-1677. There are many such lists in the qadi court records of seventeenth-century Bursa, and all take care to note that public agreement was involved in their preparation. Obviously, people in Bursa at the time considered this highly important, and it is of course also noteworthy that there was a stock phrase to relate to that “public.” For other examples of such lists see B112/326, 83b, Safar 1090/1679; B83/284, 88b, 1085/1674-1675.

[226] See Rosen 1989.

[227] Gerber 1994, chapter 2.

[228] Inalcik 1980–1981; Jennings 1986; Ongan 1974.

[229] Says Heyd: “In most criminal cases recorded in the court registers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries ... no penalty is mentioned at all. Often it is not even stated whether the cadi found the defendant guilty.” See Heyd 1973, 254.

[230] Jennings 1986; Ongan 1974; Inalcik 1980–1981.

[231] Mandaville 1979, 298.

[232] Ibid., 302–3.

[233] Ibid., 303.

[234] See ʕizakija 1995.

[235] See Rafeq 1994.

[236] Al-Ramli (d. 1081/1670). 1893–1894.

[237] For a biography of al-Ramli see Gerber 1999, 19–20.

[238] Al-Ramli 1893–1894, vol. 2, 178.

[239] Ibid., vol. 2, 184–85.

[240] Zilfi 1983.

[241] The bibliography on the waqf institution is rapidly proliferating. As a token only see Marcus 1989, passim; Roded 1989; Schwarz and Kurio 1983; Winkelhane and Schwarz 1985; Gerber 1988; Hoexter 1998b.

[242] See Geertz 1979.

[243] Gerber 1988, chapter 8.

[244] Barkan and Ayverdi 1970; Gerber 1988; Marcus 1989.

[245] Gibb and Bowen 1957, 169.

[246] Gerber 1983.

[247] Barkan and Ayverdi 1970.

[248] See Desan 1989.

[249] BS, B135/350, 1077/1666-1667.

[250] 1995 aːizak48 ʕ. See also

[251] Barkan and Ayverdi 1970, passim.

[252] Hoexter 1998a.

[253] Mardin 1995.

[254] Ibid., 278.

[255] Skocpol 1973.

[256] See Veinstein 1992.

[257] Mardin 1988.

[258] Zilfi 1988, 198--9.

[259] Moore 1978.

[260] Gerber, 1994, chapter 5.

[261] Inalcik 1993, though it should be noted that the theory is raised only to be rejected.

[262] Important information on complaint activity via the muhimme defterleri is also presented in Faroqhi 1986.

[263] Inalcik 1993, 16.

[264] Ibid., 12–13; also Aksan 1993.

[265] Faroqhi 1986.

 Chapter Five: The qa’di ’‘s Role in the Islamization[266] of Sedentary Tribal Society

AHARON LAYISH

 Introduction

The discourse pertaining to such terms as civil society and public sphere is closely connected with the history of Western society and state.[267] This point should be borne in mind when attempting to translate these terms into the reality of Muslim society and state. In theory, there is no separation of state and “church” in Islam.[268] Although theocracy is not the commonest political system in modern Islam,[269] significant remnants of this religio-political system have survived in some contemporary Muslim countries. For instance, the 1980 Egyptian Constitution maintains that the sharia (the non-codified Islamic law) is the main source of legislation (Article 2).[270] Muslim countries have adopted Western conceptions of political system, including the separation of powers—a principle totally alien to Islamic classical theory. However, it seems that the process of internalizing this principle has not so far been completed. Moreover, since the early 1970s there has been an increasing tendency toward the Islamization of the legal system in such countries as Libya, Iran, the Sudan, and Pakistan by means of statutory legislation and court decisions making the validity of statutory provisions conditional on their conformity to the sharia .[271]

Taylor distinguishes three modes of civil society in the West: the first exists in societies where there are free associations, not under tutelage of state power; the second (with a wider sense) exists where society as a whole can structure itself and coordinate its actions through such associations, which are free of state tutelage; and the third (which is an alternative or supplement to the second) exists where the ensemble of associations can significantly determine or inflect the course of state policy.[272]

The premodern Muslim society seems to fit in with the first (the narrowest) mode of civil society. Prior to the integration of the ulama (sing. al'im; scholars of religious sciences) in the state establishment one could trace in the Muslim society substantial elements of civil society. Levtzion analyzes the ulama's role as intermediaries between the rulers and their subjects to the extent that the ulama enter the definition of "free association, not under tutelage of state power": on the one hand, they bestowed legitimacy using their religious prestige to secure the obedience of the masses to the ruler's authority; on the other hand, they acted as representatives of the masses communicating to rulers the popular grievances. The ulama's attitude toward the political authorities was ambivalent: they recognized the need for a strong government to defend Islam from external and domestic threats; but as an independent (also in economic respects) class or association they considered almost every government by definition as oppressive and declined to cooperate with it or accept governmental nominations so as to avoid being corrupted. As guardians of the sharl>a and the public morals it was their duty, they believed, to guide the political rulers, from outside, on how to apply the sharl>a properly.[273] In this respect one may compare the role of the uninstitutionalized ulama to that of the intellectuals in Western civil society.

The process of integration of the ulama into the state establishment, which had started already in the Middle Ages, has been completed in the twentieth century. The mufti (a specialist in sharia who gives authoritative legal opinions), perhaps the most important agency for the development of the sharl>a and the preservation of its vitality, the qadl (the judge of a sharl>a court), in charge of the application of the sharl>a in day-to-day reality, and other religious functionaries have been incorporated into the civil service with a view to implementing the government’s policy.[274] It goes without saying that the loss of independence from the political authority diminishes the ulama’s ability to fulfill their traditional role as intermediaries and guardians of the sharia and the public morals. In this respect contemporary Muslim society has lost a vital element of civil society, though the function of the ulama may have been taken over by secular intellectuals and other associations. _’

 The Function of the shari’a in Sedentary Tribal Society

* The Qadi’s Autonomy

This chapter is concerned with the role of the qadls, an essential part of the ulama<, in contemporary Muslim society. To what extent is the sharia court a “public sphere” in the sense that the qadl is capable of formulating norms of social, ethical, and legal behavior independently—that is, outside the control of the political authority—and of imposing them on Muslim society? An attempt will be made below to assess the sharl qadl‘s autonomy and his impact on tribal society in the process of sedentarization in modern Libya (broadly speaking from the early 1930s to the early 1970s) and the Judean Desert (from the last quarter of the nineteenth century to the early 1970s) on the basis of legal documents collected from the sharl>a courts of Ajdabiya and Kufra in Libya and of Bethlehem, and tribal arbitrators in the Jerusalem-Bethlehem region.[275] The case pertaining to denial of paternity, which appears at the end of this chapter is meant to provide an illustrative notion of the qadi s scope of autonomy, which is significant in the context of public sphere.

On the face of it the question seems to be irrelevant since the qadl is part of the state apparatus. He is a delegate of authority invested with the power of jurisdiction (qada'<). He is nominated either by the caliph himself (who, in theory, retains the power to exercise justice in person) or by his intermediate representatives (wazl'r, governor of a province, etc.).[276] In other words, the ruler appoints the qadi, pays his salary, and dismisses him from office when he deems it necessary. One might be tempted to conclude that this pattern of delegation intrinsically does not allow the qadi a wide measure of autonomy.

Moreover, among the ulama and fuqaha' (sing.: faql'h; jurists, experts in fiqh, the science of the sharl'>a, the sacred law of Islam) it is the muftl', rather than the qadi, who best represents the class of (religious) intellectuals of premodern Muslim society. This assertion refers first and foremost to the original concept of the muftl dating back to the >Abbasids (750–945), before he became integrated into the the political establishment.[277] Even today there are—alongside nominated muftl's— independent muftl's whose status is a function of their learned reputation.[278] Indeed, muftl's, not qadis, were the creators and exponents of the sharl'>a, which is a set not only of legal norms but also of ethical values. The sharl'>a is a "jurists' law"—that is, a system of law that developed outside an official legislature and the control of the executive authority. All the efforts of rulers—during the formative period of the sharl'>a—to institutionalize the independent fuqaha' in order to shape the legal norm to suit political purposes were in vain. The sharl'>a did not undergo a formal process of codification until the late nineteenth century. The first codification was the Mejelle, the Ottoman Civil Code (1869–1876). From the strict shar l' point of view, codification itself implies the transformation of the sharl’>a from a jurists’ law to statutory law, with all the attendant consequences: departure from the religious-legal literature; disruption of the shar l’ legal methodology of sources of law (us’u’l al-fiqh); and collapse of the legal professional class of the fuqaha’ and muftl’s, the authorized exponents of the sharl’>a.[279]

On the other hand, the judicial practice of the qadis was never regarded as a formal source of law. The historical contribution of qadis to Islamic law took place during the Umayyad Empire (661–750), prior to the emergence of the class of muftl’s. By using unrestricted personal reasoning or discretion (ra<y) and religious ethical norms derived from the Qur<a’n, the qadis succeeded in assimilating elements of foreign legal systems that gradually penetrated into legal practice. In this respect they laid the foundations for the creation of the sharl>a; but case law—that is, law settled by precedent[280]— never recognized by Islamic legal theory as a source of law. Islamic law developed as an expression of a religious ideal in contrast to practice.[281] A sophisticated legal methodology was created later by the muftis. The “judicial practice” (>amal) that emerged in Morocco beginning in the late fifteenth century seems to be a single instance of a “realist” form of Islamic jurisprudence that was intended to bring custom within the orbit of Maliki law. Its significance from the point of view of legal theory is, however, disputed by scholars.[282]

Although the qadi is subject to the ruler who appoints him to the office and can dismiss him at will, he nevertheless enjoys a measure of autonomy with regard to the application of the non-codified shari’a in matters that are within the shari’a court’s jurisdiction. The qadi is subject to the ruler only administratively; otherwise—that is, as far as the substantive law applicable in court is concerned—he is subject to the shari’a alone.[283] From the point of view of the qadi, codification implies subordination to legal norms shaped by earthly legislature outside the control of the fuqaha’ . Thus, with regard to the shari’a courts of Ajda’biya and Kufra from the early 1930s to the early 1970s, the qadi was totally independent in this respect. The first codification of the law of personal status in Libya took place in 1972 (but unfortunately, its application is not reflected in the decisions available to me).[284] In case of doubt in any substantive or procedual matter the qadi might—though this happens quite rarely—consult any Ma’liki ‘ mufti’ or a legal treatise, according to his free choice.[285] The ruler had no standing in this matter. Moreover, the ruler was concerned in the first place with the maintenance of public order (including cases of homicide or bodily injury, which are in fact within the domain of Islamic private rather than public law) and, as might be expected, matters of personal status were not usually of great concern, unless a certain legal norm disturbed public order.[286] On the other hand, the law applicable in the shari’a court of Bethlehem, under whose jurisdiction the Bedouin of the Judean Desert fall, underwent codification. The shari’a applying to matters of personal status was replaced by the Ottoman Family Rights Law of 1917 and by the Jordanian family laws of 1951 and 1976, successively.[287] The qadi’s autonomy in this court, as far as the material law is concerned, is less than that of the Libyan qadi in the period under review.

* Sedentary Tribal Society, Custom, and Shari’a

The population of Cyrenaica and the Judean Desert, which is the object of this study, is different with respect to social, economic, and political conditions, and school of law and material law applicable in the shari’a courts. Moreover, substantial differences exist even within Cyrenaica itself between the regions of Ajda’biya and Kufra. In spite of these differences, Cyrenaica and the Judean Desert share one fundamental feature: in both cases tribal societies in the process of sedentarization are being brought within the orbit of the sharia.[288]

Ajda’biya, a district center in the cultivable plain near the Mediterranean coast, has always been an important center, owing to its location at a strategic junction of roads leading to Tripoli in the west, Benghazi, Alexandria, and Cairo in the east, and Kufra and Khartoum in the south. The town was the seat of the SanUsl government during the short period of indirect rule under the Italians. The people in this area are part of the Sa’adl confederation of tribes, the principal tribes being the Magha”riba and Maja’bira. In the town of Ajda’biya, however, they are outnumbered by members of other tribes and clans. Kufra, far in the south, consists of oases, and is also located on trade routes. Kufra was the administrative center for the Sanu’siyya and a command headquarters during the resistance to French expansion. The Zuwayya tribe is the largest population group and the dominant one; but there are other tribes, black-skinned and white-skinned, immigrant laborers from Chad and the Sudan; Ikhwa’n (“brothers”—that is, descendants of officials and servants of zawiyas of the SanUsl order who remained in Kufra after the abolition of the order); and emancipated slaves integrated into the Zuwayya genealogy. The tribes in these two regions are in different stages of sedentarization.[289]

The Bedouin in the Judean Desert are a group of tribes in the Jerusalem-Bethlehem region: al-Sawa’h’ira east of Jerusalem, al->Ubaydiyya east of Bayt Sa’h’u’r, the al-Ta’a’mira tribes extending from Bayt Sa’h’u’r in the north to Bayt Fajja’r in the south, and al-Rasha’<ida southeast of Taqu’>a. The settlement of these Bedouin, which began in the 1920s and was almost complete by the 1970s, was accelerated by proximity to Jerusalem and Bethlehem and by domestic security policy. Al-Ta’a’mira tribes have established settlements of their own in existing Judean villages and in the suburbs of Bethlehem. About half of these Bedouin no longer live within a tribal framework.[290]

As is known, normative Islam, with its system of beliefs, institutions, and laws, plays no central part in the shaping of a nomadic society.[291] Folk religion, including saint worship and intercession, still predominates. Moreover, in Cyrenaica vestiges remain of the Sanus’ iyya, an instance of S’u’fl ‘ order, adapted to the institutional and normative system of a tribal society—although the Sanu’sl’ establishment started to disintegrate after the Italian invasion in 1911.[292] Custom survived even when its followers had nominally adopted Islam. Western and Muslim scholars have observed that although Bedouin in various parts of the Muslim world consider themselves to be Muslims, their knowledge of Islamic doctrine, worship, and ethics is modest (this applies also to the Cyrenaican Bedouin even after the Sanu’sl’ revivalist movement had become established in their midst). Thus, they are negligent in the carrying out of such religious obligations as perfoming public prayer in the mosque on Fridays, and customary law has the upper hand in its encounter with Islamic law. Their acceptance of Islamic law is partial and slow. Although the Islamization of the Bedouin has been going on for centuries it has not yet been completed in every respect.[293] As might be expected, the Bedouin are not fully aware of this process. They identify themselves as Muslims. They believe in Alla’h and resort to him in various circumstances.[294] They regard tribal law as part of their Islamic heritage, although some of the customs are inconsistent with normative Islam.[295] The fact that the Bedouin identify their daily practice with the sharl>a in every respect is naturally of great significance. The outside observer, however, cannot and should not stop at this point but rather must make a clear distinction, devoid of value judgment, between orthodox sharl>a and tribal custom.[296] There is ample evidence to the effect that the Libyan qadls themselves are fully aware of the distinction between sharia, custom (>ada) and statutory law (qanun). The wakll qadl (the qadl‘s deputy) of Bethlehem, Shaykh Muhammad Sa>ld Jamal al-Rifa>1, maintains that “custom (>urf, ada) is binding law (hukm mulzim), provided that it does not conflict with an explicit provision (nas’s’) of the Qur<a’n and the sunna.”[297]

The sedentarization of the Bedouin in modern times brings them under the control of the central government, one aspect of which is the sharl’>a court. Under Italian rule the Bedouin of Cyrenaica applied to the sharl’>a courts only to a limited extent, preferring to settle their affairs according to tribal custom.[298] In the early 1970s their recourse to the sharl’>a courts increased although they did not cease to apply concurrently to the tribal courts.

Researchers have suggested several explantations for the Bedouin’s application to the sharl’>a courts:[299]

1. Sedentarization, which brings the Bedouin closer to normative Islam and hence increases their respect for the qadi’’s moral and religious authority and his function as the nominal head of the school of law (madhhab).

2. The spread of religious education and modern means of communication.

3. Geographical proximity to urban, religious, administrative, and economic centers.

4. The imposition—on the initiative of the central government—of shar>l’ jurisdiction on the Bedouin along with the abolition of statutory tribal jurisdiction (in the case of Jordan),[300] with a view to strengthening the Muslim establishment as a means to consolidate the government’s position in tribal society. From the point of view of the central government, it is easier to rule through its control of institutionalized normative Islam rather than trying to control popular religion and customs that vary from one place to another and are dominated by indigenous leaders competing among themselves for power.

5. Administrative exigencies in a modern state. Thus, for example, confirmation of marriage by a qadi’ or a shar>l’ solemnizer is required to ensure that no impediments to marriage exist between the parties that may render the marriage irregular (fas’id) or null and void (bat’i’ l). Registration of changes in marital status by the sharl’a court is also required to secure social allowances and education and medical care for children, and a shar>l’ order of succession is required to effect property rights and transactions in the land registers.

6. Equality of all parties, regardless of their tribe, origin, color, or legal position in the sharia court. (There is evidence of the rights of manumitted slaves being protected there).[301] True, the position of women and cognates under the sharia is not equal to that of men and agnates, respectively. However, their position under the sharia is much better than under tribal customary law. Indeed, some evidence suggests that the sharia court is preferred especially by people whose position in traditional society is weak and who therefore cannot realize their rights under the tribal customary system. Thus, the sharia court is applied to by divorced women who have been denied their financial rights or by heirs deprived of their share in the estate under customary law. The applicants expect the sharia court to determine their rights under the sharia .[302]

7. The executive power of the sharia court provides legal security for the realization of legal and financial rights between the parties.

Although there can be no doubt that application by sedentary Bedouin to the sharia court reflects to some extent a genuine religious transformation,[303] administrative exigencies and practical considerations are no doubt the main causes of this phenomenon. In any case, once the process of sedentarization starts, normative Islam gradually becomes a more binding lifestyle as regards worship, religious duties, and law in those domains with respect to which the sedentary Bedouin apply to the shar>l judicial system and the exponents of the sharl>a—namely, in matters of personal status and succession.

* The Qadi, Custom, and Shari’a

From the sijills of the sharl>a courts and the documents collected from tribal arbitrators, one may conclude that the more the Bedouin become sedentarized the closer they are brought within normative Islam.[304] The complex of relations between sharl>a and tribal custom may be divided into two main categories. In one custom reigns supreme, outside the control of the sharia, with only minor concessions to the sharl>a. Included in this category are “gift” (>ata<) marriages[305] that do not meet the shar>l requirements for contractual validity (offer and acceptance, etc.) and other residual traces of customary marriage according to which a woman is not a party to the marriage contract, such as the marrying off of a girl by her guardian (wall) against her will (wilayat ijbar), contrary to the Hanafl doctrine with respect to a girl who has reached maturity. Also in this category is exchange marriage (taba'dul zawja't, shigha'r)—that is, the mutual waiver of the payment of dower for the two brides, each of them representing the dower of the other;[306] customary legal maxims couched in rhyme pertaining to deferred dower payable upon divorce or death of one of the spouses;[307] khul> ("divestiture," divorce by agreement, by which the wife redeems herself from the marriage for a consideration), in which a promissory note (qus'sa) in the amount of the dower is drawn up and made payable to the divorcing husband upon the marriage of the divorced wife to another man.[308]

Other cases in this category are divorce by means of the archaic z'iha'r oath, which renders the wife a blood relative within the forbidden degrees for marriage[309] and homicide and bodily injury regulated by pure customary law.[310]

The other category prominently displays the impact of the sharl>a in areas in which it wields assimilative power over custom. In this category, the qadls play a decisive role in bringing a Bedouin population within the orbit of the sharl'>a. Unlike the independent muftl', the qadi is directly and constantly confronted by the Bedouin; his ability to display a tolerant attitude toward custom, to compromise with it while adopting and absorbing it into the sharl'>a, may create a favorable climate in which a custom-bound population will apply to a shar l' judicial authority. On the other hand, a qadi's uncompromising effort to enforce the sharl'>a in letter and spirit, regardless of the modest Islamic knowledge of those applying to the court, may turn the Bedouin population away from its jurisdiction. It has been observed in various regions of the Islamic world that nomads accept the shar l' qadis' decisions only insofar as such decisions agree with the customary norm.[311]

How do the qadis react to the confrontation between the sharl’>a, which they are expected to apply, and tribal customary law dominant among the Bedouin? Do they uncompromisingly impose the sharl’>a on the Bedouin, thus risking the latter’s withdrawal from the sharl’>a court? Do they submit to tribal custom, thus abusing their role as exponents of the sharl>’ a? Or do they seek a golden path between the two and meet custom half way, knowing this to be the only way to bring the Bedouin closer to the sharl’>a? Naturally, much depends on the education and professional training of the qadi, his religious and social backgound, and his personal motivation. Unfortunately, I have no such information regarding the Libyan qadis.[312] There is no indication in their decisions that they were influenced or inspired by the legal methodology of the Grand SanUsl. Although the SanUsl belonged to the Maliki school, he felt free to deviate from it with respect to some issues. Moreover, under the influence of Ibn Taymiyya he did not regard himself as bound by taql’l’d, the established body of law, of the Ma’likl’ school, and claimed for himself some freedom to exercise personal ijtiha’d (reasoning).[313] The qadis of Bethlehem, who are bound by the H’ anafl’ school of law, seem to have a formal and solid education in Islamic law, both codified and uncodified.

Several tendencies can be distinguished in the judicial practice: the qadis’ reconciliation with custom (as, with regard to customary khul>, reinstatement of the divorced wife unrestrictedly regardless of the waiting period and the quota of three divorces; the circumvention of the shar l’ rules of inheritance; and customary “Jah’ill’” will) and enforcement of the sharl’>a while rejecting custom completely (as with regard to the legal consequences of divorce).[314] In Libya, dar’adl, a tribal arbitrator who has been incorporated in the sharl’>a court to the extent that he is treated by the qadi as a shar l’ notary (adl) of the court, is a unique example of the symbiosis of custom and sharl’>a to which the qadl makes a vital contribution. This institution, which provides a mechanism for handling marital disputes, falls within the gray zone between custom and sharl’>a.[315] The qadis of Bethlehem give retroactive effect to customary marriages of Bedouin not performed by a shar l’ ma<dhu’n (solemnizer) and accept the testimony of Bedouin shaykhs certifying that the marriage was performed by a valid (sa’ h’l’h’) shar l’ union “in accordance with the custom of >Arab al-Sawa’h’ira.” This phenomenon has also been observed among some of the Israeli qadis.[316] Shaykh >Abd al-Qadir >Abd al-Muhsin >Abidin, the qadi of the Sharl’>a Court of Bethlehem, would say: “Since reconciliation is stronger than the qadi (al-s’ulhyuqawwi’ al-qadi), because it is based on agreement between the parties, it effects the qadi’s decision.” Moreover, he would attest that an arrangement by mutual agreement (bi<l-tarad”i’) was frequently achieved with the help of tribal notables (wuju’h al->asha’<ir), and that when a qadi was unable to solve a particular problem, he would refer the parties to an arbitrator. Among the Bedouin of the Judean Desert it has been observed that the parties appoint arbitrators to prepare the ground (tamhi’dan) for the settlement of financial matters between them and then rush to the shari’a court to obtain shar i’ legitimation for the proposed settlement. There is ample evidence for the close cooperation between the customary arbitrator and the shar i’ qadi.[317] Customary substantive and procedural law still plays an important role in the Judean Desert.[318]

The qadis’ tendency to reconcile with custom may bring about deviations from orthodox shari’a, as in the case of a khul> agreement (endorsed by court) in which it is stipulated that the divorced wife is prohibited from marrying someone before her ex-husband has been compensated by the dower of the future husband.[319]

The Maliki school, like other Sunni schools of law, does not recognize custom (>ad’a, urf) as a formal source of law. Yet custom has a solid basis in the Ma’liki’ corpus of law due to the fact that the Medinese practices (>amal) were incorporated into that school and granted the status of Prophetic sunna. In other words, custom has been absorbed into the oral traditions; hence its status as a formal source of law has ceased to be relevant.[320] This may explain why the Ma’liki’ school applicable in Libya is more inclined than any other school to compromise with custom. The eclecticism of the Ma’liki’ school found, since the fifteenth century, sophisticated expression in the judicial practice (>amal) of the shari’a courts in North Africa, which in the view of some observers became a source of law in its own right.[321]

The Libyan documents do not point to a sophisticated, systematic approach by the qadis aimed at absorbing custom by the shari’a. Moreover, there is no significant evidence in our documents of the qadis’ recourse to religious-legal literature,[322] which may imply unwillingness on their part to invoke the fuqaha’<, who are charged with the task of adapting the shari’a to changing social conditions by means of expert legal opinions (fatwa’s). On the other hand, some evidence in Libya suggests that the qadl is occasionally approached in his capacity not as a judicial authority but rather as a mufti competent to issue a legal opinion (jawa’b) in matters pertaining to divorce, succession, validity of a conversion into foreign currency, and the apportionment of tax burden among the parties to a camel-hiring contract.[323] When acting in his capacity as a mufti the qadl functions by virtue not of his nomination by the ruler but rather of his reputation as an independent faqlh.

The qadls’ decisions in Libya are generally characterized by a formalistic approach.[324] Occasionally, however, while imposing the religious-legal consequences derived from any given act, they may reproach a party to a dispute who has violated a religious-legal norm. In one case, in which a husband divorced his wife by five repudiations at one session, the qadl ruled that the first three exhausted the husband’s shar>l quota and the rest made a mockery of the Qur<anic verses.[325] This style of the qadl was meant to strengthen awareness of the sharl>a in a custom-bound population applying to the sharl>a court out of practical considerations.

As mentioned earlier, an agreement between the parties is “stronger than the qadl.” However, in the absence of such an agreement, the qadls of Bethlehem, charged with adjudicating matters of personal status and succession of the Judean Desert Bedouin, reject custom altogether and apply the sharl>a in its codified version under Jordanian family law, even when they know this will involve intolerable hardship.[326] It is interesting to note in this connection that some of the Israeli shar>l qadls dissolved marital unions on the ground that they had been concluded according to tribal custom rather than the Ottoman Family Rights Law of 1917 (which was adopted in Palestine in 1919) and ordered the parties to conclude shar>l marriages.[327] Deviation from statutory provisions of the family law would create grounds for appeal to the Shari>a Court of Appeal. The scope of judicial discretion available to the qadls of Bethlehem that could be used to bridge the gap between sharl>a and custom was by the nature of things restricted to cases where there was no need to hand down a decision based on statutory provisions—that is, cases that were settled by mutual consent of the parties. Among the Bedouin of the Judean Desert, some evidence points to a kind of sophistication designed to facilitate the adoption of the sharl>a by means of Shafi>1 fatwas—that is, outside the control of the sharia court. This applies, for example, to cases of reinstatement of a triply divorced wife. Under the H’ anafi’ doctrine, which is dominant in the Shari>’ a Court of Betlehem, the intent (niyya) of the husband to divorce his wife is irrelevant, and the triply divorced wife is therefore not legally permitted to her ex-husband unless an intermediate marriage to a third party has taken place. Under the Sha’fi>i ‘ doctrine, on the other hand, lack of intent to divorce the wife is taken into account (mu>tabara) and thus may spare the inconvenience involved in an intermediate marriage.[328] The Libyan qadls use their discretion to invoke the principle of maslaha (public interest) to bridge the gap between sharl>a and custom. In the twentieth century, the ability of the sharia court to bring the Bedouin within the orbit of normative Islam has declined due not only to the codification of the sharia but also to the competition of civil courts and the process of secularization.[329]

As noted earlier, in classical theory, the qadl is a delegate, either direct or indirect, of the caliph. The findings accumulated from the sijills of the sharl>a courts suggest, however, that the qadls regard themselves rather as representatives of the Muslim community at large by virtue of their commission to apply the sharl’>a. Their moral integrity and inner conviction of fulfilling a public mission is in the best tradition of the muh’tasib, the Islamic inspector of the market, anchored in the religious command: “to promote good and discourage evil” (al-amr bi<l-ma>ru ‘ f wa<l-nahy an al-munkar). In other words, the qadi regards himself as responsible for enforcing Islamic morals and behavior in the Muslim community. Such a function is incumbent on any individual who seeks to gain religious merit by his zeal for the sharl’>a, due to the limited role of the public authority in Muslim society (thus, there is no office of public prosecution in Islam).[330] It is interesting to note in this connection that in a land dispute settled in a Sudanese court by mutual consent of the parties and made effective by judicial decision (h’ukm rida<‘l’), the court was inspired by the Qur<a’nic commandment “to promote good and discourage evil.” Later, one of the parties changed his mind, but the judicial decision was sustained by the court of appeal on the grounds that “the statutory law (qa’nu’n) and the sharl’>a authorize [the qadi] to combine the office of the judge with the function of the muh’tasib (al-jam bayna waz’l’fatay al-qada’< wa<l-h’isba).”[331]

 Denial of Paternity—a Decision Handed Down by the Shari’>a Court of Ajda’biya

* Summary

The case discussed below[332] is meant to illustrate the qadi’s scope of autonomy to the extent of deviating from the strict shar l’ norm and adopting local customs and institutions. In doing so the qadi was inspired solely by the welfare of all the parties concerned. Yet he used his judicial discretion and religious authority to resolve the dispute within the bounderies of the sharl’>a court, thus bringing the sedentary Bedouin closer to normative Islam.

After a series of disputes between the spouses that resulted in the wife leaving her husband’s house and moving to her father’s house as “an angry woman,” the court instructed the spouses to stay with a certain tribal notary (dar’adl) so that the latter might report to the court about their behavior. After some time it became apparent that the woman was pregnant. Her husband denied paternity of the child. The woman at first acknowledged that she was pregnant by a stranger. Later, however, she claimed that her husband had intimidated her into making this acknowledgment. She explained that while she had been “an angry woman” in her father’s house, before moving to the dar’adl, her husband had continued to visit her in secret and have sexual relations with her at will; moreover, he had acknowledged having caused her pregnancy, and later on, while under the protection of the adl, they had lived together in complete harmony until her father-in-law showed up and incited her husband against her.

The adl confirmed in court that the couple’s mutual relations had been normal until her father-in-law appeared on the scene, after which the husband denied his part in the pregnancy. After the wife had acknowledged that she was pregnant by a stranger, the adl summoned her and, pointing at a saint’s tomb, enjoined her to tell the truth. Recourse to the sanction of the holy man’s tomb had its effect: the woman withdrew her first acknowledgment and attributed her pregnancy to her husband. The latter, however, persisted in denying paternity.

The qadl rejected the husband’s denial, apparently on the grounds that the li>an’ procedure had not taken place. According to this procedure, in cases of unproven charges of adultery against the wife it is possible to dissolve the marriage through a process of mutual imprecation; while paternity is denied, the parties are not subject to the Qur<a’nic sanctions prescribed for adultery (zina)’ and unproven charges of adultery (qadhf). The qadi ascribed paternity to the husband and enjoined him to return the wife to his house, to treat her well, restore her dower, her trousseau, and her jewelry, and pay her maintenance retroactively for the period during which he had neglected to do so.

* Legal Background[333]

Denial of paternity, as in the case under review, is tantamount to an accusation of adultery (zina)’ . The offense can be established either by the wife’s acknowledgment (four acknowledgments are required) or by the testimony of four eyewitnesses to the act of sexual intercourse. Once the offense has been established, the wife is liable to Qur<a’nic punishment (hadd)—that is, death by stoning (rajm)—provided she is muh’sana—that is, that the marriage has been consummated. If, however, the husband fails to establish the offense, he is liable to the Qur<a’nic punishment for unfounded accusation of adultery (qadhf), eighty lashes and removal of the right to testify until he repents.[334]

If the husband cannot prove his allegation but nevertheless continues to deny paternity, he is expected to initiate the procedure of li>an’ . According to this procedure, which is based on the Qur<an (24: 4, 6–99 and the hadlth, the husband must swear four oaths (by analogy to four witnesses required to establish adultery9 in which he invokes the name of God to the effect that he is telling the truth, and a fifth oath to the effect that if he lies he will be liable to God’s imprecation. If he fails to swear these oaths after having accused his wife of adultery, he will be liable for the hadd-punishment for qadhf. The wife must swear four oaths in which she invokes the name of God to the effect that her husband is lying and that she is innocent, and a fifth oath to the effect that if her husband is telling the truth she will be liable to God’s anger. If she fails to swear these oaths she will be liable to the hadd-punishment for zina.’ If the husband keeps silent while pregnancy becomes apparent, he is liable to the Qur<a’nic hadd and may not resort to the li>an’ procedure. The hadd applies also in the event that he retracts from his denial of paternity.

For the li>an’ procedure to be effected, the marriage must be valid or presumed (h’ukman) to be valid. If the marriage is irregular (fas’id) the woman is regarded as a stranger. If both the husband and wife adhere to the li>an’ procedure, then they are exempt from the Qur<a’nic punishments—lashes and stoning, respectively (li>an’ averts [yadra<u] the hadd); they are not allowed to have sexual relations with each other (istimta>’) even before the marriage is dissolved by court. According to the Maliki school the marriage is dissolved (furqa) by the act of mutual imprecation (mula’ana), and the qadl‘s decision is required only to make dissolution effective (munaffadh). Li>an’ is regarded as judicial dissolution (faskh) rather than (as under Abu’ H’ anifa’s doctrine) irrevocable (ba<‘in) unilateral repudiation (ta’ laq’); in fact, it is tantamount to eternal (mu<abbad) dissolution, which creates a permanent prohibition for marriage, as in the case of prohibition on grounds of fosterage (rada>’).

Li>an’ precludes the husband’s paternity of the child (the child is related only to his mother), and there exist no mutual rights of inheritance (but the child and his mother inherit each other) or maintenance. If the procedure of li>an’ takes place before consummation, the wife is entitled to half of her dower. Nevertheless, some of the legal effects of paternity are left intact as a precaution in case paternity between the husband and child is established in the future: no option of retaliation (qisas”) exists if one of them causes the death of the other; they and their relatives are prohibited from marrying each other on grounds of affinity (musah’ara). And finally, the child who is the object of the denial is not regarded as a child of unknown paternity and therefore may not be claimed for the purpose of paternity by a stranger.

* The Qadi’s Decision

In this case, the qadl rejected the husband’s denial of paternity and ruled that paternity should be attributed (ilhaq’) to him (court’s decision, line 33). There is a clear indication to the effect that the qadl was aware of the li>an procedure, and one wonders why he did not mention it explicitly. After having established the validity (thubu’t) of the marriage between the spouses, their intimate association (mu>as’hara), and their legal marital relations (khulta’), the qadl drew attention to the fact that the husband had not invoked the procedure especially laid down in the sharia for the denial of paternity (nafy Al-haml) (lines 31–32). There can be no doubt that he was referring to li>an.

As noted, denial of paternity is tantamount to an accusation of adultery, and if it is not proven either by four acknowledgments or by eyewitnesses—as in the present case—a ground is created for the hadd punishment for qadhf— that is, eighty lashes. Yet the qadl totally ignored the Qur<anic sanction without attempting to explain his omission. One possible explanation is that the sharl>a court in contemporary Libya has no jurisdiction over matters pertaining to shar>l penal sanctions (hudud).[335] However, this does not provide a fully satisfactory explanation. Paternity and its denial are matters of personal status within the sole jurisdiction of the sharia court,[336] although this court may not effect the attendant penal sanction if the husband cannot prove his accusation. One would expect the qadl to draw attention to the shar>l legal norm involved, or at least to make some value judgment regarding the fact that the husband has violated the Qur<a’nic prohibition of qadhf. Nothing of the kind is to be found in the judgment.

A more satisfactory explanation is that the qadl was motivated by the interests of the wife and, even more so, the yet-to-be-born child. He was fully convinced that the wife was pregnant by her husband and hence there was no reason, in his mind, to dissolve the marriage. As a result, he decided to concentrate on rehabilitation of the marriage in spite of the husband’s continued denial of paternity. It goes without saying that the li>an’ procedure was not helpful to this end. Moreover, an accusation of adultery, even if unproven, may cause severe damage to the reputation of the wife in addition to the dissolution of the marriage. Similarly, denial of paternity may affect the child’s right to receive maintenance from his father and to inherit from his estate. Instead, the qadl enjoined the husband to take his wife back to the conjugal dwelling, restore all her financial rights and personal effects, and pay her maintenance retroactively. One should bear in mind that maintenance includes maskan shar l—that is, legal conjugal dwelling “in the neighborhood of virtuous persons” (bi-jiwar qawm salihln)[337] rather than in a desolate dwelling (line 1)— which may have been the initial cause of the dispute between the spouses. If this explanation is correct, we have to do here with a clear instance of applying the principle of mas’laha, public interest, in judicial practice.

The qadl here does not regard himself as being bound by the sharl norms pertaining to the denial of paternity. In fact, he seems to be guided purely by pragmatic considerations. He has no inhibitions whatsoever about resorting to a tribal notary (dar’adl) for handling this particular marital dispute. As explained elsewhere, dar’adl is a tribal customary institution that became incorporated in the sharia court. The sharl qadl makes a decisive contribution to this end in his efforts to bring tribal society within the orbit of normative Islam.[338] The adl, on his part, enlists the sanction of a holy man’s tomb[339] to cause the wife to withdraw her first acknowledgment according to which she was pregnant by a stranger. The qadl does not seem to be disturbed by this procedure while assessing the accumulating evidence for rejecting the husband’s denial of paternity. Indeed, the court’s decision demonstrates the consolidated status of tribal custom and popular religion in the daily life of a tribal society in the process of sedentarization.

The case under review illustrates the extent of the qadl‘s judicial discretion to accommodate the sharia to social reality. In theory, he is bound by the sharl>a in its Maliki version. In practice, he uses his own discretion to bridge the gap between idealistic sharia and custom. Unless a violation of public order is anticipated as a result of the qadl‘s decision, no intervention on the part of the ruler is expected. Such an intervention is unlikely in matters of personal status. Hence, one may conclude that the sharl>a court fulfills a vital role in the public sphere in the sense that the qadl is capable of formulating norms of social, ethical, and legal behavior independently—that is, outside the control of the political authority.

 Appendix: The Court’s Decision and Its Translation

* The Arabic Text

[[m-h-miriam-hoexter-shmuel-n-eisenstadt-nehemia-lev-1.png]]

[[m-h-miriam-hoexter-shmuel-n-eisenstadt-nehemia-lev-2.jpg]]

[[m-h-miriam-hoexter-shmuel-n-eisenstadt-nehemia-lev-3.png]]

[<verbatim>1</verbatim>] [...]{1}{2}{3}{4}{5}{6}] ادعت الزوجة في
كانت تعول نفسها (نفقة) على ما تلتقطه من حصاد حقل من [الموسم] الذي سبق [المحكمة أنها
التاريخ، وذلك لأن [زوجها] قد أودعها في مسكن مهجور (استودعها) واستولى على [ممتلكاتها]
وعندما كشفت لأبيها عن عدم رغبتها في [<verbatim>2</verbatim>] .(غاصبها) ظلماً
على هذه [<verbatim>3</verbatim>] إعالة نفسها (نفقة) من الحصاد، لم يوافقها
النقطة. ثم أمرت المحكمة السيد المذكور إبراهيم بإعادة الزوجة [من مسكن الزوجية] إلى بيته
وإعادة النظر في قضية عودة والدها من الكفرة. [<verbatim>4</verbatim>] الخاص
فأجابه بأنكر (نفيان) [<verbatim>5</verbatim>] وبعد ذلك وجه القاضي سؤالاً إلى الزوج
الحمل (حمل)، وأقر بأنه وأخوه >عبد الرازق قد انتزعا منها (سلباً) ثوبها،
مئزرها، وسوارها. “وبعد ذلك، في 11 فبراير 1948، [<verbatim>6</verbatim>]
استدعت المحكمة الزوجين [<verbatim>7</verbatim>] الموافق 30 ربيع الأول 1367 هـ
والسيد المذكور إبراهيم، وسألتهما: ““هل تريدان الإدلاء بأقوال (أقوال)
تتناقض مع ما قلتماه سابقاً [في المحكمة]؟”” “أجابت [<verbatim>8</verbatim>] [<verbatim>9</verbatim>] الزوجة على هذا بأن قولها الأول (تقرير) كان باطلاً (باطل)
.لأنه كان تحت ضغط (ضغط) وترهيب من زوجها، وأنها في الحقيقة حملت من زوجها
ولم يكن لديها شك في ذلك لأن زوجها استمر في الاتصال [<verbatim>10</verbatim>]
[<verbatim>11</verbatim>]، بها خلال الفترة التي كانت فيها “مغتاظة” في بيت أبيها
ولم يكف عن ممارسة الجنس معها كلما سمحت المناسبة؛” في الواقع، حتى بعد ظهورها لأول
وبيانها السابق الأخير، زارها ليلاً في [أمام المحكمة] [<verbatim>12</verbatim>] مرة
التي نامت فيها ومارس معها الجنس (خلعها). [<verbatim>13</verbatim>] الغرفة
[<verbatim>14</verbatim>] [وقالت أيضًا إن] زوجها كان يعلم بحملها واعترف بذلك
وأنه عاش في حميمية منسجمة (معشرة) معها [بعد انتقاله إلى دار العدل] حتى زاره والده
تغير سلوكه تجاهها [<verbatim>15</verbatim>] وعقدا اجتماعًا طويلاً؛ وعندها.

وسئل السيد المذكور إبراهيم الخليل عما يعرفه بين الزوجين المذكورين، فأجاب قائلا: بعد أيام “ قليلة من عودتهما إلى علاقاتهما الزوجية تحت حمايتي قررت الذهاب إلى أجدابيا وسألت كل منهما على حدة عن علاقتهما الحميمة، حيث كان هناك احتمال أن أمر على المحكمة الشرعية لتقديم الأخبار عن الزوجين تحت حمايته.” “وكانت إجاباتهما تدل على أن بينهما انسجاماً تاماً. ولكن عند عودتي من أجدابيا وجدتهما في حالة نفسية [<verbatim>19</verbatim>] وأبلغت أنه في غيابي جاء والد الزوج إلى [<verbatim>20</verbatim>]، متناقضة ليخبرني بحمل زوجته، [<verbatim>21</verbatim>] المرعى. وبعد ذلك جاءني الزوج [<verbatim>22</verbatim>] السيد “.وأنها عزت ذلك إلى شخص آخر قال إبراهيم أيضا: “أحضرت الزوجة إلى منزلي، وأشرت إلى قبر سيد جبريل، وحثثتها على ألا تقول إلا الحقيقة. ولكنها غادرت منزلي دون [<verbatim>23</verbatim>] وبعد ثلاثة أيام جاءني زوجها وأخبرني [<verbatim>24</verbatim>] .أن تقول كلمة واحدة وأكدت [<verbatim>25</verbatim>] أن زوجته أقرت بحملها منه. فصحبته إلى المنزل الزوجة ما أقرت به من قبل [أنها حامل من زوجها]. ورد زوجها على ذلك بالإصرار على ما أقر به أنكر [أمام المحكمة] [<verbatim>26</verbatim>] .”من قبل [أي أن الحمل لم يكن منه] أن والده جاء لزيارته وهو تحت حماية السيد إبريك (جوار). [وأصر على] إنكاره (نافي) للحمل عندما غادرت زوجتي منزلي العام الماضي “ [<verbatim>27</verbatim>] :[الأبوة] قائلاً [وانتقلت إلى منزل والدها كـ”امرأة غاضبة”] كانت حائضًا (هائجة). بعد ذلك لم يكن لدي أي اتصال بها حتى [وضعنا أنفسنا] تحت حماية [<verbatim>28</verbatim>] السيد إبريك (جوار). “حماية السيد إبريك (جلرا)”.

[<verbatim>29</verbatim>] ،وبعد ذلك، في الثاني عشر من شهر فبراير من هذا العام حضر الوكيلان المذكوران [أمام المحكمة]، وسئلا عما إذا كان لديهما [أي شيء ليقولاه] يتناقض أمر السيد إبريك بنقل حمايتها [<verbatim>30</verbatim>] .مع ما قيل. فأجابا بالنفي (حمايتها) إلى أبيها وأمر الأخير بقبولها (استلامها).

بناءً على ما قيل في المحاضر السابقة (محاضرة) ومع [<verbatim>31</verbatim>] مراعاة شهادة (ثبوت) عقد الزواج، وعلاقة الزوجين الحميمة (معاشرتهما)، وجماعهما (الخلعة)، [ومع مراعاة حقيقة أن] الشرع وضع إجراء (حدات ... تهدل) لنفي الحمل (نفى الحمل) — ولم [<verbatim>33</verbatim>] يقدم أي دليل [يظهر أن هذا الإجراء قد تم تنفيذه] في هذه وعلى هذا الأساس حكم القاضي بأن الحمل يجب أن ينسب إلى الزوج، وألزمه أن يرد إلى “ زوجته كل ما أخذه غصباً: مهرها، وثيابها، وحليها التي هي ثيابها، ومئزرها، وسوارها المذكور. وألزمه كذلك أن ينفق عليها من الوقت الذي أهمل فيه دفعها.” وقد قدرت هذه القيمة بـ بجنيهين ونصف لمدة خمسة أشهر حتى فبراير 1948. [كما [<verbatim>36</verbatim>] ومعاملتها معاملة حسنة. وقد أصدر [<verbatim>37</verbatim>] ألزمه] باستعادة زوجته الحكم على النحو الواجب، وأمر بتسجيله، وطلب من [الشهود] أن يشهدوا عليه في 16 فبراير 1948.

[<verbatim>38</verbatim>] (شهدوا الحال) شهود على الإجراءات.

[<verbatim>39</verbatim>] الأمر كما تقدم [<verbatim>40</verbatim>] قاضي رافي> >عبد الرحمن القاضي [<verbatim>41</verbatim>] أجدابيا

{1} Regrettably, the beginning of this document is not available for inclusion here. However, on the basis of a preceding document, it is possible to conclude that the matter was decided by Shaykh Rafi> Abd al-Rahman al-Qadi, the Qadi of the Sharia Court of Ajdabiya. See Layish and Davis 1988, 89, no. 115 (taken from the sijill of Shara Court of Ajdabiya, p. 188, no. 185 of 12 February 1948).

{2} The words ‘.L ...-د -.د s’:’‘ , have been corrected in the document and appear in the margin of the document.

{3} The grammatical form of the imperfect verb with n- in the first person singular reflects spoken usage in the Maghrib. For further details see Blanc 1974, 206 and 209.

{4} This word was copied twice in the original, the second time at the beginning of line 35. A note to this effect (j ظ:.) is mentioned in the margin of the document, which implies that the repetition is cancelled.

{5} Some words were omitted from line 37 in its original version. This line has here been reconstructed on the basis of corrections in the margin of the document.

{6} The conclusion to this document is not available to me. See fn. 1 above.

* Translation[340]

[<verbatim>1</verbatim>] [...][341] [the wife had claimed in court that she] was supporting herself (tun-fiq) on gleanings from the harvest of a field from the [season] that preceded the date,[342] due to the fact that [her husband] had lodged her in a desolate dwelling (istawhadaha)’ [343] and unlawfully seized [her belongings] (ghasabaha)’ .[344] [<verbatim>2</verbatim>] When she revealed to her father her unwillingness to support herself (nafaqa) on the harvest, he did not agree with her [<verbatim>3</verbatim>] on this point.[345] Then, the court instructed the aforementioned sayyid Ibrlk to return the wife [from the conjugal dwelling] to his own private home[346] [<verbatim>4</verbatim>] and to reexamine the case on her father’s return from Kufra. Afterwards, the [qadl] addressed a question to the husband [<verbatim>5</verbatim>] who responded by denying (naf’iyan) the pregnancy [paternity] (haml),[347] and acknowledging that he and his brother >Abd al-Ra’ziq had taken away from her by force (salaba’) [her] garment, [<verbatim>6</verbatim>] her apron, and [her] bracelet. Subsequently, on 11 February 1948, which corresponds to the 30th of Rabl> Awwal 1367, [<verbatim>7</verbatim>] the court summoned the two spouses and the aforementioned sayyid Ibrlk, and both [spouses] were asked: “Do you want to make statements (aqwal’) [<verbatim>8</verbatim>] that contradict what you have previously said [in court]?”[348] To this, the wife answered that her first statement (taqrlr) was null and void (bat’i’ l) [<verbatim>9</verbatim>] because it had been given under pressure (daght)’ and intimidation from her husband, and that in reality, she had been made pregnant by her husband. [<verbatim>10</verbatim>] She had no doubt concerning that fact because her husband continued to maintain contact with her during the period when she was “an angry woman” (mughtad’a) [mughtaz’a][349] in her father’s [<verbatim>11</verbatim>] house, and he did not cease having sexual relations (mukhal’ata’) with her whenever the occasion allowed; indeed, even after her first appearance [<verbatim>12</verbatim>] [in court] and her recent preceding statement, he visited her at night in the room [<verbatim>13</verbatim>] in which she slept and had sexual relations with her (khal’ata’ ha)’ . [She also said that] her husband knew about her pregnancy and acknowledged it [<verbatim>14</verbatim>] and that he had lived in harmonious intimacy (mu>as’hara) with her [after having moved to the dar’adl] until his father visited him and they had a long meeting; whereupon [<verbatim>15</verbatim>] his behavior toward her changed.[350]

The aforementioned sayyid Ibrlk’ was asked [to state] what he knew [concerning the relations] between the aforementioned couple. [<verbatim>16</verbatim>] He answered, saying: “A few days after they resumed their conjugal relations (muraj’a’atihima)’ under my protection (jiwar’),[351] I decided to go [<verbatim>17</verbatim>] to Ajda’biya, and I asked each of them separately concerning their initimate association (mu>as’harati-hima)’, since there was a possibility that I might pass by [<verbatim>18</verbatim>] the Sharl>’ a Court in order to report information (ikhbar’) [concerning the spouses under his protection]. Their answers indicated that there was complete harmony between them. [<verbatim>19</verbatim>] However, on my return from Ajda’biyya I found the two of them in an opposite frame of mind, [<verbatim>20</verbatim>] and I was informed that in my absence the husband’s father had come to the pasturage. Subsequently, the husband came to me [<verbatim>21</verbatim>] to inform me of his wife’s pregnancy, which she attributed to someone else.” Sayyid [<verbatim>22</verbatim>] Ibrlk also said: “I brought the wife to my home and, pointing to the tomb (darlh) of Sid1 Jibril, [<verbatim>23</verbatim>] I exhorted her to say nothing but the truth. [352] However, she left my house without saying a word. [<verbatim>24</verbatim>] Three days later, her husband came to me and informed me that his wife acknowledged (i>tiraf’) [that her pregnancy was by him]. I accompanied him home [<verbatim>25</verbatim>] and the wife confirmed what she had previously acknowledged [that she was pregnant by her husband]. To this her husband responded by insisting on what he had previously declared [viz., that the pregnancy was not by him].” [<verbatim>26</verbatim>] He [viz., the husband] denied [in court] that his father had come to visit him while under sayyid Ibrik’ ’s protection (jiwar’). [He persisted in his] denial (nafy) of the pregnancy [paternity] saying: [<verbatim>27</verbatim>] “When my wife left my home last year [and moved to her father’s house as “an angry woman”] she was menstruating (ha<‘id’). After that [<verbatim>28</verbatim>]

I had no contact with her until [we placed ourselves] under sayyid Ibrik’s protection (jlra).”[353]

Afterwards, on the 12th of the month of February of the current [year], [<verbatim>29</verbatim>] the two aforementioned proxies (wakllan)[354] appeared [in court], and they were asked if they had [anything to say] that contradicted what had been stated. They answered negatively. [<verbatim>30</verbatim>] Sayyid Ibrik’ was ordered to transfer (tasllm) her protection (hamiyatiha) <himayatiha>[355] to her father and the latter was ordered to accept (istilam’) it [viz., the protection].[356]

[<verbatim>31</verbatim>] On the basis of what had been said in the preceding depositions (mahad”ir) and with due regard to the certification (thubu’t) of the marriage contract, the spouses’ intimate association (mu>as’hara),[<verbatim>32</verbatim>] their sexual intercourse (khulta), [and also with due regard to the fact that] the sharl>a established a procedure (haddadat ... tahdldan) for the denial of pregnancy [paternity] (nafy al-haml)—no proof of which had been produced [showing that this procedure had been carried out][357] in these [<verbatim>33</verbatim>] dispositions—[on the basis of all these,] his honour the Qa ‘d’i ‘ ruled that the pregnancy should be attributed (ilhaq’) to the husband,[358] and he obliged him to restore [<verbatim>34</verbatim>] to his wife everything he had taken by force: her dower, her clothing and her jewelry which are her garments, her apron, and her bracelet which have been mentioned. [<verbatim>35</verbatim>] He likewise obligated him to provide [arrears] maintenance from the time that he had neglected to pay it (nafaqat ihmal’iha)’ . This was valued [<verbatim>36</verbatim>] at two and a half pounds for a period of five months until February 1948. [He also obliged him] to take his wife back [<verbatim>37</verbatim>] and to treat her well. He duly handed down [the verdict], instructed that it be entered, and required [the witnesses] to testify (ishhad’) to it on 16 February 1948.

[<verbatim>38</verbatim>] Witnesses to the proceedings (shuhu’d al-hal’).

[<verbatim>39</verbatim>] The matter being as indicated above

[<verbatim>40</verbatim>] the Qadi’of Ajda’biya

[<verbatim>41</verbatim>] Ra’fi> >Abd al-Rah’ma’n al-Qadi ’

 Notes

My colleagues Miriam Hoexter, David Powers, Frank Stewart, and Knut Vik0r read an earlier version of this essay and made useful comments for which I am most grateful.

[266] “Islamization” in this essay denotes the process of bringing tribal society closer to normative Islam, not conversion. Cf. Levtzion 1979a, 19, 21; 1981, 78.

[267] See e.g. Taylor 1990; Calhoun 1992; Cohen and Arato 1992. I am indebted to Professor S. N. Eisenstadt for these references.

[268] Mayer 1987, 130–39.

[269] Layish 1984b; 1987.

[270] Some Egyptian judges in civil courts, by invoking Article 2, refused to apply statutory provisions contradictory to the shan‘a. See Layish and Shaham EI²b.

[271] Mayer 1987, 150–66.

[272] Taylor 1990, 98.

[273] Levtzion 1979b.

[274] Layish 1989, 5.

[275] The Libyan legal documents were placed at my disposal by Professor John Davis of Oxford University. The legal documents from the Judean Desert were collected with the assistance of my colleague, the late Dr. Avshalom Shmueli of Tel Aviv University. I am profoundly grateful to both of them. The findings and conclusions below are drawn freely from my previous research conducted on the basis of these material sources with a view to presenting them within an integrative thesis on shan‘a and custom in tribal societies and within the context of public sphere.

[276] The most authoritative source on the history and organization of the office of the qadl is Tyan 1960. See esp. 100f. For a short survey see Tyan EI². Cf Levtzion 1979b, passim.

[277] Masud, Messick, and Powers 1996b.

[278] Layish 1996.

[279] For details see Layish and Shaham EI²b.

[280] Cf. Black 1990, 216.

[281] Schacht 1964, 19–22; Coulson 1964, 28–33; Layish 1984a, 54. For a different view see Crone 1987, 15–16.

[282] Milliot 1953, 156–69, 167–78; Berque EI²; Coulson 1964, 143ff.; Schacht 1964, 61–62; Serrano [Ruano] 1996; Layish 1984a, 55.

[283] The qadI‘s autonomy is greater than that of the civil judge, who is bound by statutory legislation and by precedents of the supreme court.

[284] For further details see Layish 1991, 14–15; 1998, 19–20.

[285] The Islamic legal treatises most commenly cited in the courts’ record were written by Ibn >Asim (d. 829/1426) 1958, Illaysh (d. 1299/1881-1882) n.d., and Al-Sawl (d. 1241/1825-1826) 1806. Cf. Powers 1994.

[286] The Italians sought to retain a certain measure of normative supervision over the decisions of the qadIs in matters that were contrary to public policy. The “sleeping embryo” (haml na<im) is a case in point. For details see Layish 1991, 5—; 1998, 57 doc. 38.

[287] Anderson 1976, 41; Layish and Shaham EI²a; Layish EI²c, EI²b, EI²a.

[288] Cf. Levtzion 1981, 80.

[289] The assessment regarding sedentarization is disputed by J. Davis. See Davis 1998, 11. Cf. Layish 1991, 15–18 and the sources indicated there.

[290] For further details see Layish and Shmueli 1979, 29.

[291] Cf. Gellner 1969, 8ff., 135–33; 1984, 23–24, 30; Levtzion 1979a, 20; 1981, 79; Shaham 1993, 192–93 and the source indicated in n. 3.

[292] Davis 1987, 110 n. 15.

[293] Cf. Levtzion 1979a, 7, 19–20; 1981, 78.

[294] For details see Layish and Shmueli 1979, 4142.

[295] For details see Layish 1991, 170–71; Gellner 1939, 47; 1981, 100; 1984, 38; Evans-Pritchard 1949, 62; Colucci 1927, 24; Milliot 1953, 157, 166; Layish and Shmueli 1979, 31; lAbbadl 1988, 133, 179–83, 198–99, 403–7, based on Oweidi 1982, 121, 134–37, 149, 321–22 and Coulson 1934, 135–33; Laoust 1939, 519ff.; 1965, 323, 324; Smith 1963, 48ff.; Goldziher 1981, 238ff.; Baer 1964, 132 and the sources indicated there; 1939, 13, 14; Henninger 1959, 125ff. and the sources indicated there (I am indebted to Professor M. J. Kister for this last reference).

[296] Cf. Gellner 1939, 38, 105ff., 129ff., 135; Rosen 1995, 194–97, 201, 203; Davis 1998, 12.

[297] For Libya see Layish 1991, 175–73, 185–91. For Bethleham see Layish 1984a, 41–42.

[298] Cf. Gellner 1939, 105ff.; Lewis 1984, 153.

[299] For details see Davis 1987, 223–25, 228; Layish 1991, 127, 182–83; 1984a, 39–44 and the sources indicated there. Cf. Levtzion 1979a, 21; 1979b; 1981, 79.

[300] The statutes pertaining to the establishment of tribal courts, including the Tribal Court of Appeal of 1933, were abolished in 1973. Jordanian law still applies in the West Bank. See al->Abba’dl ‘ 1988, 114ff., 445. In Israel, the tribal courts in the Negev, which had been established during the British Mandate, were abolished though their judicial basis has been left intact. I have found no indication in Libyan shari>a courts of the existence of statutory tribal courts, but there is ample evidence that matters were settled out of shari>a courts in accordance with tribal law, most probably by tribal arbitrators on a voluntary basis and with the mutual consent of the parties, as is the case in the Judean Desert. Tribal arbitrators (with no formal status) in the Judean Desert deal with issues pertaining to matters of personal status and succession (in competition with the sharFa courts), penal matters (homicide and bodily injury), property, obligations, and contracts (in competiton with the civil courts).

[301] See Layish 1998, 78–79 doc. 32.

[302] Cf. Shahar 1997, 2422. Cf. Kressel 1992, 9495, 133, 184.

[303] There is evidence that already in the nomadic period Bedouin of the Judean Desert would visit the al-Aqsa’ ‘ Mosque, the Dome of the Rock, and the markets of the old city of Jerusalem on Fridays. Layish 1980–1982, 220; 1993, 273 and the source indicated in n. 25. On the performance of religious obligations among the Bedouin of central Sinai see Stewart 1988, 7, 17, 44, 53n., 194; 1987, 53; Lewis 1984, 152–55. I have found no evidence in the sijills (court records) to the effect that the Bedouin resort to the shari>a court is inspired by their desire to belong to the Islamic body politic; such a possibility, however, cannot be ruled out.

[304] Cf. Levtzion 1981, 78.

[305] For details see Layish 1995b; Cf. Nat r 1991; Lewis 1984, 145–44, 152–54.

[306] Layish and Shmueli 1979, 35–37. Cf. Kressel 1992, 223, 230 (waiver of sharl inheritance rights).

[307] Layish 1998, 29–30 docs. 5--.

[308] Ibid., 4544 docs. 25–27. Customary khul> has also been observed among Israeli Muslims. See Layish and Shmueli 1979, 37–38.

[309] See Layish 1998, 38 doc. 15.

[310] Ibid., 72–73 docs. 55–54; Layish 1980–1982, 211.

[311] For additional details see Layish 1991, 185–84 and the sources indicated there; 1980–1982, 218, 221; Cf. 1975, 334; 1974, 407ff.; alAbbadl 1988, 123–25; Oweidi [alAbbadi] 1982, 88–89.

[312] For the name index of the qad 1s and the na<ibs (deputy qad 1s) see Layish 1998, 103.

[313] On the legal methodology of the Grand Sanu’sl’ with special reference to ijtihad and ijtihad f1<l-madhhab see Vik0r 1994; 1995. See also Layish 1991, 204 and the sources indicated there.

[314] For more details see Layish 1991, 172ff.; Layish and Shmueli 1979, 37ff.

[315] For details see Layish 1995a.

[316] Layish 1984a, 42; 1974, 398–99, 4023.

[317] I was present at a meeting in court between the qadi and a tribal arbitrator, who discussed ways of settling a family dispute that was to have been heard in court. For details see Layish and Shmueli 1979, 44; Layish 1984a, 41.

[318] Layish 1980–1988, 211–12.

[319] For details see Layish 1991, 184–99.

[320] Libson 1997, 13337.

[321] See also p. 84 above and the references in n. 17. Cf. Layish 1991, p. 204. Ibn >A’ s’im 1958 (see n. 20 above) incorporated in his al->A’s’imiyya or Tuh’ fat al-h’ukkam’ (see bibliography) the Andalusian judicial practice (>amal). The Libyan documents contain some evidence of the impact of the Ma’likl ‘ judicial practice on day-to-day reality. See Layish 1998, e.g., 80 doc. 45 (musaq’at’), 82 doc. 49 (shahad’at al-laf1’f).

[322] Layish 1998, 24 doc. 1, 49 doc. 31, 47 doc. 50; 1991, 14544.

[323] Layish and Davis 1988, 122 doc. no. 154, 123 doc. no. 157; Layish 1998, 84 docs. 71–72.

[324] Layish 1991, 204–7.

[325] Layish 1998, 55 doc. 34.

[326] Layish 1984a, 41ff.

[327] See Layish 1974, 399.

[328] For further details see Layish 1994.

[329] Layish 1984a, 55–54; 1980–1982, 221 and the references indicated there. Cf. Shaham 1993; Shahar 1997.

[330] See Schacht 1944, 52, 207; Cahen and Talbi EI². Cf. Layish 1984b, 3537. Similarly, conversion to Islam can take place by the mere recitation of the shahad’a (Muslim creed) in the presence of witnesses without resorting to any public agency (Anderson 1970, 235, 374). It is significant to mention in this connection that the concept of public law is not developed in Islam. Thus homicide and bodily injury fall within the domain of torts—that is, private law to which the state is not a party (Schacht 1944, 75; Anderson 1951a, 811–28).

[331] al-Sahaf’a, 5 August 1984, 2.

[332] Layish 1998, 40 doc. 41 (taken from the sijill of Shar1’a Court of Ajda’biya, 189–91 no. [184/7], 14 February 1948).

[333] Unless stated otherwise, this survey is based on Shall 1973, 597–660; Ibn As’im 1958, 76–79 lines 502–17, 246 line 1694; al-Sa’wl’ 1806, vol. 1, 456–61; Ma’lik (d. 179/796) 1989, 228–30; >Illaysh n.d., vol. 2, 76.

[334] Peters 1996.

[335] Layish 1991, 4ff.

[336] Cf. Powers 1994; Shaham 1997, 158–59.

[337] See below, n. 78.

[338] See Layish 1995a, 198ff.

[339] On the saint’s role as an agent of Islamization in tribal society see Gellner 1969, 9ff. 135; 1984, 38; Morsy 1984, 48; Levtzion 1979a, 16ff.

[340] Lines are not numbered in the original text. Numbers in [ ] brackets have been introduced in both the Arabic printed text and the English translation in order to facilitate comparison between the two. Omitted words in the facsimile production have been reconstructed and inserted in { } brackets. In cases in which a particular word appears to have been written incorrectly, thereby yielding a meaning incompatible with the context, a corrected version has been suggested in < >brackets. My student Muhammad Ta’tu’ ‘r read the document and made some useful suggestions for which I am most grateful.

[341] The missing beginning of the document seems to include some details on the dispute between the spouses, a reference to a previous court meeting in which the wife acknowledged that she was pregnant by a stranger, the qadl‘s appointment of Ibri k as a notary (dar >ad) to examine the issue, and the qadI‘s instruction that the spouses stay with this notary. See below, lines 7–8, 11–12, 15ff.

[342] The reference is probably to the date on which she proclaimed herself “an angry woman” and moved to her father’s house. See below, line 10.

[343] Instead of lodging her “in the neighborhood of virtuous persons” (bi-jiwar’qawm salihln) or “in the midst of virtuous trustworthy neighbours” (wast jtran salihln ma<munln) within the meaning of “legal conjugal dwelling” (maskan shar>l). See Layish 1995a, 205–6 and Shalabl ‘ 1973, 436, respectively. “Virtuous neighbors” are needed so that the wife does not feel lonely (la’tastawh’ish) and lose her sanity. See Meron 1971, 210–11. Another possible translation of istawhadaha:’ “sought to isolate her” or “sought to be alone with her.” _’

[344] See Ibn >As’im 1958, 218, lines 1498ff. Cf. lines 5–6 below. ghasabaha ‘ means also “raped her,” but this connotation does not fit the present context.

[345] In other words, the woman expressed her desire to leave the conjugal dwelling but her father discouraged her from doing so.

[346] It appears that the couple had already stayed in the same dar’adl, whose function is to observe the couple’s behavior and submit his report to the court. See Layish 1995a. Cf. dar amln in Fierro 1985, 86ff.

[347] As we shall see later, this is a case of a pregnancy begun while the woman was “angry” living in her father’s house before moving to dar’adl.

[348] This seems to refer to the wife’s first admission that she was pregnant by a stranger.

[349] The status of “an angry woman” seems to be common practice in Cyrenaica. See, e.g., Sharl’>a Court of Ajda’biya, 176 no.172 of 30October 1947 (mughad’aba); 27 no. 52 (date not available); Mohsen 1975, 114. Cf. Layish 1975, 98 n. 66 and the references indicated there.

[350] Due to the fact that the intimate relations between the spouses (while the wife was living in her father’s house) were kept secret, the father may have convinced his son that the wife’s pregnancy would be attributed to a stranger and that it was appropriate for his son, to safeguard family reputation and honor, to deny paternity. Had it not been for the status of “the angry woman” the presumption would have been that “paternity belongs to lawful wedlock” (al-walad li<l-firas’h). See Coulson 1971, 23; Peters 1980, 126–27 145.

[351] For details on jiwar see Layish 1995a, 206--.

[352] The Bedouin believe that holy men and their tombs are sources of baraka, divine blessing. The adl here enlists the sanction of the local Sufi saint’s tomb as a means of deterring the wife from lying about her pregnancy; the expedient proved successful. Cf. Layish 1998, 21 doc. 54 (Si’di’ >Abd al-Sala’m al-Asmar); Layish 1995a, 204 and the references indicated there; Davis 1982, 146–42; Mohsen 1925, 52–59 (according to the customary law [dara<‘ib] of Awla’d >Ali ‘ in the Western Desert, if the defendant refuses to take an oath at the saint’s tomb he loses his case in favor of the claimant); al-SUri 1984, 395–96; Gellner 1969, 9ff.; 1984, 28; Evans-Pritchard 1949, 8–9, 65, 82–83, 112; Levtzion 1929a, 12–18; Hart 1996, 360; Morsy 1984, 49; Ginat 1982, 84, 120.

[353] Cf. jiwar, lines 16, 28 above; al-QusUs 1922, 52; Layish 1995a, 202–8.

[354] Their identity may have been mentioned in the missing beginning of the document.

[355] Cf. al-Qusu’s 1922, 52.

[356] The ‘add‘s function ends after he has reported to the qadl concerning the essence of the dispute between the spouses and their respective responsibilities vis-r-vis the dispute. The wife returns to her father’s house before the qadl‘s verdict is effected.

[357] It appears that the qadi’ here is referring to the procedure of li>an’ .

[358] Cf. Shari ‘>a Court of Kufra, no. 23 of 14 April 1933 (the qadi attributed the pregnancy of a divorced woman to her ex-husband on the basis of the testimony of witnesses); no. 28 of 18 July 1933 (a woman claimed to have been raped by a stranger; the qadi refused to attribute her pregnancy to this stranger because she had failed to notify someone of the rape immediately after its occurrence).

 Chapter Six: The Dynamics of Sufi Brotherhoods

NEHEMIA LEVTZION

 Shari’a and Mysticism in The Public Sphere

Islamic religious law is the totality of God’s commands that regulate the life of every Muslim in all its aspects. Islamic law is the most typical manifestation of the Islamic way of life, the core and kernel of Islam itself. Theology has never been able to achieve a comparable importance in Islam; only mysticism was strong enough to challenge the ascendancy of the Law over the minds of the Muslim, and often proved victorious.[359]

The shari’a, a God-ordained law, is entrenched in a deep-rooted public sentiment and forms the basis for the Muslim social order. Sanction of the religious law contributed to the formation of a Muslim public opinion that accorded the shari’a and the ‘ulama’ near monopoly of legal and moral legitimization, and endowed the qadi with a degree of autonomy vis-0-vis the rulers. The shari’a was developed as an autonomous legal system by fuqaha’ (jurists), who asserted their position as the sole interpreters of the Prophet’s heritage.

Since their formation in the eighth and ninth centuries, the various legal schools not only represented different interpretations of the law but were also solidarity groups. Only the Hanbali school of law retained these characteristics over a long period; the other schools of law ceased to function as mobilizing social movements after the twelfth century, and this role was taken over by Sufi brotherhoods and related organizations.

Islamic orthodoxy emphasizes the distance between God and man, as comparable to that between a slave and his master: like a slave, a man can please God only by strictly observing his commands. Sufi mystics developed alternative ways of approaching God, through spiritual and physical exercises. Sufis therefore do not have to observe the precepts of the religious law, as do others.

Islamic mysticism began as a marginal esoteric movement, considered heretic by the jurists. The rupture between jurists and mystics reached a dramatic peak with the execution in 922 of al-Hallaj, who claimed to have reached a complete union with God. But in the tenth and eleventh centuries more Sufis accepted the Islamic law as binding. Sufism became integrated into the mainstream of Islam, and before long religious leaders (‘ulama’) were simultaneously Sufi shaykhs and legal scholars.

 The Organization and Structure of Early Sufi Brotherhoods

Small communities of a master and his disciples (murids) replaced the loose master-disciple relationship of early Sufism. These entities continued to be known as tariqa (plural: turuq), but the literal meaning of “a devotional path” gave way to such terms as brotherhood or order.

Before the eighteenth century, however, brotherhoods did not have a central organization and were not actually self-supporting social organizations.[360] The loosely structured Sufi brotherhoods nevertheless became active in the public sphere, by allying themselves with more structured social organizations. In the countryside they became embedded in tribal or territorial units, which charismatic shaykhs were able to manipulate. In urban societies the brotherhoods were linked to voluntary organizations, like the futuwwa, the urban movement of young men. Later, in the Ottoman Empire, the Sufis were allied with the akhi association of young men and the trade guilds, as well as with ghazis (warriors on the frontiers of Islam) and the Janissaries.

For most Muslims the connection to Sufi brotherhoods was through the cult of saints (awliya’), which from the twelfth century on became central to the religious experience of Muslims. It was through the shaykh and the tomb, rather than through the ‘alim and the mosque, that Islam reached the common people. One was born and socialized around the shaykh’s tomb and the baraka (divine blessing) that emanated from it, and each village, town ward, and tribe had its saint’s tomb. Visitations to saints’ tombs were the highlights of religious life, particularly for women, who went to the saint’s tomb on Fridays, when the men went to the mosque for the Friday prayer.[361] By giving confidence to individuals, through the power of their protective amulets, the saints helped to maintain social stability.[362]

Sufis were deeply concerned with the life of the community. Shaykhs voiced the people’s grievances and condemned tyranny and oppression. They played a part in conciliation and arbitration, and their houses were sanctuaries.[363]

Individual Sufis and brotherhoods oscillated between individualistic denunciatory piety and community-oriented legalistic world affirmation. Pious withdrawal from the world was characteristic of the more popular and less orthodox brotherhoods. The more legally shari’a -oriented brotherhoods were “this world” oriented. A positive attitude to “this world” also provided the framework within which political engagement became licit and spiritually acceptable.[364]

 Sufis and the State

Most ‘ulama’ depended on the state, either because they held appointed positions or because they were associated with institutions supported by the state. On the other hand, Sufi shaykhs were not economically dependent on the rulers, because they received gifts and contributions from the people.

Not being dependant on the state, Sufis operated beyond the frontiers of dar al-Islam. From the tenth century on Sufi shaykhs lived among the infidel Turkish nomads of the steppes and were instrumental in converting them to Islam. Following the Mongol conquest and the destruction of the Muslim state, only the Sufi shaykhs of all men of religion continued to provide leadership to the Muslim communities. They also associated themselves with the Mongol rulers, and by the end of the thirteenth century had converted them to Islam.

The institutionalization of Sufism advanced when rulers began to endow hospices (khanqahs) for Sufis. The khanqah organized Sufism under the control of the state, aiming to foster the type of Sufism that conformed with the teachings of the shari’a .[365]

Besides the state-supported khanqahs there were completely independent, modest personal lodges (zawiya or ribat) of shaykhs. The zawiya served both as the residence of the shaykh and as a meeting place for members of the tariqa. The shaykh was buried in his zawiya, which then became a place of pilgrimage, with an annual festival.

Sufi lodges at strategic positions helped the expansion of Muslim commercial networks within and outside of dar al-Islam. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries a number of tekkes (lodges) were established on major roads in the Balkans to serve as inns. These inns accommodated poor scholars, military personnel, and wayfarers and received financial support from the central administration.[366]

Muslim rulers sought the favor of saints, built lodges and mausoleums for them, and made public pilgrimages to their tombs. Sufis justified royal patronage by their duty to guide the rulers.[367] Some sultans became murids of shaykhs, which implied a spiritual submission to the latter. When the shaykh ‘Izz Al-Din b. ‘Abd al-Salam died, the Mamluk sultan Baybars (1260–1277) said: “Only now has my authority been consolidated,”[368] so powerful was the influence of the Sufi shaykh over the Sultan. From the Sufi viewpoint, the rulers hold power only through the grace (baraka) of the saint; indeed, powerful saints might be influential in making and unmaking kings.[369]

Association with the court brought deviant Sufi brotherhoods closer to orthodoxy in practice and in doctrine.[370] Compared to the problematic relations of the Chishti Sufis with the political authorities in India, the leaders of the Suhrawardiyya were always enthusiastically involved with Muslim rulers and accumulated great wealth and landed interests.[371]

When Christians invaded dar al-Islam, Sufis rallied rulers with the spirit of jihad. This was the case of one ‘Abdallah al-Yunini (Asad al-Sham) who joined Salah al-Din’s campaigns, and of Ahmad al-Badawi, who called for jihad at the time of the Crusade of Louis X. In fifteenth-century Morocco Al-Jazuli and his followers joined the jihad against the Portuguese. In the first half of the fourteenth century Sufis accompanied the Muslim armies in their advance southward into the Indian subcontinent.[372] Wandering dervishes, the babas from Central Asia, were the spiritual guides of the Turkish ghazis in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Sufi shaykhs consecrated the ghazis as warriors in the cause of Islam.[373]

The Ottoman sultans tolerated socially deviant dervishes, who often also exhibited Shi’i-oriented beliefs and practices; but this attitude changed at the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the Ottomans were threatened by the Shi’i propaganda of the Safawids. Political pressure on suspected dervishes then increased, and dervish groups sought respectability by joining the ranks of the Bektashiyya brotherhood, which itself became more orthodox at that time, at least outwardly.[374]

The Janissaries became formally associated with the Bektashis at the end of the sixteenth century. The supreme Bektashi shaykh was appointed “colonel” of a Janissary unit, and eight Bektashi dervishes were assigned to Janissary units as chaplains. In formal parades the Bektashi shaykh marched in front of the agha of the Janissaries. The Janissaries adopted the uniform of the Bektashiyya and participated in their ceremonies. They were called “the children of Haji Bektash.”[375]

Khalwati shaykhs were invited to Istanbul in the sixteenth century to join the fight against the heretics, particularly on the western frontier of the Balkans. Close relations between Khalwati shaykhs and Ottoman sultans continued until the middle of the seventeenth century, and for almost two centuries the Khalwatiyya had the largest number of tekkes and affiliates in the Ottoman capital.[376]

 The Conversion of Charisma to Economic and Political Power

In the seventeenth century the Ottoman central authority weakened in Anatolia, and people turned to religion in search of stability. In such circumstances Sufi shaykhs became influential by converting their charisma to economic and political power. But the Ottoman state never became weak enough to permit the rise of Sufi shaykhs to such powerful positions as in certain parts of Morocco.[377]

In the segmentary political and social system of Morocco, where the central authority is too far away to be effective, holy men who live near the tomb of a saintly ancestor provide the continuity and the stable framework for that political system. Their moral authority helps to guarantee political, legal, and ecological arrangements reached through their arbitration. The saints also play an important role by anchoring the local society in the wider system of Islam. For the local tribesmen, they represent the religion of the central tradition, and guarantee the tribesmen’s incorporation into it.[378]

The situation in Sind seems to have been somewhat similar to that in Morocco. Since temporal authority was a distant force with which they had little contact, local tribes in Sind tended to follow Sufi pirs, whose power base was in the countryside. Pirs of important shrines possessed substantial land holdings and political power, and wielded great influence over the lives of the people. Like the saints of the Atlas in Morocco, pirs in Sind acted as “professional neutrals” to balance opposing interests. Indeed, the social order was based on the bond between pir and murid, because individuals felt more secure under the patronage of a powerful pir. It is significant, however, that both in Morocco and in Sind, individual shaykhs, not brotherhoods, wielded real power.

One of the most powerful individuals was the Naqshabandi shaykh ‘Ubaydallah Ahrar (1404–1490) in Samarqand, who converted the charisma of a Sufi shaykh to economic and political power. He exploited the decline of the authority of the Timurid sultans and gained almost absolute influence over the sultan Abu Sa’id (1451–1468), who was his murid. Ahrar also accumulated considerable landholdings, as a result of peasants selling their holdings to him in order to become his disciples and enter under his protection (himaya). Ahrar protectedthem from taxation, as wellas other excessive and arbitraryburdens deemedcontraryto Islamic principles, bythreatening emirs with his spiritual powers. In typical Naqshabandi fashion, Ahrar reconciled his worldly engagements with a state of mind of being mentally disengaged from worldlymatters. Wealth in the context of his spiritualworld symbolized a favor bestowedbyGod.[379]

 Initiation and Dhikr

Sufi congregations in hospices andaround tombs attracted the common people. Theysought access to the baraka of the shaykh, and to participate in the collective sessions of the dhikr. Such affiliates needed only the simplest form of initiation and a basic mystical training. They took the oath of allegiance (bay’a) and accepted the shaykh as teacher and leader, but continued their normal life. As the circle of devotees grew, Sufi brotherhoods became devotional movements where lay affiliates found relief from worldly anxieties.[380]

The most important part of Sufi liturgy is the dhikr (literally: the act of remembering). It is a litany tirelessly repeated, consisting of formulae containing the names of Allah. There are two modes of dhikr: the silent dhikr, known as khafi (hidden) or qalbi (by the heart) and the vocaldhikr, known as jahri (public) or lisani (by the tongue). The two modes are equally legitimate, and both have authoritative traditions;[381] but the silent dhikr was thought to be more respectable and was practiced by those who were more advanced along the spiritual path. The vocal dhikr, considered more popular and practiced in a collective ceremony, helped to induce a mystical experience in the ordinary man relatively quickly, through rhythmical exercises.

The silent dhikr was typical of the more orthodox shari’a-oriented brotherhoods. Mustafa al-Bakri (1688–1749), who inspired the reform of the KhAl-watiyya in Egypt, adopted the vocal dhikr and presided over vocal dhikr ceremonies in Jerusalem, where participants would faint from excitement and exhaustion. His disciple al-Hifni conducted ceremonies of vocal dhikr in Cairo. These ceremonies became so popular he had to repeat them for days and nights to admit the many thousands who wanted to attend.[382]

One may speculate as to why Mustafa al-Bakri, whose reform of the KhAl-watiyya was toward greater orthodoxy, changed to the more popular form of dhikr. The reason was probably that the vocal dhikr offered greater scope for the participation of common people in the rituals and helped to popularize the tariqa and win adherents. This move might be better appreciated in the wider context of the structural, organizational, and ritual changes that Sufi brotherhoods experienced in the eighteenth century.

 Structural, Organizational, and Ritual Changes in the Eighteenth Century

In the eighteenth century, brotherhoods transformed from old patterns of decentralized diffusive affiliation into larger-scale organizations, more coherent and centralized. Led by charismatic shaykhs, the reformed Sufi brotherhoods cut across regional, ethnic, and political boundaries to mobilize wider popular support,[383] and they incorporated local saintly lineages. Local shaykhs, who had controlled the spiritual life of the common people, became regional representatives, muqaddams and khalifas in hierarchically structured organizations.[384]

Before the eighteenth century, Sufi shaykhs obtained initiation into several turuq, and often shifted their principal allegiance from one tariqa to another.[385] But Mustafa al-Bakri insisted that his own disciples be affiliated exclusively to the Khalwatiyya and ordered them to break their former allegiance to other turuq and shaykhs.[386] Exclusivity gave greater cohesion to the tariqa, and added to the commitment of its adherents. The Tijaniyya, an offshoot of the Khalwatiyya, adopted the concept of exclusive affiliation with even greater zeal. The Tijaniyya, in its turn, influenced rival turuq in the Maghrib and in West Africa, in particular the Qadiriyya, which also became more assertive and cohesive.[387]

The restructured Sufi brotherhoods reached out to the common people and mobilized popular support, thus contributing to the penetration of a more meaningful religious experience into the lower levels of Muslim society and spreading from the urban to the rural population.

In the countryside of West Africa, the growth of Islam from the seventeenth century brought about a new rural religious leadership. Unlike the urban scholars, who had been spokesmen of the merchants, the new leadership articulated the grievances of the peasants. They criticized the rulers and contributed to the radicalization of Islam, thus preparing the ground for the great reformist movements, better known as the jihads.[388]

 Mystical Verse in Vernacular Languages

Looking for common features of Sufi movements across the Muslim world I have observed that written Islamic literatures in the vernacular languages appeared simultaneously all over the Muslim world in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and that the predominant literary genre in all the vernacular literatures was the mystical verse. This development is explained by the expansion of Islam to the countryside, where the knowledge of Islam could be disseminated to the illiterate peasants and herdsmen only in the vernacular languages.

The need to write down oral mystical poetry in folk idioms arose also with the growth in scale of the brotherhoods, whose leaders sought to communicate with affiliates living in remote communities. Poems in the vernaculars, which had earlier been transmitted and recited orally, were committed to writing in the Arabic script, and copies of the written texts were sent out to the literate representatives of the shaykh in different localities, who then recited these texts to an illiterate audience.

In India, Sufis turned to the regional idioms—Urdu, Sindhi, and Punjabi— for preaching and teaching because the sacred languages—Arabic and Persian—were inaccessible to the masses.[389] The discourse of the elite continued in Arabic and Persian, the classical languages of Islam, whereas the vernacular literature was important in building bridges to the common people.[390]

Muslim literature in China, written mostly in Chinese characters, developed from the middle of the seventeenth century. As elsewhere, mystical works were important. This literature was composed in an easy style, inclining toward the spoken language because it addressed the masses.[391]

The preaching of Imam Mansur in 1785 in the Caucasus is said to have been in simple language and directed to the peasants.[392] In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a period of literary decline in Egypt, works of theology and law were written in bombastic style, but Sufi texts were composed in the simple down-to-earth language of the people.[393] Sufis all over the world then began to adapt their idiom and style to achieve efficient communication with the people they sought to mobilize.

The efficiency of preaching and exhortation in the vernacular to mobilize popular support is described in the case of ‘Uthman dan Fodio, the leader of the jihad in what is today Northern Nigeria: “Then we rose up with the Shaykh, helping him in his mission work for religion. He traveled for that purpose to the east and west, calling people to the religion of God by his preaching and his poems (qasidas) in a non-Arabic language (‘ajami).”[394] When ‘Uthman dan Fodio saw that his community was ready for the jihad, “he began to incite them to arms ... and he set this in verse in his non-Arabic Qadiri poem (qasida ‘ajamiyya Qadiriyya).” This mystical verse had a hypnotic effect on devotees on the eve of the jihad.[395]

 Sufi Brotherhoods in the Public Sphere

Mysticism, an inward and individualistic mode of worship, is unlikely to create a social space. After the tenth century the esoteric form of piety, elitist in nature, gradually became the most popular mode of devotion in Islam, mainly through the contribution of brotherhoods. It was the brotherhoods that brought Sufism from the private to the public sphere, to play an important sociopolitical role in the communal and religious life of the Muslims for a period lasting seven centuries.

Before the seventeenth century most of the brotherhoods had been loosely organized and localized, and had not been self-supporting social organizations. Brotherhoods reached all social strata through the cult of saints. The baraka (grace) of the saints imbued individuals with confidence and helped maintain social stability. Commercial fairs and religious festivals took place around saints' tombs. Moreover, Sufism offered a social space of religious experience to women, who had hardly enjoyed any place in formal religious life.

The political authorities sought to control the activities of the Sufis by the endowment of hospices (khanqahs), which organized Sufism under the control of the state and fostered shari'a -abiding Sufism. Some Sufi brotherhoods avoided the courtly scene and cultivated the ideal of ascetic poverty. But other brotherhoods were closely associated with rulers and accumulated great wealth. Even socially deviant dervishes were attracted to the rulers' courts, where they were pressured to conform to the shari'a. According to the Sufi vision of authority, rulers were entrusted with a temporary lease of power through the baraka of a saint. Muslim rulers thus sought the favor of saints, and sometimes became disciples of Sufi shaykhs.

Sufis, unlike other 'ulama', could function also outside the Muslim state, and Sufi lodges helped the expansion of Islam beyond the frontiers of dar Al-Islam. Where the central authority was weak, people sought security with Sufi shaykhs, who transformed their charisma into economic and political power, gaining possession of substantial land holdings and wielding great influence over the lives of the people. Wealth represented a blessing bestowed by God, and such shaykhs managed to reconcile the possession of worldly assets with mental disengagement from this world.

Sufi brotherhoods being esoteric organizations, induction into them needed an initiation ceremony, not only for those wishing to become murids but also for those who only sought access to the blessing of the shaykh. A collective dhikr evolved to induce a mystical experience for the ordinary man in a relatively short space of time. With a much larger circle of devotees, brotherhoods became more a devotional than a mystical movement.

Sufi brotherhoods thus fulfilled multiple roles in Muslim societies; they provided moral guidance to voluntary associations, opened opportunities for release from the hardships of everyday existence, gave confidence to individuals, and helped sustain social stability. They also maintained lines of communications between the common people and the authorities.

Before the eighteenth century these brotherhoods had been localized and had influenced only their immediate communities. But in the eighteenth century Sufism experienced a radical change, when brotherhoods transformed from old patterns of decentralized, diffusive affiliations to larger-scale organizations, more centralized and coherent.

Changes in rituals emphasized the hierarchical and centralized nature of the reformed tariqa and the expanded role of the shaykh. Brotherhoods offered larger scope for the participation of the common people in their ceremonies, facilitating the recruitment of new adherents.

A new Muslim leadership emerged that articulated the grievances of the masses, criticized the rulers, and contributed to the radicalization of Islam. The discourse of the public sphere in Muslim societies addressed social and political issues, and in order to reach the illiterate it was written in the vernacular languages. In this way, written Islamic literatures in the vernacular languages developed simultaneously all over the Muslim world in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with mystical verse as the predominant genre.

Reformed brotherhoods gave rise to movements of renewal and reform in the eighteenth century. One may be tempted to speculate that these reformed premodern movements could have led Muslim societies into the modern period with a sense of revival. But this process was truncated when leaders of these movements redirected their major efforts from internal reform to defending dar al-Islam against the invading European powers. Ultimately they were all crushed by the overwhelming military power of the Europeans.

[359] Schacht 1974, 393.

[360] Karamustafa 1994, 88–89; Levtzion 1997.

[361] Trimingham 1971, 232.

[362] Ibid., 220–21, 234; Karamustafa 1994, 87–89.

[363] Trimingham 1971, 27, 230, 237–38.

[364] Algar 1976, 44; 1990, 152.

[365] Fernandes 1988, vol. 1, 24.

[366] Faroqhi 1976, 73–75; 1981, 99–101, 113; Norris 1993, 101–2, 109.

[367] Eaton 1993, 94.

[368] Quoted in Abu Zahra, 1953, 143.

[369] Eaton 1993, 31, 83.

[370] Eaton 1978, 45–48, 50–53; Ernst, 1993, 47.

[371] Ansari 1992, 5, 30.

[372] Eaton 1978, 284.

[373] Trimingham 1971, 83; Faroqhi 1993, 197; Zarcone 1993, 71.

[374] Ocak 1993, 249–51; Trimingham 1971, 83; Faroqhi 1981, 92; Karamustafa 1993, 243; 1994, 83–84, 94–95.

[375] Birge 1937; Zarcone 1993, 71; Goodwin 1994, 148–52.

[376] Trimingham 1971, 75; Zarcone 1993, 80; Clayer 1994, 65–67, 70.

[377] Faroqhi 1993, 197, 205–6.

[378] Gellner 1969, 41ff; 1981, 114–30.

[379] What is offered here is a preliminary analysis of the role of Ahrar as a charismatic shaykh, based on Paul 1991; DeWeese 1993; Gross 1988; 1990.

[380] Trimingham 1971, 27–28, 186, 199–200; Eaton 1978, xxxi.

[381] See Gardet EI².

[382] al-Jabarti (d. 1240/1825-1826) 1879–1880, vol. 1, 300; Weigert 1989, 109–11.

[383] For a more detailed analysis see Levtzion 1997 and Levtzion and Voll 1987.

[384] Clancey-Smith 1994, 41–45; Karrar 1992, x, 20; Algar 1990; Abu-Manneh 1990, 295; Hofheinz 1990, 28–29; Grandin 1990, 645.

[385] Eaton 1978, xxxi-xxxii, 207; Winter 1982, 92, 97.

[386] al-Jabarti, 1879–80, vol. 1, 295; vol. 2, 61; Weigert 1989.

[387] Abun-Nasr 1965, 15–57; Martin 1969; Brenner 1988.

[388] Levtzion 1987, 23–26.

[389] Schimmel 1975, 131, 135, 163; Shackle 1993, 163, 265, 285–88; Roy 1984, 58; Eaton 1978, 91. It is significant that in the independent state of Bijapur, where, being far from the Mughal court, the influence of Persian culture was weaker, literature in Dakhni developed from the fifteenth century, more than two centuries before the appearance of Urdu literature.

[390] Schimmel 1973, 48–50; 1976, xi, 11.

[391] Aubin 1990, 496–97.

[392] Bennigsen 1964, 195.

[393] Winter 1982, 27.

[394] Ibn Fudi (d. 1245/1829) 1963, 85.

[395] Ibid., 51; see also Hiskett 1975.

 Chapter Seven: The WAQF and the Public Sphere

MIRIAM HOEXTER

Much of the discussion on whether Middle Eastern states have the necessary ingredients for the development of democracy has centered on the questions of civil society and the nature of relations between the state and society. The “Oriental despotism” thesis, long in vogue in the literature, saw these two questions as inseparable: the despotism that characterized the Oriental state precluded the existence of any autonomous organization or civil society; or as Turner put it, “The concept [of civil society] has been used as the basis of the notion that the Orient is, so to speak, all state and no society.”[396] The absence of a civil society thus constituted the principal theoretical postulate of the “Oriental despotism” case, which, according to Turner, was “a reflection of basic political anxieties about the state of political freedom in the West.”[397] By now, the existence of a plethora of civic associations in the Middle East, though not structured on the Western model, seems to be widely recognized.[398] However, emphasizing the despotic nature of rulers, their lack of legitimacy, and their lack of concern for the welfare of the public, the predominating picture in the literature concerning the relations between state and society is that of a more or less total separation and estrangement of the two.[399]

I propose to challenge this rather unsatisfying picture by looking at the relations between rulers and society from the broader perspective suggested by the concept of the public sphere. The importance of this concept—defined as a zone of autonomous social activity between the family and the ruling authorities—lies largely in that it goes beyond appeals to the formal institutions of the Western civil society model, to address the entire realm of societal and cultural life that has relevance to the social and political order.[400] It thus broadens the scope of discussion to include aspects that have hitherto been largely neglected, such as informal ties, the moral-ethical values that form a society's image of the good order, and the symbols that reflect the common values and social ideals of the particular society.[401] I shall look at the relations between society and its rulers through a particular prism—that of the Islamic endowment institution, the waqf.

Hodgson, in his discussion of the shari'a as a civic force, lists the waqf foundations, along with the shari'a laws and the Sufi (mystic) orders, as the three religiously sanctioned integrative institutions holding together all Islamic groupings in the town.[402] Within this framework the waqf fulfilled a particular role: it became the vehicle for financing Islam as a society,[403] or, as I prefer to formulate it: the waqf served as a major means through which the Islamic idea of the social order proper for the umma (the community of believers) was implemented. Throughout the premodern Islamic world, endowments (waqfs) were made by rulers as well as by all strata of the Muslim population. They provided for the financing and maintenance of a host of public services and did so through an institution that, across the centuries, had retained its basic characteristic as an institution whose rules were an integral part of the shari'a—the sacred law.[404] The waqf is thus an ideal prism through which to examine both the moral values underlying the Islamic perception of the public sphere and the ways they were put into practice.

This chapter is divided into two parts. In the first I shall discuss some doctrinal points that I believe are relevant to the perception of the public sphere characteristic of the Islamic cultural area and their reflection in the waqf. In the second part, I shall examine the impact of the waqf on the formation of the public sphere and the nature of the discourse it generated.

 The WAQF and the Perception of the Public Sphere

* Umma and Shari’a

The central importance accorded in Islamic political discourse to the community of believers (the umma) is perhaps the most significant difference between the way Islamic culture and Western culture view the nature of the public sphere and the relationship between the rulers and society.

The interests of the community of believers and the norms that should guide the lives of individuals and the community were the main concerns of Muhammad. After his death, public life was, to a large extent, posited as the collective responsibility of the umma. The Qur’an and Muhammad’s sunna (practices established by the example of the Prophet’s life) provided the norms of public life and served as guidelines for the community as to how to discharge its responsibilities.[405] The umma inherited the task of spiritual guidance of the community after Muhammad, and its consensus (ijma’) on the legitimacy of the ruler as well as on details concerning the development of social and cultural norms was considered infallible.[406]

With the elaboration of the shari’a—the sacred law, or the rules and regulations governing the lives of Muslims, derived in principal from the Qur’an and hadith[407]—the role of interpreters and custodians of Muhammad’s legacy of the norms and ideals of good order proper to the community of believers passed, in the main, to the shari’a specialists—the fuqaha’, or, more generally, the ‘ulama’. However, the umma-in its original meaning of the entire community of believers as well as in its more restricted meaning of the community of believers living under one of the legitimate Islamic rulers—never lost its central position as the moral community. Moreover, the umma retained its right and ability to influence the public sphere, although this did not necessarily imply participation in daily policymaking.

Umma and shari’a were thus the center of gravity around which all activity in the public sphere revolved. Their central position in the premodern Islamic world created a situation radically different from the one prevalent in Western civilization: it placed the umma as the most significant group in the public sphere, and above the ruler. The shari’a embodied the norms of public order, and its preservation was the main moral obligation of both the community and the ruler.

Some implications of these basic tenets of the Islamic view of the public sphere and their reflection in the endowment institution will be discussed in the sections that follow.

* The Individual and the Public Sphere

Creation of a waqf has always been the act of an individual. The endowment itself as well as all the details embodied in the endowment deed were determined by the individual endower, who alone was promised a reward for his good deed in the hereafter.[408] Endowments by rulers and their entourages are perhaps the best example, emphasizing the individual responsibility of the endower. When endowing an asset, a ruler never did so as a representative of the realm. His act of endowment, like that by anyone else, was the act of a private individual. An endowment by the realm, the political system as a body or institution, let alone an endowment by any other body or group, is simply unknown to Islam and unacceptable according to the terms of the law of waqf. Thus, an endowment of arable land, which in the Ottoman Empire belonged to the state, was preceded by a procedure of temlik—a procedure whereby ownership of the land to be endowed was passed to the person, usually a member of the ruler’s family or entourage, who intended to create a waqf. [409]

While the act of creating an endowment was that of a private individual, the beneficiaries of the endowment were always located in the public sphere, whether in the first stage (the endowment would then be described as a waqf khayri) or in the last stage of the devolution of beneficiaries, after the extinction of the primary and intermediary private beneficiaries (the endowment would then be described as a waqf ahli). By endowing his property the individual participated in the formation of the public sphere, thus expressing his sense of belonging to the community of believers and his identification with its values.

The waqf, then, reflects the basic Islamic notion concerning the relation between the individual and the community: in contrast to West European culture, where the distinction between private and public acts was very pronounced, what Hodgson termed “the unitary contractualism of Islamdom” “denied any special status to public acts at all ... to the point where it ruled out all corporate status and reduced all acts to the acts of personally responsible individuals.” [410] The public sphere in Islam was thus conceived of not as an antithesis to the private individual but as an integral or synthetic component of his life as a Muslim.[411]

* The Conception of Charity

Endowing one’s asset has always been considered a sadaqa—an act of charity recommended by the shari’a that entitled the founder of the endowment to recompense in the world beyond. In fact, the term waqf, by which the Islamic endowment institution is known, is an abbreviation of the original sadaqa mawqufa.[412] The basic idea of the endowment as a continuous or eternal charity is reflected in the definition that appears in virtually every waqf manual: al-waqf sadaqa jariya fi sabil Allah ta’ala—the waqf is a continuous charity for the sake of God and his religion.[413]

The institutionalization of the waqf called for a definition of a charity and thus a legitimate beneficiary of endowments. A valid purpose for the benefit of which one could endow the produce of one's property was defined as qurba—that is, anything likely to bring the founder nearer to God.[414] Obviously this was a very broad definition, reminiscent of what Hodgson called "occasionalism," which he considered one of the hallmarks of the Islamicate social order (as against Occidental "legitimism"), symbolized by the arabesque and representing "an elaborate surface formalism, adaptable to any substance."[415] This broad definition allowed for the inclusion, as beneficiaries of an endowment, of family members, freed slaves, the poor in general, or the poor belonging to a specific social group, even a group of animals, side by side with mosques, madrasas, Sufi orders, the water supply system, bridges, etc. This broad definition ensued from the most basic conception of Islam, which, from its inception, never conceived of itself as a religion regulating only the sphere of worship but as a political community guided by and devoted to Allah in all spheres of human activity.[416] According to this conception a contribution toward the welfare of the community, just as care for one's own family, was considered an act likely to bring a person closer to Allah.

The idea of charity, then, was defined in Islam in a much broader and more flexible manner than in other cultures.[417] The definition of qurba does not differentiate between private and public well-being; each is assigned equal value and importance in furthering the interests of the community of believers.

* The Umma, the Ruling Auhhotes, and the 'Ulama'

The way waqf foundations—conglomerations of large numbers of endowments serving a public purpose—were handled reflected the basic islamic perception of rights, responsibilities, and competencies in the public sphere. An acquaintance with its major characteristics is therefore indispensable to an understanding of the subject.

sunni doctrine distinguishes between two spheres of claims or rights: those of men, known as huquq al-‘ibad, and those of God, termed huquq Allah. The first covers claims of private individuals in their dealings with one another and was always recognized as belonging in the sphere of jurisdiction of the ‘ulama’-t—e specialists in shari’a law. Huquq Allah, the claims of God, are traditionally identified with the general interests of the community of believers (the umma).[418]

The point to be borne in mind concerning this distinction is that claims or rights accrued to only two categories: the individual and the umma.[419] insistence on the rights of private individuals and on the primacy of the umma- not the state or the ruler-in the public sphere was thus at the very root of islamic political thought.

However, the umma-the entire community of believers as well as the local Muslim community in a specific region or town-was an uninstitutionalized reference group. A kind of latent competition ensued between the ‘ulama’ and the rulers as to who was entitled to represent the interests of the umma and stand up for the community’s rights. The modus vivendi in this competition may be summarized as follows: From quite an early stage in islamic history,[420] the ‘ulama’, not the rulers, were recognized as the bearers and interpreters of the norms and basic values of the proper islamic social order. The rulers, on their part, were made responsible for the implementation of these norms, the protection and promotion of the general interests of the community of the faithful. They were to attend to these responsibilities in fulfillment of their obligation to ensure the rule of the shari’a in the territories under their control-an obligation that alone legitimized their rule. They did so under the watchful eyes of the ‘ulama’, and in cooperation with some of them. It is important to remember that the ‘ulama’ very rarely acted as a concerted group. They were hardly a group in the sociological meaning of the term. Usually it was the expertise in the shari’a of the individual ‘alim, not his membership in a specific group, that gave him the authority and the backing of the umma to speak up in defense of islamic norms and social values against rulers who deviated from these norms.

As early as the classical period, rulers were granted extra-shar’i authority to take political and administrative considerations into account in their pursuance of the interests of the islamic community. However, one important reservation was attached to the ruler’s discretion: his actions could in no way be in blatant contradiction of the substantive principles of the shari’a .[421] Rules and regulations promulgated by rulers in this capacity were considered ad hoc measures. They were binding in the territory under the particular ruler’s control but usually did not assume normative character. Since they were not considered an integral part of the shari’a, they are almost totally absent from the legal literature (fatwas, furu’).

How did this modus vivendi work in practice? Endowments serving general public and charitable purposes belonged in the realm of huquq Allah.[422] The modus vivendi therefore applied in their case. In pursuance of their extra- shar’i prerogatives, rulers asssumed direct or indirect responsibility for the administration of many of the largest and richest public foundations. Also, in a number of cases they allowed for the diversion of some of the income of these rich foundations to purposes other than those designated by the founders of the endowments. Sometimes this deviation from the strict letter of waqf law led to outright abuse of endowed property; but this was not the rule. Usually, the money diverted from its original purpose helped rationalize the management of foundations in general, by providing the means necessary for costly periodic restoration work in major mosques, expenses that could not have been met solely from the annual income of these mosques. In other cases, sums were spent on distributing charity to the needy or on furthering other general interests of the Islamic community.[423] Although a deviation from the strict letter of waqf laws, spending money to meet these needs was very much in line with waqf ideology and has never, as far as I know, met with objections or criticism from the ‘ulama’.

In all other matters the rich foundations controlled by the ruling authorities remained within the jurisdiction of the ‘ulama’. The assets making up their patrimonies never lost their waqf status, which meant that all these properties were non-negotiable in principle and subject to the laws of waqf. The interpretation of these laws and their implementation remained in the hands of the specialists—the ‘ulama’—not the ruler. Instances of rulers who blatantly violated waqf property or manipulated waqf rules in cooperation with some qadis are recorded in the literature. [424] The fact is, however, that the supreme authority of waqf laws has never in premodern times been questioned outright or even tampered with. The above modus vivendi was thus maintained for centuries in principle and to a very large extent also in practice.

The picture that emerges from the above discussion is that of rulers responsible for the organization and daily functioning of the public sphere but devoid of authority to determine the basic values governing many of its aspects. The norms, the ideals of good order, and the basic rules expressing them were laid down in the shari’a and left to the interpretation of the ‘ulama’. The legitimization of the ruler depended on his observation of these rules, and the umma, usually through the intermediacy of the specialists, had the right and the obligation to supervise the manner in which he fulfilled his obligation. In other words, the community of believers had built-in claims on its rulers concerning the nature of the public sphere. If the protection against arbitrary acts by rulers was the main purpose of the chartered rights granted in Western civilization to various corporative organizations, the commitment of the Islamic ruler to uphold the shari’a had a much broader significance. It implied an obligation on the part of the ruler to make sure that the public sphere in the territory under his control was construed in conformity with the basic moral norms and values of Islam, and that the law was administered according to the specific rules of the shari’a. The ruler’s adherence to these norms and rules was the touchstone of his relations with the community under his control.

* The Dynamics of Change

In terms of the above-mentioned modus vivendi the ‘ulama’ were entrusted with the mission of preserving and protecting the Islamic norms embedded in the waqf institution and embodied in the detailed and intricate laws of the waqf.

This, however, did not mean that these laws remained unchanged throughout the centuries. Research in the past few years has largly dealt the coup de grtce to the notion that dominated the literature for a long time—to the effect that Islamic law was unchanging and immutable. This notion is certainly unacceptable concerning the Islamic endowment institution, with its obvious practical economic and social implications and with a record of survival over many centuries and throughout a vast cultural area.

Some of the basic questions relevant to any discussion of the dynamics of change in the domain of Islamic law concern the nature of change, the mechanisms used, and the people responsible for its introduction. The subject certainly deserves more detailed study.[425] Only a few points can be raised here. I shall concentrate on the role played in the process of change by the rulers on the one hand and custom (‘urf, ta’aruf, ta’amul) on the other. I believe that these two aspects of the dynamics of Islamic law have particular relevance to our understanding of the nature of the discourse between rulers, ‘ulama’, and the general public.

The need to take into consideration social and economic realities was the principal incentive for the introduction of change in laws in general and in those regulating the waqf in particular. Generally speaking, this was done by allowing a flexible interpretation of operative details while taking great care to preserve the basic principles or norms underlying the law.

Actual change, adopted and approved by the shari’a court—with or without prior consultation with a mufti[426]—usually preceded its legal formulation and adoption as a rule binding on all adherents of the school of law. The latter was a lengthy process, during which ‘ulama’ from all over the Islamic world expressed their learned opinion on the subject until, at a point that is difficult to determine, a change was accepted as “the preferred view” (al-rajih) or “the sounder view” (al-asahh al-mukhtar) of a particular school of law.[427] The participation of rulers in these scholarly discussions seems to have been extremely rare.[428] I have not come across a single case in which the ruler actually initiated a change in a basic waqf law.

However, intervention by a ruler was sometimes called for in order to clinch an issue that had given rise to a lengthy and indeterminate debate among the ‘ulama’. It was thus that in 951/1544-1545, following a long debate of the issue by the specialists, the Ottoman sultan Sulayman I Kanuni (r. 1520–1566), at the obvious instigation of the chief mufti, issued an order limiting substantially the scope of exchange transactions in endowed properties.[429]

The history of cash endowments is another, better-known case in point, combining custom, a learned debate by the ‘ulama’, and a decision by the ruler. Cash endowments appeared in the Ottoman Empire as early as the first decades of the fifteenth century.[430] Although the endowment of cash money is problematic in many ways from the point of view of the shari’a, it became a custom or, as Mandaville put it, “it seems to have been an indigenous product of the flexible Ottoman judiciary.”[431] When, in the course of the first half of the sixteenth century, cash waqfs became the dominant mode of endowment, they gave rise to a vehement debate among the ‘ulama’, which soon spread to broader circles of the Ottoman public. The debate was settled by an imperial order, issued to all qadis of the empire, to approve endowments of cash. Some points in this story are relevant to our discussion. First, it helps us gauge correctly the role of the ruler in this process. The sultan was not actually involved in the learned debate and did not express his opinion on the points of law. His decision in the form of an imperial decree to the qadis of the empire was needed in order to clinch a lengthy discussion, put an end to the confusion it caused, and ensure uniformity of adjudication on the issue in the territories under his rule.[432] Second, the case of cash endowments demonstrates the great influence of custom and public opinion on the process of change. In his decision, the sultan was certainly influenced by his chief mufti—the famous Ebu Suud (d. 1574)—who, in addition to a fatwa he issued, composed a long treatise on the subject, which Mandaville summarizes as “an appeal to continued popular usage (ta’amul, ta’aruf), to the welfare of the people (istihsan), and to both throughout with a tone of ‘Let’s be practical,’ an appeal to common sense.”[433] However, one may assume that the voice of the people carried no less weight with the sultan. This was typically expressed by a scholar who did not belong to the official ‘ulama’ hierarchy. Bali Baba was a representative of a settler family in Sofya, where he built a Sufi (mystic) lodge, became the leader of the Halveti Order, and was known for his scholarship and sanctity. He wrote a letter to the sultan describing the confusion resulting from the conflicting views on the subject of cash endowments and supplicating him to issue an order that would cut throught the doubts. Dwelling on the actual consequences the annulment of thousands of cash waqfs would have on the practice of religion, on welfare, on education, and on other vital interests of the community of believers, he explained, quoting famous ‘ulama’, that “God’s legislation has no other purpose than to ease the way of His servants through the exigencies of the times. Some rules of the sharia are overturned by changes through time, out of necessity and to ease difficulties.” On these grounds Baba Bali pleaded with the sultan to decide for the admissibility of cash endowments “because it better suited the conditions of the people of our time.”[434] Long-established custom and the interests of the community thus carried the day and brought about what obviously was a substantive change in the law of waqf.

Change in a particular stipulation of the law was not necessarily applicable in the entire Islamic cultural area. The ‘ulama’ distinguish between two types of custom: general custom, applicable in all parts of the Islamic world, and local custom, applicable only in a specific region.[435] Indeed, many changes in waqf laws had a distinctive local coloring.[436] Thus, we know of a large number of long-term or permanent leases of endowed properties within the same school of law. These arrangements differ in detail from one another, have different names in different regions of the Islamic world, and represent local custom.[437] We know little of how such customs came into being. There can be little doubt, however, that their purpose was to provide solutions to existing local problems and their conflict with stipulations of the law. It seems reasonable to assume that the local population actually affected by the situation induced many of these changes. It is hard to determine whether the local community merely exerted informal pressure or actually petitioned for a specific change. It certainly expected its leaders— ‘ulama’ and/or rulers-— come up with solutions in response to its changing needs. Whatever the case might have been, the local solution was the product of a joint endeavor by the local population demanding a change, some ‘ulama’ formulating the change, and the local ruling authorities endorsing the new ruling.

The need to introduce changes in the law thus often gave rise to a discourse in which the ‘ulama’ played an important role but which involved both the community and the rulers. This discourse was based on the recognized need for a change. No less important, for all participants in this discourse the only conceivable change was such as would conform to the rules of the shari’a and be approved by its protectors-—at is, one that remained within the framework of the Islamic norms and values that all of them shared.

 The Impact of the WAQF on the Public Sphere

The second part of the discussion will focus on three main subjects: the impact of endowments on the formation of the urban public space; their contribution to the crystallization of autonomous groups within the umma; and the nature of discourse between the rulers, the ‘ulama’, and the community generated by endowments.[438]

* The Urban Public Space

The waqf’s contribution to the shaping of the urban public space can hardly be overestimated. A major part of the public environment in towns actually came into being as a result of endowments. This was true for new cities as well as for those parts of existing towns that developed under Islamic rule. Mosques, madrasas, zawiyas, caravanserais, as well as the town’s water supply systems, etc., were built as endowments. No less important, the building of a mosque or madrasa was often accompanied by the construction of large parts of the town’s economic infrastructure, particularly shops and sometimes even whole markets, which were part of the endowment and whose rentals were intended to finance the salaries of the mosque’s or madrasa’s staff, the daily functioning of the institution, and the cost of maintenance, repairs, etc. In other cases already existing immovables of all sorts (usually located in the neighborhood of the mosque) were acquired by the founder of the mosque and endowed for these purposes.[439] Indeed, one can hardly imagine the public space of any large town in the Islamic cultural area without these contributions based on endowments.

* The Crystallization of Autonomous Groups

The waqf also served as a vehicle for the crystallization of various autonomous groups in the space between the private individual and the ruling authority. The broad definition of charity, enabling the endower to select a particular public segment of his choice as beneficiary of his endowment, made this possible. On many occasions endowers selected as public beneficiaries of their endowments not a general Islamic purpose but a more limited one to which they felt personally attached, such as a specific school of law, a zawiya, a Sufi order, a professional guild, the inhabitants of a particular neighborhood, the ashraf (descendants of the Prophet), groups of common origin such as the Andalusians in Algiers, etc. The waqf thereby withdrew from the ruler’s influence properties that served to finance the independent interests of various groups within the community. These endowments were usually administered by the head of the group: the guild’s leader (amin), the leader in the town of the descendants of the Prophet (naqib al-ashraf), or a resident of a neighborhood chosen by its inhabitants. The income from the endowments served to finance charity within the group, help needy members with payment of their taxes, assist in organizing and financing social activities, maintain places of worship and meeting for the members of the group, such as neighborhood zawiyas or mosques.[440] In other words, the waqf served as a vehicle whereby a given common identity, based on common origin, profession, or residence, was enhanced and assumed the nature of an autonomous social group, keen on protecting and advancing the particular interests of its members and thus an influential factor in the public sphere.

In much the same way endowments served to enhance the social standing of notable families-—e a’yan—who, through endowments, succeeded in drawing into the orbit of their influence a large number of clients, thus ensuring the longevity of the family’s influence in the town. This was done by establishing waqfs for public purposes—for example, a mosque or a zawiya—and securing their administration for generations to come to a member of the family, who, by the terms of the endowment deed, was given the responsibility to appoint the personnel, decide their salaries, etc.[441] Similar aims were achieved by creating endowments known as khayriyya khassa. Particularly important in this category were endowments providing resources to finance the activities of the family's guest house. These guest houses served for social gatherings, especially the celebration of religious holidays, which were usually accompanied by preaching, prayers, and sometimes dhikrs (collective Sufi litanies). On these occasions food and even some clothes were handed out to large numbers of people, and the officiating preachers, teachers, etc., were each rewarded for their services, the endowment deed specifying the sums to be spent on each item.[442] Endowments of this nature were one of the important tools whereby local families secured themselves a power base independent of the ruling authorities, a leading position within the local community, and the necessary backing to stand up to the rulers in protection of the community's interests.

The waqf thus played an important role in turning the amorphous umma into a society composed of autonomous interest groups that, although they never acquired the status of legal entities, exercised much influence in the public sphere. The waqf also fostered the development of an autonomous leadership that could and often did speak up for the local population. Indeed, the distribution of endowments among the various public purposes in a given town reflected its social fabric and the special character of the local umma, as well as the relative social importance attached to neighborhoods, professional guilds, schools of laws, or groups of origin. Examination of endowments for various public purposes in a given town over time can reveal changes in the relative importance of disparate groups in the population. It can also help identify the local leading families and indicate changes in their social standing in the town.

* The Relations between Rulers, 'Rlama', and Community

I shall focus on three aspects of these relations: the bond between rulers and the community created by endowments made by rulers; the discourse generated by the proliferation of endowments; and the involvement of the ‘ulama’ and the community in the administration of large public foundations.

Many of the largest public foundations all over the Islamic world were endowed by rulers, their immediate entourages, and senior members of the ruling elite. They served a variety of political and social purposes, including promotion of the colonization and Islamization of conquered territories and the establishment and maintenance of such public services as welfare, social, religious, educational, and general municipal services. They were often used as instruments of public policy and helped enhance the ruler’s power and prestige.[443] As in the case of gift relationships in other civilizations, endowments by rulers also served to establish bonds between the ruling authority and the general population, based on appreciation and gratitude, and generating a measure of loyalty on the part of the beneficient population. Considering that the same purposes could have been attained by simple “gifts”—that is, by allocations out of the state’s resources controlled by the rulers—the fact that in the cultural area we are concerned with these “gifts” were given in the form of individual waqfs had, I believe, a particular significance: They symbolized the adherence of the endowing ruler to the norms of good order inherent in the ideology of the Islamic endowment. Thus, while the solidarity the ruler strove to create by the “bread and circuses” evergetism was described by Veyne as a wish by the ruler “to offer symbolic proof that they [the rulers] were in the service of the ruled,”[444] the waqfs endowed by rulers in the Islamic cultural area established a much more significant bond of shared norms and moral values between rulers and their subjects. The irreversibility of the act of endowing one’s property and the basic notion of the waqf as an eternal charity conferred upon this moral bond an element of permanence and continuity. Also, above and beyond a certain feeling of gratitude generated by the “bread and circuses” evergetism, the message of shared values, or the message of a shared “lifeworld” of Islam projected by rulers’ endowments, generated a public opinion that approved of, even legitimized, the rule of the endowing ruler.

The proliferation of endowments brought about a situation where not only public buildings but also a large proportion of the real estate in towns and in many cases in the rural areas as well, acquired waqf status. This meant that the laws of the endowment institution determined major issues relevant to the urban economy—such as the nature and details of the leasing arrangements of principal parts of the urban properties. Moreover, important issues concerning the town's development—for example, the need to recycle properties in order to provide the space necessary to accommodate new economic enterprises, for the extension of the town's water system, for population increases, and the like—often necessitated transactions in endowed properties, which were subject to waqf rules. This implied that all these issues were determined independently of the rulers' wishes. They were handled by the 'ulama', who alone were in charge of interpreting the law and determining how it would be implemented. Because of its impact on the town's economy and development, and its influence on the daily life of the local population, the waqf thus generated an ongoing discourse involving the local community, the 'ulama', and the rulers. I have already alluded to the nature of this discourse and the role of each of the participants in bringing about important changes in waqf laws.[445] Details concerning the regular leases of endowed properties, the type of local long-term leases, as well as local policies geared to either limiting the scope of such leases, and also of exchange transactions, or allowing for their proliferation, were often determined to suit local social and economic circumstances and were the result of a similar discourse. It was thus that specific local circumstances in Ottoman Algiers brought about changes of policy concerning regular leases as well as long-term and exchange transactions of endowed property. Pressure from below, a dynamic approach of the 'ulama' toward the interpretation of waqf laws, and the rulers' cooperation combined to bring about solutions whereby the letter of the law was made to coexist with the requirements of real life. Although these solutions allowed for a relaxation of some of the rules of the endowment institution, they did not clash head-on with its basic rules. Moreover, while accommodating the needs of the town and its inhabitants, special care was taken to protect the financial interests of the waqf.[446]

The administration of public foundations generated a lively discourse in the public sphere. Many of these foundations, which served the entire local population or catered to general Islamic purposes—for instance, the holy places of Islam—were made up, wholly or principally, of endowments by rulers and their entourages. In other cases their patrimony comprised a large number of private endowments that reached their final khayri stage after the demise of their primary and intermediary beneficiaries.[447] All such endowments whose khayri beneficiary was the same—e.g., the holy places of Islam—were lumped together and administered jointly. The ruling authorities had an obvious interest in these large agglomerations of properties, which produced a very considerable income. They therefore kept either direct or indirect control of their administration.[448] However, once endowed, the property no longer belonged to the founder, but, according to the prevailing view of the Hanafi school of law, to God. The ruling authorities thus controlled these public foundations, including those endowed by rulers, not as owners but in their capacity as guardians of the interests of the umma. As in other matters of public interest, the responsibility of rulers in the case of these foundations was considered part of their basic duties to ensure observation of the shari'a, the norms of social order proper to the community of believers, and the furthering of the general interests of the umma in the territories under their control.

Obviously, the local community had a vested interest in the way the rulers carried out their duties concerning the waqf. Some of its members— mainly 'ulama' but also the many others who provided the various services a mosque or a madrasa required—were employed in the establishments maintained by waqfs and depended on them for their salaries. The poor and the needy for their part depended on public foundations that provided charity, clothes, and food. The religious and municipal services maintained by public foundations were of direct concern to the entire urban population. Last but not least, the general attitude displayed by the ruling authorities toward the public endowments they administered indicated to the local population the way the waqfs they themselves had established, or were likely to establish in the future, would be treated.

In concrete terms, the local community expected the rulers to make sure that the waqf status of endowed properties was honored—that is, to protect the properties from such arbitrary acts as confiscation or embezzlement by officeholders or abuse by those who wielded power; to ensure the regular distribution of public foundation income among the legal beneficiaries (e.g., salaries to the servants of the foundation, distribution of charity or food to the poor); and to see to it that ahli endowments arrived at their ultimate destination. Rulers were also expected to see to the periodic repair and renovation of major establishments maintained by endowments whose cost involved sums over and above the income produced by their patrimony. As a matter of course the ruler was expected to contribute his share to the community by making his own endowments and encouraging his household and entourage to do the same.

As special guardians of the shari’a, ‘ulama’ had the important task of keeping a watchful eye on the way rulers discharged these duties. Indeed, there are many examples of initiatives taken by ‘ulama’ and of their cooperation with the ruling authorities to introduce measures geared to protecting the interests of public foundations. Followup on the line of private beneficiaries of ahli endowments and ensuring that upon their extinction the endowed property entered the patrimony of the public foundation designated by the founder was certainly one of the thorniest problems facing many charitable foundations. It could hardly have been handled without the qadis’ cooperation. One of the earliest reports mentioning this problem dates from the eighth century. Kindi (d. 350/961) tells us that in 118/736 the qadi of Cairo, Tawba b. Nimr realized that many endowments were being usurped and passed on as regular inheritances. Since the ultimate beneficiaries of these endowments were to be the poor and the destitute (not the heirs of the founder), the qadi decided to take these endowments under his wing so as to protect them from usurpers.[449] Measures designed to meet this difficulty were undertaken by various rulers before the nineteenth century. One example, reported in some detail in the sources, is that of the reforms carried out in Algiers toward the end of the seventeenth or beginning of the eighteenth century[450] and in Constantine in 1776.[451] The rulers, in concert with the local ‘ulama’, issued orders to prepare special registers that would include all public foundations supported by endowments. Alongside the name of each foundation were to be listed all endowment deeds made in its favor, particularly those in which the foundation appeared as ultimate beneficiary. The document produced as a result of these orders was known as “the waqfiyya of Algiers,” and served as an efficient tool in enabling Algerian public foundations to carry out the necessary followup on ahli endowments. In addition to this immediate aim, the very initiative as well as the efforts involved in preparing the document served a broader aim: to signal to the local population that its rulers were intent on protecting endowed assets in general. Indeed, this initiative played an important role in the substantial rise in the rate of endowments in Ottoman Algiers in the ensuing period.[452]

Qadis in the Ottoman Empire were assigned specific duties concerning public foundations. They were ordered to keep an eye on the administrators of such foundations and to audit the financial statements the administrators appointed by Istanbul were obliged to prepare annually. Qadis were also required to assist in the preparatory work preceding major repair and maintenance work on waqf property, on which the Ottoman center decided from time to time.[453]

The local population was sometimes directly involved in the administration of public foundations. This was the case in Ottoman Algiers, where for a long time the administration of the largest of all public foundations in the town—the Waqf al-Haramayn—was entrusted to a governing body of four, including two representatives of the local population.[454] In other instances, the local population exercised a more informal supervision over the administration of public foundations. An example that reports in some detail the manner in which such an informal supervision was carried out in Jerusalem at the end of the eighteenth century is given by Peri. In a number of cases beneficiaries of the two largest public foundations in Jerusalem complained to the ruler of improper management; the complaints attest to the detailed acquaintance of the petitioners with the foundation's situation and their close watch over the administrators.[455] Given the stake members of the local population had in the proper working of public foundations, one is justified, I believe, in assuming that such informal supervision was not confined to Jerusalem but was in fact carried out in other places and periods as well.

In extreme cases of outright violation of public waqfs by rulers—involving the diversion of income from their charitable or educational purposes, or the withholding of salaries, stipends, and food rations from 'ulama' and students— the local population, led by the 'ulama', reacted with violent outbursts, riots, and outright revolt and instigation against the rulers.[456] As in the case of the "moral economy," these riots should not be seen as merely spasmodic outbursts motivated by economic plight. Thompson's interpretation of the food riots in eighteenth-century England as an expression of grievances operating within a popular consensus based on moral and social norms as to what were or were not legitimate economic practices,[457] applies in our case as well. The norms in our case were those of the shari’a in general and waqf laws in particular, which enjoyed a high measure of consensus among the population and thus helped mobilize large proportions of the Cairene population to side with those directly affected by the ruler’s violation of these norms, which were considered an integral part of the ruler’s “contract” with the community.

The endowment system also made it possible for the community to express its criticism by means of exit rather than voice.[458] The local population’s rate of endowment for public institutions, and particularly for foundations catering to general Islamic concerns—such as the poor of the holy places of Islam—was an important criterion by which the prestige of the town and its rulers were judged by the general Islamic community. Refraining from creating new endowments or keeping their rate at a low level reflected unfavorably on the ruler’s renown and thus provided the local community with an effective means of expressing its distrust of the ruler’s performance of his duties toward the community and its general discontent with the ruling system. A fairly high level of endowments by the local population, on the other hand, implied general confidence of the public in the rulers’ intentions and ability to protect their waqfs and abide by Islamic norms of proper public order.[459] The proportion of endowments by a local population over a period was thus an excellent indicator of the kind of relationship between a local community and its rulers and the existence or absence of discourse between them.

Thus, although the local umma was an uninstitutionalized body with no voting rights, it had a variety of informal but efficient ways to claim what it considered its rights.

 Conclusion

Perhaps the most important difference between the Western civil society model and the public sphere in pre-nineteenth-century Islamic societies was the informality of the latter. While the discourse between ruler and society in the West was based on a formal relationship rooted in the well-defined rights of autonomous groups, the discourse in the public sphere in the Islamic cultural area was based on informal understandings rooted in the basic adherence of all to common moral values and social norms.

Study of the waqf reveals a very lively public sphere, involving rulers, governors, and senior officials, side by side with all strata of the Muslim community— rich and poor, male and female—all of them participating in the creation and improvement of the public space. Indeed, through the waqf all elements of society, including its rulers, were mobilized in the service of the umma—that is, in the service of implementing the Islamic conception of the public sphere, which focused on the community of believers and the norms appropriate to its social order.

The broad definition of charity—that is, of what constitutes a legitimate beneficiary of endowments—allowed for the use of waqf to sustain a great variety of recipients, from family members to a plethora of institutions serving the entire community. It also helped crystallize interest groups in the space between the household and the ruling authorities, thus creating arenas of the public sphere independent from the official sphere.

The rules governing the endowment institution, combined with the proliferation of endowments, their predominance in the public space and their social and economic importance, actually deprived rulers of the exclusive prerogative to decide on a large number of issues concerning the interests of the community, and triggered a continuous discourse with the community, and its representatives concerning the administration and policies of major issues in the public sphere. This discourse had its own dynamic, instigated by the practical economic and social implications of the waqf and determined by a joint effort of the community, the ‘ulama’, and the rulers.

The waqf thus served as an important integrative institution holding together the society and its rulers. Rather than separation and estrangement, it established a strong bond of shared values, common cultural symbols, and common language between rulers and society. The participation of rulers in the creation of endowments symbolized the bond of values shared with the society under their rule and conferred a measure of legitimacy on the rulers. Moreover, the many public foundations created by rulers and their entourages obviously refute the thesis that rulers were careless of the public, its needs, and its well-being.

[396] Turner 1984, 39.

[397] Ibid., 40. On the “Oriental despotism” thesis see also Springborg 1987, esp. 414–31; 1992, esp. 18–20.

[398] Ibid.; For more recent summaries of this point, connecting it to the question of democracy, see Lindholm 1996, esp. 33848; Sadowski 1997; Eickelman 1996, esp. x-xi.

[399] E.g., Lambton 1981; Vatikiotis 1987; Lapidus 1996; Lindholm 1996 and further literature there. See also Sadowski 1997 for a criticism of the research on this topic.

[400] Somers 1995, esp. 123--7; Calhoun 1993, esp. 269.

[401] These have been particularly emphasized and developed by political anthropology and the new cultural history. See Hann and Dunn 1996; Hunt 1989.

[402] Hodgson 1974, vol. 2, 119.

[403] Ibid., vol. 2, 124.

[404] As to the difficulty of rendering the term shari’a into English, see ibid., vol. 1, 334, n. 1. For a more detailed definition see below.

[405] Mottahedeh 1980, 7.

[406] See, e.g., Lambton EI² and bibliography there.

[407] Calder EI².

[408] For the basic rules governing the waqf see Heffening EI.

[409] See, e.g., Inalcik 1973, 148; Gerber 1983, 38–39.

[410] Hodgson 1974, vol. 2, 346–47.

[411] The same idea was reflected in the idea of the hisba — see Cahen and Talbi, EI².

[412] See Schacht 1953, 443–52; Heffening EI; Cahen 1961, 44–45, 56.

[413] E.g., al-Kasani (d. 585/1189) 1910, vol. 4, 221. The idea, as well as the terms sadaqa jariya or sadaqa mawqufa appear in virtually every treatise on the waqf. See, e.g., al-Shaybani (al-Khassaf) (d. 261/875) 1904, passim.

[414] On the notion of qurba see Anderson 1951b, 292–99.

[415] Hodgson 1974, vol. 2, 345–46.

[416] See Pruett 1984, whose article revolves around the idea that “for the Muslim, Islam is the command to submit to Allah in every aspect of his life,” and a critique of the Orientalist who “has dismissed this fundamental consideration from his reading of Islam. That is to say, he fails to see the transcendent truth and good in the Muslim tradition and thinks of it as a cultural artifact only” (44).

[417] See Baer 1981; Hoexter 1987. A comparison of the meaning of charity in Islam and in other cultures awaits serious study and is beyond the scope of this paper. For some beginnings in addressing this comparative aspect see, e.g., Jones 1980.

[418] See, e.g., Johansen 1981, 298, quoting Kasani; Heyd 1973, 204–7, 209, quoting Mawardi; Inalcik EI².

[419] Sometimes a third categoryof rights, haqq al-saltana (the right of the state) is mentioned in the sources. It certainlydid not grant the ruler or the state anyintrinsic rights of their own. What it did was to grant the ruler the right to prescribe extra-shar’i punishments, in protection of the rights of society. As Heyd shows, in the object of punishment and its general thrust, haqq al-saltana was rather similar to haqq Allah, both being identified with the rights of the Islamic communityand the public interest. See Heyd 1973, 204–7. For further details see below.

[420] Crone and Hinds 1986, esp. 80–97, place the victory of the ‘ulama’ and the rejection of caliphal guidance in spiritual matters in the ‘Abbasid period, and its formal acknowledgment in the period after the mihna in 234/848. See also Hurvitz, this volume.

[421] On siyasa shar’iyya see Coulson 1964, 129–30,172; 1957, 51. The most comprehensive exposition of the doctrine is Heyd 1973, 198–207. For the dating of the process whereby siyasa was incorporated in the shari’a see Johansen 1979, 54–61; 1981, 302.

[422] For the combination of huquq Allah and huquq al-‘ibad in the waqf institution see Hoexter 1995. This paragraph is based on ibid.

[423] On this subject see Hoexter 1998a, chapter 6.

[424] See e.g. Hoexter 1997, esp. 322 and n. 10. Despite instances of corruption among them, the ‘ulama’ as a reference group were never discredited to the point of actually losing their role as transmitters and interpreters of the norms of the proper social order.

[425] On the mechanisms of change see, e.g., Johansen 1993b; Hallaq 1994; Gerber 1998.

[426] On the role of the muftis see, e.g., Hallaq 1994; Powers 1990; Masud, Messick, and Powers 1996a. In some places, e.g., Ottoman Algiers, a formal institution— the majlis ‘ilmi, composed of the Hanafi and Maliki qadis and the muftis of the two schools of law—was set up to deal with major or difficult points of law—see Hoexter 1984, 256–58.

[427] On tarjih and tashih see Hallaq 1994, 5155. See also n. 30, above.

[428] This, as well as the basic division of responsibilities between rulers and ‘ulama’ discussed above, held true except in cases in which a ruler claimed special spiritual powers—i.e., declared himself a mahdi—a divinely guided ruler who would restore Islam to its original perfection.

[429] Horster 1935, 42–43; Ibn ‘Abidin (d. 1252/1836) 1966, vol. 4, 388–89.

[430] The history of cash endowments is dealt with in detail in Mandaville 1979. What follows is based on this article.

[431] Ibid., 290, n. 3.

[432] See Heyd 1973, 185–87.

[433] Mandaville 1979, 298.

[434] On Baba Bali and his views as quoted above see ibid., 301–4.

[435] On ‘urf see Libson 1997; Ibn ‘Abidin (d. 1252/1836) 1883–1884; Johansen 1993a.

[436] For the opposition in Syria to a number of changes introduced by the Ottomans, on the grounds of these changes being based on local custom prevalent in Anatolia and Rumeli but not in Syria see Rafeq 1994.

[437] For a short description of the various leases see Baer EI².

[438] Manyof the examples cited in this part are taken from the Ottoman Empire. I believe, however, that the general conclusions hold true for other periods and regions of the premodern Islamic world as well.

[439] Actually, quite a number of urban studies, particularlyin the past few decades, are mainlybased on waqf documents. For some of the more recent studies pertaining to the subject under discussion see Hoexter 1998b, 482, n. 25.

[440] For further details, examples, and literature on endowments for these purposes see Baer 1997, 279–85, 288, 291–97; Hoexter 1998b, 481, n. 22.

[441] For further details, examples, and bibliography see Baer 1997, 265–69; Hoexter 1998b, 481, n. 22. On endowments, particularlyfor madrasas bythe patrician class in Iran see Arjomand 1998; 1999 and further bibliography there.

[442] For further details, examples, and bibliography see Baer 1997, 273–75.

[443] For further details and literature see Hoexter 1998b, 47677, nn. 6, 7, 8. For the use of endowments as an instrument of public policy see Arjomand 1998.

[444] Veyne 1990, 418.

[445] See above.

[446] For further details see Hoexter 1998a, chapter 5.

[447] Contrary to what has been the accepted wisdom, ahli endowments reached their khayri stage quite often and within a relatively short span of time. See ibid., esp. 90–99; Baer 1983, 21–22; Ben Achour 1992, 61; Yerasimos 1994, 45.

[448] For details see Hoexter 1995.

[449] Kindi (d. 350/961) 1912, 346. See also Tyan 1960, 380 and n. 3.

[450] The exact date is not clear. See Devoulx 1863, 104–5.

[451] Feraud 1868, 12122.

[452] Hoexter 1998a, esp. 22–23, 83–86.

[453] Peri 1983, 32–36; Gerber 1988, 164–66; Marcus 1979; 1989, 307.

[454] See Hoexter 1998a, chapter 3.

[455] Peri 1983, 42–45.

[456] See Raymond 1973–1974, vol. 2, 794; Crecelius 1995, 257--5. Both relate to the eighteenth century—a particularly corrupt period in Egypt.

[457] Thompson 1971.

[458] On voice and exit see Hirschman 1970.

[459] For an example of how this worked in Ottoman Algiers see Hoexter 1998a.

 Chapter Eight: Concluding Remarks: Public Sphere, Civil Society, and Political Dynamics in Islamic Societies

SHMUEL N. EISENSTADT

 I

The chapters collected in this volume were presented and discussed in a workshop that took place in Jerusalem at the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute. The workshop constituted part of a program on “Collective Identity, Public Sphere, and Political Order,” under the auspices of the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute, the Swedish Collegium for Advanced Study in the Social Sciences in Uppsala, and the Max Weber Kolleg at Erfurt University, its major aim being to reexamine critically some of the basic assumptions of recent studies of the topic as they bear on the dynamics of different civilizations and contemporary societies.

 II

Notions of civil society were proposed and elaborated in different European contexts in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, especially within the intellectual tradition of what came to be termed the Scottish Enlightenment, but also earlier by such scholars as Pufendorf. However the revival of interest in this concept in contemporary social science has been largely and somewhat curiously limited to the rather particular conceptualization of civil society, formulated mainly by Hegel, in a continental European setting in the period of transition from absolutist monarchies to nations and states. This conceptualization certainly did not apply to other European societies, such as the Scandinavian countries, Holland, or even England, where, in the relations between “state” and “society,” the influence of the latter on the former was much greater than in the German states or even in France.[460]

Whatever its strengths and limitations, the discourse on civil society was for a long period dormant in the social science literature—to be revived again only after the breakdown of the Soviet Empire and the promulgation of the concept of civil society as a norm for Middle and East European societal reconstruction. This revived discourse was connected with greater attention to the concept of “public spheres” in the period after World War II—a concept presented in Jurgen Habermas’s Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere, a book that gained additional recognition in the contemporary discourse.[461] In this discourse, the concepts of public sphere and civil society tended to be coupled, overlapped, almost conflated, often without any clear distinction between them. Moreover, in this contemporary discourse a very strong assumption emerged that the development of a public sphere and a civil society constitutes a critical condition for the formation and continuity of constitutional and democratic regimes.[462]

The available historical and contemporary evidence shows these assumptions to be very problematic. First, the relations between civil society, public sphere, and the political arena are much more variable than is implied in these assumptions. The concept of a public sphere entails that there are at least two other spheres—the official sphere and the private sphere—from which the public sphere is more or less institutionally and culturally differentiated. It is, therefore, a sphere located between the official and the private spheres. It is a sphere where collective improvements, the common good, are at stake. This holds also for the official sphere; but in the public sphere such business is carried out by groups that do not belong to the ruler’s domain. Rather, the public sphere draws its membership from the private sphere. It expands and shrinks according to shifting involvements of such membership, as Albert O. Hirschman has demonstrated with regard to modern development.[463]

The public sphere is the place of voice rather than of loyalty, to use Hirschman’s famous distinction. Its strength depends on its institutional locus, whether it is dispersed or unified, whether it is close to the center or on the periphery. It is based on oral or written communication. Its influence rests on interpretations of the common good vis-ð-vis the ruler on the one hand and the private sphere or spheres of different sectors of the society on the other.

The term public sphere therefore denotes the existence of arenas that are not only autonomous from the political order but are also public in the sense that they are accessible to different sectors of society. Public spheres are constructed through several basic processes—namely, those of framing, communicating, and institutionalizing. The first process is one of categorization; it defines a discourse beyond face-to-face interaction. The second process is one of reflexivity; it invites a debate on problems of the common good, on criteria of inclusion and exclusion, on the permeability of boundaries, and on the recognition of the "other." The third process stabilizes this sphere. Public spheres tend to develop dynamics of their own, which, while closely related to those of the political arena, are neither coterminous with nor governed by the dynamics of the latter. They develop in different ways in different societies, and they differ in their relations not only to the rulers but also to what has been often designated as civil society.

Hence, second, these two concepts—public sphere and civil society— should not be conflated. Public sphere must be regarded as a sphere between the official and the private. And it must be regarded as a sphere that expands and shrinks according to the constitution and strength of those sectors of society that are not part of the rulership. Civil society entails a public sphere, but not every public sphere entails a civil society, whether of the economic or political variety, as defined in the contemporary discourse, or as it developed in early modern Europe through direct participation in the political process of corporate bodies or a more or less restricted body of citizens in which private interests play a very important role. We do indeed expect that in every civilization of some complexity and literacy a public sphere will emerge, though not necessarily of the civil society type.[464]

Even this broad definition of the public sphere seems to be culturally bound, however. As Benjamin Schwartz once remarked in a rejoinder to Hannah Arendt's distinction between the public and the private, a number of important societies such as the Chinese "had long done quite well without any conception at all of the public as distinct from the private good."[465] And indeed, the notion of private interests as distinct from public interests—especially the idea that private interests could serve as a solid base for the pursuit of public interests—seems to be European. It is tied to a legal tradition that endows the individual with subjective rights and defines many associations as corporate bodies with legal rights, to an economic tradition that relies on the rational pursuit of self-interest; and it belongs to an institutional tradition that emphasizes the separation between state and civil society.

But whatever the differences with respect to the relations between public sphere, civil society, and the political arena, in all societies these relations have entailed continual contestation about power and authority, their legitimation and accountability.

In recognition of the very complex and variable relations among public sphere, civil society, and the political arena, one central focus of the program within whose framework the Jerusalem workshop was undertaken was, first, the reexamination of these concepts—especially, but not only, as they apply to non-Western societies; second, the ways in which the contestations about power and its legitimation have crystallized in different civilizations and shaped their dynamics; and third, a possible reassessment of the dynamics of Western societies themselves.

 III

Such a critical appraisal of the concepts of public sphere and civil society as they developed in contemporary scholarship is closely related to the "Orientalist" debate—that is, criticism of the analysis, in Western and Western-inspired scholarship, of non-Western, especially Asian, societies.

Critics of so-called Orientalism, from Edward Said on, have shown that many of the analyses of "Oriental" (above all Asian) societies undertaken by Western and Western-inspired scholarship have imposed concepts and categories rooted in the cultural program of modernity that developed in the West.[466] In particular, the conceptions of world history implicit in such scholarship have viewed the modern nation state as the epitome of progress.

On the analytical level, this approach often entailed, as Talal Asad has shown, the transposition of certain concepts—for instance, “religion”—that were rooted in Western thought and in the distinct Western historical experience, to the analysis of non-Western societies, often giving rise to the misinterpretation of many crucial aspects of the latter.[467]

On the conceptual level, the imposition of these concepts on the analysis of “Oriental” societies was often connected with a view that depicted Asian societies as being a mixture of stagnation and Oriental despotism. Truly enough, this view of Asian societies was not the only one prevalent in modern European historiographical discourse. Indeed, a strong current in this discourse as it developed in the Enlightenment promulgated a very positive view of some of these societies (e.g., the Chinese) as exhibiting civilizing features not to be found in the West. Yet the negative “Orientalist” view of these societies has become predominant in large parts of Western, especially European, scholarship and in public discourse.[468] Many studies have been guided by the implicit— and often also explicit—assumption to be found already in Marx’s discussion on the “Asian mode of production.”[469] The assumption was that these civilizations, even when initially dynamic, became static, stagnant—one major manifestation of such stagnation being that “modernity,” whether in the economic or in the political sphere, and rationality did not develop in them. In the case of Muslim societies, such decline was seen to have set in already early in the thirteenth century, with the victory of orthodoxy over the more open trends oriented to “Western” Greek philosophy.[470]

Concomitantly, many such societies—including most of the Muslim societies, especially Middle Eastern ones, as well as China—were often portrayed as epitomizing Oriental despotism; all power was seen as concentrated in the hands of the rulers, with the various sectors of society granted no autonomy beyond purely local affairs and even these affairs often tightly regulated by the great despots.[471]

 IV

The critique of Orientalism gave rise, as is well known, to intensive discussion and controversy—with highly ideological overtones. It became closely connected with the many criticisms of the models—predominant in the social sciences of the 1950s and early 1960s—of the structural-framework approach, in particular studies of modernization.[472] One of the major foci of these criticisms was that no institutional or organizational setting was taken as "given," nor was the extent to which different parts or components thereof contributed to its continuity considered. Instead, the very construction of any such setting was seen as problematic—and as always taking place through continual power contestations and negotiations among the different actors, through which, to follow Gramsci's terminology, hegemonies were established.[473] These intensive discussions and controversies opened up the problem of the relations between agency and social structure and between social structure and culture.[474]

The criticism of Orientalism was indeed closely interrelated with general developments in the social sciences and humanities. Such criticism has shown that much of the research that was guided by "Orientalist" conceptions neglected many aspects of non-Western societies—especially those related to power contestations and the relations between power and culture, which are crucial for understanding their contours and dynamics. At the same time the researches that burgeoned in conjunction with these broad controversies highlighted the extent to which the crystallization of different hegemonies has influenced many aspects of social life, among them constructs of sexuality and gender, conceptions of the human body, or the shaping of collective memory and rituals of commemoration.[475]

Within the broad spectrum of such studies, two major lines of research developed that directly challenged what they perceived as the "Orientalist" assumption. One was the so-called subaltern studies,[476] developed first in India, which emphasized above all the continual development of different forms of opposition, or more accurately resistance, to the Western political and also intellectual hegemony, especially on different local levels. The other, more recent line of research, rooted far more than the subaltern studies in Western "postmodern" scholarship, criticized the emphasis on the modern nation-state as defined in Western terms as the model and the major unit of analysis, with the concomitant neglect of regional, occupational, gender, and other social sectors and networks.[477]

But interestingly enough, the critics of “Orientalist” scholarship did not take up the most important and potentially most constructive challenge opened up by the “Orientalist” debate—namely, how to account for the internal dynamics of these non-European modern civilizations in their own terms, possibly also putting them in a comparative framework that would not bestow a privileged position on the Western experience.

It is paradoxical that many of the studies of Asian societies criticizing the Orientalist approach in many ways accepted the assumption that in most of these societies, in some crucial period of their development, a process of stagnation had set in; that the impact of colonialization and imperialism had, at least partially, stifled their transformation into modern capitalist societies. One fascinating illustration of such an approach is the debate on the potentialities for capitalist development in seventeenth- to early nineteenth-century India, presumably stifled by British colonialism.[478]

Marshall Hodgson’s ideas, as expressed in his Venture of Islam and some of his very incisive articles, many published posthumously, could have served as a starting point for going in such directions beyond the “Orientalist” debate had they been more fully developed by Hodgson himself before his untimely death. He had as yet taken only the very first steps in analyzing the Muslim societies, and their encounter with modernity, which of course later became the point of departure for much of “Orientalist” critique and scholarship.[479] Moreover, Hodgson was not followed, at least until quite recently, in the mainstream studies of Islamic societies, even if references to him abounded.

 V

The failure of these studies to analyze the internal dynamics of Asian societies was possibly rooted in a certain analytical blindness or blockage connected with the general ideological ambience of the intellectual and academic discourse of the 1970s. The central analytical point of much of such discourse— possibly the point most emphasized in the Orientalist debate and certainly one that was greatly influenced by Foucault[480] and to a smaller extent by Gramsci[481]—was the close relation between power and culture; indeed, Foucault saw an almost complete identity between the two. Most of the criticism focused on the ways in which the cultural program of modernity was imposed on these societies through the exercise of power—especially colonial or imperial power. Yet, until recently, most of these studies did not address the problem of the extent to which the relation between power and culture developed in the dynamics of these civilizations prior to the impact of the West. They did not take up the problem of how relations between culture and power— and the challenges to the hegemonic relations and discourses that developed in these societies—differed from or were comparable to Western ones, much less how these relations and challenges differed among various non-Western societies.

With the interesting exception of some studies of early Mesoamerican societies,[482] an important outcome of this analytical blindness was the fact that these studies, with their strong emphasis either on subaltern resistance or on the autonomy of various social sectors (regional, professional, economic, gender), barely touch on a problem central to Weber's analysis. That problem relates to the various broad symbolic and institutional frameworks of these civilizations—whether of the Brahminic or Sanskritist or Confucian cosmopolis, or of the Islamic umma—and its dynamics. It is Sheldon Pollock's singular merit to be probably the first among the critics of Orientalism to raise this problem. In his central statement as well as his later work on the vernacular millennium, he pointed out the importance of the relations among the carriers of these broad frameworks and the various groups—especially various local political elites and groups—and the specific dynamics generated by these relations.[483] Further research would indicate how such dynamics—which included both resistance and a quest for autonomy, but also potential challenges to the legitimation of such hegemonies and patterns of power—crystallized in different societies.

It is interesting that most of these studies did not refer to Weber; and insofar as they did, they adopted that interpretation of Weber that tended to see him as a Eurocentric preoccupied with analyzing the origin of modern capitalism and demonstrating the superiority of the West.[484] They neglected the other side, or other reading, of his work—namely, the reading of the Gesammelte Aufsatze zur Soziologie und Sozialpolitik as studies of the internal dynamics of the various great civilizations in their own terms, with a special emphasis on the role of heterodoxies and sectarian movements in these dynamics.[485]

The comparison between Weber and Foucault is indeed of great interest from the point of view of our analysis. As is well known, Foucault and his followers focused on the ways in which the concrete institutional patterns, patterns of life, and basic conceptions of order have been shaped by the interweaving of culture in the exercise of power. The relation between power and knowledge is also a central focus of Weber's analysis in the Gesammelte Aufsatze—probably best illustrated in his analysis of the place of the Confucian literati in the construction of the Chinese imperial order. Needless to say, Foucault's own work—as well as the many more contemporary historical, sociological, and anthropological studies influenced in one way or another by Foucault—provides far more detail than can be found in Weber's analysis, even if many details of Foucault, especially his analysis, have recently been subjected to far-reaching criticism.[486]

This can perhaps be best seen in Foucault's reluctance to face two broad problems. There is the problem of agency and its place in the constitution of different social and political orders, different orders of power and culture. And there is the closely related problem of the historical roots of different orders, and of continuities or discontinuities between historical periods and the concomitant difficulty in explaining the possible place of resistance in the generation of processes of social change.

As T. B. Hansen has indicated, the term parrhesia is used by Foucault for the courageous act of disrupting dominant discourses, thereby opening a new space for another truth to emerge—not a discursive truth but rather a "truth of the self," an authentication of the courageous speaker in this "eruptive truth-speaking."[487] But while this term goes beyond the simple emphasis on resistance as simply due to the inconvenience of being confined within the coercive frameworks of an order, it does not systematically analyze the nature of the agency through which such other truth may emerge,[488] or how the emergence of such "truth of the self" may become interwoven with processes of social change and transformation.

In contrast to Foucault, Weber's analysis focused on the way in which institutional patterns are constructed by human agency as well as on the problems of continuity and discontinuity between different historical periods. [489] Weber did not conflate power and culture; he attempted to specify the distinct aspects or dimensions of culture. For instance, he tried to clarify how the basic ontological premises, conceptions of salvation, and the like prevalent in a society influence specific institutional patterns—such as the structure of rulership or configurations of strata—as well as the mechanism through which such influence is exerted. Second, he emphasized that the contours of such patterns constitute a continual focus of contention among various groups among which of special importance are the various heterodoxies that potentially develop and continually challenge the existing hegemonies. The strong emphasis on the importance of heterodoxies in crystallizing such challenges indicates that such challenges are influenced not only by pure "power" contestation but also by the basic premises of the different religions or systems of belief and knowledge that become hegemonic in their respective societies, and that such premises, especially when institutionalized, contain within them seeds of potential challenge—and transformation.[490]

 VI

It is indeed with respect to analyzing the relation between culture and power that the analysis of public spheres is of central importance. Public spheres—and of course social movements, especially heterodoxies, sectarianisms, and collective identities (for example, those that crystallized in the vernacular age)—constituted the most important institutional arena in all these societies, for it was in this arena that the rulers, different elites, and various social groups in the centers and peripheries continually negotiated with, contested, and confronted one another about the definition of the common good, as well as about the legitimation and accountability of authorities and the concomitant possible challenges to the existing hegemonies..

But the concrete ways in which such negotiations or contestations develop differ greatly among different civilizations—attesting to the different ways in which power and culture are interwoven—and shape their distinct dynamics. Analyzing the dynamics of different societies may help in facing the challenge of how on the one hand to recognize the dynamics specific to particular civilizations, and on the other to confront the problem of the fruitfulness— and limits—of applying concepts developed in the Western social science discourse to the analysis of non-Western societies.

 VII

The essays presented in this volume will hopefully help to resolve some of these problems and take up some of these challenges. To no small degree the chapters build on some of Hodgson’s powerful insights and clearly indicate the inadequacy of the approaches that have promulgated the view of Muslim societies as stagnant and of their political regimes as epitomizing Oriental despotism. They clearly demonstrate, as Hoexter, Levtzion, and Eickelman succinctly indicate in their introduction and foreword, that there crystallized in Muslim society a very vibrant and autonomous public sphere that was of crucial importance in shaping the dynamics of Muslim societies.

This public sphere crystallized out of the interaction of the ‘ulama’ (the interpreters of the religious sacred law), the shari’a (the religious law), various sectors of the broader community, and the rulers. The basic framework within which such interaction took place was that of the shari’a, which was the main overall framework of Islamic societies, the regulator of the moral and religious vision, the cohesive and boundary-setting force of Muslim communities.

In the words of Hoexter and Levtzion in their introduction:

<quote>

Umma and shari’a are central conceptions running through the discussion in virtually all the chapters included in the present volume. The umma—the community of believers—was accorded central importance in Islamic political thought. Not only were the protection and furthering of its interests the central concern of the ruler, the individual Muslim and the ‘ulama’; the umma’s consensus (ijma’) on the legitimacy of the ruler as well as on details concerning the development of social and cultural norms was considered infallible. The community of believers was thus placed as the most significant group in the public sphere, and above the ruler. (see Miriam Hoexter).

The shari’a—the sacred law, or the rules and regulations governing the lives of Muslims, derived in principal from the Qur’an and hadith—was developed by fuqaha’ (jurists) and was basically an autonomous legal system, independent from the ruler’s influence. Above and beyond a legal system, the shari’a embodied the values and norms of the social order proper to the community of believers and became its principal cultural symbol. The sacred nature of the shari’a is deeply entrenched in the public sentiment of Muslim societies. The sanction of the sacred law has contributed to the formation of a Muslim public opinion and endowed institutions and social groupings based on the shari’a—such as the qadi, the mufti, the schools of law (madhabib)— with a high degree of autonomy vis-d-vis the ruler. It has also accorded moral authority to the ‘ulama’—the shari’a specialists—who have asserted the position as authorized interpreters of the shari’a law and custodians of the moral values underlying the ideals of social order of the umma.

</quote>

Among the many organizations that developed in Muslim societies, it was mainly in the schools of law, the waqf, and the different Sufi orders that reconstitution of the public sphere continually took place. As the essays presented here indicate, the relative importance and scope of these institutions did change in different historical settings and periods; but some combination of them seems to have existed in all cases. Many aspects of the institutional arenas constituting the public sphere varied in different societies and periods; though regulated by the ruler, they were yet autonomous and could exert far-reaching influence on the ruler—an influence that went far beyond simple subservience to official rule or attempts to evade it.

 VIII

The overall pattern of the public sphere (or spheres) that developed in Muslim societies, the mode of interaction between the ‘ulama’, the different sectors of society, and the rulers, was rooted in the basic premises and conceptions of Islam. The specific constellations, the concrete institutional arenas thereof, on the other hand, were shaped by the historical experience of the various Islamic societies.

Most important among the factors bearing on the construction of public spheres in Islam was the ideal of the umma—the community of all believers— as the major arena for the implementation of the moral and transcendental vision of Islam; the strong universalistic component in the definition of this Islamic community; and the closely connected emphasis on the principled political equality of all believers.

This pristine vision of the umma, probably implicit only in the very formative period of Islam, entailed a complete fusion of political and religious collectivities, the complete convergence or conflation of the sociopolitical and religious communities.[491] Indeed, the very conceptual distinction between these two dimensions, rooted as it is in the Western historical experience, is probably not entirely applicable to the concept of the umma.

In the implementation of these basic premises of Islamic vision, Islamic societies evinced, as Maxime Rodinson has put it,[492] the characteristics of a “totalitarian movement,” as if it were a political party strongly oriented to the reconstruction of the world and very militant in this pursuit—albeit needless to say without having all the modern technological and administrative means of totalitarianism. Such implementation, however, was to be realized not in the establishment of one continual political regime but through the shari’a, the law, which from early on in Islamic history became the main framework of the overall moral and transcendental visions of Islam and the regulator of the modes of its implementation. It was only in the early phase of Islamic conquest and then in some of the “renovated” regimes to be discussed later that these “totalitarian”-like tendencies became predominant.

The emphasis on the construction of a political-religious collectivity was connected in Islam with the development of a principled ideological negation of any primordial element or component within this sacred political-religious identity. Indeed, of all the Axial Age civilizations in general, and the monotheistic ones in particular, Islam was, on the ideological level, the most extreme in its denial of the legitimacy of such primordial dimensions in the structure of the Islamic community—although de facto of course the story was often markedly different, as Bernard Lewis has shown.[493] In this it stood in opposition to Judaism, with which it shared such characteristics as an emphasis on the direct, unmediated access of all members of the community to the sacred. It differed, however, from Judaism in its basic conception of the relations between man and God, in the strong emphasis—as the name Islam connotes—on the total submission to God and in the lack of any possible contractual or covenantal relationship between God and the community of believers.[494]

Two primordial aspects have very forcefully persisted in very central areas of Islam: first, the strong emphasis, in the initial historical phase of Islam, then to a large extent in Shi’i Islam, and in its Moroccan version, on descent from the Prophet as a source of legitimation of rulers; second, the emphasis on Arabic as the sacred language of Islam, of the Qur’an, of prayer, and also to a large degree of the legal exegesis. This was in contrast to Judaism, where the Bible was read in Greek in Alexandria (and in English in many synagogues in the United States); and to Christianity, where the liturgy was naturally read in Greek (or other languages) in the East, and later on in Europe after the Reformation not only in Latin but in the various vernacular languages. But beyond these two primordial elements or emphases, there developed in Islam no sanctification of any “ethnic” primordial-communal elements or symbols, and it was the universalistic ideology of the umma that became predominant.

Yet from the very beginning of Islam’s history strong tensions developed between these particularistic primordial Arab components, which were natural, as it were, to the initial carriers of the Islamic vision, and the universalistic orientation—tensions that became more important with the continual conquest and incorporation of new territorial entities and ethnic groups.[495] The final crystallization of this universalistic ideology took place with the so-called ‘Abbasid revolution.

Paradoxically, also in this period—indeed, in close relation to the institutionalization of this universalistic vision—there developed, especially within Sunni Islam, a de facto separation between the religious community and the rulers. This separation was partially legitimized by the religious leadership, and was continually reinforced, above all by the ongoing military and missionary expansion of Islam—an expansion far beyond the ability of any single regime to sustain. This separation between the religious and political elites involved, as M. Sharon has shown,[496] a shift in the legitimation of rulers in Sunni Islam (with the partial exception of some rulers such as for instance the Moroccan sultans) from direct descent from the Prophet to the consensus of the community and the rulers’ ability to maintain their power.[497] Ultimately, any persons or groups able to seize power were accepted and post facto legitimated through the influence of the khalifa.

In the different Muslim regimes that developed under the combined impact of the continual expansion of Islam and the Mongol invasion, a separation took place between the khalifa and the actual ruler, the sultan, heralding de facto separation between the rulers and the religious establishment (‘ulama’). The khalifa often became de facto powerless yet continued to serve as an ideal figure—the presumed embodiment of the pristine Islamic vision of the umma, and the major source of legitimation of the sultan—even if de facto he and the ‘ulama’ legitimized any person or group that seized power. Such separation between the khalifa and the sultan was closely connected with the crystallization (in close relation to the mode of expansion of Islam, especially of Sunni Islam) of a unique type of ruling group—namely, the military-religious rulers, who emerged from tribal and sectarian elements. It also produced the system of military slavery, which created special channels of mobility—such as the gulam system in general and the Mamluk and Ottoman devsirme in particular-through which the ruling groups could be recruited from alien elements.[498]

But even when some imperial components developed, as was the case in Iran, which became a stronghold of Shi’i Islam and in which relatively continual strong patrimonial regimes developed, a complete fusion between the political ruler and the religious elites and establishment did not ensue.[499]

 IX

This separation between khalifa and sultan was most prevalent in the mainstream of Islamic (Sunni) religious thought and tended to legitimize any ruler who ensured the existence of the Muslim community and the upholding of the shari’a. At the same time this mode legitimated-indeed, assumed-the possible coercive nature of such rulers and their distance from the pristine Muslim ideal regarding the moral order of the community. While rulers, even oppressive ones, were legitimized in the seemingly minimalistic tone necessary for the maintenance of public order and of the community, they were not seen as the promulgators, guardians, or regulators of the basic norms of the Islamic community. But whatever the extent of the acceptance of their legitimation, it usually entailed the rulers’ duty to uphold the social order and to implement shari’a justice-and hence also the possibility of close scrutiny of their behavior by the ‘ulama’even if such scrutiny did not usually have clear institutional effects. It was indeed the ‘ulama’, however weak their organization, who were the guardians of the pristine Islamic vision, upholders of the normative dimensions of the umma, and keepers and interpreters of the shari’a.

It was the central place of the ‘ulama’—their relatively high symbolic standing despite small organizational autonomy-that distinguishes the Muslim regimes from other traditional patrimonial regimes in South or Southeast Asia or the early Near East. Truly enough, this highly autonomous religious elite did not develop into a broad, independent, and cohesive ecclesiastic organization, and the religious groups and functionaries were not organized as a distinct, separate entity; nor did they constitute a tightly organized body— except, and even then only partially, in the Ottoman Empire,[500] where large sectors of the ‘ulama’ were organized by the state or in different modes in Shi’i Islam.[501] Yet the ‘ulama’ were largely autonomous in that they were constituted according to distinctive—even if highly informal—criteria of recruitment and were, at least in principle, independent of the rulers.

It was these religious leaders, the ‘ulama’even the relatively controlled ‘ulama’ of the Ottoman Empire, as Haim Gerber shows, who were the custodians of the law, of shari’a, and through it of the boundaries of the Islamic community, and hence performed important juridical functions. It was the ‘ulama’ who created major networks that brought together, under one religious—and often also social-civilizational—umbrella, varied ethnic and geopolitical groups, tribes, settled peasants, and urban groups, creating mutual impingement and interaction among them that otherwise would probably not have developed. And it was the ‘ulama’, acting through different, often transstate, networks, who were the crucial element forming the distinctive characteristics of public spheres in Islamic societies. As M. Hodgson has indicated, and as is fully illustrated in the chapters in this volume, it was the ‘ulama’ who, through their activities in schools of law, the waqfs, and the Sufi orders constituted the public spheres in Islamic societies and provided arenas of life not entirely controlled by the rulers. These public spheres were arenas in which different sectors of the society could voice their demands in the name of the basic premises of Islamic vision. Indeed, the dynamics of these public spheres cannot be understood without taking into account the crucial importance in them of the place of the community, rooted also in the basic premise of Islam, that of the equality of all believers and of their access to the sacred—conceptions that have necessarily given members of the community a right to participate, if not in the political arena, certainly in the communal and religious ones, in the promulgation and voicing of norms of public order.

 X

The continual interaction between the ‘ulama’, the rulers, and the different sectors of the community, then, were crucial to the constitution of an autonomous public sphere in Islamic societies. To quote Hoexter and Levtzion’s introduction once more:

<quote>

The picture that emerges from the contributions to this volume is that of a vibrant public sphere, accommodating a large variety of autonomous groups and characterized by its relatively stable but very dynamic nature. The community of believers was the center of gravity around which activity in the public sphere revolved. Its participation in the formation of the public sphere was a matter of course; its well-being, customs, and consensus were both the motives and the main justifications for the introduction of changes in social and religious practices, in the law and policies governing the public sphere. The independence of the shari’a and the distribution of duties toward the community between the ruler and the ‘ulama’, established very early in Islamic history, were crucial factors in securing the autonomy of the public sphere and putting limits on the absolute power of the ruler.

</quote>

The relative strength of these actors varied of course, as the essays in this volume attest, in different periods and in different Muslim societies; and these differences greatly influenced the specific contours of the major institutions of the public sphere.

In some cases, as Said Arjomand has shown in his analysis of the emergence of the academics in medieval Islamic societies, they could indeed be greatly dependent on the ruler; he could exercise strong control—based on patronage—over the appointment of personnel to the institutions and hence limit their independence.[502] But in all cases the rulers retained the basic parameters of public spheres as constituted in Islamic societies. In cases where the rulers were weak, as for instance in Malaka, as Robert Heffner has shown, strong merchant groups could become not only autonomous in their own milieu but also major players in the political arena vis-0-vis the ruler.[503]

 XI

The autonomy of the ‘ulama’, the hegemony of the shari’a, and the continuous yet variable vitality of the public spheres in Muslim society do not however imply direct autonomous access to the domain of rulership. Notwithstanding what might have been deduced from some of the more recent discussions about civil society and democracy, these factors did not result in the decision-making process of rulers, as they did in European parliaments and corporate urban institutions. Needless to say, some—often very strong—attempts to exert such influence did develop in many Muslim societies. But in concrete matters, especially foreign or military policy, as well as in such internal affairs as taxation and the keeping of public order and supervision of their own officials, the rulers were quite independent from the various actors in the public sphere.

It was this rather limited access of the major actors in the public sphere to concrete policy making that gave rise to the wrong perception of the rulers of Muslim societies as Oriental despots. This image is wrong because in fact the scope of the decision making of these rulers was relatively limited. Even if the rulers could behave in despotic ways in their relations to the officials most close to them, in internal affairs beyond taxation and the keeping of public order, they were limited, and not only because of the limits of technology. Their power was also limited because, unlike the European experience, rulership (“politics”) in these above all Sunni Islamic societies did not constitute— contrary to the pristine image of the Muslim ruler as the embodiment of a transcendental vision of Islam—a central ideological component in the upholding of the moral order, even if pragmatically it constituted a necessary condition for the implementation of shari’a. Paradoxically enough, the fact that political problems constituted a central focus of Muslim theology was to no small extent rooted in this disjunction between the ideal of the Islamic ruler as the upholder of the pristine transcendental vision of Islam and the reality of his rulership. Moreover, the “political” weakness of many of the major organizations in the public sphere, as Said Arjomand has shown, is to be attributed not to the despotic tendencies of the ruler but to the absence of legal concepts and of corporations.[504]

Thus, in Muslim, especially Sunni, societies a very interesting decoupling developed between the makeup of the public sphere and access to the decision making of the rulers. This decoupling was manifest in the combination, on the one hand, of granting to large sectors of the society, to the major actors in the public sphere, rather limited autonomous access to concrete policy making; on the other hand the upholding of the moral order of the community was vested in the ‘ulama’ and in the members of the community, with the rulers playing a secondary role.

This decoupling of a vibrant public sphere, autonomous from the political arena—or to be more precise from the realm of rulership, which differed greatly from its counterparts in Europe, especially Western and Central Europe—constituted one of the distinctive characteristics of Muslim civilization. It was distinctive, too, from the relations between the public sphere and the political rulership arena that developed in other non-Muslim Asian civilizations. It differed from India, where the political order did not constitute a major arena for the implementation of the predominant transcendental and moral vision; where sovereignty was highly fragmented; and where rulership was to a large extent embedded in the very flexible caste order,[505] giving rise to a vibrant public sphere with relatively strong access to the rulers. And it differed from China, where the political order in fact constituted the major arena for the implementation of the transcendental vision and where it was the rulers who, together with the Confucian literati, constituted the custodian of this order, leaving very limited scope for an autonomous public sphere.[506]

 XII

From the point of view of the contemporary discourse on civil society, constitutionalism, and democracy, this specific combination of a vibrant public sphere with highly limited access of the major actors to the rulers’ decision making gave rise in Muslim societies to a very paradoxical situation with respect to the impact of these main actors on changes in the political arena. The most important fact here—one that seemingly strengthened the view of these regimes as despotic—is that despite the potential autonomous standing of members of the ‘ulama’, fully institutionalized effective checks on the decision making of the rulers did not develop in these societies, and there was no machinery other than rebellion through which to enforce any far-reaching “radical” political demands.

And yet in contrast to other patrimonial regimes, the potential not just for rebellion but also for principled revolt and possible regime changes was endemic in Muslim societies. True, as Bernard Lewis has shown,[507] a concept of revolution never developed within Islam. But at the same time, as Ernest Gellner indicated in his interpretation of Ibn Khaldun’s work,[508] a less direct yet very forceful pattern of indirect ruler accountability and the possibility of regime changes did arise. This pattern was closely connected with a second type of ruler legitimation and accountability in Muslim societies—that embodied in the ruler being seen as the upholder of the pristine, transcendental Islamic vision.

Yet the possibility of implementing that pristine vision of Islam, of achieving that ideal fusion between the political and the religious community, of constructing the umma, was actually given up relatively early on in the formation and expansion of Islam. Indeed, the fact that political issues constituted a central focus of Muslim theology was to no small extent rooted in this disjunction between the ideal of the Islamic ruler as the upholder of the pristine transcendental vision of Islam and the reality of rulership in Islamic religion.[509] Yet although never fully attained, it was continually promulgated, as Aziz al-Azmeh has shown, with very strong utopian orientation, by various scholars and religious leaders, in the later periods.[510] Given the ongoing perception of the age of the Prophet as an ideal, even utopian model, the idea of restoration constituted a perennial component of Islamic civilization, promoted above all by some of the extreme reformist movements. Muhammad’s community in Medina became —in the apt phrase of Henry Munson Jr., the Islamic “primordial utopia.”[511] Many of the later rulers (the ‘Abbasids, Fatimids, and others) came to power on the crest of religious movements that upheld this ideal and legitimized themselves in just such religiouspolitical terms.

 XIII

The impact of this enduring utopian vision of the original Islamic era, of the fact that this ideal was neither ever fully implemented nor ever fully given up, became evident in some specific characteristics of the political dynamism of Islamic regimes and of Islamic sects—or rather movements with sectarian tendencies. One has of course to be very careful in using the term sect—with its Jewish and especially Christian roots—with respect to Islam, or even with respect to Hinduism. Other than the fundamental break between the Shi'is and the Sunnis, the distinctive characteristic of Christian sectarianism—the tendency to schism—has barely been applicable to Islam. But sectarian-like tendencies have existed in the recurring social movements in Muslim societies; and one of their distinctive characteristics has been the importance of their political dimensions, frequently oriented toward the restoration of that pristine vision of Islam, which has never been given up. Such renovative orientations were embodied in the different versions of the tradition of reform— the Mujaddid tradition. [512]

These radical reform movements could be focused on the person of a mahdi and/or be promulgated by a Sufi order or in a tribal group such as the Wahhabis, or in a school of law. As Emanuel Sivan has pointed out:

<quote>

Islamic Sunni radicalism was born out of the anti-accommodative attitude towards political power which had always existed within this tradition as a vigilante-type, legitimate, albeit secondary strand. Its most consistent and powerful paragon over the last seven centuries was the neo-Hanbalite school of Islamic law. When modern Sunni radicals looked in the 1920s and 1960s for a tradition to build upon, they turned quite naturally, like their predecessors in the late eighteenth century (the founders of Saudi Arabia), to neo-Hanbalism.[513]

</quote>

Such restorative protofundamentalist tendencies were often connected with strong utopian eschatological orientations. In the words of Aziz al-Azmeh:

<quote>

The Medinan Caliphate can thus be regarded, with Laroui, as a utopia. What Laroui omits is an important complement without which consideration of this matter would remain incomplete: this is eschatology. Unlike activist, fundamentalist utopia, this finalist state of felicity and rectitude associated with the future reigns of the Mahdi (the Messiah) and of ‘Isa b. Maryam (Jesus Christ) is not the result of voluntaristic action! Like the Medinan regime and the prophetic example, it is a miraculous irruption by divine command onto the fact of history, although it will be announced for the believers by many cosmic and other signs. Not only is the End a recovery of the Muslim prophetic experience, it is also the recovery of the primordial Adamic order, of the line of Abel, of every divine mission like those of Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, Solomon, Jesus and Muhammad, who incorporates, transcends and consummates them all in the most definitive form of primeval religiosity, Islam. The End, like the beginning and like the periodic irruptions of prophecy, is really against nature; it is the calque of the beginning so often repeated in history, and is the ultimate primitivism.[514]

</quote>

Political and/or renovative orientations could be oriented toward active participation in the political center, or its destruction or transformation, or toward a conscious withdrawal from it. But even such withdrawal, which developed in both Shi’ism and Sufism, often harbored tendencies to pristine renovation, leading potentially to political action.

 XIV

The fullest development of the political potential of such renovative tendencies took place in Islamic societies where such tendencies became connected with the resurgence of tribal revival against “corrupt” or weak regimes, rooted in the mode of Islamic expansion. Here the political impact of such movements became connected with processes attendant on the expansion of Islam and especially with the continuous impingement on the core Islamic polities of relatively newly converted tribal elements who presented themselves as the carriers of the original ideal Islamic vision and of the pristine Islamic polity. Many tribes (e.g., some of the Mongols), after being converted to Islam, transformed their own “typical” tribal structures to accord with Islamic religious-political visions and presented themselves as the symbol of pristine Islam, with strong renovative tendencies oriented to the restoration of pristine Islam.[515]

This tendency became closely related to the famous cycle depicted by Ibn Khaldun—namely, the cycle of tribal conquest, based on tribal solidarity and religious devotion, giving rise to the conquest of cities and settlement in them, followed by the degeneration of the ruling (often the former tribal) elite and then by its subsequent regeneration out of new tribal elements from the vast—old or new—tribal reservoirs. Ibn Khaldun emphasized above all the possibility of such renovation from within the original, especially Arab, tribal reservoir, and not from reservoirs acquired as it were through the expansion of Islam. Moreover, he focused more on the dilution of internal tribal cohesion as an important factor in the decline of Muslim dynasties and paid less attention to the “dogmatic” dimensions of Islam. But the overall strength of Ibn Khaldun’s approach is that it provides an important analytical tool for understanding the dynamics of Islamic societies beyond the geographical scope of his own vision. Such new “converts”—along with the seemingly dormant tribes of the Arabian peninsula, of which the Wahhabis constituted probably the latest and most forceful illustration—became a central dynamic political force in Islamic civilization.

By virtue of the combination of this expansion with such sectarian, renovative orientations, Islam was probably the only Axial civilization within which sectarian-like movements—together with tribal leadership and groups—often led not only to the overthrow or downfall of existing regimes but also to the establishment of new political regimes oriented, at least initially, to the implementation of the original pristine, primordial Islamic utopia.

 XV

It was indeed the Wahhabis who constituted, as John Voll has indicated, the last—and very forceful—case of a “traditional” Islamic, renovative protofundamentalist movement:

The vision of creating a society in which the Qur’an is implemented means that Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s mission would inevitably entail political consequences. It was the local rulers who forced him to leave the town where he began teaching, and it was another local ruler, Ibn Sa’ud, who provided necessary support. The political system created by the Wahhabis did not place the inspirational teacher in a position of political rule. Instead, the Wahhabi state was based on the close cooperation of a learned ruler (shaykh) and an able commander (emir). The combination reflected a long-standing perception of the proper relations between the institutions of the scholars and those of the commanders. Such a system of institutionalization reflected a reduced emphasis on charismatic leadership among Sunni fundamentalists and was also an important aspect of the great Sunni sultanates of the medieval era.

“Wahhabism” is thus a term used today for the type of reformism elucidated in ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s opposition to popular religious superstitions and innovations, his insistence on informed independent judgment rather than the rote reliance on medieval authorities, and his call for the Islamization of society and the creation of a political order that would give appropriate recognition to Islam. Wahhabism represents an important type of fundamentalism, one that continues to operate within the modern world but was not initiated as a result of conflict with the modernized West. The Wahhabis succeeded in establishing a state that, while imperfect, has nonetheless been recognized by many in the Islamic world as consonant with the fundamentalist vision to create an Islamic society. It is the most enduring experiment within the broader mission, and as such it has provided a standard against which other movements and states could be measured. [516]

In such “renovative” regimes a concept of rulership, and of its legitimation, was promulgated that presented the ruler as the upholder of the pristine, transcendental vision. Such regimes constituted probably the most widespread illustration of at least a partial transformation of the “usual” conception of rulership in Sunni Islam. Such transformation could be found also in cases where the rulers, the sultans, were also recognized as being khalifas—or at least as having many of the attributes of khalifas—by virtue of some charismatic qualities of baraka (blessing) attached to them. This was the case among the Moroccan rulers. For instance, the Moroccan sultans Sidi Muhammed and Mowlay Suleyman based their claim to represent the pristine vision largely on baraka, derived from the fact that they could claim to be descendants of the Prophet—to be challenged by diferent sectors of the ‘ulama’ and various popular sectarian-like movements.[517] Such rulers could be recognized—in John Waterbury’s felicitous characterization—as “Commanders of the Faithful” by wide-ranging groups over whom they would not impose their sultanic rulership.[518]

The most extreme case of such transformation of the usual Sunni conception of rulership was to befound within Shi’i Islam, where a strong potential for the implementation of such visions by the ruler continually existed, even if in a subterranean fashion, in the image of the hidden imam. When combined with messianic or eschatological orientations it came to embody, in the mahdis, messianic-like renovators who appeared in Muslim societies—first in Sunni then in Shi’i ones—throughout history. Their transformed conception of rulership and of its legitimation was connected with a public sphere that differed greatly from the one analyzed above. With the possible exception of the mahdi regimes, the ‘ulama’ continued to constitute a very important element in those waqf institutions that were fully developed, although the Sufi orders were suppressed by the “puritan” renovative regimes. In the latter regimes, the public sphere was much less autonomous, and the ruler constituted the major—possibly the dominant—actor in the public sphere, at least in the regulation of the moral consensus of the community.

 XVI

Insofar as such movements did not create, in the Ibn-Kahldunian mode, new regimes, the impact of such movements on Muslim societies indeed continually constituted their organizational foci. Such construction of autonomous public spheres gave rise to some of the distinct patterns of pluralism characteristic of these societies. This pluralism was characterized by very strongly patrimonial features—such as the existence of segregated—regional, ethnic, and religious—sectors perhaps best illustrated by the Ottoman millet. It also resulted in a relative blurring as between the center and the periphery, as well as the prevalence—especially in these sectors—of multiple patterns of legitimation. But in contrast to more classical patrimonial regimes that developed in such non-Axial civilizations as those of Mesoameria, the ancient Near East, and (Hinduized) South Asia, the Muslim patrimonial regimes were in constant tension with the more sectarian "totalistic" tendencies and they could be undermined by the more extreme proto-fundamentalists, who could attempt, as was the case with the Wahhabis, to establish new "pristine" regimes.

 XVII

It is only natural that these tensions and confrontations between pluralistic and totalistic tendencies became intensified in Muslim societies with the establishment within them of regimes rooted in the ideological premises of modernity, with their strong emphasis on relatively homogeneous territorial states. The rise of modern nation states, with their claim to homogeneity, has greatly undermined the autonomy of the public sphere—with the state attempting to appropriate, control, and even monopolize it. Although, as Dale Eickleman has shown,[519] a vibrant public sphere did develop in these regimes—and its very development attests to a growing democratization—this trend did not necessarily broaden the scope of autonomous political participation and of pluralism. These problems became even more acute with the rise of contemporary fundamentalist movements, which often combined the control mechanisms of the modern states with strong Jacobin tendencies, legitimized in terms of an essentialist tradition.

Contemporary Muslim societies can be seen as moving between two poles: attempts to establish territorial states with some elements of pluralism that build on their earlier historical experience; and strong antipluralistic tendencies in the form of either extreme secular oppressive—often military—regimes or extreme Jacobin fundamentalist ones. But these problems are beyond the scope of this volume.

 XVIII

The above analysis of the characteristics and dynamics of public spheres in Islamic societies illustrates how one might account for the internal dynamics of these non-European modern civilizations at least to some extent in their own terms; how one might analyze the ways in which power and culture are interwoven in different societies and shape also the distinct dynamics of these societies; how to put them in a comparative framework that does not bestow a privileged position on the Western experience.[520]

Additionally, the analysis of public spheres in Islam provides some clues as to the applicability of Western social scientific concepts to non-Western societies. We cannot avoid Western concepts, but we can make them more flexible, so to speak, through differentiation and contextualization. The use of such concepts as public sphere, civil society, and collective identity is helpful as long as we do not assume that the way in which these components were put together in Europe constitutes an evaluative yardstick for other modernizing societies. These components can develop in many different ways, depending, among other factors, on the major symbols available, especially the relative importance of their religious, ideological, primordial, and historical aspects; the conception of the political order and its relation to other societal orders; the conception of political authority and its accountability; the conception of the subject; and the modes of center-periphery relations.

We need to avoid the pitfalls of both Western- and Eastern-centeredness. Such a fallacious position can be found, for instance, in the Nihonjinron literature, with its claims about the incomparable uniqueness of Japan. We cannot identify uniqueness without making some comparisons. The attitude of “inverted Orientalism,” sometimes to be found among the more critical Western and Japanese scholars, developed in reaction to the Nihonjinron literature and led to a denial of the validity of certain Japanese categories of thought as applied to the analysis of Japanese historical and contemporary experience. Such an approach turns out to be rather paradoxical, as it goes against the exploration of those categories emphasized by the critics of the “Orientalist” approach.

The existence of debates on these issues attests to the intricacies of comparative research. The root of the problems lies not only in the fact that, at least until recently, most of the scholars who addressed these issues came from the West, but also in that this type of research has developed almost entirely— Ibn Khaldun notwithstanding—as part of the Western modern discourse. The adoption of various critical stances toward the earlier “Orientalist” literature— in the West, in India, in Japan, and elsewhere—has remained part of this discourse. The continuous reconstruction of this discourse by intellectuals in non-Western countries has greatly transformed it, but for the most part these interventions have not gone beyond the confines of this discourse.

[460] Eisenstadt and Schluchter 1998; this is partly based on a research proposal by S. N. Eisenstadt, W. Schluchter, and B. Wittrock, entitled “Collective Identity, Public Sphere, and Political Order: Cultural Foundations and the Formation of Contemporary Societies.”

[461] Habermas 1989.

[462] Cohen 1999; Galston 1999; Mardsen 1999; Barber 1999.

[463] Hirschman 1982; 1970.

[464] Eisenstadt 1987; 2000.

[465] As quoted in Hirschman 1982, 63; see also Eisenstadt and Schluchter 1998, 10–12.

[466] Said 1978; Hussain, Olson, and Qureshi 1984, esp. the chapter by Turner; Breckenridge and Van der Veer 1993; Dirks 1995.

[467] Asad 1993.

[468] Stauth 1993.

[469] See Vidal-Naquet 1996, esp. chapter 11, 267–76 and chapter 12, 277–318.

[470] Grunebaum 1976; Grunebaum and Hartner 1960.

[471] Springborg 1987.

[472] Eisenstadt 1973; 1995 chapter 11, 280–305; Vidal-Naquet 1996; Dirks, Eley, and Ortner 1996.

[473] Gramsci 1991.

[474] Eisenstadt 1995.

[475] Gorski 1993.

[476] Guha and Spivak 1988.

[477] Duara 1988.

[478] Chandra 1968; Matsui 1968; Morris 1968.

[479] Hodgson 1974; 1993.

[480] Foucault 1973; 1988; 1975; 1965.

[481] Gramsci 1991.

[482] Pollock 1993; Brown 1991; Tedlock 1992.

[483] Pollock 1998a; 1998b.

[484] Stauth 1993.

[485] Eisenstadt 2000; Schluchter 1989, esp. part II, 83–279.

[486] O’Neill 1986; Van Krieken 1990.

[487] Hansen 1999, 243 (note 3 to chapter 2).

[488] It is only in his reportages of the Iranian revolution that Foucault went beyond these limitations; but in these reportages he did not take up the analytical challenge of reconciling such different portrayals.

[489] Weber 1924; 1968; 1951; 1958; 1952.

[490] Eisenstadt 1995, chapter 12, 306–27.

[491] Cook 1983; Hodgson 1974; Turner 1974; Lapidus 1988; 1982; Shahid 1970; Schluchter 1987; Pipes 1981; Crone 1980.

[492] Rodinson 1971.

[493] Lewis 1973; al-Azmeh 1997, esp. part II, chapters 6–8.

[494] Eisenstadt 1992a.

[495] Lapidus 1975; 1996.

[496] Sharon 1983.

[497] Gibb 1968; Lapidus 1988; 1996; Pipes 1981; Crone 1980.

[498] Ayalon 1951; 1996.

[499] Arjomand 1999; 1988a; 1984; 1988b.

[500] Gibb 1968; Inalcik 1973.

[501] Arjomand 1988a.

[502] Arjomand 1988a; 1999.

[503] Heffner 1998.

[504] Arjomand 1999.

[505] Goodwin Raheja 1988; Rudolph and Rudolph 1987; Wink 1994.

[506] Balazs 1964; Chang 1955; Van der Sprenkel 1958; Wakeman 1998; Woodside 1998; Eisenstadt 1992b.

[507] Lewis 1973.

[508] Ibn Khaldun (d. 808/1406) 1958; Gellner 1981

[509] al-Azmeh 1997; Rosenthal 1958; Rosenthal 1968.

[510] al-Azmeh 1997; 1993.

[511] Munson 1988.

[512] Landau-Tasseron 1989; Lazarus-Yafeh 1986; Levtzion 1986; Levtzion and Voll 1987; Levtzion and Weigert 1995; Voll 1991.

[513] Sivan 1995, 16.

[514] al-Azmeh 1993, 98

[515] Lewis 1973, chapter 18, 253–66; Gellner 1981; Ibn Khaldun 1958.

[516] Voll 1991, 351.

[517] Munson 1988.

[518] Waterbury 1970.

[519] Eickelman and Piscatori 1996; Eickelman 1993; Eickelman and Anderson 1999.

[520] This follows Eisenstadt and Schluchter 1998.

 Works Cited

<biblio>

al-‘Abbadi, A. ‘U 1988. Al-Qada’ ‘inda al-‘Asha’ir al-Urduniyya. Silsila Man Hum Al-Badw? 4. Ph.D. dissertation, Cambridge University.

Abu-Lughod, J. 1987. “The Islamic City—Historic Myth, Islamic Essence, and Contemporary Relevance.” International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 19: 155–76.

Abu-Manneh, B. 1990. “Khalwa and Rabita in the Khalidi Suborder.” In Naqshabandis, ed. M. Gaborieau, A. Popovic, and T Zarcone. Istanbul-Paris: Institut Franais d’Etudes Anatoliennes d’Istanbul, 289–302.

Abun-Nasr, J. 1965. The Tijaniyya. London: Oxford University Press.

Abu Shama (d. 665/1268). 1947. Tarajim Rijal al-Qarnayn al-Sadis wa’l-Sabi’. Ed. M. Z. al-Kawthari. Cairo: Dar al-Kutub.

———. 1990. Kitab al-Ba’ith ‘ala Inkar al-Bida’ wa’l-Hawadith, Ed. M. S. Riyad. Riyad: Dar al-Raya.

———. 1991–1992. ‘Uyun al-Rawdatayn fi Akhbar al-Dawlatayn, 2 vols. Ed. A. Al-Baysumi. Damascus: Manshurat Wizarat al-Thaqafa.

Abu Yusuf, Ya’qub b. Ibrahim (d. 182/798). 1969. Kitab al-Kharaj, vol. 3. Trans. A. Ben Shemesh. Leiden: Brill.

Abu Zahra, M. 1953. Ibn Taymiyya. Cairo: Dar al-Thaqafa al-‘Arabiyya.

Aksan, V. H. 1993. “Ottoman Political Writing, 1768–1808.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 25: 53–69.

al-Albani, M. N. 1960–1961. Musajala ‘Ilmiyya bayn al-Imamayn al-Jallalayn al-‘Izz b. ‘Abd al-Salam wa-Ibn al-Salah. Damascus: Manshurat al-Maktab al-Islami.

Algar, H. 1976. “Silent and Vocal Dhikr in the Naqshabandi Order.” Akten des VII. Kongresses fur Arabistik und Islamwissenschaft. Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Gottingen, PhilologischHistorische Klasse. Gottingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 3rd ser. 98: 39–46.

———. 1990. “A Brief History of the Naqshabandi order.” In Naqshabandis, ed. M. Gaborieau, A. Popovic, and T. Zarcone. Istanbul-Paris: Institut Franais d’Etudes Anatoliennes d’Istanbul, 13–19.

Amin, H. 1965. Ta’rikh al-‘Iraq fi’l-‘Asr al-Saljuki. Baghdad: n. p.

Anderson, J. N. D. 1951a. “Homicide in Islamic Law.” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 13: 811–28.

———. 1951b. “The Religious Element in Waqf Endowments.” Journal of the Royal Central Asian Society 38: 292–99.

———. 1970. Islamic Law in Africa. London: Frank Cass.

———. 1976. Law Reform in the Muslim World. London: Athlone Press.

Ansari, S. 1992. Sufi Saints and the State Power: the Pirs of Sind, 1843–1947. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Arjomand, S. A.1984. From Nationalism to Revolutionary Islam. Albany: State University of New York Press.

‘— 1988a. ed., Authority and Political Culture in Shi’ism. Albany: State University of New York Press.

— ——. 1988b. The Turban for the Crown: The Islamic Revolution in Iran. New York: Oxford University Press.

— ——. 1998. “Philanthropy, the Law, and Public Policy in the Islamic World before the Modern Era.” In Philanthropy in the World’s Traditions, ed. W. F. Ilchman, S. N. Katz, and E. L. Queen II. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 109–32.

— ——. 1999. “The Law, Agency, and Policy in Medieval Islamic Society: Development of the Institutions of Learning from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century.” Comparative Studies in Society and History 41: 263–93.

Asad, T. 1993. Genealogies of Religion: Discipline and Reason of Power in Christianity and Islam. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press.

Aubin, F. 1990. “En Islam Chinois? quels Naqshabandis.” In Naqshabandis, ed. M. Gaborieau, A. Popovic, and T Zarcone. Istanbul-Paris: Institut Franais d’Edes Anatoliennes d’Istanbul, 491–572.

Ayalon, D. 1951. L’esclavage du Mamelouk. Jerusalem: Israel Oriental Society.

— 1996. Le phenomene mamelouk dans LOrient islamique. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.

al-Azmeh, A. 1993. Islams and Modernities. London: Verso.

— ——. 1997. Muslim Kingship: Power and the Sacred in Muslim, Christian and Pagan Politics. London: I. B. Tauris.

Baer, G. 1964. Population and Society in the Arab East. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

— ——. 1969. Studies in the History of Modern Egypt. Chicago: Chicago University Press.

— ——. 1981. “The Muslim Waqf and Similar Institutions in Other Civilizations.” Paper presented at the Workshop on Economic and Social Aspects of the Muslim Waqf, Jerusalem, 1–20 February 1981.

— ——. 1983. “Women and Waqf: An Analysis of the Istanbul Tahrir of 1546.” Studies in the Social History of the Middle East in Memory of Professor Gabriel Baer, Asian and African Studies 17: 9–27.

— ——. EI² “Hikr.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition, supplement.

— ——. 1997. “The Waqf as a Prop for the Social System (Sixteenth-Twentieth Centuries).” Islamic Law and Society 4: 264–97.

Balazs, E. 1964. Chinese Civilization and Bureaucracy: Variations on a Theme. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Barber, B. 1999. “Civil Society: Getting Beyond the Rhetoric. A Framework for Political Understanding.” In Civic Engagement in the Atlantic Community, ed. J. Janning, C. Kupchan, and D. Rumberg. Gtitersloh: Bertelsmann Foundation Publishers, 115–42.

Barkan, 0. L, and E. H. Ayverdi. 1970. Istanbul Vakiflari Tahrir Defteri 953 (1546) Tarihli. Istanbul: Baha Malas’

Ben Achour, M. 1992. “Le habous ou waqf: l’institution juridique et la pratique tunisoise.” In hasab wa nasab: Parente, Alliance et Patrimoine en Tunisie, ed. S. Ferchiou. Paris: Editions du CNRS, 51–78.

Bennigsen, A. 1964. “Un mouvement populaire au Caucase au 18e siecle: la guerre sainte du sheikh Mansur, 1785–1791.” Cahiers du Monde Russe et Sovietique 2: 159–205.

Berkey, J. P. 1992. The Transmission of Knowledge in Medieval Cairo. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

———. 1995. “Tradition, Innovation, and the Social Construction of Knowledge in the Medieval Islamic Near East.” Past and Present 146: 38–65.

———. 2000. “Storytelling, Preaching, and Power in Mamluk Cairo.” Mamluk Studies Review 4: 53–73.

Berque, J. EI² “‘Amal.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

8111, J. A., and C. Leiden. 1979. Politics in the Middle East. Boston: Little, Brown.

Birge, J. K. 1937. The Bektashi Order of Dervishes. London: Luzac.

Black, H. C., et al. 1990. Black’s Law Dictionary, 6th ed. St. Paul: West Publishing Co.

Blanc, H. 1974. “The nekteb-nektebu Imperfect in a Variety of Cairene Arabic.” Israel Oriental Studies 4: 206–26.

Bosworth, C. E. 1973. “Barbarian Incursions: The Coming of the Turks into the Islamic World.” In Islamic Civilization, 950–1150, ed. D. S. Richards. Oxford: Cassirer, 1–16.

— ——. 1976. The Medieval Islamic Underworld. The Banu Sasan in Arabic Society and Literature. Leiden: Brill.

Breckenridge, C. A., and P. Van der Veer, eds. 1993. Orientalism and the Postcolonial Predicament: Perspectives on South Asia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Brenner, L. 1988. “Concepts of Tariqa in West Africa: the Case of the Qadiriyya.” In Charisma and Brotherhood in African Islam, ed. D. C. O’Brien and C. Coulon. Oxford: Clarendon, 33–52.

Brown, C. 1991. “Hieroglyphic Literacy in Ancient Mayaland: Inferences from Linguistic Data.” Current Anthropology 32: 489–96.

Brown, P. 1981. The Cult of Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Bulliet, R. 1972. The Patriciate of Nishapur: A Study in Medieval Islamic Social History. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

— ——. 1973. “The Political-Religious History of Nishapur in the Eleventh Century.” In Islamic Civilization, 950–1150, ed. D. S. Richards. Oxford: Cassirer, 71–91.

— ——. 1994. The View from the Edge. New York: Columbia University Press.

Cahen, C. 1937–1938. “Une chronique syrienne du VI^e/XII^e siecle: le Bustan al-Jami’.” Bulletin d’Etudes Orientales 7–8: 113–55.

‘— 1961. “Reflexions sur le waqf ancien.” Studia Islamica 14: 37–56.

— ——. EI² “Ayyubids.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Cahen, C., and M. Talbi. EI² “Hisba.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Calder, N. EI² “Shari’a.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Calhoun, C. 1992, 1994. ”Introduction.” In Habermas and the Public Sphere, ed. C. Calhoun. Cambridge: MIT Press, 1–48.

———. 1993. “Civil Society and the Public Sphere.” Public Culture 5: 267–80.

Chamberlain, M. 1994. Knowledge and Social Practice in Medieval Damascus, 11901350. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Chandra, B. 1968. “Reintrepretation of Nineteenth-Century Indian Economic History.” The Indian Economic and Social History Review 5: 35–75.

Chang Chung-li. 1955. The Chinese Gentry: Studies on Their Role in Nineteenth-Century Chinese Society. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Chartier, R. 1991. The Cultural Origins of the French Revolution. Trans. L. G. Cochrane.

Durham and London: Duke University Press.

Ɂizakya, M. 1995. “Cash Waqfs of Bursa, 1555–1823.” Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 38: 313–54.

Clancey-Smith, J. A. 1994. Rebel and Saint: Muslim Notables, Populist Protest, Colonial Encounters (Algeria and Tunisia., 1800–1904). Berkeley: University of California Press.

CLayet, Nc199ዓ. ^ytiዓues,etaetsodet. tasHavetisdains L’aireו,aaaMוicu,edeai.findui 15^e siecle h nos jours. Leiden: Brill.

Cohen, J. 1999. “Trust, Voluntary Association, and Workable Democracy: The Contemporary American Discourse of Civil Society.” In Democracy and Trust, ed. M. Warren. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 208–48.

Cohen, J. L., and A. Arato. 1992. Civil Society and Political Theory. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Cohen, M. 1997. “Jewish Communal Organization in Medieval Egypt: Research, Results and Prospects.” In Studies in Muslim-Jewish Relations: Judeo Arabic Studies, ed. N. Galb. New York: Harwood Academic Press, 73–86.

Colas, D. 1997. Civil Society and Fanaticism: Conjoined Histories. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Colucci, M. 1927. “Il diritto consuetudinario della tribd della Cirenaica.” Revista Coloniale 22: 24–37.

Cook, M. 1983. Mohammad. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Cornell, V. J. 1998. Realm of the Saint: Power and Authority in Moroccan Symbolism. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Coulson, N. J. 1957. “The State and the Individual in Islamic Law.” The International and Comparative Law Quarterly 6: 49–60.

———. 1964. A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

———. 1971. Succession in the Muslim Family. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Crecelius, D. 1995. “Introduction.” Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 38, 3: 247–61.

Crone, P. 1980. Slaves on Horses. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1987. Roman, Provincial, and Islamic Law. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Crone, P., and M. Hinds. 1986. God’s Caliph. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Davis, J. 1987. Libyan Politics: Tribe and Revolution. London: I. B. Tauris.

———. 1998. “A Social Perspective.” In Legal Documents on Libyan Tribal Society in Process of Sedentarization, ed. A. Layish. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 7–13.

Deegan, H., ed. 1994. The Middle East and Problems of Democracy. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.

Desan, S. 1989. “Crowds, Community and Ritual in the Work of E. P.Thompson and Natalie Davis.” In The New Cultural History, ed. L. Hunt. Berkeley: University of California Press. 47–71.

Devoulx, A. 1863. “Les edifices religieux de l’ancien Alger.” Revue Africaine 7: 102–13.

DeWeese, D. 1993. “Review of Jurgen Paul.” Journal of Asian History 27: 66–67.

Dhahabi, Shams al-Din (d. 748/1348). 1984–1985. Siyar A’lam al-Nubala’, vols.

21–23. Ed. B.‘A. al-Ma’ruf and M. H. Sirhan. Beirut: Mu’asasat al-Risala.

Dirks, N. B., ed. 1995. Colonialism and Culture. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Dirks, N. B., G. Eley, and S. Ortner, eds. 1996. Culture, Power, History: A Reader in Contemporary Social Theory. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Drory, J. 1988. “Hanbalis of the Nablus Region in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries.” Asian and African Studies 22: 93–112.

Duara, P. 1988. Culture, Power, and the State: Rural North China, 1900–1942. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Duben, A., and C. Behar. 1991. Istanbul Households: Marriage, Family, and Fertility, 1880–1940. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Eaton, R. M. 1978. Sufis of Bijapur: Social Roles of Sufis in Medieval India. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

———. 1993. The Rise of Islam and the Bengal Frontier, 1204–1760. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Eddc A.-M. 1999. La principaute Ayyoubide d’Alep (579/1183-658/1260). Stuttgart: Steiner.

Eickelman, D. F. 1964. “Is There an Islamic City? The Making of a Quarter in a Moroccan Town.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 5: 274–94.

———, ed. 1993. Russia’s Muslim Frontiers: New Directions in Cross-Cultural Analysis. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.

———. 1996. “Forward.” In Civil Society in the Middle East, vol. 2, ed. A. R. Norton. Leiden: Brill.

Eickelman, D. F., and J. W. Anderson, eds. 1999. New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.

Eickelman, D. F., and J. Piscatori. 1996. Muslim Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Eisenstadt, S. N. 1973. Tradition, Change and Modernity. New York: Wiley.

———. 1987. European Civilization in a Comparative Perspective. Oslo: Norwegian University Press.

———. 1992a. Jewish Civilization: The Jewish Historical Experience in Comparative Perspective. Albany: State University of New York Press.

———, ed. 1992b. Kulturen der Achsenzeit II: Ihre Institutionelle und Kulturelle Dynamik. Teil I: China, Japan. Frankfurt: Suhrkamp.

———. 1995. Power, Trust, and Meaning: Essays in Sociological Theory and Analysis.

Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

———. 2000. Die Vielfalt der Moderne. Berlin: Velbruck Wissenschaft.

Eisenstadt, S. N., and W. Schluchter. 1998. “Introduction: Paths to Early Modernities— A Comparative View.” Daedalus 127: 1–18.

Eliss^eff, N. 1949. “Les monuments de Nur al-Din.” Buletin d’Etudes Orientales 13: 5--3.

———. 1972. “Un document contemporain de Nur al-Din. Sa notice biographique par Ibn ‘Asakir.” Bulletin d’Etudes Orientales 25: 125–40.

Ephrat, D. 2000. A Learned Society in a Period of Transition: The Sunni ‘Ulama’ of EleventhCentury Baghdad. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Ernst, C. E. 1993. “An Indo-Persian Guide to Sufi Shrine Pilgrimage.” In Manifestations of Sainthood in Islam, ed. G. M. Smith and C. E. Ernst. Istanbul: Isis Press, 43–67. Evans-Pritchard, E. E. 1949. The Sanusi of Cyrenaica. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Faroqhi, S. 1976. “The Tekke of Haci Bektas, Social Position and Economic Activities.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 7: 183–205.

———. 1981. “Seyyid Gazi Revisited: The Foundation as Seen through SixteenthCentury Documents.” Turcica 13: 90–122.

———. 1986. “Political Initiatives ‘from the Bottom Up’ in the Sixteenth- and Seventeenth-Century Ottoman Empire: Some Evidence for their Existence.” In Osmanische Studien zur Wirtschaftsund Sozialgeschichte, ed. H. G. Majer. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 24–45.

———. 1993. “Sainthood as Means of Self-Defense in Seventeenth-Century Ottoman Anatolia.” In Manifestations of Sainthood in Islam, ed. G. M. Smith and C. E. Ernst. Istanbul: Isis Press, 193–208.

Feraud, C. 1868. “Province de Constantine: Les anciens etablissements religieux musulmans de Constantine.” Revue Africaine 12: 121–32.

Fernandes, L. 1988. The Evolution of a Sufi Institution in Mamluk Egypt: the Khanqah. Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag.

Fierro, M. I. 1985. “Los Malikies de al-Andalus y los Dox Arbitros (al-hakaman).” Al-Qantara 6: 79–102.

‘— 1992. “The Treatises Against Innovation (Kutub al-Bida’).” Der Islam 69: 204–46.

Fleischer, C. H. 1992. “The Lawgiver as Messiah: The Making of Imperial Image in the Reign of Suleyman.” In Soliman le Magnifique et son Temps, ed. G. Veinstein. Paris: Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales, 159–77.

Foucault, M. 1965. Madness and Civilization: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason. New York: Pantheon Books.

— ——. 1973. The Birth of the Clinic: An Archaeology of Medical Perception. Trans. A. M. Sheridan Smith. New York: Vintage Books.

— ——. 1975. Surveiller et punir: naissance de la prison. Paris: Gallimard.

— ——. 1988. Technologies of the Self: A Seminar with Michel Foucault. Ed. L. H. Martin et al. Amherst: University of Massachussetts Press.

Frenkel, J. 1992. “The Endowment of al-Madrasa al-Salihiyya in Jerusalem by Saladin.” In Palestine under the Mamluks, ed. J. Drory. Jerusalem: Ben Zvi Institute, 72–77 (in Hebrew).

Galston, W. 1999. “Social Capital in America: Civil Society and Civil Trust.” In Civic Engagement in the Atlantic Community, ed. J. Janning, C. Kupchan, and D. Rumberg. Gtitersloh: Bertelsmann Foundation Publishers, 67–78.

Gardet, L. EI² “Dhikr.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Geertz, C. 1979. “Deep Play: Notes on the Balinese Cockfight.” In Interpretive Social Science, ed. W. M. Sullivan and P. Rainbow. Berkeley: University of California Press, 181–224.

Gellner, E. 1969. Saints of the Atlas. Chicago: Chicago University Press.

— ——. 1981. The Muslim Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

— ——. 1984. “Doctor and Saint.” In Islam in Tribal Societies, ed. S. A. Akbar and D. M.

Hart. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 21–38.

— ——. 1994. Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and Its Rivals. London: Hamish Hamilton.

Gerber, H. 1983. “The Waqf Institution in Early Ottoman Edirne.” Studies in the Social History of the Middle East in Memory of Professor Gabriel Baer, Asian and African Studies 17: 29–45.

— ——. 1987. The Social Origins of the Modern Middle East. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.

— ——. 1988. Economy and Society in an Ottoman City: Bursa 1600–1700. Jerusalem: The Hebrew University.

— ——. 1994. State, Society, and Law in Islam: Ottoman Law in Comparative Perspective. Albany: State University of New York Press.

———. 1998. “Rigidity versus Openness in Late Classical Islamic Law: The Case of the Seventeenth-Century Palestinian Mufti Khayr al-Din al-Ramli.” Islamic Law and Society 5: 165–95.

———. 1999. Islamic Law and Culture, 1600–1840. Leiden: Brill.

Gibb, H. A. R. 1968. Studies in the Civilization of Islam. Boston: Beacon Press

Gibb, H. A. R., and H. Bowen. 1957. Islamic Society and the West, vol. 2. London: Oxford University Press.

Gilbert, J. E. 1977. “The ‘Ulama’ of Medieval Damascus and the International World of Islamic Scholarship.” Ph.D diss., University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.

———. 1980. “Institutionalization of Muslim Scholarship and the Professionalization of the ‘Ulama’ in Medieval Damascus.” Studia Islamica 52: 105--3.

Ginat, J. 1987. Blood Disputes among Bedouin and Rural Arabs in Israel: Revenge, Mediation, Outcasting, and Family Honor. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.

Goitein, S. D. 1967. A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza. Vol. 1: Economic Foundations. Berkeley: University of California Press.

———. 1970. “Minority Self-Rule and Government Control in Islam.” Studia Islamica 31: 101–16.

———. 1971. A Mediterranean Society. The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza. Vol. 2: The Community. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Goldziher, I. 1967, 1971. Muslim Studies, 2 vols. Ed. and trans. S. M. Stern and C. R. Barber. London: George Allen and Unwin.

———. 1981. Introduction to Islamic Theology and Law. Trans. A. Andras and R. Hamori. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Goodwin, G. 1994. The Janissaries. London: Saqi Books.

Goodwin, Raheja G. 1988. “India: Caste, Kingship, and Dominance Reconsidered.” Annual Review of Anthropology 17: 497–522.

Gorski, P. 1993. “The Protestant Ethic Revisited: Disciplinary Revolution and State Formation in Holland and Prussia.” American Journal of Sociology 99: 265–316.

Gramsci, A. 1991. Selections from Cultural Writings. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. Grandin, N. 1990. “A propos des asanid de la Naqshabandiyya dans les fondements de la Khatmiyya du Soudan oriental: strategies de pouvoir et relation matre/disciple.” In Naqshabandis, ed. M. Gaborieau, A. Popovic, and T. Zarcone. Istanbul- Paris: Institut Franais d’Etudes Anatoliennes d’Istanbul, 621–55.

Gross, J. A. 1988. “The Economic Status of a Timurid Sufi Shaykh: a Matter of Conflict or Perception.” Iranian Studies 21: 84–104.

———. 1990. “Multiple Roles and Perceptions of a Sufi Shaykh: Symbolic Statements of Political and Religious Authority.” In Naqshabandis, ed. M. Gaborieau, A. Popovic, and T Zarcone. Istanbul-Paris: Institut Franais d’Etudes Anatoliennes d’Istanbul, 109–21.

Grunebaum, G. E. 1976. Islam and Medieval Hellenism. London: Variorum Reprints.

Grunebaum, G. E., and W. Hartner, eds. 1960. Klassizismus und Kulturverfall. Frankfurt.

Guha, R., and G. Spivak, eds. 1988. Selected Subaltern Studies. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Haarman, U. W. 1988. “Ideology and History, Identity and Alterity: the Arab Image of the Turk from the ‘Abbasids to Modern Egypt.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 20: 175–96.

Habermas, J. 1989, 1992. The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society. Trans. Th. Burger. Cambridge: Polity Press.

Hallaq, W. B. 1994. “From Fatwas to Furu’: Growth and Change in Islamic Substantive Law.” Islamic Law and Society 1: 29–65.

Halpern, M. 1963. The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Hammoudi, A. 1997. Master and Disciple: The Cultural Foundations of Moroccan Authoritarianism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Hann, C., and E. Dunn, eds. 1996 Civil Society: Challenging Western Models. London: Routledge.

Hansen, T. B. 1999. The Saffron Wave: Democracy and Hindu Nationalism in Modern India. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Al-Harawi, ‘Ali (d. 611/1215). 1953. Kitab al-Isharat fi Ma’rifat al-Ziyarat. Ed. J. Sourdel-Thomine. Damascus: Institut Franais de Damas.

Hart, D. M. 1996. “Murder in the Market: Penal Aspects of Berber Customary Law in Precolonial Moroccan Rif.” Islamic Law and Society 3: 343–71.

Hartmann, A. EI² “al-Mansur, al-Malik Muhammad b. ‘Umar b. Shahnshah.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Heffening, W. EI (1931) “Wakf.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam.

Heffner, R. 1998. “A Muslim Civil Society? Indonesian Reflections on the Conditions of Possibility.” In Democratic Civility: The History and Cross-Cultural Possibility of a Modern Political Ideal, ed. R. Heffner. New Brunswick, N. J.: Trescoton Publishers, 285–323.

Henninger, J. 1959. “La religion bedouine preislamique.” L’antica Societd Beduina. Studi Semitici 2: 115–40.

Heyd, U. 1973 Studies in Old Ottoman Criminal Law. Ed. V. L. Menage Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Hinds, M. EI². “Mihna.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Hirschman, A. 1970. Exit, Voice, and Loyalty: Responses to Decline in Firms, Organizations, and States. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

———. 1982. Shifting Involvement: Private Interest and Public Action. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Hiskett, M. 1975. A History of Hausa Islamic Verse. London: School of Oriental and African Studies.

Hodgson, M. G. S. 1974. The Venture of Islam 3 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

———. 1993. Rethinking World History: Essays on Europe, Islam, and World History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hoexter, M. 1984. “Le contrat de quasi-alienation des awqaf a Alger a la fin de la domination turque: etude de deux documents d’‘ana’.” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 47: 243–59.

———. 1987. “The Idea of Charity: A Case Study in Continuity and Flexibility of an Islamic Institution.” In Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin, Jahrbuch 1985/6. Berlin: Sideler Verelag, 179–89.

‘— 1995. “Huquq Allah and Huquq al-‘Ibad as Reflected in the Waqf Institution.” North African, Arabic, and Islamic Studies in Honor of Pessah Shinar, Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 19: 133–56.

— ——. 1997. “Adaptation to Changing Circumstances: Perpetual Leases and Exchange Transactions in Waqf Property in Ottoman Algiers.” Islamic Law and Society 4: 319–33.

— ——. 1998a. Endowments, Rulers, and Community: Waqf al-Haramayn in Ottoman Algiers. Leiden: Brill.

— ——. 1998b. “Waqf Studies in the Twentieth Century: The State of the Art.” Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 41: 474–95.

Hofheinz, A. 1990. “Encounters with a Saint: al-Majdhub, al-Mirghani, and Ibn Idris as Seen through the Eyes of Ibrahim al-Rashid.” Sudanic Africa 1: 19–59.

Horster, P. 1935 Zur Anwendung des islamischen Rechts im 16. Jahrhundert. Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer.

Humphreys, R. S. 1977. From Saladin to the Mongols: The Ayyubids of Damascus, 11931260. Albany: State University of New York Press.

— ——. 1989. “Politics and Architectural Patronage in Ayyubis Syria.” In Essays in Honor of Bernard Lewis, ed. C. E. Bosworth et al. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 151–75.

— ——. 1994 “Women as Patrons of Religious Architecture in Ayyubid Damascus.” Muqarnas 11: 35–54.

Hunt, L. ed. 1989. The New Cultural History. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Hussain, A., R. Olson, and J. Qureshi, eds. 1984. Orientalism, Islam and Islamists. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books.

Ibn ‘Abidin, Muhammad Amin (d. 1252/1836). 1883–1884. Nashr al-Urf fi Bina.’ Ba’d al-Ahkam ‘ala al-Urf. Damascus: Matba’at Ma’arif Suriyya al-Jalila.

‘— 1996. Radd al-Muhtar ‘ala al-Durr al-Mukhtar, vol. 4. Cairo: Matba’at Mustafa al-Babi al-Halabi.

Ibn Abi al-Wafa’ (d. 775/1371). 1993. Al-Jawahir al-Mudi’a fi Tabaqat al-Hanafiyya, vols. 1–3. Ed. ‘A. al-Hulu. Cairo: Hajar.

Ibn al-‘Adim, ‘Umar (d. 660/1262). 1954, 1968. Zubdat al-Halab fi Ta’rikh Halab, vols.

2, 3. Ed. S. al-Dahhan. Damascus: Institut Franais de Damas.

— ——. 1988–1989. Bughyat al-Talab fi Ta’rikh Halab, vols. 1–10. Ed. S. Zakkar. Damascus: Dar al-Fikr.

Ibn Ahmad, ‘Abdallah (d. 290/903). 1986. Kitab al-Sunna. Dumam: Dar Ibn al-Qayyim.

Ibn Ahmad, Salih (d. 266/880). 1981. Sirat al-Imam Ahmad b. Hanbal. Alexandria: Mu’assasat Shabab al-Jami’a.

Ibn al-‘Asakir, Thikat al-Din ‘Ali (d. 571/1176). 1995. Ta’rikh Madinat Dimashk, vol. 2. Ed. ‘A. al-‘Amrawi. Beirut: Dar al-Fikr.

Ibn ‘Asim, Muhammad b. Muhammad al-Maliki al-Gharnati (d. 829/1426). 1958. Al-‘Asimiyya ou Tuhfat al-Hukkam fi’l-‘Uqud wa’l-Ahkam. Ed. L. Bercher. Alger: La Typo-Litho.

Ibn al-Athir, Diya’ al-Din (d. 637/1239). 1939. al-Mathal al-Sa’ir fi Adab al-Katib wa’l-Sha’ir, vols. 1–2. Ed. M. M. ‘Abd al-Hamid. Cairo: Matba’at Mustafa al-Babi al-Halabi.

Ibn al-Athir, ‘Izz al-Din (d. 631/1233). 1965–1967. al-Kamil fi’1-Ta’rikh, 13 vols. Beirut: Dar Sadr and Dar Beirut.

Ibn al-Banna’ (d. 471/1078). 1956. Ta’rikh. Ed. and trans. G. Makdisi as Autograph Diary of an Eleventh-Century Historian of Baghdad. Reprinted from the Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, parts 1–3, 18: 9–31, 239–60.

Ibn Fudi, ‘Abdallah (d. 1245/1829). 1963. Tazyin al-Waraqat. Ed. and trans. M. Hiskett. Ibadan: Ibadan University Press.

Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani, Ahmad b. ‘Ali (d. 852/1449). 1984. Tahdhib al-Tahdhib. Beirut: Dar al-Fikr.

Ibn Hibban, Muhammad (d. 354/965). 1976. Kitab al-Majruhin. Aleppo.

Ibn Ishaq, Hanbal (d. 273/886). 1977. Dhikr Mihnat al-Imam Ahmad b. Hanbal. Cairo: Dar Nashr al-Thaqafa.

Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 597/1200). 1940. al-Muntazam fi Ta’rikh al-Muluk wa’l-Umam, 6 vols.

[@@@Vols. 5–10]. Hyderabad, Deccan: Dairatu’l-Maarifi’l-Osmania.

Ibn Jubayr (d. 614/1217). 1907. Rihla. Ed. W. Wright and M. J. De Goeje. Leiden: Brill.

Ibn Kathir (d. 774/1373). 1932. Al-Bidaya wa’l-Nihaya fi’l-Ta’rikh, vols.12–13. Cairo: Dar al-Sa’ada.

———. 1966. al-Bidaya wa’l-Nihaya, 14 vols. Beirut: Dar Sadr and Dar Beirut.

Ibn Khaldun, ‘Abd al-Rahman b. Muhammad (d. 808/1406). 1958. The Muqaddimah, 3 vols.. Trans. F. Rosenthal. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

Ibn Khallikan (d. 681/1282). 1970. Wafayat al-A’yan wa-Anba’ Abna’ al-Zaman, 7 vols. Beirut: Dar al-Thaqafa.

‘— 1972. Wafayat al-A’yan wa-Anba’ Abna’ al-Zaman. 8 vols. Ed. I. ‘Abbas. Beirut: Dar al-Thaqafa.

Ibn al-Nadim, Muhammad b. Abi Ya’qub (d. end of fourth century/tenth century). 1970. Kitab al-Fihrist, vol. 1. Trans. B. Dodge. New York: Columbia University Press.

Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392-93). 1952–1953. Dhayl ‘ala Tabaqat al-Hanabila, 2 vols. Ed. M. H. al-Fiqi. Cairo: Matba’at al-Sunna al-Muhammadiyya.

Ibn Shaddad, ‘Izz al-Din (d. 684/1285). 1953. al-A’laq al-Khatira fi Dhikr Umara’ Al-Sham wa’l-Jazira. Ed. D. Sourdel. Damascus: Institut Franjais de Damas.

— ——. 1956. al-A’laq al-Khatira fi Dhikr Umara’ al-Sham wa’l-Jazira: Ta’rikh Madinat Dimashq. Ed. S. al-Dahhan. Damascus: Institut Franjais de Damas.

— ——. 1991. al-A’laq al-Khatira fi Dhikr Umara’ al-Sham wa’l-Jazira, vol. 1. Ed. Y. Z. al-‘Abara. Damascus: Manshurat Wizarat al-Thaqafa.

Ibn Tulun (d. 953/1546). 1949. al-Qala’id al-Jawhariyya fi Ta’rikh al-Salihiyya. Ed. M. A. Duhman. Damascus: Maktabat al-Dirasat al-Islamiyya.

Ibn Wasil, Jamal al-Din (d. 697/1298). 1970–1977. Mufarrij al-Kurub fi Akhbar Bani Ayyub, vol. 3. Ed. Shayyal, S. ‘Ashur, and H. Rabi’. Cairo: Dar al-Qalam, vols. 4–5. Cairo: Dar al-Kutub.

‘Illaysh, Muhammad b. Ahmad (d. 1299/1881-1882). n.d. Fath al-‘Ali al-Malik fi’l-Fatwa ‘ala Madhhab al-Imam Malik, 2 vols. Cairo: Dar al-Fikr.

Imber, C. 1992. “Suleyman as Caliph of the Muslims.” In Soliman le Magnifique et son temps, ed. G. Veinstein. Paris: Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales, 179–84.

Inalcik, H. 1973. The Ottoman Empire: The Classical Age 1300–1600. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

— ——. 1980–1981. “Osmanli Idare Sosyal ve Ekonomic Tarihiyle Ilgili Belgeler: Bursa Kadi Sicillerinden Sejmeler.” Belgeler 10: 1–91.

———. EI² “Kanun—(III) Financial and Public Administration.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

———. 1993. “Decision Making in the Ottoman State.” In Decision Making and Change in the Ottoman Empire, ed. C. Farah. Kirksville, MO.: Thomas Jefferson University Press, 9–18.

al-Jabarti, ‘Abd al-Rahman b. Hasan (d. 1240/1825). 1879–1880. ‘Aja’ib al-‘Athar fi’l-Tarajim wa’l-Akhbar. Cairo, Bulaq.

al-Jahiz, Abu ‘Uthman ‘Amr b. Bahr (d. 255/869). 1979. Rasa’il al-Jahiz, vols. 1 and 3. Cairo.

Jawad, M. 1954. “al-Rubut al-Baghdadiyya.” Sumer 10: 218–49.

Jennings, R. C. 1986. “The Society and Economy of Manuka in the Ottoman Judicial Registers of Trabzon, 1560–1640.” In Continuity and Change in Late Byzantine and Early Ottoman Society, ed. A. Bryer and H. Lowry. Birmingham and Washington: The University of Birmingham, Centre for Byzantine Studies; and Dumbarton Oaks, 129–54.

———. 1990. “Pious Foundations in the Society and Economy of Ottoman Trabzon, 1565–1640.” Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 38: 271–336.

Johansen, B. 1979. “Eigentum, Familie, und Obrigkeit im hanafitischen Strafrecht.” The World of Islam 19: 1–71.

———. 1981. “Sacred and Religious Element in Hanafite Law: Function and Limits of the Absolute Character of Government Authority.” In Islam et politique au Maghreb, ed. J.-Cl. Vatin and E. Gellner. Paris: Editions du CNRS, 281–302.

———. 1993a. “Coutumes locales et coutumes universelles aux sources de regles juridiques en droit musulman hanafite.” Annales Islamologiques 27: 29–35.

———. 1993b. “Legal Literature and the Problem of Change: The Case of the Land Rent.” In Islam and Public Law, ed. C. Mallat. London: Graham and Trotman, 29–47.

Jokisch, B. 1999. “Socio-Political Factors of Qada’ in Eighth/Fourteenth Century Syria.” Al-Qantara 20: 503–30.

Jones, W. R. 1980. “Pious Endowments in Medieval Christianity and Islam.” Diogenes 109: 23–36.

Juynboll, G. H. A. 1983. Muslim Tradition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Karamustafa, A. T. 1993. “The Antinomian Dervish as Model Saint.” In Modes de transmission de la culture religieuse en Islam, ed. H. Elboudrari. Cairo: Institut Franais d’Archeologie Orientale du Caire, 241–66.

———. 1994. God’s Unruly Friends: Dervish Groups in the Islamic Later Middle Period, 1200–1550. Salt Lake City: Utah University Press.

Karrar, A. S. 1992. The Sufi Brotherhoods in the Sudan. Evanston: Northwestern University Press.

al-Kasani, Abu Bakr b. Mas’ud (d.585/1189). 1910. Kitab Bada’i’ al-Sana’i’ fi Tartib Al-Shara’i’, vol. 4. Cairo: Matba’at al-Jamaliyya.

al-Khatib al-Baghdadi, Ahmad b. ‘Ali (d. 463/1072). 1966. Ta’rikh Baghdad. Beirut.

Kindi (d. 350/961). 1912. Kitab al-Wulat wa-Kitab al-Qudat. The Governors and Judges of Egypt. Ed. R. Guest. Leyden and London: Brill.

Kister, M. 1971. “Rajab is the Month of God.” Israel Oriental Studies 1: 191–223.

Kraemer, J. L. 1982. “Heresy Versus the State in Medieval Islam.” In Studies in Judaica, Karaitica, and Islamica, ed. S. R. Brunswick. Ramat Gan: Bar Ilan University Press, 167–80.

Kressel, G. M. 1992. Descent through Males. Mediterranean Language and Culture Monograph Series, 8. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz.

Lambton, A. K. S. 1968. “The Internal Structure of the Seljuk Empire.” In The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 5, ed. J. A. Boyle. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 203–83.

———. 1981. State and Government in Medieval Islam. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

———. EI² “Khalifa—(II) In Political Theory.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

———. 1988. Continuity and Change in Medieval Persia: Aspects of Administrative, Economic, and Social History, 11th-14th Century. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Landau-Tasseron, E. 1989. “The ‘Cyclical Reform’: A Study of the Mujaddid Tradition.” Studia Islamica 70: 79–118.

Laoust, H. 1939. Essai sur les doctrines sociales et politiques de Taki al-Din Ahmad b. Taimiya. Cairo: Institut Franais d’Arc^ologie Orientale.

———. 1959. “Le hanbalisme sous le Califat de Baghdad, 241-656/855-1258.” Revue des Etudes Islamiques 27: 67–128.

— ——. 1965. Les schismes dans l’Islam: introduction d une etude de la religion musulmane. Paris: Payot.

— . 1973. “Les Agitations Religieuses a Baghdad aux IVe et Ve socles de lHgire.” In Islamic Civilizatioon, 950–1150, ed. D. S. Richards. Oxford: Cassirer, 169–85.

— apidus, I. M. 1967. Muslim Cities in the Later Middle Ages. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

— ——. 1969. “Muslim Cities and Islamic Societies.” In Middle Eastern Cities: Symposium on Ancient, Medieval, and Modern Middle Eastern Urbanism, ed. I. M. Lapidus. Berkeley: University of California Press, 47–79.

— ——. 1975. “The Separation of State and Religion in the Development of Early Islamic Society.” International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 6: 363–85.

— ——. 1982. “The Arab Conquest and the Formation of Islamic Societies.” In Studies on the First Century of Islamic Society, ed. G. Juynboll. Carbondale, Ill.: Southern Illinois University Press, 49–72.

———. 1988. A History of Islamic Societies, 1st ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1996. “State and Religion in Islamic Societies.” Past and Present 151: 3–27.

Layish, A. 1974. “Shari’a u-Minhag ba-Mishpaha ha-Muslimit bi-Yisra’el.” Hamizrah Hehadash 23: 377–409.

———. 1975. Women and Islamic Law in a Non-Muslim State. Jerusalem: Israeli Universities Press; New York: Wiley.

———. 1980–1982. “Challenges to Customary Law and Arbitration: The Impact of Islamic Law upon Settled Bedouin in the Judaean Desert.” Tel Aviv University Studies in Law 5: 206–21.

— ——. 1984a. “The Islamization of the Bedouin Family in the Judaean Desert, as Reflected in the Sijill of the Shari’a Court.” In The Changing Bedouin, ed. E. Marx and A. Shmueli. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books, 39–58.

— ——. 1984b. “‘Ulama’ and Politics in Saudi Arabia.” In Islam and Politics in the Mod.ern Middle East, ed. M. Heper and R. Israeli. London: Croom Helm, 29–63.

— ——. 1987. “Legal Reform in Saudi Arabia as a Mechanism to Moderate Wahhabi Doctrine.” Journal of the Amerian Oriental Society 107: 279–92.

— ——. 1989. “Islamic Law in the Contemporary Middle East.” Occasional Papers 3, Centre of Near and Middle Eastern Studies, University of London. London: School of Oriental and African Studies.

— ——. 1991. Divorce in the Libyan Family. New York: New York University Press; Jerusalem: Magnes Press.

— — 1995a. “Dar ‘Adl—Symbiosis of Custom and Shari’a in Tribal Society in Process of Sedentarization.” Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 19: 198–213.

. 1995b. “Shari’a and Custom in Libya: Was Tajdida Married to Two Husbands?” Archiv Orientdlm 63: 488–503.

———. 1996. “The Fatwa as an Instrument of Accommodation.” In Islamic Legal Interpretation. Muftis and Their Fatwas, ed. M. K. Masud, B. Messick, and D. S. Powers. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 270–77.

———. 1998. Legal Documents on Libyan Tribal Society in Process of Sedentarization. Pt. 1: The Documents in Arabic. Mediterranean Language and Culture Monograph Series 14. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz.

———. EI²a “Mahkama.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

———. EI²b “Mirath.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

———. EI²c “Talak.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Layish, A., and J. Davis. 1988. Libyan Society: A Selection of Documents from the Sijills of the Shari’a Courts of Ajdabiya and Kufra. Jerusalem: Academon.

Layish, A., and R. Shaham. EI²a “Nikah.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

———. EI²b “Tashri’.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Layish, A., and A. Shmueli. 1979. “Custom and Shari’a in the Bedouin Family according to Legal Documents from the Judaean Desert.” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 42: 2945.

Lazarus-Yafeh, H. 1981. “Muslim Festivals.” In idem. Some Religious Aspects of Islam. Leiden: Brill, 38–47.

———. 1986. “Tajdid al-Din: A Reconsideration of Its Meaning, Roots and Influence in Islam,” The New East 31: 1–10.

Leder, S. 1997. “Charismatic Scripturalism. The Hanbali Maqdisis of Damascus.” Der Islam 74: 279–303.

Leiser, G. 1986. “Note on the Madrasa in Medieval Islamic Society.” The Muslim World 56: 16–23.

Levtzion, N. 1979a. “Toward a Comparative Study of Islamization.” In Conversion to Islam, ed. N. Levtzion. New York and London: Holmes and Meier, 1–23.

———. 1979b. “The ‘Ulama’ as Officials and as Popular Leaders.” Paper submitted to the conference on Hierarchy and Stratification in the Middle East, under the auspices of the Joint Committee on Near and Middle East Social Science Research Council, and the American Council of Learned Societies, Mt. Kisco, New York, 9–12 May 1979.

‘— 1981. “Shari’a u-Minhag be-Tahalikhei Hit’aslemut ve-Hitnahalut.” Cathedra 20: 78–80.

———. 1986. “Eighteenth-Century Renewal and Reform Movements in Islam.” The New East 31: 48–70.

———. 1987. “The Eighteenth Century: Background to the Islamic Revolutions in West Africa.” In Eighteenth-Century Renewal and Reform Movements in Islam, ed. N. Levtzion and J. O. Voll. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 21–38.

———. 1997. “Eighteenth-Century Sufi Brotherhoods: Structural, Organizational and Ritual Changes.” In Islam: Essays on Scripture, Thought, and Society, A Festschrift in Honour of Anthony H. Johns, ed. P. R. Riddel and T Street. Leiden: Brill, 147–60.

Levtzion, N., and J. O. Voll eds. 1987. Eighteenth-Century Renewal and Reform Movements in Islam. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Levtzion, N., and G. Weigert. 1995. “Religious Reform in Eighteenth-Century Morocco.” Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 19: 173–97.

Lewis, B. 1973. Islam in History. London: Alcove Press.

———. 1993. “The Significance of Heresy in Islam.” In idem, Islam in History, new ed., rev. and expanded. Chicago: Open Court, 275–94.

Lewis, I. M. 1984. “Sufism in Somaliland: A Study in Tribal Islam.” In Islam in Tribal Societies, ed. S. A. Akbar and D. M. Hart. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 127–68.

Libson, G. 1997. “On the Development of Custom as a Source of Law in Islamic Law.” Islamic Law and Society 4: 131–55.

Lindholm, Ch. 1996. “Despotism and Democracy: State and Society in the Premodern Middle East.” In The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, ed. J. A. Hall and I. Jarvie. Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 329–55.

Madelung, W. F. 1974. “The Origins of the Controversy Concerning the Creation of the Koran.” In Orientalia Hispanica sive studia F.M. Pareja Octogenario Dicata, vol. I/1, ed. J. M. Barral. Leiden: Brill.

— ——. 1985. Religious Schools and Sects in Medieval Islam. London: Variorum Reprints. Makdisi, G. 1959. “The Topography of Eleventh-Century Baghdad.” Arabica 6: 178–97.

— ——. 1961. “Muslim Institutions of Learning in 11th Century Baghdad.” Bulletin of Oriental and African Studies 24: 1–56.

— ——. 1963. Ibn ‘Aqil et la resurgence de l’Islam traditionaliste au XIe siecle. Damascus: Institut Franais de Damas.

— ——. 1971. “Law and Traditionalism in the Institutions of Learning of Medieval Islam.” In Theology and Law in Islam, ed. G. E. von Grunebaum. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 75–88.

— ——. 1973. “The Sunni Revival.” In Islamic Civilization 950–1150, ed. D. S. Richards. Oxford: Cassirer, 155–68.

— ——. 1975. Review of R. Bulliet, The Patricians of Nishapur, Journal of American Oriental Society 95: 491–95.

— ——. 1981a. The Rise of Colleges: Institutions of Learning in Islam and the West. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

— ——. 1981b. “Hanbalite Islam.” In Studies on Islam, ed. M. L. Swartz. New York: Oxford University Press, 216–74.

———. 1990. The Rise of Humanism in Classical Islam and the Christian World. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Malik, Abu ‘Abd Allah b. Anas (d. 179/796). 1989. al-Muwatta of Imam Malik Ibn Anas. Trans. Aisha Abdurrahman Bewley. London: Kegal Paul International.

Mandaville, J. E. 1979. “Usurious Piety: The Cash Waqf Controversy in the Ottoman Empire.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 10: 289–308.

Marcus, A. 1979. “Piety and Profit: The Waqf in the Society and Economy of Eighteenth-Century Aleppo.” Paper presented at the International Seminar on Social and Economic Aspects of the Muslim Waqf, Jerusalem, 24–28 June 1979.

———. 1989. The Middle East on the Eve of Modernity: Aleppo in the Eighteenth Century. New York: Columbia University Press.

Mardin, S. 1988. “The Ottoman ‘Tacit’ Contract.” In State, Democracy, and the Military in Turkey in the 1980s, ed. M. Heper and A. Evin. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter.

———. 1995. “Civil Society and Islam.” In Civil Society, Theory, History, Comparison, ed. J. A. Hall. Cambridge: Polity Press, 278--00.

Mardsen, R. 1999. “Community, Civil Society, and Social Ecology.” In Civic Engagement in the Atlantic Community, ed. J. Janning, C. Kupchan, and D. Rumberg. Gtitersloh: Bertelsmann Foundation Publishers, 97–114.

Marshal, G. 1994. Oxford Dictionary of Sociology. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Martin, B. G. 1969. “Notes sur l’origine de la tariqa des Tijaniyya et sur ler debuts d’Al-hajj ‘Umar.” Revue des Etudes Islamiques 37: 267–90.

Masud, M. K., B. Messick, and D. S. Powers, eds. 1996a. Islamic Legal Interpretation. Muftis and Their Fatwas. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

———. 1996b “Muftis, Fatwas, and Islamic Legal Interpretation.” In Islamic Legal Interpretation. Muftis and Their Fatwas, ed. M. K. Masud, B. Messick, and D. S. Powers. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 3–32.

Matsui, T. 1968. “On the Nineteenth-Century Indian Economic History: A Review of a ‘Reinterpretation’.” The Indian Economic and Social History Review 5, no. 1: 17–33.

Mayer, A. E. 1987. “Law and Religion in the Muslim Middle East.” The American Journal of Comparative Law 35: 127–84.

Melchert, C. 1992. “Sectaries in the Six Books: Evidence for their Exclusion from the Sunni Community.” The Muslim World 82: 287–95.

Meron, Y. 1971. Eobligation alimentaire entre epoux en droit musulman hanefite. Paris: R. Pichon et R. Durand-Auzias.

Milliot, L. 1953. Introduction d l’etude du droit musulman. Paris: Recueil Sirey.

Mir-Hosseini, Z. 1999. Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate in Contemporary Iran. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Mohsen, S. K. 1975. Conflict and Law among Awlad ‘Ali of the Western Desert. Cairo: National Center for Social and Criminological Research.

Moore, B. 1966. The Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy. Boston: Beacon Press.

———. 1978. Injustice: The Social Bases of Obedience and Revolt. New York: Sharpe.

Morray, D. 1994. An Ayyubid Notable and his World. Ibn al-‘Adim and Aleppo as Portrayed in his Biographical Dictionary of People Connected with the City. Leiden: Brill.

Morris, M. D. 1968. “Towards a Reinterpretation of Nineteenth-Century Indian Economic History.” The Indian Economic and Social History Review 5: 1–15.

Morsy, M. 1984. “Arbitration as a Political Institution: An Interpretation of the Status of Monarchy in Morocco.” In Islam in Tribal Societies, ed. S. A. Akbar and D. M. Hart. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 39–65.

Mottahede, R. P. 1973. “Administration in Buyid Qazwin.” In Islamic Civilization, 9501150, ed. D. S. Richards. Oxford: Cassirer, 33–45.

———. 1980. Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Mouton, J.-M. 1994. Damas et sa principaute sous les Saljoukides et les Bourides 468549/1076-1154. Cairo: Institut Franais d’Archologie Orientale.

Munson, H. Jr. 1988. Islam and Revolution in the Middle East. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Natur, A. 1991. “Shari’a u-Minhag ba-Mishpaha ha-Bedevit ba-Negev ‘al pi ha-Pesiqa shel Beit ha-Din ha-Shar’i bi-Be’ersheva.” Hamizrah Hehadash 33: 94–111.

Nawas, J. A. 1994. “A Reexamination of Three Current Explanations for al-Ma’mun’s Introduction of the Mihna.” International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 26: 615–29.

al-Nawawi (d. 676/1277). 1999. Fatawa al-Imam al-Nawawi. Ed. M. al-Arna’ut. Damascus: Dar al-Fikr.

Norris, H. T. 1993. Islam in the Balkans: Religion and Society between Europe and the Arab World. Columbia: University of South Carolina.

Norton, A. R., ed. 1995. Civil Society in the Middle East. Leiden: Brill.

Ocak, A. Y. 1993. “Kalenderi Dervishes and Ottoman Administration from the Fourteenth to the Sixteenth Centuries.” In Manifestations of Sainthood in Islam, ed. G. M. Smith and C. E. Ernst. Istanbul: Isis Press, 239–55.

Olson, R. W. 1974. “The Esnaf and the Patrona Halil Rebellion of 1730: A Realignment in Ottoman Politics?” Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 17: 329–44.

O’Neill, J. 1986. “The Disciplinary Society from Weber to Foucault.” British Journal of Sociology 37, no. 1: 42–60.

Ongan, H. 1974. Ankaranin Iki Numarali Seriye Sicili. Ankara: Ttirk Tarih Kurumu.

Oweidi [al-‘Abbadi], A. S. S. 1982. “Bedouin Justice in Jordan.” Ph.D. dissertaion, Cambridge University.

Patton, W. 1897. Ahmed Ibn Hanbal and the Mihna. Leiden: Brill.

Paul, J. 1991. “Forming a Faction: The himaya system of Khwaja Ahrar.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 23: 533–48.

Pavlin, J. 1996. “Sunni kalam and the Theological Controversies.” In The History of Islamic Philosophy, ed. S. H. Nasr and O. Leaman. London: Routledge.

Pedersen, J. 1948. “The Islamic Preacher: wa’iz, mudhakkir, qass.” In Ignaz Goldzher Memorial Volume, ed. S. Lowinger and J. Smogyi. Budapest: Globus vol. 1, 226–55.

———. 1953. “The Criticism of the Islamic Preacher.” Die Welt des Islams n.s. 2: 215–31.

Peri, O. 1983. “The Ottoman State and the Waqf Institution in Late Eighteenth-Century Jerusalem.” M.A. Thesis, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem (in Hebrew).

Peters, E. L. 1980. “Aspects of the Bedouin Bridewealth among Camel Herders in Cyrenaica.” In The Meaning of Marriage Payments, ed. J. L. Comaroff. London: Academic Press, 125–60.

Peters, R. 1996. “Islamic Criminal Law: A Survey for the Course ‘Introduction to Islamic Law’.” Amsterdam: University of Amsterdam, Department of Arabic Studies.

Pines, S. 1996. “An Early Meaning of the Term Mutakallim.” In Studies in the History of Arabic Philosophy, ed. S. Stroumsa. Jerusalem: The Magnes Press.

Pipes, D. 1981. Slave Soldiers and Islam. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Pollock, S. 1993. “Deep Orientalism? Notes on Sanskrit and Power beyond the Raj.” In Orientalism and the Postcolonial Predicament, ed. C. A. Breckenridge and P. Van der Veer. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 76–133.

———. 1998a. “The Cosmopolitan Vernacular.” Journal of Asian Studies 57: 6–37.

———. 1998b. “India in the Vernacular Millennium: Literary Culture and Polity, 1000–1500.” Daedalus 127: 41–75.

Pouzet, L. 1986. Damas au VII^e/XIII^e siecle—Vie et structures religieuses dune metropole islamique. Beirut: Dar al-Machreq.

Powers, D. S. 1990. “Fatwas as Sources for Legal and Social History: A Dispute over Endowment Revenues from Fourteenth-Century Fez.” Al-Qantara 11: 295–341.

———. 1994. “Kadijustiz or Qadi-Justice? A Paternity Dispute from Fourteenth-Century Morocco.” Islamic Law and Society 1: 332–66.

Pruett, G. E. 1984. “Islam and Orientalism.” In Orientalism, Islam, and Islamists, ed. A.

Hussain, R. Olson, and J. Qureshi. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 43–87. al-Qusus, ‘A. 1972. al-Qada’ al-Badawi, 2nd ed. Amman: al-Matba’a al-Urduniyya. Rafeq, A. 1994. “The Syrian ‘Ulama’, Ottoman Law and Islamic Shar’ia.” Turcica 26: 9–29.

Rahman, F. 1979. Islam, 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

al-Ramli , Khayr al-Din (d. 1081/1670). 1893–94. Al-Fatawa al-Khayriyya li-Naf al-

Bariyya, 2 vols. Istanbul: Matbaa-i Uthmaniyye.

Raymond, A. 1973–1974. Artisans et commergants au Caire au XVIII^e siecle, 2 vols. Damascus: Institut Franais de Damas.

RCEA. 1931–1943. Repertoire Chronologique d’Epigraphie Arabe, 17 vols. Ed. E. Combe, J. Sauvaget, and G. Wiet. Cairo: Institut Franais d’Archeologie Orientale.

Roded, R. 1989. “Quantitative Analysis of Waqf Endowment Deeds.” Osmanli Arastirmalari 9: 51–76.

Rodinson, M. 1971. Mohammed. New York: Pantheon Books.

Rosen, L. 1989. The Anthropology ofJustice. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1995. “Law and Custom in the Popular Legal Culture of North Africa.” Islamic Law and Society 2: 194–208.

Rosenthal, E. I. J. 1958. Political Thought in Medieval Islam. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Rosenthal, F. 1968. A History ofMuslim Historiography, 2nd ed. Leiden: Brill.

Roy, A. 1984. The Islamic Syncretistic Tradition in Bengal. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Rudolph, S., and L. Rudolph. 1987. In Pursuit ofLakshmi: The Political Economy of the Indian State. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Saadeh, S. 1977. “The Development of the Position of the Chief Judge during the Buyid and Seljuk Periods.” Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University.

Sadowski, Y. 1997. “The New Orientalism and the Democracy Debate.” In Political Islam, ed. J. Beinin and J. Stork. Berkeley: University of California Press, 33–50.

Said, E. 1978. Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books.

Sauvaget, J. 1941. Alep: essai sur le developpement d’une grande ville syrienne des origines au milieu du XIX^e siecle. Paris: P. Geuthner.

al-Sawi, Ahmad (d. 1241/1825-1826). 1806. Bulghat al-Salik li-Aqrab al-Masalik, 2 vols.

[Cairo]: al-Maktaba al-Tijariyya al-Kubra.

Schacht, J. 1953. “Early Doctrines on Waqf.” In Melanges Fuad Koprulu. Istanbul: Osman

Yaln Matbaasi, 443–52.

———. 1964. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

———. 1974. “Law and the State.” In The Legacy of Islam, ed. J. Schacht and E. C.

Bosworth. 2nd edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 392443.

Schimmel, A. 1973. Islamic Literatures ofIndia. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz.

———. 1975. Classical Urdu Literature from the Beginning to Iqbal. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz.

———. 1976. Pain and Grace: A Study of Two Mystical Writers in Eighteenth-Century Muslim India. Leiden: Brill.

Schluchter, W. 1987. “Einleitung: Zwischen Welteroberung und Weltanpassung. Oberlegungen zu Max Webers Sicht des fhen Islams.” In Max Webers Sicht des Islams. Interpretation und Kritik, ed. W. Schluchter. Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 11–124.

———. 1989. “Towards a Comparative Sociology of Religion.” In idem, Rationalism, Religion, and Domination: A Weberian Perspective, Part II. Trans. N. Solomon. Berkeley: University of California Press, 83–279.

Schwarz, K., and H. Kurio. 1983. Die Stiftungen des osmanischen Grosswesirs Koga Sinan Pascha (gest. 1596) in Uzungaova/Bulgarien. Berlin: Klaus Schwarz Verlag.

Serrano [Ruano], D. S. 1996. “La prtica legal (‘amal) en al-Andalus a trav^s de los Madhahib al-Hukkam fi Nawazil al-Ahkam de Muhammad Ibn ‘Iyad.” Qurtuba 1: 171–92.

Shackle, C. 1993. “Early Vernacular Poetry in the Indus Valley: its Contexts and its Character.” In Islam and Indian Religions, ed. A. L. Dallapicola and S. Zingel-Ave Lallemant. Stuttgart: Steiner, 259–89.

Shaham, R. 1993. “A Woman’s Place: A Confrontation with Bedouin Custom in the Shari’a Court.” Journal of the American Oriental Society 111: 192–97.

———. 1997. Family and the Court in Modern Egypt. Leiden: Brill.

Shahar, I. 1997. “Trilemma be-Diyunei Beit ha-Din ‘al-Mahkama al-Shar’iyya’ bi-Be’ersheva ki-Nequdat Mifgash shel Shalosh Ma’arachot Hoq: Huqei ha-Medina, ha-Hoq ha-Shar’i veha-‘Urf ha-Bedevi.” Jama’a 1: 11–35.

Shahid, I. 1970. “Pre-Islamic Arabia.” In Cambridge History of Islam, vol. 1, ed. P. Holt, A. Lambton, and B. Lewis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 3–29.

Shalabi, M. M. 1973. Ahkam al-Usra fi’l-Islam. Dirasa Muqarana bayna Fiqh al-Madhahib al-Sunniyya wa’l-Madhhab al-Ja’fari. Beirut: Dar al-Nahda al-‘Arabiyya.

Sharon, M. 1983. Black Banners from the East. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.

al-Shaybani (al-Khassaf), Abu Bakr Ahmad b.‘Amr (d. 261/875). 1904. Kitab Ahkam al-Waqf. Cairo: Bulaq.

Sibt b. al-Jawzi (d. 654/1256). 1951, 1951–1952. Mir’at al-Zaman fi Ta’rikh al-A’yan.

Printed edition of the Jewett text. Part. 8, vol. 1 [Events in the years A.H. 495589] (1951), vol. 8 (1951–1952). Hyderabad, Deccan: Dairatu’l-Maarifi’l-Osmania.

———. 1968. Mir’at al-Zaman fi Ta’rikh al-A’yan. Partial edition by A. Sevin. Ankara: Trk Tarih Kurumu. (Events connected with the Seljuks, A.H 448–480).

Siegman, H. 1964. “The State and the Individual in Sunni Islam.” The Muslim World 54: 14–26.

Sivan, E. 1968. L’Islam et la croisade: idealogie et propagande dans les reactions musulmanes aux croisades. Paris: Librairie d’Amȯrique et d’Orient.

———. 1985. Interpretations of Islam Past and Present. Princeton: The Darwin Press.

———. 1995. “In God’s Cause.” In The Limits of Pluralism: Neo-Absolutisms and Relativism. Amsterdam: Praemium Erasmianum Foundation, 9–27.

Skocpol, T. 1973. “A Critical Review of Barrington Moore’s Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy.” Politics and Society 1: 1–34.

Smith, W. C. 1963. Islam in Modern History. New York: New American Library.

Somers, M. R. 1995. “What’s Political or Cultural About Political Culture and the Public Sphere? Towards an Historical Sociology of Concept Formation.” Sociological Theory 13: 113–44.

Sourdel, D. 1953. “Ruhin. Lieu de pelerinage musulman de la Syrie du nord au XIIIe siecle.” Syria 30: 89–107 ———. 1972. “Deux documents relatifs a la communaute hanbalite du Damas.” Bulletin d’Etudes Orientales 25: 141--5.

Springborg, P. 1987. “The Contractual State: Reflections on Orientalism and Despotism.” History of Political Thought 8: 395–433.

———. 1992. Western Republicanism and the Oriental Prince. Cambridge: Polity Press.

Stauth, G. 1993. Islam und westlicher Rationalismus: Der Beitrag des Orientalismus zur Entstehung der Soziologie. Frankfurt: Campus Verlag.

Stewart, F. H. 1987. “A Bedouin Narrative from Central Sinai.” Zeitschrift fur arabische Linguistik 16: 44–92.

———. 1988. Texts in Sinai Bedouin Law. Pt. 1: The Texts in English Translation. Mediterranean Language and Culture Monograph Series 5. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz.

———. 1990. Texts in Sinai Bedouin Law. Pt. 2: The Texts in Arabic. Mediterranean Language and Culture Monograph Series 5. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz.

al-Subki, Taj al-Din (d. 771/1370). 1966–1967. Tabaqat al-Shafi’iyya al-Kubra, 6 vols. Cairo: Dar al-Kutub al-Khidiwiyya.

‘. 1970–1971. Tabaqat al-Shafi’iyya al-Kubra, vols. 7–8. Ed. ‘A. M. al-Julu and M. M. al-Tanahi. Cairo: Matba’at Mustafa al-Babi al-Halabi.

al-Sulami, ‘Izz al-Din (d. 660/1262). 1996. Fatawa. Ed. M. J. Kurdi. Beirut: Mu’asasat al-Risala.

al-Suri, Salah al-Din Hasan. 1984. “Libya wa’l-Ghazw wa’l-Thaqafa al-Itali.” In Buhuth wa-Dirasat fi’l-Ta’rikh al-Libi 1911–1943, ed. al-Suri and H. Wada’a al-Husnawi. vol. 2. Tripoli: n. p., 393–431.

Swartz, M. L. 1982. “The Rules of Popular Preaching in Twelfth-Century Baghdad according to Ibn al-Jawzi.” In Predication et propagande au Mayen Age. Islam, Byzance, Occident, ed. G. Makdisi et al. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.

al-Tabari, Muhammad b. Jarir (d. 310/923). 1987. The History of al-Tabari, vol. 32. Trans. C. E. Bosworth. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Talmon-Heller, D. 1994. “The Shaykh and the Community: Popular Hanbalite Islam in12th-13th Century Jabal Nablus and Jabal Qasyun.” Studia Islamica 79: 103–20.

———. 1999. “Society and Religion in Syria from the Reign of Nur al-Din to the Mamluk Occupation (1154–1260).” Ph.D. dissertation, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem (in Hebrew).

———. 2001. “Preachers and Prayer Leaders in Ayyubid Syria.” Israel Oriental Studies (forthcoming).

Taylor, C. 1990. “Modes of Civil Society.” Public Culture 3: 95–132.

Taylor, C. S. 1998. In the Vicinity of the Righteous: Ziyara and the Veneration of Saints in Late Medieval Egypt. Leiden: Brill.

Tedlock, D. 1992. “On Hieroglyphic Literacy in Ancient Mayaland: An Alternative Interpretation.” Current Anthropology 33: 216–17.

Thompson, P. E. 1971. “The Moral Economy of the English Crowd in the Eighteenth Century.” Past and Present 50: 76–136.

Tibawi, A. L. 1962. “The Origins and Character of al-Madrasa.” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 25: 225–38.

Trimingham, J. S. 1971. The Sufi Orders in Islam. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Turner, B. 1974. Weber and Islam. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

———. 1984. “Orientalism and the Problem of Civil Society in Islam.” In Orientalism, Islam, and Islamists, ed. A. Hussain, R. Olson, and J. Qureshi. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 23–42.

Tyan, E. 1960. Histoire de l’organisation judiciaire en pays d’Islam. Leiden: Brill.

———. EI² “Kadi.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Van der Sprenkel, B. O. 1958. The Chinese Civil Service: The Nineteenth Century. Canberra: Australian National University.

Van Ess, J. 1992. Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3. Jahrhundert Hidschra, vol. 3. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter.

Van Krieken, R. 1990. “The Organization of the Soul: Elias and Foucault on Discipline and the Self.” Archives Europeennes de Sociologie 31: 353–71.

Vatikiotis, P .J. 1987. Islam and the State. London: Croom Helm.

Veinstein, G. 1992. “La voix du matre a travers les firmans de Soliman le Magnifique.” In Soliman le Magnifique et son Temps, ed. G. Veinstein. Paris: Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales, 127–44.

Venske, M. L. 1986. “Special Use of the Tithe as a Revenue-Raising Measure in the Sixteenth Century Sanjaq of Aleppo.” Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 24: 239–323.

Veyne, P. 1990. Bread and Circuses: Historical Sociology and Political Pluralism, abridged, with an introduction by O. Murray. Trans. B. Pearce. London: Allen Lane, Penguin.

Vidal-Naquet, P. 1996. La democratie grecque vue d’ailleurs. Paris: Flammarion.

Vik0r, K. S. 1994. “The Concept of Ijtihad in a Nineteenth Century Debate: Muhammad b. ‘Ali al-Sanusi’s Iqaz al-Wasnan.” Paper submitted to EURAMES Inaugural Conference, Warwick, 8–11 July 1994.

‘— 1995. Sufi and Scholar on the Desert Edge: Muhammad b. ‘Ali al-Sanusi and His Brotherhood. London: Hurst.

Vogel, F. E. 1999. Islamic Law in the Modern World: The Legal System of Saudi Arabia. Leiden: Brill.

Voll, J. 1991. “Fundamentalism in the Sunni Arab World: Egypt and the Sudan.” In Fundamentalism Observed, ed. M. Marty and R. S. Appleby. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 345–403.

Wakeman F. Jr. 1998. “Boundaries of the Public Sphere in Ming and Qing China.” Daedalus 127: 167–90.

Waterbury, J. 1970. The Commander of the Faithful: The Moroccan Political EliteA Study in Segmented Politics. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

Watt, M. W. 1968. Islamic Political Thought. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Weber, M. 1924. Gesammelte Aufsdtze zur Soziologie und Sozialpolitik. Tingen: Mohr.

— ——. 1951. The Religion of China: Confucianism and Taoism. Glencoe: Free Press.

— ——. 1952. Ancient Judaism. Glencoe: Free Press.

— ——. 1958. The Religion of India: The Sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism. Glencoe: Free Press.

— ——. 1964. The Theory of Social and Economic Organization. New York: The Free Press.

— ——. 1968. On Charisma and Institution Building: Selected Papers. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

— ——. 1969. On Law in Economy and Society. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Weckman, G. 1986–1987. “Community.” In The Encyclopedia of Religion, vol. 3, ed. M. Eliade. New-York: Macmillan, 566–71.

Weigert, G. 1989. “The Khalwatiyya in Egypt in the Eighteenth Century.” Ph.D. dissertation, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Wensinck, A. J. EI “Tarawih.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam.

— EI² “Sha’ban.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Wheatley, P. In press. The Places Where Men Pray Together: Cities in Islamic Lands, 7th-10th Centuries. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Wink, A. 1994. “Al-Hind: The Making of the Indo-Islamic World.” Paper presented at the International Symposium on Indian Studies, Kovalam, 28 November-2 December 1994.

Winkelhane, G., and K. Schwarz. 1985. Der osmanische Statthalter Iskender Pascha (gest. 1571) und seine Stiftungen in Agypten und am Bosporus. Bamberg: Verlag Aku GmBh.

Winter, M. 1982. Society and Religion in Early Ottoman Egypt: Studies in the Writings of ‘Abd al-Wahhab al-Sha’rani. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books.

Woodside, A. 1998. “Territorial Order and Collective Identity Tensions in Confucian Asia: China, Vietnam, Korea.” Daedalus 127: 191–220.

Al-Ya’qubi (d. 897/1491). 1892. Kitab al-Buldan, ed. M. J. de Goeje. 2nd edition. Leiden: Brill.

Yazici, T. EI² “Qalandariyya.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Yerasimos, S. 1994. “Les waqfs dans l’amenagement urbain d’Istanbul au XIXe siecle.” In Le waqf dans le monde musulman contemporain (XIX^e-XX^e siecles): functions sociales, economiques et politiques, ed. F. Bilici. Actes de la Table Ronde d’Istanbul, 13–14 novembre 1992. Istanbul-Paris: Institut Franais d’Etudes Anatoliennes d’Istanbul, 43–49.

Zaman, M. Q. 1997. Religion and Politics Under the Early ‘Abbasids. Leiden: Brill.

Zarcone, T 1993. Mystiques, philosophes, et franc-magons en Islam: Riza Tevfik, penseur ottoman (1868–1949), du soufisme d la confrere. Istanbul-Paris: Librairie d’Amerique et d’Orient.

Ze’evi, D. 1996. An Ottoman Century: The District of Jerusalem in the 1600s. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Zettersteen, K. V., and Ch. Pellat. EI² “Ahmad b. Abi Du’ad.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Ziai, H. EI² “Al-Suhrawardi, Shihab al-Din Yahya b. Habash.” In Encyclopaedia of Islam, new edition.

Zilfi, M. C. 1983. “The Ilmiye Registers and the Ottoman Medrese System Prior to the Tanzimat.” In Collection Turcica III: Contributions d l’histoire economique et sociale de l’Empire ottoman, ed. J. L. Bacque-Grammont and P. Dumont. Louvain: Peters, 309–27.

———. 1988. The Politics of Piety: The Ottoman Ulema in the Postclassical Age (16001800). Minneapolis: Bibliotheca Islamica.

</biblio>

 Contributors

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. Among his publications are Muslim Politics (coauthored with James Piscatori), The Middle East and Central Asia: An Anthropological Approach, and New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere (co-edited with Jon W. Anderson).

Shmuel N. Eisenstadt is Professor Emeritus of Sociology, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Senior Fellow, Van Leer Jerusalem Institute. His recent publications include: Japanese Civilization: A Comparative View; Paradoxes of Democracy: Fragility, Continuity and Change; Fundamentalism, Sectarianism and Revolutions.

Daphna Ephrat is Lecturer in the Department of History, Philosophy, and Judaic Studies at The Open University of Israel and teaches undergraduate courses in the Department of Middle Eastern and African History at Tel Aviv University. Her publications include: A Learned Society in a Period of Transition: the Sunni ‘Ulama’ of Eleventh-Century Baghdad and articles on related subjects. She is co-author of an introductory course on Islam taught at the Open University of Israel.

Haim Gerber is Professor of Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies at The Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His publications include:

Social Origins of the Modern Middle East and other books and articles on the legal and social history of the region.

Miriam Hoexter is Associate Professor of Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies at The Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Her publications include: Endowments, Rulers and Community: Waqf al-Haramayn in Ottoman Algiers and articles on the social history of Ottoman and Colonial Algeria, Ottoman Palestine, and the Islamic endowment institution.

Nimrod Hurvitz is Lecturer at the Department of Middle Eastern Studies, The Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. His recent publications include: “Biographies and Mild Asceticism: A Study of Islamic Moral Imagination” and “Schools of Law and Historical Context: Re-examining the Formation of the Hanbali Madhhab.”

Aharon Layish is Professor of Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies at The Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He is Executive Editor of Islamic Law and Society. His recent publications include: Divorce in the Libyan Family; Legal Documents on Libyan Tribal Society in Process of Sedentarization. Books in progress: The Reinstatement of Islamic Law in Sudan under Numayri (with Gabriel Warburg); The Mahdi’s Legal Methodology in Sudan, 1881–1885.

Nehemia Levtzion is Fuld and Bamberger Professor of History of the Muslim Peoples at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He served as Dean of Humanities at the Hebrew University and as President of the Open University of Israel. He is currently the Chair of the Council for Higher Education’s Planning and Budgeting Committee. Among his publications: Muslims and Chiefs in West Africa; Ancient Ghana and Mali; Conversion to Islam; with J. F. P. Hopkins Corpus of Early Arabic Sources for West African History; editor with J. O. Voll, Eighteenth Century Renewal and Reform in Islam; Islam in West Africa: Religion, Society and Politics to 1800; editor with Randall Pouwels, The History of Islam in Africa.

Daniella Talmon-Heller, is Lecturer at the Department of Middle Eastern Studies, The Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. She is co-author of an introductory course on Islam taught at the Open University of Israel. She is presently working on a book on Society and Religion in twelfth- and thirteenth-century Syria.

 Index

<biblio>

Abu Hanifa. See Hanafi

‘ada. See custom

ahl al-hadith, muhaddithun (traditionists, advocating exclusive authority of hadith), 3, 17–29, 34, 37, 40, 41

ahl al-ra’y (rationalists, advocating the right of jurists to reason for themselves), 26, 40, 41

‘alim. See ‘ulama’

‘amal (judicial practice), 86, 91

‘amma. See commoners ashab al-ra’y. See ahl al-ra’y

Ash’ari, 34, 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 48nn. 45,

46; 50, 51, 62n. 42

ashraf (sing. sharif) (descendants of the Prophet), 12, 35, 128, 149, 157

awqaf. See waqf baraka (divine blessing, grace), 45, 55,

107n. 87, 110, 111, 113, 116, 157 See also Sufi bid’a (pl. bida’) (unwarranted innovation), 39, 49, 50, 51, 59, 60, 63n. 84

bid’a hasana (welcome, good innovation), 50

caliph. See khalifa commoners (‘amma), 13, 23, 49–63. See also community of believers community of believers (umma) active in public sphere, 12, 13, 15, 49–50, 59–66, 71, 73, 74–75, 79, 81n. 23, 126, 127, 129, 134, 151, 152 autonomous groups within (see ashraf; groups of origin; guilds; madhhab; neighborhoods; Sufi) discourse with ruling authorities (see rulers) place in doctrine, 10, 66, 120--2, 123–25, 144, 147, 148–49, 154 role in shaping religious practices, 6, 13, 49--0, 55, 60

See also commoners; ‘ulama’; waqf cult of saints, 55, 60, 87, 96–97, 106n.

74, 107n. 87, 110, 116

custom (‘ada, ta’amul, ta’aruf, ‘urf), 5, 13, 73, 80, 86–99, 94–97, 125–27 See also qadi dar ‘adl (tribal arbitrator incorporated in the shari’a court and treated by the qadi as a shar’i notary — ‘adl — of the court), 90, 93, 94, 96, 106nn. 76, 81, 82; 107n. 91

dhikr (Sufi litany), 55, 113–14, 117, 129

endowments. See waqf faqih. See fuqaha’

fatwa (legal opinion), 14, 32, 33, 43, 49, 50, 52, 53, 74, 91, 92, 126. See also mufti fiqh (the science of the shari’a), 26, 85, 121, 147 fuqaha’ (sing. faqih) (scholars of fiqh), 10, 43, 53, 85, 86, 91–92, 109, 120. See also ‘ulama’ groups of origin, 12, 128–29 guilds, 5, 12, 69–70, 71, 80, 81n. 18, hadith (tradition deriving from the Prophet), 10, 15, 21, 22, 25, 26, 36, 41, 43, 50, 54, 56, 55, 66, 54–55, 120 Hanafi, Abu Hanifa, 7, 12, 14, 26, 25n.

128–29

36, 32, 37, 38, 35, 41, 47n. 27, 50,

54, 55, 62n. 42, 63n. 82, 85, 50, 52, 131, 136n. 31 See also madhhab Hanbali, Ibn Hanbal, 4, 11, 14, 22–24,

26, 28n. 4, 32, 34, 37, 38, 35, 40, 41,

42, 43, 44, 47n. 27, 51, 53, 54, 55, 58–55, 105, 155. See also madhhab

Ibn Hanbal. See Hanbali

ijma’ (consensus of community or ‘ulama’), 10, 13, 120, 147 ijtihad (exercise of independent reason ing), 5, 50

‘ilm (religious knowledge), 31, 40 ‘ilm al-rijal (branch of knowledge concerning information about hadith transmitters), 21–22, 25–28, 25n.

25. See also ‘ulama’

imam (leader of public prayer), 35, 38,

45, 51, 55, 58, 55

kalam (theology), 15, 22–24, 28n. 5, 41 khalifa (caliph), 66–68, 114, 150, 157.

See also rulers

khanqah (pl. khawaniq) (Sufi lodge), 3,

31, 54, 56, 55, 62n. 45, 111, 116 khatib (preacher of Friday sermon), 35,

37, 53, 54, 58, 55

madhhab (pl. madhahib) (school of law), 31, 33, 54, 88, 128, 125, 151, 155 affiliation and membership, 37–38, 35, 44 and madaris, 38, 35–40, 43 arena of public sphere, 3, 11, 37–41,

43–45, 147

as solidarity group, 4, 11–12, 38, 35, 40–41, 44, 46-47n. 23, 58–55, 105 autonomy in public sphere, 10, 14, 44, 58–55, 147 internal conflicts, 4, 41–44 rulers' intervention in conflicts, 14, 41–42, 43 rulers' intervention in debates among madhahib, 14, 42, 43

social functions, 11, 38–39, 41, 47–488. 37, 58–55

See also: Hanafi; Hanbali; Maliki;

Shafi’i; ‘ulama’ madrasa (pl. madaris) (college of religious sciences), 4, 31–32, 33, 37, 38, 39, 41, 44, 45n. 6, 47n. 34, 54, 59, 74, 75, 76, 122, 128, 131, 137n. 46 autonomy of ‘ulama’ heads of madaris, 11, 33–34 role in public sphere, 3, 43

See also ‘ilm; madhhab

mahdi (a divinely guided ruler who would restore Islam to its original perfection), 14, 68, 137n. 33, 155, 158 majlis al-‘ilm (assembly of learning), 54, 59

Maliki, 32, 37, 47n. 27, 86, 90, 91, 95, 97, 105n. 56, 136n. 31. See also madhhab mazalim (rulers’ court of justice dealing in particular with petitions concerning abuse of power by officials), 34, 70. See also Ottoman law mihna (inquisition), 3, 6, 10, 13, 14, 17–29, 28n. 4, 41, 136n. 25

mudarris (pl. mudarrisun) (teacher at a madrasa), 33–34, 37 mufti (jurisconsult who issues fatwas), 10, 11, 14, 32, 36, 41, 50, 52, 53, 59, 72, 74, 84, 85, 86, 92, 125, 126, 136-37n. 31, 147. See also fatwa; ‘ulama’ muhaddithun. See ahl al-hadith muhtasib (supervisor of moral behaviour, particularly market inspector), 35, 49, 54, 61n. 22, 70, 78, 93 mutakallimun (scholastic theologians), 3, 17–29. See also kalam mutawalli, nazir (waqf administrator), 34, 35, 54

Mu’tazili, 15, 23, 24, 28n. 8, 25n. 20, 37, 40

nazir. See mutawalli neighborhoods, 12, 38, 58, 77, 80, 128–25

Orientalism, 141444 145, 159–66

Oriental and Ottoman despotism, 7, 15, 78–79, 119, 142, 147 stagnation of Oriental societies, 142, 14344

Ottoman law, 68–75, 80

general characteristics, 68–69 procedure, 71

qanun and shari’a, 13, 72

rise of shari’a, 13, 72

role of sultan, 69, 70

tribunals, 70–71, 81n. 22 (see also mazalim)

See also guilds; qadi; shari’a patronage, 3, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 54, 57, 59, 62n. 40, 111, 113, 129, 152 public opinion, 10, 11, 13, 17, 21, 27, 126, 130, 147 public sphere

general:

and civil society, 9, 65, 83, 139–41

and the new cultural history, 65, 119 and official sphere, 9, 140, 141 and private sphere, 9, 140, 141 and relations between power and culture, 144–44 applicability of Western models to other civilizations, 9, 142, 143, 146, 159–66 definition, 9, 17, 119, 140, 141 development of theory of, 13, 139–41

in Muslim societies, 1–2, 4, 9–15, 50, 65–66, 70, 120, 121, 122, 124, 147

and civil society, 65–66, 72, 74, 76–77, 77–80, 83–84, 119

and official sphere, 35–36 (see also ‘ulama’) and policy-making decisions, 15255, 154 and private sphere, 7, 9, 12, 121–22 and religion, 1–8, 49–63, 148 applicability of Western models to,

17, 83–84, 142, 146, 147, 159–60 arenas of public sphere, 37–41,

68–75, 75–77, 79–80, 84–107, 128–29, 134, 148, 151 (see also guilds; madhhab; madrasa; neighborhoods; qadi; Sufi)

autonomy of, 7--, 15, 70, 77, 147, 148, 151, 152, 153

discourse in, 3, 6–7, 15 (see also waqf) dynamics of, 7–8, 15, 27, 151 impact of modern territorial states, 157–58 impact of renovative movements, 154–5 (see also mahdi) informality of, 3, 4, 15, 134 in other civilizations, 139, 140, 141, 142, 144–45, 153, 159–66 qadi (judge), 19, 22, 26, 41, 52, 53, 54,

59, 74, 79, 136–77. 31

autonomy of, 5, 10, 11, 34, 70–71, 84–86, 94.97, 109, 147

bridging shari’a and social reality, 5,

11, 90–93, 94–97

general duties, 32, 3433, 70–72, 84,

93, 133

his court as an arena of public sphere, 5, 11, 35, 84–107

See also custom; Ottoman law; ‘ulama’; waqf ribat (pl. rubut) (Sufi lodge), 31, 45, 48n. 51, 111 rulers

and norms governing the public sphere, 13, 123–24, 130 and religious sphere, 14, 49–63

and shari’a, 5, 10, 11, 13, 49–50, 5255, 60nn. 3, 7; 62n. 42, 69, 78, 79, 86, 123–25, 131, 150 decrees relating to the shari’a, 14, 126 discourse with ‘ulama’ and commu nity, 73–74, 125--7, 129–34, 137n. 33, 147 division of responsibilities with ‘ulama’, 19–20, 27, 66–67, 123–25 rulers (continued) involvement in doctrinal discussion,

4, 13–14, 17–20, 43, 50, 126–27 involvement in resolving conflicts in the public sphere, 4, 14, 41–42, 43, 51, 80, 152 legitimation of, 7, 13, 14, 32, 35, 43, 67–68, 78–79, 84, 123, 124, 130, 150, 154, 157, 158 responsibilities towards the community, 123, 124, 125, 131,150, 152

See also khalifa; madhhab; mihna;

Ottoman law; Sufi; ‘ulama’; waqf

Shafi’i, 12, 14, 32, 34, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 47n. 27, 51, 54, 59, 62n. 42, 63n. 82, 92. See also madhhab shari’a, (the sacred law of Islam) (adjective: shar’i), 66, 72, 83, 122, 131, 132 an autonomous civic force, 5, 9, 10,

69, 86, 109, 120, 147, 152

and custom (see custom) and moral, cultural, and social norms,

10, 13, 37, 121, 127, 147, 148 and social order, 10, 109, 124, 147

and Sufism, 5, 109–10, 111, 114, 116

shar’i concepts, views, 85–86, 93, 123, 124

shar’i courts, 34, 125 (see also qadi)

shar’i regulations, rules:

dynamics of change, 4–5, 73, 125–27, 137n. 41

local variations, 5, 13, 69, 73–74, 127 social forces involved in change, 74–75.126–27 violation of, 51, 124, 133–34 symbol of cultural identity, 10, 13, 147 tribal notrary incorporated in the shar’i court (see dar ‘adl)

See also fuqaha’; mufti; Ottoman law;

qadi; rulers; ‘ulama’; waqf sharif. See ashraf

Shi’i, Shi’ism, 21, 25, 26, 35, 41, 50, 51, 52, 112, 149, 150, 151, 155, 157, 158

Sufi, Sufi brotherboods (tariqa, pl. turuq), 5, 10, 13, 31, 44–4, 51, 52, 54, 57, 59, 73, 87, 107n. 87, 120, 122, 126, 128, 151, 155, 158 affiliation, 4, 45, 113, 114, 117 alliance with other social groupings, 110, 117 and expansion of Islam, 111, 112, 116 and jihad movements, 112, 115–16 and the public sphere, 3, 6, 12, 109–10, 116–17, 147 and radicalization of Islam, 115, 117

and ‘ulama’, 110, 111, 116

and use of vernacular languages, 6, 12, 115–116, 117 economic and political power, 112–13, 116 historical development and structure, 6, 11, 12, 109–18 relations with the ruling authorities, 12, 111–12, 116, 117

social functions, 4, 6, 45, 110, 113, 116, 117

See also baraka; dhikr; khanqah; ribat; shari’a; tekke; zawiya sunna (the Prophet’s sayings and doings established as legally binding precedents, in addition to the Qur’an), 13, 21, 22, 24, 60, 60n. 2, 63n. 84, 88, 91, 120 revival of (ihya’ al-sunna), 14, 31, 40, 48n. 46, 50, 58, 59

Sunni, 24, 25, 28, 28n. 5, 32, 37, 41, 42, 43, 51, 59, 149, 150, 153, 155, 157, 158

ta’amul. See custom ta’aruf. See custom tariqa, (pl. turuq). See Sufi tekke (Sufi lodge), 111, 112

‘ulama’ (sing. ‘alim) (scholars of religious sciences) articulation of religious dogma, 3, 10, 17–29

‘ulama’ (continued)

association with rulers, 36, 39, 40, 42, 45–446. 7, 57, 67, 74, 84 autonomy, independece from ruling authorities, 5, 10, 11, 18–20, 36, 73–74, 79–80, 85, 124, 151 conflict with ruling authorities, 3,

17–29, 66–67, 74, 123, 157 cooperation with ruling authorities,

14, 27, 43, 49–50, 51–52, 57–58,

59, 131, 132

custodians of social norms, 10, 59,

123, 125, 147, 150

discourse with ruling authorities, 125–27, 131 functions, 11, 32–33, 35, 55, 84, 123,

124, 132, 151

informal representatives of the community of believers, 11, 32, 76, 84, 93, 123, 124 in official positions, 11, 32, 33–37, 52, 54, 59, 72, 83–84 internal discourse among, 18–29, 125--7 interpreters, transmitters of shari’a, 37, 59, 85, 109, 120, 123, 124, 130–31, 147, 150, 158 leaders of autonomous organizations.

(see madhhab; Sufi) moral authority, 7–8, 10, 32, 84, 85,

109, 123, 147, 153

part of the official sphere? 32–37, 74–75, 83–84 social status and organization, 20–21, 44, 45n. 3, 72, 84, 123, 136n. 29, 150, 151 spiritual status, 19–20 strife among. (see madhhab, mihna)

See also fuqaha’; ‘ilm; ‘ilm al-rijal; madhhab; madrasa; mufti; qadi; rulers;

shari’a; Sufi; waqf umma. See community of believers

‘urf. See custom

Wahhabi, 155, 156–57, 158

waqf (pl. awqaf) (Islamic endowment), 4, 10 administration of large public endowments, 7, 15, 35, 76, 129, 131–33 and groups in the community, 12, 77, 128–29, 135 and urban public space, 12, 128 autonomy of, 5, 6, 77, 80, 129, 130, 131 cash endowments, 13, 73, 126–27 endowments by rulers and retinue, 7, 14, 32, 34, 53, 54, 55, 58, 75–77, 121, 130, 131, 132, 135 focus of discourse or tacit bargaining in public sphere, 6–7, 12, 15, 125–27, 129–34, 135,147 ideology, 7, 12, 121–22, 124, 130, 134–35 involvement of community, 7, 76, 77, 131–32, 133–34, 135 involvement of qadis, 7, 15, 76, 77, 132, 133 involvement of ruling authorities, 7, 45n. 6, 77, 124, 129–34, 135 involvement of ‘ulama’, 7, 76, 77, 123, 124, 129–34, 135, 151, 158

See also mutawalli; shari’a; ‘ulama’ wa’z, wa’iz (pl. wu’az) (deliverer of wa’z, admonition or sermon), 34, 54, 57, 59, 63n. 67, 68

zawiya (Sufi lodge), 87, 111, 128, 129

</biblio>

#title The State of the Nation

#subtitle Ernest Gellner and the Theory of Nationalism

#author John A. Hall

#authors John A. Hall, Roman Szporluk, Brendan O’Leary, Miroslav Hroch, Tom Nairn, David Laitin, Nicos Mouzelis, Mark Beissinger, Charles Taylor, Alfred Stepan, Chris Hann, Dale F. Eickelman, Rogers Brubaker

#date November 1998

#isbn 9780521633666

#publisher Cambridge University Press.
<[[https://www.cambridge.org/gb/universitypress/subjects/sociology/political-sociology/state-nation-ernest-gellner-and-theory-nationalism] [cambridge.org/gb/universitypress/subjects/sociology/political-sociology/state-nation-ernest-gellner-and-theory-nationalism]]>

#source <[[https://archive.org/details/stateofnationern0000unse] [archive.org/details/stateofnationern0000unse]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-23T15:16:35

#topics

#DELETED temporarily

#cover j-a-john-a-hall-the-state-of-the-nation-1.jpg

#temporarily

 [Front Matter]

 [Synopsis]

Nationalism is one of the major social and political sources of modern times, and a subject of intense intellectual debate. The most important and influential theory of nationalism is that of Ernest Gellner (1925–1995). This volume assesses every aspect of that theory, bringing together an exceptional set of scholars to explain, criticise and move beyond Gellner’s work. In doing so the book establishes the state-of-play within the theory of nationalism, and complements Gellner’s account by bringing political variables into consideration. The book is unique in offering sustained attention to a single powerful theory, and will be of wide interest to students and scholars of political and social theory, history, sociology and anthropology.

John A. Hall is Professor of Sociology at McGill University, and has also taught at Southampton and Harvard Universities and the London School of Economics. His recent books include Coercion and Consent (1994), International Orders (1996), Is America Breaking Apart? (with Charles Lindholm, 1998) and The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner (co-edited with I C. Jarvie, 1996).

 [Title Page]

The State of the Nation

Ernest Gellner and the Theory of Nationalism

Edited by

John A. Hall

McGill University

Cambridge

UNIVERSITY PRESS

 [Copyright]

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge, New York, Melbourne, Madrid, Cape Town, Singapore, Sao Paulo, Delhi, Dubai, Tokyo

Cambridge University Press

The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 8RU, UK

Published in the United States of America by Cambridge University Press, New York

[[http://www.cambridge.org][www.cambridge.org]]

Information on this title: [[http://www.cambridge.org/9780521633246][www.cambridge.org/9780521633246]]

© Cambridge University Press 1998

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 1998 Reprinted 1999, 2000

A catalogue record for this publication is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloguing in Publication data The state of the nation: Ernest Gellner and the theory of nationalism/edited by John A. Hall.

p. cm.

ISBN 0 521 63324 9 (hardback) ISBN 0 521 63366 4 (paperback)

I. Gellner, Ernest. 2. Nationalism. 3. Political science.

I. Hall, John A., 1949-.

JC3 l l.S77 1998

320.54’01 -de 21 97–52663 CIP

ISBN 978-0-521-63324-6 Hardback

ISBN 978-0-521-63366-6 Paperback

Transferred to digital printing 2009

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party Internet websites referred to in this publication, and does not guarantee that any content on such websites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate. Information regarding prices, travel timetables and other factual information given in this work are correct at the time of first printing but Cambridge University Press does not guarantee the accuracy of such information thereafter.

 Contents

List of contributors

Introduction

JOHN A. HALL

Part I The making of the theory

1 Thoughts about change: Ernest Gellner and the history of nationalism 23

ROMAN SZPORLUK

2 Ernest Gellner’s diagnoses of nationalism: a critical overview, or, what is living and what is dead in Ernest Gellner’s philosophy of nationalism? 40

BRENDAN O’LEARY

Part II The classical criticisms

3 Real and constructed: the nature of the nation 91

MIROSLAV HROCH

4 The curse of rurality: limits of modernisation theory 107

TOM NAIRN

5 Nationalism and language: a post-Soviet perspective 135

DAVID LAITIN

6 Ernest Gellner’s theory of nationalism: some definitional and methodological issues 158

NICOS MOUZELIS

vi Contents

Part III Bringing politics back in 7 Nationalisms that bark and nationalisms that bite: Ernest Gellner and the substantiation of nations

MARK BEISSINGER

8 Nationalism and modernity CHARLES TAYLOR

9 Modern multinational democracies: transcending a Gellnerian oxymoron ALFRED STEPAN

Part IV Wider implications

10 Nationalism and civil society in central Europe: from Ruritania to the Carpathian Euroregion CHRIS HANN

11 From here to modernity: Ernest Gellner on nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism

DALE F. EICKELMAN

12 Myths and misconceptions in the study of nationalism ROGERS BRUBAKER

Bibliography of Ernest Gellner’s writings on nationalism Index

 Contributors

John A. Hall is Professor of Sociology at McGill University

Roman Szporluk is M. S. Hrushevskyi Professor of Ukrainian History at Harvard University

Brendan O’ Leary is Professor of Government at the LSE

Miroslav Hroch is Professor of History at Charles University

Tom Nairn is Director of the Unit for the Study of Government in Scotland at University of Edinburgh

David Laitin is William R. Kenan, Jr., Professor of Political Science at the University of Chicago

Nicos Mouzelis is Professor of Sociology at the LSE

Mark Beissinger is Professor of Political Science and Director of the Center for Russia, East Europe and Central Asia at the University of Wisconsin at Madison

Charles Taylor is Professor of Philosophy at McGill University

Alfred Stepan is the Gladstone Professor of Government at Oxford University

Chris Hann is Professor of Social Anthropology at the University of Kent

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College

Rogers Brubaker is Professor of Sociology at UCLA

 Introduction

John A. Hall

The most striking way in which Ernest Gellner stood apart from the rest of his generation of postwar social scientists was in his concentration on nationalism. The neglect of nationalism within the academy after 1945 is easily explained: as is often the case, geopolitical events set the intellectual agenda. Nationalism was blamed for the onset of war in 1939; as statesmen paid no attention to national self-determination when dividing Germany and Korea, so scholars in their turn ignored nationalism. If there was some interest, not least in the case of Gellner himself, in decolonisation and in nation-building in the new states that resulted, it remains the case that generalised intellectual attention turned to nationalism only in the 1980s — interestingly and puzzlingly slightly before the break-up of the last Eurasian empire made nationalism a central topic of public concern. In these circumstances, Gellner's theory of nationalism, first adumbrated two decades earlier, suddenly received enormous attention, with Nations and Nationalism becoming an influential, much translated bestseller.

The circumstances of Gellner's life which made it utterly impossible for him ever to have neglected nationalism are well worth bearing in mind as background to the studies assembled in here. Both his parents were lower middle class Bohemians of Jewish background who changed their allegiance, from the German to the Czech community, to accommodate themselves to the way in which sheer demographic weight created a new form of society in Prague at the end of the nineteenth century.[1] Gellner himself grew up in a bilingual household within a genuinely multinational city. He was necessarily aware not just of Zionism, Marxism and nationalism but also of different communities, often in violent conflict with each other. After his class had sung together in his Czech primary school, for example, he volunteered to sing the same song with different words — German words, to the shocked silence of his classmates. This was the sort of event that let would-be insiders know that they would never really be accepted, especially if they came from a Jewish background. Loyalty to Masaryk's republic kept the family in Prague very late, so that Gellner witnessed the start of the German occupation which was to lead to the death of some of his relations. But the escape of his immediate family allowed attendance at St Albans County School for Boys and a year at Balliol College before active service at the end of the war as a member of the Czech Brigade. Gellner marched in the victory parade in Prague in 1945, but was unable to re-settle in the city he so loved. For one thing, he was appalled at the manner of the expulsion of the Sudeten Germans at this time, even though he found it entirely comprehensible. For another, he could see — or so he claimed in later years — that Czechoslovakia was in for a very bad time: there was limited active opposition to communism because the Czechs had no doubt that Germany would revive and no trust that the West would protect them should that revival react to the political and ethnic cleansing in which they were then engaged.

Thinking through these experiences necessitated theorising nationalism. Most obviously, the marvellous extended parable of ‘Megalomania’ and ‘Ruritania’ that stands at the heart of Nations and Nationalism demonstrates identities to be constructed and chosen, thereby making his central claim that it is nationalism that explains the nation — and not, as is so often believed, the nation which accounts for nationalism. [2] But it is a less obvious element of Gellner’s background that makes his theory permanently thought-provoking. Gellner’s thought contained powerful tensions. The firm stress on the need for protection given by the political roof of nationalism goes hand-in-hand with a no-holds-barred defence of universal rationality against every form of relativism; equally, the insistence that national homogeneity enables political and economic development did not rule out deep loathing for nationalist politics and ideology.

These tensions came out especially clearly after he returned to Prague in 1991 to open a Centre for the Study of Nationalism for the newly founded Central European University. At a local level, Gellner disliked the claustrophilia of Vaclav Klaus’s Czech Republic despite the fact that it was producing, as his theory had predicted, something of an economic miracle. More generally, he was deeply worried by the speed and totality of the Soviet collapse, fearing that ethnic cleansings might lead to dreadful political instability throughout the region. [3] This was something of a change of heart: he had returned from initial close contacts with Soviet ethnographers delighted that his concern with ethnic stratification seemed to cast so much light on problems sure to plague the Soviet Union. With characteristically witty self-deprecation, he made the best and most cutting joke against himself — that he had become a Russian imperialist. [4] He became equally enthusiastic about the virtues of Austro-Hungary, not least when assessing the contribution of Malinowski — and particularly so when setting him against the narrow communalism he found in Wittgenstein. [5] At the end of his life there was accordingly considerable tension between the formal descriptive theory of Nations and Nationalism which predicts the demise of entities such as Austro-Hungary and the Soviet Union and his prescriptive hopes for some way in which cultural pluralism could be achieved within a larger political unit.

The purpose of this volume is to analyse Gellner's theory of nationalism as a whole. In order to do this properly, the book is structured around four key themes. It is vital, to begin with, to fully comprehend the making of the theory, not least since emphases within it — for example, the late emergence of a prescriptive tone — changed over the three decades over which it was articulated. Secondly, considerable attention is given to the classical criticisms brought against the theory. At a substantive level, Gellner's theory was accused of being too modernist and too optimistic; at a more formal philosophical level, it was attacked again and again for having too instrumental a view of human motivation and for relying excessively on functionalist argumentation. These charges are discussed at length here, giving one justification for the title — that is, providing the most up to date state-of-play of discussions of Gellner's theory of nationalism. But the title is designed to suggest a second meaning. Gellner's theory explains nationalism by means of socio-economic categories. The principal positive claim of the third section of this volume is that nationalism cannot be understood without systematically bringing politics back in; differently put, this section is representative of modern studies of nationalism in seeking to challenge Gellner's account by stressing the impact of the actions of states. The fourth thematic section considers some implications of Gellner's theory: if two essays — one on civil society, the other on Islam — follow Gellner's own agenda, the final essay by Rogers Brubaker presents nothing less than an overview of the future of nationalist studies in general.

These themes can best be brought out by devoting the rest of this introduction to discussion of the individual chapters — albeit this process necessarily cannot take the place of the rich detail in which the reader will soon be immersed. But before turning to this task, two general points deserve emphasis. First, it is curiously rare in social science to subject any theory to sustained analysis, let alone to definitive refutation. Intellectual interest seems driven by fashion, with one view being replaced by another because it lends excitement rather than truth. This is dreadful, not least since it means that untested theories come back again and again. The studies assembled here aim at better cognitive practice, not least since Gellner's theory needs attention on the grounds of complexity as well as merit. Secondly, it should be emphasised that all Gellner's work to do with nationalism, listed in the bibliography at the end of this volume, is considered here. This means that attention is given to his initial statement in the mid-1960s and to the complete account of Nations and Nationalism, to later historically-sensitive amendments and to the prescriptive writings already mentioned, to his important 1996 'Reply to Critics' and to Nationalism, his last book on the subject published posthumously in 1997. One benefit of considering the full panoply of Gellner's work on nationalism is that it is possible to draw attention to replies that Gellner developed to standard criticisms of his position.

The charm of Roman Szporluk's account of the way in which Thought and Change suggested an intellectual agenda should not distract from the novelty of its analytical contribution. Szporluk shares with Gellner an East Central European background, and this makes him especially sensitive to the way in which Gellner's assessment of nationalism was merely a part of a larger attempt to take stock of the ideological options provided by the modern world, and in particular of Marxism and liberalism. The most important claim of Szporluk's own important Communism and Nationalism — that is, its interpretation of Marxism as a nationalist strategy of late development — is clearly inspired by Gellner's view of Marxism as a protestant ethic of the twentieth century.[6] Still, there remains a difference between the two accounts. Gellner's review essay of Szporluk's book took issue with the praise given to List's view that nations are eternal: this ontology was rejected on the grounds that nations are created, with nationalism itself being seen as the result of ethnic conflict — for all that the 'nation', once formed, then often eagerly embraces developmentalist strategies.[7] This is not a matter on which Gellner changed his mind, noting in a very late statement (in a passage quoted at length below) that 'nationalism is not to be explained by the use it has in legitimising modernisation — a view with which I am quite mistakenly credited.[8] Despite the power of Gellner's reply, Szporluk is surely right to insist that Gellner showed too little interest in ‘old-state’ nationalism. This is an extremely important point. Gellner defined nationalism in terms of the ‘awakened’ seeking their own state. But large and established states, not least Revolutionary France and Wilhelmine and Nazi Germany, can and have embraced nationalism in ways that have vitally affected the historical record. Szporluk further notes, perhaps as the result of a background whose contours are powerfully evoked by Chris Hann in his contribution to this volume, that peoples are fought for by different states. This leads him to hint at another definitional point of which we will hear more: states are not always quite so unitary and homogeneous as Gellner imagined. Szporluk certainly makes much of this point in his most recent work on the Ukraine, and this in turn derives in part from stressing the way in which differential outcomes may come about as the result of nationalist ideas — which Gellner famously scorned.[9]

Gellner responded generously and warmly to an earlier version of Brendan O’Leary’s essay, not surprisingly since it was then the most complete critical account of his work on nationalism. This version of O’Leary’s essay is very much expanded, and takes into account all of Gellner’s late writings on nationalism; O’Leary now goes beyond his discussion of Thought and Change and Nations and Nationalism to critical assessment of the historical stages of nationalism proposed as well as to analysis of Gellner’s late prescriptive argument. The essay now stands as the most accurate analytic reconstruction of Gellner’s theory. O’Leary adds to this a defence of many of the theory’s key points, most notably its modernist emphasis and its claim that nationalism would lose its virulence once the transition to modernity had been achieved. He is particularly interesting on the typology of nationalism, noting both that it is not as inclusive as Gellner had imagined and that it does not structure his later historically sensitive amendments. O’Leary is of course not without critical points of his own to make. Those concerning the philosophy of social science and politics concern us below, for they are at the heart of later essays; but one point should be mentioned here. O’Leary insists that nationalism has a perfectly coherent ideology, based on the principle of self-determination, and that it is inherently modern and progressive — a view that means a great deal to O’Leary, one suspects, given that his works suggest adherence to a particular and highly liberal version of Irish nationalism. Gellner’s response at this point was blunt: ‘We should not make nationalists a present of their ontology. It is not universally applicable, and to accept a principle which implies the contrary, means that we start from false premises.[10] One should not miss O’Leary’s footnotes for his reply to Gellner at this point. And his essay anyway deserves the closest reading: it is packed with innovative views, not least in its appreciation of the role of geopolitical conjunctures in the history of nationalism.

The second section of the book turns to detailed consideration of the classical accusations levelled at Gellner’s theory. The first substantive issue to be considered is the charge that nations are far older than Gellner’s modernist account allowed. A thesis of primordialism was suggested by John Armstrong in his Nations before Nationalism, but Gellner gave sustained attention to two different authors, Anthony Smith and Miroslav Hroch, who offered more subtle accounts seeking some mix of modernism and primordialism. He did so, it should be noted, because he was genuinely troubled by the issue, noting uneasily that Shakespeare’s plays are full of nationalist rhetoric. Still, he sought to maintain his modernist view, albeit he took care to open the matter to empirical debate. Thus Nationalism doubts Anthony Smith’s view that successful nation-states must have an ethnic core at their heart, but suggests empirical research to establish how many states have historic ‘navels’ and how many invent them — as well as to consider those which seem to manage without them altogether.[11] He gave still more attention to the work of Miroslav Hroch, often joking that the publication of his Social preconditions of national revival in Europe made it difficult for him to open his mouth for fear of making some mistake. He most certainly took very seriously Hroch’s insistence that Balkan nationalism did not fit his scheme since it had nothing to do with industrialism: he varied his reply to this point, becoming most consistent, in the eyes of both O’Leary and Mouzelis, when arguing that industrialism cast a long shadow to which peripheral elites reacted. Still, he eventually devoted a critical essay of great power to Hroch’s work, accusing him of reifying both class and nation.[12] It is to that essay that Hroch replies here.

Hroch carefully and interestingly describes the process of his intellectual formation so as to evade certain of Gellner’s objections. He insists that his use of the nationalist term ‘revival’ did not entail acceptance of any ontological view of the permanence of nations. Equally, he explains that the class terms in which his argument had been expressed did not indicate allegiance to the materialist conception of history: if pure economic classes mattered on occasion, so too did all sorts of social groups whose existence is best understood in Weberian terms. It is good to have these matters cleared up, and there is justice in Hroch's claim that this increases the conceptual overlap between their two accounts — both of which, after all, draw on socio-economic rather than political categories for the explanations they offer. Still, two sets of differences remain. First, there is disagreement as to the material on which nationalist processes work. Hroch stands closer to Anthony Smith in insisting that nationalism would be ineffective were its appeal not directed at a pre-existent community; this contrasts with Gellner's more constructivist position. Secondly, Hroch's celebrated phase model makes an important distinction between national identity and nationalism, and he insists that some movements sought to affirm their identity without seeking their own state. This again puts Gellner's definition of nationalism under scrutiny.

A second substantive charge often made is that Gellner was too optimistic in imagining that nationalism would lose its bite once modernisation had been completed. This claim is of course extremely important to his general position, for it allows him to restore a measure of universalism by arguing that the excesses of nationalism will be temporary. One occasion on which he devoted his full attention to the impact of nationalism within the industrial era was when reviewing Tom Nairn's The Break-Up of Britain.[13] He did not find himself especially troubled by the arguments of that book, not surprisingly given that it made extensive use of his own categories. Nor did he find movements of rich regions seeking some autonomy from the fiscal extractions of central states — for that is how he and Nairn then saw the matter — especially troubling for his general position.[14] But Nairn here makes a rather different case — one moreover which does go absolutely to the heart of Gellner's thought. When Gellner sought to explain the viciousness to which nationalism can be prone, he tended to make much of John Plamenatz's contention that nationalism in Central and Eastern Europe was bound to be nasty, given the absence of a high culture and the presence of complex ethnic intermingling — a corollary of Gellner's view here being that the undoubted horror associated with German nationalism was seen as essentially contingent.[15] Nairn's interpretation is very different. Modernisation is brutal, as Gellner knew, but it need not be passive: rather, traumatic experiences which take away the promise of affluence lead those placed in pain to codify anti-modern memories. According to this view of interrupted modernisation, ethnic nationalism is the result of a peasantry managing to write its way into history. If this has happened in Central and Eastern Europe, most notably in contemporary Serbia, Nairn insists that it can happen anywhere: he has in mind here not just the Khmer Rouge with whom he begins but quite as much the cases of France and Germany — which is, of course, to agree with Szporluk that the form of nationalism within ‘core’ countries matters a very great deal. In making this argument, Nairn interestingly distinguishes between chauvinism and nationalism. The words themselves do not matter, but the reality does. For all that nationalism can be reactionary and vicious, it can equally be progressive; this was the case with Gellner’s Czechs seeking to escape the constraints of Vienna and the Baltic peoples seeking to leave a moribund Soviet Union — and, Nairn insists, of the Scots wanting autonomy from an overcentralised and decrepit imperial state.[16]

These two substantive criticisms effectively concern the beginning and end points of the record of nationalism with which Gellner was concerned. But most attention by his critics has always been given to the area in between, namely to the putative link between industrialism and nationalism. It should be said immediately that rather different issues are here deeply, even licentiously entangled. An immediate problem is that of functionalist logic, that is, of whether the needs of industrial society cause nationalism. Should the answer to that question prove to be negative, the claim that national homogeneity enables, that is, is functional for, economic (and political) development may still convince — which is to stress that multinational arrangements are rare and difficult. But a further distinction needs to be drawn here, between societies that have built their nations before industrialisation and those that face modernisation after nation-building has begun. It may be the case that the advantages given by the relative social homogeneity of the former should not convert to policy prescriptions for the latter designed to extirpate all pluralism. Asymmetry in development — ethnic and linguistic homogeneity achieved over time in the one case, nationbuilding through a recognition of cultural diversity in the latter — may have much to recommend it.

The chapters by Laitin and Mouzelis form something of a pair, arriving at similar conclusions even though one is a negative and the other a positive critique. David Laitin is one of the most distinguished practitioners of rational choice theory, an approach he clearly finds attractive on account of its rigour. This makes Laitin's charge against Gellner — that he attempts to be too rigorous — all the more striking. In fact two elements are involved here. First, Laitin accuses him — as have many others, notably Charles Taylor and Brendan O'Leary in this volume, as well as Michael Mann and Perry Anderson on previous occasions [17] — of adopting a functionalist logic of explanation. It is not at all hard to see what is meant here. Gellner constantly marshalled the categories of his general philosophy of history when discussing nationalism, and it very often seemed as if he did mean to say that industrial society's need for social and linguistic homogeneity was the cause of nationalism. But Laitin moves beyond this to say that Gellner relies heavily on the most instrumental view of human motivation imaginable. [18] Laitin believes that one can do much better by drawing in other variables, in this case adding to material self-interest the extent to which one's own group forces nationalist activity upon one through varied social pressures and the extent to which the larger society might be prepared to welcome moves to accommodation. The second part of his chapter makes marvellous use of these variables, themselves identified through the construction of ingenious measures, to identify patterns of behaviour in Estonia, Latvia, Kazakhstan and the Ukraine which would not be revealed by Gellner's approach.[19] In all this, it should be firmly noted, Laitin clearly envisages a range of relations wider than Gellner's stark choice between nationalist secession or assimilation — a viewpoint for which he argued extensively in an earlier pathbreaking book on language repertoires and state construction.[20]

Nicos Mouzelis has become particularly well known in recent years for a series of books dealing with the logic of social theory, and he here applies his skills to a defence of Gellner's position against the first of Laitin's charges. [21] There is indeed no doubt that it makes no sense to take consequences as causes — that is, in this case, to take the need of a social formation as the cause of its very creation. One way out of this dilemma is suggested by O'Leary. He notes that some nationalist leaders in effect agree with Gellner's view of the needs of a new form of society, and therefore actively try to create it. If this brings agency back into the historical record, equally important is the fact that the seeming necessity of the equation between social homogeneity and the modern world is subtly undermined. Differently put, that equation is an ideology, and an ideology which may not be completely true: for all that modern social organisation may be easier given social similarity, policies to engineer social homogenisation forcibly may, as noted, have grave disadvantages. That is the point at the heart of Laitin's interest in the extent to which a larger society will welcome those who seek to enter its bounds, the particular point being that Estonians can create loyalty and diminish dissent if they welcome Russians who learn Estonian. Alfred Stepan also reflects on this case, underscoring the potential in the situation by saying that the Russian population can be politically integrated rather easily even though it will retain a measure of cultural distinctiveness.

Mouzelis accepts O'Leary's criticism, but then uses these words of Gellner to mount a defence of a particular type of functionalism:

Functionalism is a term people sometimes apply to their own position and it is not clear why it should be a badge of shame. What I think the critics mean is that [my] theory is teleological, that it explains a phenomenon in terms of the needs it satisfied, and this is not acceptable in good social science: a need may be demonstrated but it does not bring forth its own satisfaction ...

I accept entirely this repudiation of teleological explanation: I have many needs which, whatever their urgency or intensity, nature has not deemed fit to satisfy. Bitter experience, quite apart from the canons of scientific propriety, has taught me this unpalatable truth. Needs engender no realities. But my theory does not sin against this. It is straightforwardly causal. Political and economic forces, the aspirations of governments for greater power and of individuals for greater wealth, have in certain circumstances produced a world in which the division of labour is very advanced, the occupational structure highly unstable, and most work is semantic and communicative rather than physical. This situation in turn leads to the adoption of a standard and codified, literacy-linked ('High') idiom, requires business of all kinds to be conducted in its terms, and reduces persons who are not masters of that idiom (or not acceptable to its practitioners) to the status of humiliated second-class members, a condition from which one plausible and much-frequented escape route led through nationalist politics. [22]

This is an important passage, making it crystal clear that Gellner's principal thesis is that nationalism results from the actions of a social group placed at a disadvantage by newly unified cultural space — the causal origins of which lie with varied and unspecified ‘political and economic forces’. Mouzelis follows Michael Mann in arguing that the new social context was initially as much the result of military as of economic factors. [23] Gellner came to accept this, admitting that a ‘state committed by its very manner of operation to cultural Gleichschaltung is not merely an effect of a new socio-economic system, but also an important independent cause’. [24] Mouzelis then defends functionalism shorn of teleology as a useful general orienting approach to social life. But it is noticeable that this attempt to save Gellner in fact ends up largely agreeing with Gellner’s critics. Both Laitin and Mouzelis insist that Gellner’s very abstract general model needs to be filled up with historical detail. Mouzelis seems to think that in general we are bound to have abstract theories which can then suggest detailed historical accounts, with Gellner certainly believing this to be true for nationalism. In contrast, Laitin is in the company of a group of contemporary scholars who feel that historical details are not just one damn thing after another: as we shall see, this school rather seeks to theorise politics as a comprehensible middle ground standing between abstract generality and random particularity.

The possibility of political explanation is also raised by Laitin’s second charge, namely that Gellner’s theory suffers from an excessively instrumental view of human nature. Gellner firmly rejected this charge:

I am deeply sensitive to the spell of nationalism. I can play about thirty Bohemian folk songs (or songs presented as such in my youth) on my mouth organ. My oldest friend, whom I have known since the age of three or four and who is Czech and a patriot, cannot bear to hear me play them because he says I do it in such a schmaltzy way, ‘crying into the mouth organ’. I do not think I could have written the book on nationalism which I did write, were I not capable of crying, with the help of a little alcohol, over folksongs, which happen to be my favourite form of music. I attend folklore performances from choice, but go to Covent Garden or the Narodni Divadlo from social obligation or snobbery. [25]

More than the merely personal is involved here. Gellner emphasised — in a passage replying to Perry Anderson, who had made Laitin’s point with great force[26] — that humiliation rather than material self-interest provides the heart of his theory:

Modern life is contact with bureaucrats: shop assistants, railway clerks, etc., etc.

It is this which pushes people into nationalism, into the need for the congruence between their own ‘culture’ (the idiom in which they can express themselves and understand others) and that of the extensive and interconnected bureaucracies which constitute their social environment. Noncongruence is not merely an inconvenience or a disadvantage: it means perpetual humiliation. Only if such a congruence does obtain, can one feel ‘at ease in one’s skin’. Only then is one’s personal style of being accepted and endorsed by the environment, only then is one allowed to ‘be oneself’, without impediment. Nationalism is not explained by the use it has in legitimising modernisation — a view with which I am quite mistakenly credited — but by the fact that individuals find themselves in very stressful situations, unless the nationalist requirement of congruence between a man’s culture and that of his environment is satisfied. Hence that deep passion which, according to Perry Anderson, is absent both from my theory and my bosom. As it happens, it is very much present in both of them. The passion is not a means to some end, it is a reaction to an intolerable situation, to a constant jarring in the activity which is by far the most important thing in life — contact and communication with fellow human beings.[27]

This shows again that the core of his theory lies in a group seeking the security of its own political roof. O’Leary accepts this formulation as an improvement on Gellner’s earlier statements. Though this may be so, it is still noticeable that humiliation is seen socio-economically, that is, as the result of ethnic and/or linguistic difference. But nationalism can arise without linguistic or ethnic difference, whilst relative peace can sometimes be observed where cultural and linguistic diversity is allowed within a single state. This brings us to the third part of the book.

One of Gellner’s most brilliant points was that nationalism was at once inevitable and relatively weak, that is, that only a very few calls by nationalists for their own states have been successful.[28] This is akin to the point made against — but not by — Durkheim, namely that not all divorced Protestant males who are unemployed commit suicide.[29] If one set of factors does not explain all variance, it may make sense to bring in further variables. O’Leary suggests in this spirit that the size of a ‘nation’ might help us predict the chances for success of a nationalist claim. He also argues that political oppression might go a long way to explaining the incidence of nationalism — that is, differently put, that a sense of humiliation might result from acts of political arbitrariness. Gellner would have none of this:

<quote>

Oppression is not some kind of independent and additional factor: cultural differentiation, inoffensive under the old intimate social order, is automatically experienced as oppression in the age of anonymity, mobility, and pervasive bureaucratisation with a standardised idiom. [30]

</quote>

There is some truth here, just as there is to an alternative defence he sometimes offered — namely, that authoritarianism is almost a constant, and so no explanation of nationalism. But oppression can not be dismissed so easily. For one thing, there is a marked difference between old regimes which do not much interfere with their societies, and modern ones which do so with real bite.[31] For another thing, his insistence that ‘repression itself is a corollary of a nationalism-engendering situation’ does not carry conviction: a whole host of ideological and institutional factors stand behind the actions of the modern state.[32]

The three chapters that follow offer a state-centric challenge to Gellner’s theory of nationalism. Mark Beissinger begins his chapter with an analysis of the remarkable way in which Gellner’s theory stresses both necessity and contingency, and thereafter seeks middle ground through theorising politics. Beissinger notes that nationalists are very much more concerned with state power than economic opportunity, and he in effect suggests that we take them at their word. He argues that completely repressive states can bring nationalist agitation to a halt, whilst liberal regimes stressing compromise and accommodation may create a soft nationalism concerned to have national identity within established borders. But his central point is reminiscent of Tocqueville: nationalism is likely to be strongest when political openness is followed by a sudden re-imposition of arbitary rule. Support for independence in Georgia blossomed literally over night after the Soviet attempt at repression — with this, together with a similar intervention in the Baltics, having powerful demonstration effects elsewhere. The analytic point is best expressed in terms of the categories made famous by Hirschman: exit is attractive when voice is denied, with some measure of loyalty being possible as the result of political inclusion. [33] Differently put, nationalism is a dialectical affair, with movements amongst Ruritanians very often resulting from the actions of those in the Megalomanian metropolis. One prime example of the independence of oppression as a explanatory factor can be found in Scotland: nearly two decades of rule by a party not supported locally, and one determined to destroy local government, stand behind the current resurgence of Scottish nationalism. A second example may well yet be provided by Belarus: nationalism is there becoming political and liberal, the opponent of Stalinist legacies — with the language itself something that nationalist leaders will force themselves to learn later, should their struggle prove to be successful.[34] All this is reminiscent of Austro-Hungary: the Dual Monarchy might have survived if a more liberal option had been taken by the regime, with the failure to do so leading political sub-units to become homogeneous linguistic and ‘ethnic’ blocs.

Charles Taylor is one of a very small handful of modern thinkers possessed of something like Gellner’s extraordinary intellectual range. Both shared a background in Oxford philosophy, and both consider the relations of epistemology to politics. It is perhaps this that leads to a certain similarity of argumentative style. Taylor broadly accepts Gellner’s functionalist argument about industrialisation, seeking to complement it with an appreciation of the functional requirements of democracy. Further, Taylor accepts that nationalism is pre-eminently modern. Although he has interesting points to make about the very varied nature of mass support for nationalism, the core of his case then privileges the reactive responses on the part of peripheral elites. It is at this point that Taylor subtly parts company with Gellner: nationalism is occasioned by discrimination on the part of the powerful. One example of this is the Quebecois nationalism with which he has always lived, seen here as the result of the relative instransigence of ‘the rest of Canada’.

But this is part of a much more general demand for dignity, one manifestation of which is that of Islamic fundamentalism. This very different philosophy of history leads to Taylor's now famous call for a 'politics of recognition', the purpose of which is to soften various ethnic and cultural demands by means of political inclusion. [35]

Alfred Stepan begins his discussion of multinational arrangements by placing Gellner within the history of liberalism more generally. A fundamental drift within liberalism asserts that it is necessary to solve the national question before liberal rule can be possible. Stepan is far too good an historical sociologist to disagree with this, as the recent book he has co-authored with Juan Linz makes exceedingly clear.[36] All the same, he wishes to consider the alternative possibility — that liberal arrangements may sufficiently soften demands for cultural diversity that they do not lead to full-scale secession. Such arrangements are especially vital, in his view, because most secessions create new problems of minorities — not least because the late twentieth century lends minorities staying power, as the result of diasporas sending money home and of external interest fanned by the international media. There is absolutely no doubt in Stepan's mind that human beings are capable of holding multiple identities, and that doing so encourages rather than undermines the consolidation of democracies. In this matter, he draws on striking evidence from Spain and the Baltics. But his tone is still cautious. A very great deal will depend upon the details of design.[37] If federalism leads to regional overrepresentation, it can lead to stalemate and blackmail. And if institutions matter, so too does our political theory. Stepan here follows Taylor and Kymlicka in arguing that greater attention be given by liberalism to communal rather than individual rights — an area in which there is sure to be intense debate in coming years. Behind these pleas, it is easy to see the nature of Stepan's fundamental hope. He certainly favours a measure of homogeneity, for he is well aware that loyalty is necessary for democracy: but that sharing can be at, so to speak, a high level, thereby allowing for greater cultural diversity within it. The civic nationalism of France and the United States had the capacity to be highly exacting, being as wedded to the nation-state as a moral project as has been ethnic nationalism. [38] Stepan is best seen as arguing for more civil arrangements, for a less romanticised, more domesticated view of the state as a home for nations.

It may be useful to assess this state-centred position so as then to compare it with Gellner's general viewpoint. Nobody doubts that uniformity makes the operation of a modern industrial and democratic society much easier. It is a fact, albeit a sad one, that the developmental tasks of Hungary, the Czech Republic and Poland are much eased thanks to the ethnic cleansings of Hitler and Stalin. None the less, the incidence of nationalism — the move from national identity to demands for secession, or, in a different formulation, the ability of some national markers to eventually create states — is definitely influenced by state activity. A corollary of this descriptive point is prescriptive practice, namely, a politics of recognising difference. We have some reason to believe that such politics can work. Had postcommunist Ukraine forcibly sought to build a unitary and homogenised nation-state it would surely have faced debilitating secessionist challenge: its more civil route makes it possible for us to at least hope that it will continue to survive. Equally, multilingual India seems to work, probably thanks to a three plus or minus one language regime — that is, one needs Hindi and English and a provincial language, with the minus applying to Hindi provinces and the plus to minorities within provinces. More generally, it should firmly be noted that the attempt to build unitary, homogenised nation-states in Africa has been a disaster — less a help to economic development than the principal ideological element explaining a period of catastrophe. [39]

Gellner's own late prescriptive arguments are rather different. His hope that different cultures could be allowed to flourish did not diminish his insistence that power remain politically centralised. As the provision of opera houses rather than the acceptance of political autonomy, of folk-dancing rather than of democracy, failed in both Austro-Hungary and the Soviet Union it is worth speculating as to why Gellner would not go any further. Gellner was a remorseless critic of the replacement of analysis by hope, and there remains enough to be said for his pessimism to make the state-centred view a challenge rather than a complete alternative. His general view that nationalism may lose its bite after the transition to modernity after all gains support from the discovery that accommodation by means of federal and consociational deals depends upon certain background conditions, lending it better chances in Holland than in South Africa.[40] Linguistic difference does raise difficulty: Quebec may yet secede from a relatively liberal regime, whilst the continued unity of India is not guaranteed. His refusal to endorse any view that placed too much hope on the best being realised can be seen in those final words of Nationalism on the principle of selfdetermination:

<quote>

Various procedures involved in applying [the idea of self-determination] cut across each other: is it demography, history, or geography which is to prevail? The application of the demographic principle (let the majority of the population be heard and be decisive) depends on how the electoral units are drawn, and this demarcation can easily be manipulated to render diverse answers. There is the not insignificant consideration of safety and security: our nation has been attacked before and probably will be attacked again, so can we tolerate a boundary which enables the enemy to cut the country in half with ease, or to shell the capital with small guns? There is the piquant principle invoked in Kosovo — can a nation be expected to separate itself from a piece of land which witnessed its greatest national disaster, even if that land is now largely inhabited by aliens? ... There is also the principle that even a cultural/national group which is not a majority anywhere, may nevertheless, or all the more, require to have a safe haven, shelter, base, somewhere ... In brief, the various criteria are almost always in conflict.[41]

</quote>

This stands as a prescient warning to philosophers now — of course, quite properly — seeking to establish principles of legitimacy for secession.[42] Bluntly, power and principle do not always coincide, and a large part of the task of social science needs to be limited to that of explaining the very difficult matter of how the world actually works.

Gellner’s mind seemed to be furnished with a set of cards, surprising use of which could be made when addressing particular issues. The last section of this book begins with two chapters addressing occasions when the playing of these cards was linked to his interpretation of nationalism. Gellner’s 1995 Conditions of Liberty is the text principally involved in both cases.

Gellner argued that the collapse of socialism involved the loss of a moral universe, and his analyses of postcommunist politics were thereafter concerned with what would come to fill the vacuum. He viewed this general situation with a great deal of apprehension, noting that civil society forces were slow to organise — in contrast to ethnic nationalist sentiment which seemed to him all-too-readily mobilisable. With the benefit of even a few years of hindsight, and in particular of a series of elections lost by nationalist demagogues, we can see that Gellner may have been wrong at this point. Nationalism has not swept over most of the former socialist bloc, perhaps in part because the absence of civil society made it rather hard to organise nationalist protest efficiently. [43] Part of the explanations for this statement has already been given, particularly by Mark Beissinger: nationalist protest derived far less from cultural bases than from political units with which a central state interacted.

Chris Hann disputed Gellner’s view of the nature of civil society on a previous occasion.[44] A background to his argument on this occasion is a precise anthropological account of the fate of east Galicia, and in particular of Premsyl. Hann notes the contrast already drawn, between the descriptive theory of Nations and Nationalism and the late admiration for Austro-Hungary, and insists that the former makes most sense of this area before 1918 given that state policies were neither passive nor liberal.[45] A still more fundamental contrast with Gellner’s general world view concerns the socialist period. Hann insists that a good deal of progressive social change took place in this period, moving society from rural hierarchy towards something like equality and inclusion. This stands behind his scepticism as to the benefits of the introduction of civil society: in so far as this means the arrival of capitalist market relations, Hann insists that it has merely diminished life chances and recreated hierarchies. What is especially noticeable for Hann is that western monies to support civil society groupings have been used to underwrite Polish right-wing nationalist groups opposed to the rights of Ukrainians. In a sense, Gellner knew all about this: a merit of his discussion of civil society is that it explicitly points out that mere societal self-organisation is no guarantee of civility. But it certainly was Gellner’s hope that the strengthening of society in eastern Europe would prevent the sudden emergence of the politics of rage.

Conditions of Liberty necessitates consideration of Islam since it argues forcefully that this religion may take the place of nationalism in large parts of the modern world. Gellner's thesis at this point was straightforward. Islam has within it a high tradition, stressing literacy and puritanism, that can be and is used by those wishing to modernise their societies. This means that Islamic societies can evade, as Taylor also notes, the awful choice between populism and westernisation: remaining true to their better selves allows them to enter the modern world. It is this that lends Islam, in Gellner's view, its secularisation-resistant quality, making it a major force to be reckoned with in the modern world.

This very striking view is open to the very basic rejoinder that Islamic societies in fact have a poor record of economic, social and political modernisation. But what matters here are the two rather different considerations raised by Brendan O'Leary. First, it may well not be the case that Islamic societies are resistant to pressures that derive from nationalism. O'Leary notes that Pakistan and Afghanistan remain subject to ethnic conflicts, and suggests that Islam may be tied with nationalism in South Asia rather than serving as an alternative to it. One might add to his analysis at this point a further objection: attempts to develop identities larger than the national — whether pan-Arab, Muslim or Shi'ite — have uniformly failed. Secondly, O'Leary wonders whether Islam is as secularisation resistant as Gellner imagined. Were it to be so, there would be a remarkable and uncomfortable contrast with the way in which Gellner hopes that achieved modernity will diminish the fervour of nationalism.

Dale Eickelman's account of Muslim politics takes direct issue with Gellner at this point. Gellner's view of lslamic civilisation was formed in the mid-l 960s, Eickelman correctly notes, and so is slightly insensitive to key changes that have taken place since then. Mass higher education has led to a plethora of societal organisations, many of which wish to reimagine Islam in very different forms. Eickelman insists that Islam is no longer unitary, going so far as to say that its varied characters result in largest part from the national contexts within which it interacts. By and large, Eickelman presents an optimistic view, noting that many Islamic movements favour democracy, for all that some wish to undermine it. History has not yet sat in judgement on this matter, and Gellner's pessimism may yet come to haunt us.

Nothing could be more Gellnerian in spirit, Rogers Brubaker correctly notes, than removal of intellectual detritus. His essay decisively refutes, through factual consideration and analytical clarification, six misconceptions about nationalism, so as to offer a comprehensive account of where nationalist studies are now going. Analysis of the first pair of misconceptions — that careful architecture can solve nationalism as against the view that it is endemic and dangerous — takes Brubaker close to Gellner's viewpoint. The second pair of misconceptions — the idea that nationalism is a 'return of the repressed' as against the view that it results from elite manipulation — is the result of debates in the most recent literature. None the less, Brubaker should be seen as arguing against Gellner's position. Broadly speaking, Brubaker belongs to the state-centred school of thought identified above — his particular contribution being to stress that nationalism in the former Soviet Union crystallised around the administrative units of that modern regime. But it is the fifth myth, that of groupism, that leads Brubaker to his largest and most original disagreement with Gellner. Brubaker believes that the high point of homogeneity for the nation-state may now be over: the end of conscription warfare and transnational migration may lead to multicultural societies that allow cultural difference within liberal limits. This leads to the final myth, much spread in fact by his own earlier work, according to which a useful binary contrast should be drawn between civic as against ethnic nationalism. [46] Brubaker seeks to replace this with the highly suggestive notions of state-framed and counter-state nationalisms.

[1] G. Cohen, The Politics of Ethnic Survival, Princeton, 1981.

[2] E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, pp. 58–62.

[3] E. Gellner, 'The Rest ofHistory', Prospect, May 1996, pp. 34–8.

[4] E. Gellner, ‘Nationalism in Eastern Europe’, New Left Review, no. 189, 1991.

[5] His growing interest in Malinowski can be seen easily by looking through the bibliography at the end of this volume. His most important arguments are contained in Language and Solitude: Wittgenstein, Malinowski and the Hapsburg Dilemma, Cambridge, 1998; but attention should also be given to ‘Two Escapes from History, or the Hapsburg Impact on British Thought’, in A. Bohnen and A. Musgrave, eds., Wege der Vernunft, Festschrift zum siebzigsten Geburtstag van Hans Albert, Tubingen, 1991.

[6] R. Szporluk, Communism and Nationalism, Oxford, 1988. Gellner’s Weberian view ofMarxism is in Thought and Change, London, 1965, pp. 136–9.

[7] E. Gellner, ‘The Dramatis Personae of History’, East European Politics and Society, vol. 4, 1990, reprinted as ‘Nationalism and Marxism’, in Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford, 1994.

[8] E. Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, Amsterdam, 1996, p. 626.

[9] A foretaste of Szporluk’s forthcoming magnum opus on Ukrainian history is ‘After Empire: What?’, Daedalus, vol. 123, 1994.

[10] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, p. 638.

[11] Smith’s claims were made in The Ethnic Origins of Nations, Oxford, 1986. A direct debate between Smith and Gellner on this point can now be found in Nations and Nationalism, vol. 2, 1996. But see too, Nationalism, London, 1997, pp. 90–101.

[12] E. Gellner, ‘An Alternative Vision’, in Encounters with Nationalism. The reader should note that this essay is taken from a larger piece, published later as ‘The Coming of Nationalism and its Interpretation: The Myth of Nation and Class’, in G. Balakrishnan, ed., Mapping the Nation, London, 1996.

[13] T. Nairn, The Break-Up of Britain, London, 1977.

[14] E. Gellner, ‘Nationalism, or the New Confessions of a Justified Edinburgh Sinner’, Political Quarterly, vol. 49, 1978.

[15] J. Plamenatz, ‘Two Types of Nationalism’, in E. Kamenka, ed., Nationalism: The Nature and Evolution of an Idea, London, 1973, discussed in E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, pp. 99–100. See Gellner’s Nationalism, pp. 59–62 for some further, slightly ad hoc comments about nationalist violence.

[16] A brilliant account and comparison of the reactionary and progressive nationalisms of the Basques and the Catalans is now available in J. D. Medrano, Divided Nations: Class, Politics, and Nationalism in the Basque Country and Catalonia, Ithaca, 1995.

[17] P. Anderson, ‘Science, Politics, Enchantment’ and M. Mann, ‘The Emergence of Modern European Nationalism’, first published in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., Transition to Modernity, Cambridge, 1992, and reprinted in Hall and Jarvie, The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner.

[18] A part of Gellner’s rejection of this claim is noted below, but see too ‘Reply to Critics’, pp. 623–39.

[19] D. Laitin, Identity in Formation: The Russian Speaking Populations in the Near Abroad, Ithaca, 1998.

[20] D. Laitin, Language Repertoires and State Construction in Africa, Cambridge, 1992.

[21] The books in question are Post-Marxist Alternatives (London, 1990), Back to Sociological Theory (London, 1990), and Sociological Theory: What Went Wrong? (London, 1995).

[22] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, pp. 629–30.

[23] Mann, ‘The Emergence ofModern European Nationalism’.

[24] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, p. 636.

[25] Ibid., pp. 626–7.

[26] Anderson, ‘Science, Politics, Enchantment’.

[27] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, pp. 627–8.

[28] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 43–50.

[29] R. Aron, Introduction to the Philosophy of History, London, 1961, p. 202.

[30] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, p. 637.

[31] M. Mann, Sources of Social Power. Volume Two: The Rise of Classes and Nation-States, 1760–1914, Cambridge, 1993.

[32] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, p. 637.

[33] A. O. Hirschman, Exit, Voice and Loyalty, Cambridge, MA, 1978.

[34] R. Szporluk, ‘Nationalism after Communism: Reflections on Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and Poland’, Nations and Natioralism, vol. IV, 1998.

[35] C. Taylor, ‘The Politics of Recognition’, in A. Gutmann, ed., Multiculturalism, Princeton, 1994.

[36] J. Linz and A. Stepan, Problems of Democratic Transition and Consolidation, Baltimore, 1996, especially ch. 2.

[37] This is a fertile area for research and theory, not least on the vexed question as to whether the provision of local institutions contains or serves as a launching pad for nationalism. A great deal seems to depend upon political style — that is, whether local institutions are the result of pressure rather than of generosity on the part of an intelligent state.

[38] For an analysis of the state as a moral project, see the excellent discussion in V. Perez-Diaz, The Return of Civil Society, Cambridge, MA, 1990.

[39] I draw on Laitin, Language Repertoires and State Construction in Africa for these points about India and Africa.

[40] J. McGarry and B. O’Leary, ‘Introduction: The Macro-political Regulation of Ethnic Conflict’, in J. McGarry and B. O’Leary, eds., The Politics of Ethnic Conflict Regulation, London, 1993, pp. 36–7.

[41] Gellner, Nationalism, pp. 104–6.

[42] For examples, see A. Buchanan, Secession, Boulder, 1992 and M. Moore, ed., Self-Determination and Secession, Oxford, 1997.

[43] See Jack Snyder’s forthcoming monograph on nationalism and democracy for a fully developed working out of this argument.

[44] C. Hann, ‘Gellner on Malinowski: Words and Things in Central Europe’, in Hall and Jarvie, The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, pp. 45–64. For Gellner’s response see ‘Reply to Critics’, pp. 675–8.

[45] It may be worth noting in passing that one of Gellner’s favourite novels, Joseph Roth’s superb The Radetzky March, is partly set in East Galicia. The novel by and large takes the same view as Nations and Nationalism — that the break-up of the empire was inevitable.

[46] R. Brubaker, Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany, Cambridge, MA, 1992.

* Part I: The mating of the theory

 1. Thoughts about change: Ernest Gellner and the history of nationalism

Roman Szporluk

... two of the great myths of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, namely Marxism and nationalism. [47]

Today, a third of a century since its publication in 1964, Thought and Change can be seen as Ernest Gellner's magnum opus, a work that contained the nucleus of not only Nations and Nationalism but also of an even later Plough, Sword and Book. [48] Its initial reception, however, appears to have been lukewarm: Brendan O'Leary says that Gellner's theory of nationalism presented there 'went largely unnoticed' among political scientists, philosophers and sociologists.[49] Something similar probably may be said also about its reception among historians. This chapter, however, is not even a beginning of an investigation of that question. Instead, this is a personal account, written twenty-eight years after the story began, of how one historian's encounter with Thought and Change, first read by him in 1968,[50] had put him on a 'train of thought' in the course of which he formed, for himself, a view of the history of nationalism and Marxism, which he then presented in his teaching and writing.

It is common for one book to become the stimulus for another writer to write another book in roughly the same area and on the same (or a related) topic. But in this case something different happened. Here a philosophical and sociological argument by a theorist inspired a historian to design a concrete historical investigation that was not even aimed at 'testing' the theorist's thesis, let alone at formulating another general proposition. Instead, Gellner's understanding of what nationalism is in general, led a historian to look at historical evidence in a way that enabled him (or so he thought), in accordance with criteria implicit in Gellner's argument, to identify a certain individual as a significant nationalist thinker. That 'discovery' in turn inspired a new reading of the life and ideas of another figure, representing another Weltanschauung, whose standing as a major thinker, unlike that of the former, had never been in question.

Paradoxically, this occurred under the inspiration of a scholar who insisted that nationalist thinkers ‘did not really make much difference’:

If one of them had fallen, others would have stepped into his place ... No one was indispensable. The quality of nationalist thought would hardly have been affected much by such substitutions. Their precise doctrines are hardly worth analyzing.[51]

The story does not end here, however. For that very scholar then wrote an essay in which he examined, seriously and sympathetically, the said nationalist thinker’s ideas.[52] But let us begin at the beginning.

 Reading Gellner

For me, Thought and Change was not an easy ‘read’ and I absorbed, and reacted to, some parts of it more actively than others. But as I worked my way through his argument, I realised that Gellner treated nationalism in a way I had not seen anywhere else — and that he was most strikingly original in establishing ‘genetic’ (not his adjective) connections between nationalism and Marxism that had remained hidden or obscure to other writers.

* Philosophy

Gellner’s aphoristic style — sentences that effortlessly turned themselves into memorable ‘quotations’ — helped an outsider to come to grips with the philosopher’s fundamental thesis. ‘Philosophy’, Gellner said, ‘is about industrialisation’. He then clarified his meaning in a footnote: ‘Or, if you like: philosophy is about the failure of 1789.’ To help those distressed or confused by the seeming paradox, Gellner was willing to reformulate his thought: he described philosophy as ‘an attempt to understand the nature, emergence, alternatives and implications of the kind of knowledge on which our society is based, and of that society itself’.[53] Elsewhere, he described philosophy as ‘general thought about man, society, and their place in the world, and thought of the kind which takes least for granted’.[54]

Gellner said that philosophy is about change, and the essence of change is industrialisation — the transition from agrarian to industrial world. According to him, that change was transforming the nature of the relationship between man and the surrounding world:

the features which differentiate the world of pre-industrial men from those of developed countries are far deeper than mere wealth alone, or the presence of steel mills, electricity, and so forth. What is at issue is something far bigger: a wholly new balance between being and knowing.[55]

Even while elsewhere in the book he said that ‘philosophy is about industrialisation’, Gellner made it clear that in his view it is not industry but science that defines the new age. Moreover, science is not a new religion replacing the old: ‘it was a mistake of the Enlightenment, and its nineteenth-century revolutionary successors, to suppose that science was rather like a religious synthesis — only truer and free of invocation of the extra-mundane.[56]

There was a fundamental difference between the philosophy of the modern age and the religion of the old:

In fact, science is radically and qualitatively different. Its manifest and regrettable characteristics ... include not only the now well-advertised essential incompleteness ... but also a kind of amorality, one might even say a moral dullness. It does not reveal a nature that rewards virtue and punishes vice, and in whose terms virtue and vice can be defined (in brief, a kind of decapitated version of the old Deity). There is no such lady. It reveals a world that supplies no morals, which at best indicates possibilities and excludes some others. No closed, meaningful, reliable cosmos emerges.[57]

Thus, if ‘science’ did not offer any guidance as to how the individual ora group should behave, and thus was not assuming the role of religion in old society, what authority did modern men and women have to rely on once they had lost religion as their guide? Was ‘philosophy’ a substitute, as a ‘practical’ or ‘applied’ science? Nor was it clear whether Gellner allowed that there might exist more than one kind of ‘philosophy’ whose business was ‘industrialisation’. He called liberalism and socialism the ‘two great currents of social thought brought into being by the earlier stages of the great transition’[58] but was ‘social thought’ as understood in this case another name for philosophy?

Questions of this kind did not bother me at the time when I was working my way through Thought and Change. I was not interested in the relationship between philosophy and science as he defined them and I paid little attention to his critique of liberalism, to which he gave considerable attention in his book. What mattered was his treatment of Marxism.[59]

* Marxism

As was to be expected, Gellner acknowledged that Marxism was concerned with those matters which he assigned to the domain of philosophy. It was understandable, therefore, that he turned to Marxism after an explication of his own position.

He recognised that Marxism was concerned with change, and was thus on the right track in identifying what was important, indeed crucial, about the modern period. ‘Marxism is still probably the best starting point for the understanding of the modern world. Not because its doctrines are true ... but because, on the whole, the questions it poses are the correct ones.’ He spoke with respect about Marx’s sociology — but he separated it from his ‘preposterous eschatology’.[60]

Gellner also acknowledged the special political status of Marxism as the legitimating ideology of a number of states: the ‘one official belief ... that comes some way towards incorporating the transition into the official Founding and Justifying Myth of these societies’.[61]

But being official did not make Marxism right. I was especially struck by Gellner’s remark on what he called the ‘two famous mistakes of Marxism’ and what, he said, they really were about:

two famous mistakes of Marxism — the expectation of continuing or even increasing misery of the proletariat, and the underestimation of nationalism — are really one mistake: if the proletariat in regions where the big wave has already passed remained near the starvation line ... then indeed it might feel solidarity with the new recruits to industrial misery.[62]

To appreciate the explosive content of this message, one needs to place it next to what Gellner had to say about nationalism and industrialisation or ‘change’: ‘Essentially, nationalism is a phenomenon connected not so much with industrialisation or modernisation as such, but with its uneven diffusion.’[63]

Let us follow Gellner’s thought — philosophy is about industrialisation, nationalism is about its uneven diffusion — to where it leads. A moment’s reflection makes one realise that since no other kind of diffusion is possible — diffusion must take place in time — Gellner is really saying: ‘Nationalism is about industrialisation.’ (I am sure it did not occur to me then to ask whether this meant that ‘philosophy equals nationalism’.)

It would be interesting to see if post-publication reviews and other critical commentaries on Thought and Change noted the anti-Marxist thrust of that work. For me, because of my prior exposure to MarxismLeninism, that was one of its most impressive elements. Gellner was challenging Marxism on its territory: the idea of uneven development had been a fixture in the repertory of Marxism-Leninism; every student of communism knew that Trotsky had argued, by invoking uneven development, for the communist revolution in what came to be called Third World countries. As late as the 1930s, Trotsky famously insisted that workers in Calcutta had much more in common with those of Manchester, and vice versa, than either did with their respective nation's 'bourgeoisie'. And here Professor Gellner came along to stand the famous Trotsky argument on its head! The solidarity of workers of advanced and underdeveloped countries was a myth, he said, and he implied further that for developing lands nationalism was the answer. It was good for them to be independent: 'if a politically united world were passing through the second, global, phase of industrialisation, this united world might well come to resemble the present condition of South Africa' .[64]

Modern industry was a child of science, Gellner was saying, but nationalism, not Marxism, was better suited to deal with the social and political aspects and consequences of industrialisation.

* Nationalism

It was obvious from the preceding that change and nationalism went hand-in-hand. Nationalism was a subversive, revolutionary force: as the wave of industrialisation and modernisation moves outward, it disrupts the previous political units. These are generally either small and intimate (village, tribe, feudal unit), or large but loose and ill-centralised (traditional empires, which of course contain the small intimate groupings as parts). [65]

In a footnote (some of his most revealing points were in the footnotes) Gellner introduced the concept of modernisation and explained how industrialisation was related to it:

The two are to be distinguished only as the narrower and wider aspects of the same phenomenon. Industrialisation proper may be preceded — in certain odd cases followed — by the trappings, terminology, expectations, slogans of industrial society. A complex of such anticipatory borrowings may have almost as much impact on a society as the thing itself. [66]

Later, the idea of ‘anticipatory borrowings’ would reappear when he recognised that some nations were ‘engendered by recent industrialism’, while others were engendered by ‘the shadow cast by its coming’.[67] Modernisation was obviously a broader concept than industrialisation.

It was in the realm of culture, including education, that ‘anticipatory borrowings’ took place and where industrialism’s coming cast its ‘shadow’. However, for Gellner culture is the foundation of industrial society, not only something very important in an industrialising one. Modernity calls for an educated person, education is attained in school, schools use different languages:

The importance of the ‘national’ differentiation, of what are in effect cultural definitions of group membership, hinges on the fact that development requires, above all, education, that it is in effect education which confers real citizenship, and that education must be in some medium, some culture, some ‘language’. [68]

In school one learned to work and one also learned to be a citizen:

the modern phenomenon — citizenship through education, group differentiae in terms of the language of instruction, and unmediated membership of mass co-cultural societies ... [69]

Thus, to Gellner, the language was more than a medium in which scientific-industrial knowledge was communicated. The medium was the message: ‘Language is, as Vico saw, more than a tool of culture, it is culture.’[70]

Nationalism recognised the crucial importance of education in the making of the modern person — i.e. an individual skilled to function in industrial society. While in agrarian society one learned the necessary skills while working in agriculture, in industrial society one learned not by working in a factory but by studying in school before going to work. And school, said Gellner, had to be national.

Gellner's approach helped one to see why education was the central battleground in nationality struggles in countries like the Habsburg monarchy. The struggle for language of instruction in school was not a diversion from the real issues such as suffrage or wages or land reform (which was what democrats, liberals and socialists were saying) but a fundamental struggle about the kind of persons that were being made — and thus about the limits of political units.

What Gellner had to say about 'anticipatory borrowings' and nations engendered by the 'shadow' of industry amounted to recognising that even while 'philosophy', that is, sociology and economics, was more important than history, something was still left for the historian to do. 'Anticipatory borrowings' meant ideas. A study of those ideas had a future, after all ...

 Studying history

There were personal or autobiographical circumstances which led me to find Gellner's position on nationalism so persuasive and so appealing. I had studied the intellectual evolution of Tomas G. Masaryk (1850–1937) and Gellner suddenly illuminated for me the larger stage on which my subject's life had taken its course.

At first, Masaryk proclaimed the necessity of a 'New Christianity'. (He read Saint-Simon and Comte during his youth, in the late 1860s. One of his teachers in Brno was a follower of Saint-Simon.) Then he gave up that new universal religion and proposed that science should become a new, needless to say, universal, religion. Finally, by the 1890s, without giving up his fundamental religious and philosophical ideas, Masaryk decided to present them in a package he called the Czech national philosophy. Only with that last move, only by going national, did Masaryk acquire a potential constituency and at least a prospect of political influence. He could preach his vision of what it meant to be human only by telling certain people that he was teaching them what it meant to be Czech. [71]

If Masaryk had provided me with what was one case of an originally religious figure's seemingly inevitable march to nationalism, Russia/ USSR supplied the story of a Marxist historian, M. N. Pokrovsky (1868–1932), who attempted 'rescuing history from the nation', [72] and from 1917 until his death enjoyed the status, with Lenin's approval, of the leader of new Soviet historical science. But then, in 1934, he was condemned by the new Stalinist orthodoxy that put Marxism-Leninism in the service of new Russian-cum-Soviet imperial patriotism. [73]

Gellner seemed to be telling me that there was some regularity (Gesetzmassigkeit or zakonomernost) in what happened in the cases I studied: the futility, or so it looked, of two very different attempts to ignore or to overcome nationalism, the impossibility of transcending the nation in modern thought and politics.

* Teaching

It was obvious I had to share my discovery of Gellner with my students. Back in school, at the University of Michigan, I organised an undergraduate colloquium, under the title 'Theories of Nationalism', in which Thought and Change was the principal text; and in conjunction with its themes other readings were selected. (Topics of several of the weekly sessions were presented via quotations from the book. Thus, one week's theme was 'Philosophy is about industrialisation.' The next was: 'Or, ifyou like: philosophy is about the failure of 1789.')

That colloquium underwent revisions over several years and then was succeeded by 'Socialism and Nationalism', a lecture course with, I thought, a broader appeal. The main idea, however, remained the same. Students were told that socialism and nationalism operated in a world being transformed by industry, and both were equally ‘responses’ to it and attempts to explain the failure of ‘1789’; these two world-views differed, however, in that one spoke for the underdog and the other for the outsider. (I would hasten to add that later in the term we would deal with situations in which outsiders and underdogs were, or thought themselves to be, the same.)

This was a course in which nationalism and Marxism were given equal standing. Nationalism or the national question was not treated as a problem (that is, a distraction from serious matters) for the Marxists to ‘solve’ — which was how college courses on Marxism dealt with nationalism. [74] Here, nationalism was recognised as a view and a movement which had in common with Marxism a concern with the modern world: industrialisation/modernisation and its consequences. Nationalism was another — alternative — interpretation of the world and a rival programme for its transformation.

* Learning

It was one thing to make assumptions and issue declarations, and another to furnish individuals and ideas capable of doing for nationalism what Marx, Engels and their followers (whose names my students had at least heard) did for socialism. Preparation for it took some time and effort.

When I walked into the forest of nationalism I did so with at least some idea on how to recognise those trees that I needed to find. From Gellner I had received a standard for comparing and ‘grading’ nationalist thinkers of the nineteenth century. Which ones had understood — or, anticipated? — what Gellner was teaching us now? Which one/s knew what nationalism was all about, without having read Gellner?

If nationalism was what Gellner said it was — and the relevant citations above had made me a convert to his interpretation — I reasoned that there should have been at least some nationalists who had at least intuitively been on the right track before Gellner. There must have been some, that is, who had grasped the connection between the condition of their nation, the nationalist's proper main concern, on the one hand, and the uneven diffusion of industrialisation, a universal process, on the other. In short: my task was to find a Gellner before Gellner.

Just as before Marx and scientific socialism there had been various 'Utopian' currents, in my study (and then presentation) of nationalism I found 'Utopian' nationalist thinkers and currents. Just as Utopian socialists idealised the past social order and the village commune where it still survived, so, I argued, did Utopian nationalists do the same about the distant national past and the village culture of their time, and they rejected industrialisation and change. 'Scientific nationalism', by contrast, built its programme on the acceptance of the inevitability and desirability of industrialisation. While it was evident that in actual historical cases the distinction between the two kinds of nationalism was not always sharp, for some 'Utopians' had intuitively arrived at important and correct insights (Herder was an obvious example), I needed someone who clearly understood that 'philosophy is about industrialisation'. After reading in secondary literature and after going to original writings of major figures themselves, I decided I could close my search. It was Friedrich List. [75]

More than any nationalist thinker I had encountered, I concluded, List deserved the rank of leading theorist, perhaps founder, of 'scientific nationalism'. At times I called his system generic nationalism for it could be adopted by any nation facing an industrialising world. This generic nationalism, or the 'algebra of nationalism', which List invented, could be learned and applied by any nationalist currents and movements for they in relation to it represented just so many different 'arithmetics'.[76] I suspect this mathematical analogy made little if any sense, but it helped me to clarify my argument about an underlying commonality in all 'scientific' nationalisms. For the same purpose, I drew on List's own life and career as an illustration of universal applicability of his system: List had begun (and ended) his public life as a German nationalist but also found time to be a theorist and practitioner of American nationalism as well, and even managed to offer to the French some free advice on how they could make France stronger. To make the symmetry between the two Weltanschauungen perfect, I needed a nationalist figure to ‘compare and contrast’ with Marx. If List had not existed it would have been necessary to invent him. ‘The Marx of nationalism’, I could tell my students, ‘was Friedrich List’.

The ‘discovery’ of List called for a fresh look at, perhaps a reexamination of, Marx’s biography. If List was what he appeared to have been, one reasoned, Marx ought to have known, and have said something about, him. It was reasonable to suspect that the young Marx should have not only had some opinions on German nationalism of his time but he should have been especially interested in List because of List’s view of industrialisation in the setting of a world market. But, as I was soon to learn, standard works on Marx were not interested in the question of young Marx and German nationalism, and had nothing or almost nothing to say about Marx’s knowledge of or opinions on Friedrich List (only Harold Laski seemed to have noticed a polemic with List in The Communist Manifesto).[77] Undeterred, and seeing myself similar to the astronomer who senses that there must be an unaccounted-for celestial body somewhere in the space because the movements of known planets cannot be explained otherwise, I felt an important piece — German nationalism before 1848, and specifically Marx’s relation to List — was missing in the accounts of Marx and Marxism. I went to work and found that Marx had known List — and, much better than I had imagined; Marx had even read List’s critique of Adam Smith before reading Adam Smith himself. (Even their careers intersected at one point: Marx took a job that List had been offered first, but declined.) I had a subtitle for my book: Karl Marx versus Friedrich List.

 History of nationalism ... and Marxism?

In an essay titled ‘An Alternative Vision’, first published in 1992, Gellner reaffirmed the original message of Thought and Change. ‘History is neither the conflict of classes nor of nations.’[78] The development of nations and the change in class relations do not take place in two distinct and independent realms: ‘in reality, both are aspects of one single transition’. [79] Thought and Change carried the same message already in the 1960s. If one took seriously Ernest Gellner’s thought about change, I concluded, this was how one should teach — and write — the intellectual history of the nineteenth century. It was therefore under his inspiration, or what I took it to be, that I decided to treat communism and nationalism together, as entities enjoying equal status and, more importantly, as dealing with the same subject.

This being evident to Gellner (and his readers) did not mean it was evident to nationalists or Marxists of the past. Their philosophical and ideological principles and assumptions presumably were impediments to their seeing the full picture and meaning of the process, even if they also stimulated them to see correctly, realistically, one or the other aspect of the single process: these nationalists and Marxists may have resembled those men in a famous tale who, with their eyes tied, were asked to touch and then to describe an elephant. (Perhaps Gellner would have corrected this analogy to say that nationalism and Marxism see the world with one eye, right or left, open: consequently, nationalism sees one side of the picture, and Marxism the other.)

For obvious reasons (one of them clarity), the ideas of one key fgure, Marx, had to be presented in one part of the book, and those of List in another. But as my story moved on from List and Marx to their successors and followers, it was becoming harder, sometimes impossible, to isolate in separate chapters socialist figures and their ideas from their nationalist rivals. Some ‘nationalists’ spoke and acted like (sometimes even as) Marxists, while in other cases ‘Marxists’ could be equally legitimately labelled as nationalists. This was the case in nineteenth and early twentieth-century Europe, for example in Bulgaria and in Italy, and even more so in Russia. But the original boundaries between Marxism and nationalism became quite blurred in the post-1945 colonial and postcolonial world, where some of the central ideas of List came to be attributed to Marx under the label of ‘dependency theory’. After this and other similar revelations, I was prepared to believe Dieter Senghaas that List had been ‘an early Maoist’.[80]

But as I learned while writing my book and then continuing to read on these topics thereafter, one did not need to go to Mao or to dependency theory in Latin America to see cases of a convergence between nationalism and Marxism or between any of these two and social science. In Europe two relevant examples are provided by Max Weber and Antonio Gramsci.

Weber's Olympian stature as a scholar may have been one of the reasons why nationalism in his thought was overlooked. A number of publications have corrected this view and I feel safer now than I did when in response to Benedict Anderson's remark that 'nationalism did not produce its grand thinkers: no Hobbeses, Tocquevilles, Marxes or Webers', I wrote: 'The Weber of nationalism was Weber.'[81]

In his recent book on Russian politics, Jeremy Lester analyses Gramsci's argument 'that social classes which exist at the economic level are not necessarily duplicated at the political level' and that 'the process of articulating a collective will able to effect a political hegemony in society' requires first 'the ability to create "inter-class" political subjects'. Gramsci further argued, Lester continues, that 'victory in a hegemonic struggle' will be achieved when 'a collective will' becomes a 'popular religion': by this Gramsci means, according to Lester, that this will happen when a collective will 'becomes imbued in the national consciousness of a given society'.[82] Lester and other scholars provide support for the argument that Gramsci's Marxist ideas can be 'converted' or 'translated' to communicate something important in the language of nationalism. (In that language, societies with the 'interclass' political subjects postulated by Gramsci are called nations.) It seems legitimate to see in the grandfather of Eurocommunism also a theorist of nation-building and also a figure in the Risorgimento tradition.[83]

Such trans-ideological convertibility was exactly what should have been taking place if the world was as Gellner described and interpreted it. Since Marxism and nationalism were concerned with 'aspects of one single transition', the more original, the more open-minded thinkers of one school should have been driven by the logic of their pursuit to set aside ideological blinkers imposed on them by their respective outlook and to enter the others' territory. Ideas of those who did so especially successfully, one might further reason, would not only be 'translatable' or 'convertible' into the language of the other current but would enter a common knowledge about history, society and politics. Step by step, the walls separating what Gellner called ‘political myth’ (see the epigraph to this paper) from what he termed ‘a social current’ and that from ‘philosophy’ would be dismantled.

 Epilogue

Indeed, as I see it today, Gellner had anticipated something of this kind himself. At a time when the USSR appeared to the world as a Marxist success story, he speculated that ‘though there may be little to suggest that the Soviet state will wither away, there may be some hope that Marxism itself will do so’. It would end up, he thought, occupying ‘the kind of modest place in Russian national pride, patriotism and disbelief, as do traditional faiths in the life of other nations’.[84] In other words, Marxism would become an item in the repertoire of Russian nationalism. But then in Gellner’s view Marxism in Russia had performed the function of nationalism from the beginning: ‘It is nationalists above all who flirt with Marxism’;[85] ‘Marxism is not intended for the overcoming of the ills of industrialism: its role is to bring them about. Marxist revolutions precede, and do not follow, industrial development.[86] Russia’s Marxist revolution had been engendered by the diffusion of industrialisation and once in power it carried industrialisation out to a successful completion: this accomplishment proved it was nationalist! QED.

But, it is also evident to me — now, decades following the publication of his opus, during which major works on nationalism by other scholars have also appeared — that Gellner overlooked some other important things. First, perhaps forgivably at the time, he ignored the non-Russian nationalities in the USSR and their national ideas and ideals. Secondly, he did not consider the possibility that the Russians themselves might have other ideas, besides the official one, about their national identity. Even less did he allow the more general proposition, namely that in nationalist intellectual debates important issues were considered and then resolved as some visions of the nation established themselves as dominant. He thus refused to concede what Gramsci had acknowledged after traversing a very different intellectual journey: national identity is a subject of intranational contestation and the ideological sphere is a battlefield in the struggle for hegemony within the nation.

To admit this required recognising that nationalist ideas and nationalist thinkers did matter. Such an admission would have been perfectly compatible with Gellner's acceptance of nationalism's correct appreciation of what industrialisation was doing to society. Why not allow that nationalism attracted minds at least as bright as those drawn to Marxism? But while bright minds tend to disagree even when they share some basic views, their disagreements are not always a waste of time. To the best of my knowledge Gellner never said that Marxist ideas did not matter, that the controversies between Bernstein and Luxemburg, between Lenin and Plekhanov or Martov, and so forth, did not contribute to the eventual determination of what Marxism became when in power. Why did he not concede the same importance to nationalist debates and struggles for the definition of national identities and national policies? (But then this may be wrong: when he spoke about Marx's 'preposterous eschatology', which for real believers makes Marx, Marx, he showed that his failure to do justice to nationalism was matched by the same in regard to Marxism.)

To understand Gellner's lack of attention to conflict and cooperation within the particular ethnic group in the process of its formation as a modern nation one needs to bear in mind the larger framework in which he viewed the nation-making process. According to Ronald Findlay, 'in common with much of nineteenth-century evolutionary type of thinking', Gellner treated states and nations as 'the collective units ... lined up on parallel tracks with the trains leaving at successive dates'. This explains why 'any interaction between the units in either conflict or cooperation' is missing in Gellner's account.[87]

There is merit in Findlay's point. It is, as the Russians say, no accident that one of Gellner's last books, Plough, Sword and Book, was subtitled The Structure of Human History. What excited him was Change, the global transition from Agraria to Industria. In this regard Gellner's real precursor or Doppelganger was neither List nor Marx but the man who inspired them both. Henri de Saint-Simon was a great interpreter and the prophet of industrial civilisation. (I have often wondered why that name is missing from all the books of Gellner's I have seen.) But what Saint-Simon had seen as a future Gellner knew as a recent past and the present, and thus, unlike the former, he had to explore the connection between industry and nationalism and Marxism.

In other words, Gellner had to deal with a history that was not reducible to sociology. As a historical phenomenon in Central and Eastern Europe, the transition from Agraria to Industria took place as transition from the ancient empire of ‘Megalomania’ to new nationstates, such as ‘Ruritania’ and its siblings. (‘Megalomania’, of course, was the Habsburg monarchy, and Gellner’s own Czechoslovakia was one of the ‘Ruritanias’.) But he paid little attention to intranational and international relations, including situations, common in East Europe, when one and the same ethnic group was an object of rival nationbuilding efforts at the same time — invoking different ethnic, historic and political arguments for its cause and proposing different national responses to modernity. [88] Perhaps because it fitted so ill under any broader type, Poland is also conspicuously absent on his map of nationalism: the Poles had their own elite even when they were under foreign rule, their nationalism had by far anteceded industrialisation, and at no time could they be called an ‘awakening nation’. (Their condition could rather be diagnosed as national insomnia.) Gellner touched upon the condition of Poland indirectly, in an essay on the Polish anthropologist Bronislaw Malinowski, who spent his youth under Austrian rule. (He seems to have written more on him than on all the other Poles combined. Did he detect some similarities between the Pole’s and his own life path?)[89] His view of the monarchy, even though it had been destined, in his scheme, to be replaced by new nations, was not all negative: the empire of the Habsburgs was a ‘kindergarten of nations’.[90]

This was brilliant. But the empire was also something else. It contained also nations or parts of nations which on Gellner’s timetable (not to mention their conduct) were long past kindergarten. But he was less ready to recognise that modernisation profoundly affected also the so-called ‘old continuous nations’ — that they too were undergoing a crisis during the transition to modernity, as they faced the task of creating their nation-states on the ruins of their respective imperial ‘Megalomanias’.

As Findlay points out, in Gellner’s view ‘there could be no such a thing as “old industrial country” nationalism’. For Gellner, nationalism was ‘exclusively an “ideology of delayed industrialisation” ... associated with a movement against an alien ruling elite’.[91] But Francis Joseph I, the monarch under whose ‘auspices’ (sub auspiciis imperatoris) the young Malinowski received his degree at the University of Cracow, and whose many titles included that of Grand Duke of Cracow, had among his subjects also Adolf Hitler, and was also titled Duke of Auschwitz. When it came to actual life experience, nobody needed to tell Ernest Gellner that ‘modernity’ had had another side and had been the source of problems other than discontents arising from industrialisation. He recognised, as we saw, ‘not only the now well-advertised essential incompleteness ... but also a kind of amorality, one might even say a moral dullness’ of science. ‘It reveals a world that supplies no morals, which at best indicates possibilities and excludes some others. No closed, meaningful, reliable cosmos emerges.’[92] But when he commented on this aspect of the world — which I think he did rarely in print — he did so in a different genre from the academic. Without claiming to know sufficiently well his published works, it appears to me that his essay on Hannah Arendt, ‘From Konigsberg to Manhattan (or Hannah, Rahel, Martin and Elfriede, or, Thy Neighbour’s Gemeinschaft)’, presents most completely Gellner’s view of that other side of history from the age of the Enlightenment to Hitler.[93] But his own system, his grand vision of global scientific and industrial transformation, did not allow for the possibility ofAuschwitz, or the Gulag, and did not claim to have an ex-post explanation of their occurrence.

 Notes

I would like to thank Anatoly Khazanov and John A. Hall for their encouragement and suggestions; also Patrice M. Dabrowski and Benjamin R. Frommer.

[47] E. Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford, 1994, p. 199.

[48] According to John A. Hall, when commenting on an earlier draft of this paper, Legitimation of Belief and The Psychoanalytic Movement and ‘maybe others’ are ‘contained therein quite as much’.

[49] B. O’Leary, ‘Ernest Gellner’s Diagnoses of Nationalism: A Critical Overview’, or, ‘What is Living and What is Dead in Ernest Gellner’s Philosophy of Nationalism’, this volume, p. 46.

[50] I ordered a copy of Thought and Change from Blackwell whilst in Vienna, after finding an intriguing reference to it in some weekly. (I had first heard of Ernest Gellner in 1959, when I was a newly arrived student in England, but I did not read his Words and Things then and did not much follow the polemic it generated.) In Vienna, I was studying the life and thought of Masaryk (see note 25 below), and had planned to spend a major part of my research leave in Prague; 21 August 1968 made it Vienna only.

[51] E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, p. 124. B. O’Leary, ‘On the Nature of Nationalism: An Appraisal of Ernest Gellner’s Writings on Nationalism’, in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, Amsterdam, 1996, p. 103, speaks of ‘Gellner’s contempt for nationalist doctrine’.

[52] E. Gellner, ‘Nationalism and Marxism’, in Encounters with Nationalism. This review article of R. Szporluk, Communism and Nationalism: Karl Marx versus Friedrich List, Oxford and New York, 1988 was originally published in East European Politics and Societies, vol. 4, 1990.

[53] E. Gellner, Thought and Change, London, 1965, p. 72.

[54] Ibid., p. 74.

[55] Ibid., p. 72. Further clarification and elaboration of his meaning was given on p. 74, and in a footnote to that page.

[56] Ibid., pp. 122–3.

[57] Ibid., p. 123.

[58] Ibid., p. 117.

[59] Ibid., p. 126.

[60] Ibid., p. 126.

[61] Ibid., p. 126. Italics in the original.

[62] Ibid., p. 172. Italics in the original.

[63] Ibid., p. 166.

[64] Ibid., p. 178.

[65] lbid.,p. 171.

[66] Ibid., p. 17 ln.

[67] Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, p. 11. My emphasis.

[68] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 172.

[69] Ibid., p. 173.

[70] Ibid., p. 195.

[71] R. Szporluk, ‘Masaryk in Search of Authority’, Canadian Slavonic Papers, vol. 7, 1965. I developed this interpretation more fully in The Political Thought of Thomas G. Masaryk, Boulder, 1981, especially in ch. 4, ‘Religion as Nationalism’.

[72] This is borrowed from P. Duara, Rescuing History from the Nation: Questioning Narratives of Modern China, Chicago and London, 1995.

[73] R. Szporluk, ‘Pokrovsky’s View of the Russian Revolution’, Slavic Review, vol. 26, 1967 and M. N. Pokrovskii, Russia in World History: Selected Essays, ed. with an introduction by R. Szporluk, trans. R. Szporluk and M. A. Szporluk, Ann Arbor, 1970.

[74] To my knowledge, the many books with Marxism (or socialism) and nationalism in the title are without exception about what Marxists have had to say about nationalism. R. Munck’s The Difficult Dialogue: Marxism and Nationalism, London, 1986 is a monologue.

[75] I had heard of List before reading Gellner, of course, and the history of nationalism was not a tabula rasa for me when, with Gellner’s guidebook in hand, I started my journey of discovery. But Gellner supplied the instrument that permitted me to locate List as the central figure in the nationalist constellation. I do not know of works in which comparisons are drawn between any aspects of Gellner’s and List’s thought — with the exception of Ugo Pagano, who argues (‘Can Economists Explain Nationalism?’, in A. Breton, G. Galeotti, P. Salmon and R. Wintrobe, eds., Nationalism and Rationality, Cambridge, 1995, p. 175n) that List had ‘anticipated some considerations on the role of the nation in the organisation of the division of labour that have been later independently developed by Gellner’.

[76] My search for a ‘generic’ nationalism had obviously been stimulated by Anthony Smith’s argument on nationalism’s ‘core doctrine’. On this, see A. D. Smith, Theories of Nationalism, New York, 1973, pp. 20–4 and Szporluk, Communism and Nationalism, pp. 93–4.

[77] H. J. Laski, ‘Introduction’, to K. Marx and F. Engels, The Communist Manifesto, New York, 1982, pp. 50–1.

[78] Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, p. 199. Italics in the original.

[79] Ibid., p. 195. Italics in the original.

[80] D. Senghaas, ‘Friedrich List und die neue internationale okonomische Ordnung’, Leviathan, vol. 3, 197 5, p. 297, quoted in Szporluk, Communism and Nationalism, p. 274n. Senghaas may be going a bit too far but there is a trace of Gellner here: List and Mao alike were concerned with late modernisers/industrialisers. Wasn’t List’s idea of ‘the world city’ (his characterisation of England) that was exploiting a ‘global village’ Maoist? (Or should we call Mao a late Listian?).

[81] ‘Preface’ to Communism and Nationalism, (1991, pbk.) p. vi. O’Leary, ‘Ernest Gellner’s Diagnoses of Nationalism’, p. 87, thinks it ‘strange’ that Anderson ‘fails to classify Weber as a nationalist grand thinker, stranger still that Rousseau, Burke, J. S. Mill and Friedrich List are not seen as nationalist grand thinkers ... ‘ In a recent article on Marx, List and Smith (‘The World of Nations: Some Economic Implications of Nationalism’, Critical Review, vol. 9, 1995) Liah Greenfeld adds more names. While Greenfeld restates the interpretation of Marx given in her Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity (Cambridge, MA, 1992), see pp. 577–9 and 581–2 of the new article for her view of nationalism in Adam Smith.

[82] J. Lester, Modern Tsars and Princes: The Struggle for Hegemony in Russia, London, 1995, pp. 7–8.

[83] Gramsci's well-known and often-cited 'Marxist' analyses of the October 1917 revolution in Russia and its aftermath show that the Bolshevik seizure of power took place in a country in which nation-building had not yet taken place. See Lester, Modern Tsars and Princes, pp. 19–21 and Walter Adamson, Hegemony and Revolution: A Study of Antonio Gramsci's Political and Cultural Theory, Berkeley, 1980, p. 221, whom Lester cites. R. Bellamy, Modern Italian Social Theory: Ideology and Politics from Pareto to the Present, Oxford, 1987 writes on Gramsci's place in the history of Italian nation-formation.

[84] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 125.

[85] Ibid., p. 135.

[86] Ibid., p. 137.

[87] R. Findlay, 'Notes on the Political Economy of Nationalism', in Breton, Galeotti, Salmon and Wintrobe, Nationalism and Rationality, p. 149.

[88] To take an extreme example: the 'Ruthenes' of Hungary before 1918 were being told at various times that, on the basis of certain 'objective' criteria, they were Hungarian, or Ukrainian, or Russian, or Ruthene or Austrian. (Because a supra-ethnic, 'imperial-Austrian' national identity was not created, or did not survive for long, we should not forget that there were times when serious attempts were being made to promote such a national identity. On this matter, see W. Leitsch, 'East Europeans Studying History in Vienna (1855–1918)', in D. Deletant and H. Hanak, eds., Historians as Nation-Builders: Central and South-East Europe, London, 1988.) In such situations, choosing one nationality against others implied making choices in politics, in attitudes towards ‘industrialisation’, and so forth, because some nationalisms were more ‘scientific’ and others more ‘Utopian’.

[89] [Editorial Note: Roman Szporluk’s guess can now be answered positively: see E. Gellner, Language and Solitude: Wittgenstein, Malinowski, and the Hapsburg Dilemma, Cambridge, 1998.)

[90] Gellner, ‘A Non-nationalist Pole’, Encounters with Nationalism, p. 78.

[91] Findlay, ‘Notes on the Political Economy ofNationalism’, p. 148.

[92] Gellner, Thought and Change, pp. 122–3.

[93] E. Gellner, Culture, Identity and Politics, Cambridge, 1987.

 2 Ernest Gellner’s diagnoses of nationalism: a critical overview, or, what is living and what is dead in Ernest Gellner’s philosophy of nationalism?

Brendan O ‘Leary

The theoretical problem is to separate the quite spurious ‘national’ and ‘natural’ justifications and explanations of nationalism, from the genuine, time- and context-bound roots of it. (Ernest Gellner, Thought and Change)[94]

Nationalism, so far the most potent principle of political legitimacy in the modern world, holds that the nation should be collectively and freely institutionally expressed, and ruled by its conationals. In numerous essays and four books, Ernest Gellner, an exceptionally brilliant, fluent, prolific and witty philosopher, anthropologist, sociologist and multilingual polymath provided lucid and persuasive accounts of why nationalism is a necessary component of modernity, and why it is its typical and major principle of political legitimacy.[95] This chapter seeks to provide a preliminary posthumous analysis of Gellner’s legacy. It needs little justification since all worthwhile subsequent writing and research on nationalism will benefit from Gellner’s work, whether they build on his presumptions or dissent from them.

Gellner’s arguments about nationalism disturbed both conservatives and secular rationalists. The reasons are not hard to find. Nationalism relegates religion to a secondary, and even inessential, principle of a stable and legitimate political order and thus challenges traditionalist conservatism. Nationalism also suggests that law, reason, utility, material prosperity and social justice are secondary principles in establishing a stable and legitimate political order, and has therefore provoked persistent condemnation from rationalist liberals and socialists for some two hundred years.[96] Gellner’s writings on nationalism were a sustained criticism of one very pious Oakeshottian conservative, the late Elie Kedourie; but they were also intended to reassure rationalist liberals (including social democrats). One question is whether he provided the right reassurances.

This chapter scrutinises the core arguments of Gellner’s Thought and Change, Nations and Nationalism and Nationalism. His other writings on the subject are treated in parentheses. This textual focus is not difficult to justify. Nations and Nationalism was Gellner’s most elaborate statement on the subject; and was largely a rich expansion of the themes first sketched in Thought and Change. His last work, Nationalism, completed but not published in the summer before his death, does not repudiate the key propositions advanced in Nations and Nationalism. However, it does contain some tacit and important qualifications, as well as elaborations, of his views — as did his Encounters with Nationalism, a late collection of essays and reviews, and as did his ‘Reply to Critics’, who included this author, in The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, edited by J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie. Benefiting from these late writings this chapter will close by answering the question in the subtitle above.

 Thought and Change

Gellner’s first extensive statement on nationalism asserted that both liberalism and Marxism got it wrong.[97] Most liberals assumed nationalism was a doomed legacy of outmoded irrationalism, superstition and savagery; most Marxists thought it was a necessary but temporary stage in the path to global socialism. They were both a touch previous in their assumptions. Indeed, while Marxism, as an organised ideocracy, is now fast heading towards its grave and political liberalism is wracked with self-doubt, nationalism seems in vigorous and rude health.

Marxism and liberalism were not wrong, however, because two other popular theories are right, namely ‘Dark Gods theory’ and ‘naturality theory’. Dark Gods theory has it that nationalism is the inevitable expression of the atavistic, irrationalist passions that motivate human beings — an original sin.[98] Gellner rejected this idea as ‘utter nonsense’, even when it included sensible premises like the importance of belonging, identification and exclusion in human behaviour.[99] That human beings have always been organised in groups with loyalty-instilling capacities must be distinguished from their more recent and historically novel propensity to identify with the modern anonymous nation. Naturality theory has it that people have nationalities in the way that they have eyebrows and blood groups; that it is natural that those who share a nationality should wish to share the same political unit; and this is a good thing. Gellner, by contrast, insisted on the contingency of nationalism. It is, however, underpinned by social foundations: ‘there are undoubtedly overwhelmingly powerful factors in the contemporary and recent social conditions which do make these [nationalist] suppositions ... natural and probably irresistible’.[100]

Gellner rejected naturality theory and Kedourie’s idealist argument that nationalism is the result of a world-historical intellectual error: an accidental and bad set of ideas, loosely derived from Kant, and disseminated by philosophical incompetents with disastrous consequences. [101] Contrary to the assumption of the naturality of nationalism, the typical political units for most of history were not animated by nationalist principles — which did not feature in small tribal or village units, city states, feudal entities, dynastic empires or in the loose moral empires of a shared religion. Premodern political units rarely, and only accidentally, coincided with those of ‘nations’,

‘i.e. linguistic and cultural boundaries’.[102] Within them the nationality of the governors was not a fundamental issue of legitimacy; the governed simply asked of their rulers whether they were ‘less corrupt and grasping, or more just and merciful’ than their predecessors.[103] Now, to use the nouns of social anthropologists, the relationships between ‘structure’ and ‘culture’ are utterly changed. Nationalism is a principle of political legitimacy for us precisely because culture has become so important that it ‘does not so much underline structure: rather, it replaces it’.[104]

Once social ‘structure’, i.e., social roles, were tightly circumscribed, nested and ascriptive, and for this reason shared linguistic and cultural communication was not essential to the preservation of social order and effective interaction; but now social roles are open and changeable, and ‘those who communicate must speak the same language, in some sense or other’, and the classification of people by ‘culture’ is classification by ‘nationality’.[105] The negative social foundations of nationalism are thus explained by the erosion of rigid social structures. A shared culture has become much more important in creating and sustaining social cohesion than it was. The positive social foundations are explained by economies of scale in the production of literate citizens by state-sponsored educational systems. The minimal political unit, formerly circumscribed by defence or economic requirements, ‘is now determined by the preconditions of education’, [106] which means it must be larger than the family, village and city-state. Moreover, the relevant educational system must operate ‘in some medium, some language (both in the literal and the extended sense)’ .[107] Literacy, an essential aspect of a normally socialised modern human being, is generated by state-sponsored educational systems, which are multiply facilitated if the idioms of the home and the school are the same. In turn, modern educational systems explain the cultural identifications that move so many human beings. These identifications are, however, historically recent and novel, and are not (authentically?) nostalgic: modern people ‘do not in general become nationalists from sentiment or sentimentality, atavistic or not, well-based or myth-founded: they become nationalists through genuine, objective, practical necessity, however obscurely recognised’. [108]

Thought and Change provided a schematic account of why modern loyalty-invoking units are not very small and local, like tribal, feudal or classical units: functioning educational systems have to operate on a broader scale; and of why they are cultural units: a shared culture is an indispensable feature of a modern social system. Gellner went one stage further and asked why these cultural units tend to be smaller than those of agrarian religious civilisations (e.g., Christendom or Islam), even though these wider civilisations could have furnished a shared language or culture. In other words, he sought to explain the divisiveness of nationalism — why it fractures wider political entities, such as the empires of the ancien regime. His answer was that ‘nationalism is a phenomenon connected not so much with industrialisation or modernisation as such, but with its uneven diffusion’. [109]

The uneven impact of successive waves of industrialisation and modernisation generate sharp stratifications between peoples that are not hallowed by custom, that are not easily politically regulated, but that are remediable through ‘national’ secession. Intelligentsias that experience blocked social mobility, and who share cultural traits with proletarians experiencing multiple humiliations in urban environments, and discrimination in labour markets, provide the personnel for nationalist movements. They seek to establish their own nation-states if they presently have no feasible prospect of being fairly treated or assimilated — which Gellner seemed to treat as the same thing. These new nationstates will be modern, or at least they will be structured as such, even if in ideological self-deception the intelligentsia romantically believe themselves to be restoring their old nation. They will talk like narodniks but act as westernisers. [110] Contrary to the wisdom of historiographers, poets and philologists: ‘Nationalism is not the awakening of nations to selfconsciousness: it invents nations where they do not exist — but it does need some pre-existing differentiating marks to work on, even if ... these are purely negative.’[111]

These are the core propositions of Thought and Change. Gellner anticipated criticisms by clarifying and qualifying his theses in three ways.

First, he recognised that ‘some pre-modern loyalty-evoking political units’, notably the strong dynastic states of the Atlantic seaboard of Europe, embraced populations and territories ‘similar to those which one would expect to be produced by modern nationalism’, and posed the question ‘do these rather different phenomena, so close to “nationalism”, contradict the theory?’ [112] In a dense and slightly confusing passage, he suggested three possible theory-saving options:

(i) he could accept that the modernising forces generating nationalism have been operating in Europe at least since the Reformation, or

(ii) he could refuse to classify these phenomena with modern nationalism (which left open the possibility of a non-modern nationalism?), or

(iii) he could accept that a pre-modern shared culture, including membership of a dynastic state whose boundaries roughly overlapped with a language, might be a factor, amongst others, in inclining people in the direction of particular bedfellows for the construction of a modern nation.

Gellner wanted to protect his theory from the charge that it is tautological and/or unfalsifiable, and to separate the modern phenomena of nationalism — ‘citizenship through education, group differentiae in terms of the language of instruction, and unmediated membership of mass co-cultural societies’ — from other superficially related premodern phenomena, ‘even if a few of those others also make a banner of language-and-culture’.[113] The latter are the religious and linguistic imperialisms of some ethnically based pre-modern dynasties.

Secondly, Gellner insisted that ‘it is impossible to predict with confidence, prior to the crystallisation of this or that nationalism, just which “nations” will emerge’.[114] Cultural differences are widespread and real, and injustices, exploitation, humiliation are equally so, but it isn’t easy to tell just which identifications and oppositions will emerge to produce specific nationalisms. This predictive weakness may make his theory look suspiciously untestable, but he left the impression that it can be tested in other ways, and that it has the merit of rejecting two alternative theses:

(i) that all pre-modern cultures will inevitably generate nations, and (ii) that some pre-modern cultures are far more likely than others to form the raw materials of modern nations.[115]

Thirdly, he recognised that nationalism is not an all-powerful or all-pervasive political force. There are exceptional zones that have resisted the norm of ‘one culture, one polity’: Switzerland, Belgium and Canada. The last two cases did not concern him because the weaknesses of Belgian and Canadian nationalism confirm the assumption that bilingual or multilingual states will be less nationally stable than those that are monolingual. Switzerland is more embarrassing: Gellner described it as ‘a traditional society which has weathered modernisation’ so it can tolerate linguistic pluralism. Also, there ‘is a sense in which various kinds of Swiss “speak the same language” even if they do not do so in a literal sense’;[116] a curious argument. Gellner additionally recognised that just as nationalisms can be obstructed or modified ‘by special circumstances’, so they can also be facilitated by power politics which may manipulate nationalist ideas, or by the dissemination of political norms which are infused with nationalist assumptions. He mentions what for him was a homely example, the formation of the Czech national state which resulted from a coalition between Czech intellectuals and western foreign policy.

He closed his first discussion of nationalism by briefly evaluating it. He wasted no time condemning nationalist chauvinism in the standard manner of liberal cosmopolitans. Instead he considered that the ‘main boon which nationalism has conferred on mankind … may well be political’. The benefits are not merely psychological though these are important — the dignity and self-respect arising from the elimination of ‘second- or nth class citizenship’ and the joys liberated peoples enjoy from not being ‘bossed and knocked about by others with whom they cannot or are not allowed to identify’, and being bossed and knocked about by ‘their own’ people instead. [117]

The major political benefit that nationalism has given to humanity is that it has preserved pluralism in the world, and thereby preserved political liberalism. This conclusion was reached by considering the most feasible counterfactual alternatives to a world of nation-states: a world government or a world in which the major empires of the late nineteenth century had been preserved. In both these situations, Gellner reasoned that liberalism would have been obliterated. A world government passing through the second, global phase of industrialisation would have resembled South Africa under apartheid, a coercively organised hierarchy of races and ethnic communities; while a world of industrialising empires would have been wracked by ferocious battles over citizenship fought between the metropolitan cores and the more numerous and poorer peoples of the territories they had conquered. The ironic message was that nationalism, unintentionally, preserved the miracle of western liberalism because it inhibited global despotism and helped destroy the world of the European empires. For this reason, if no others, Gellner thought that liberals should take comfort from the benign repercussions of nationalism.

 Nations and nationalism

The theory articulated in Thought and Change went largely unnoticed in the writings of political scientists, political sociologists and political philosophers — perhaps because it was buried within a wider discussion of philosophy and social change, and perhaps because it was patronisingly classed as a provincial ‘English’ variation on the themes of the modernisation school ascendant in American social science. [118] Thought and Change was known, if at all, for sharply stating the conventional wisdom of the emergent affluent society of the late 1950s and the early 1960s: a modern state has one major principle of political legitimacy, the GNP must increase. The other major principle, that the state must be a nation-state, was less remarked upon.

In complete contrast, Gellner’s book-length statement, wittily expounded nearly two decades later in Nations and Nationalism, was very well received amongst political scientists and political sociologists who study nationalism, and those who do not, and rightly so.[119] Nations and Nationalism was at once more sociologically ambitious than Thought and Change, bearing the imprint of Gellner’s dialogues with Durkheim and Marx; more conceptually novel, displaying the value-added of his theory of industrial society; and more empirically promising, as it set out a typology of nationalism-inducing and nationalism-thwarting situations.

There are, however, fundamental continuities between Thought and Change and Nations and Nationalism. First, Gellner continued to reject four erroneous theories of nationalism:

(i) the nationalist theory that it is natural, self-evident and self-generating;

(ii) Kedourie's theory that it is a contingent consequence of 'ideas which did not need ever to be formulated, and appeared by a regrettable accident', and is inessential to the life of industrial societies;[120]

(iii) Marxism's 'Wrong Address Theory': the liberationist message intended for classes was 'by some terrible postal error' delivered instead to nations; and

(iv) 'Dark Gods Theory'.[121]

The thesis is restated that nationalism is an essential component of modernisation, of the transition from agrarian to industrial society — the latter requiring a state that can produce and be maintained by one common, literate and accessible culture. The vocabulary in which this idea is expressed has, however, become part of a wider philosophy of history. Nationalism is now defined as:

the general imposition of a high culture on society, where previously low cultures had taken up the lives of the majority, and in some cases the totality, of the population. It means the general diffusion of a school-mediated, academy-supervised idiom, codifed for the requirements of a reasonably precise bureaucratic and technological communication. It is the establishment of an anonymous impersonal society, with mutually substitutable atomised individuals, held together above all by a shared culture of this kind, in place of the previous complex structure of local groups, sustained by folk cultures reproduced locally and idiosyncratically by the micro-groups themselves. [122]

The preconditions (and maintenance) of nationalism include widespread or universal literacy, and a society committed to economic growth through its formal commitment to social mobility — both horizontal and vertical. Industrial society requires effective and widespread context-free communication through a common medium, a ‘high culture’. Communicative media are placed centre-stage in generating and maintaining nationalism, but the argument stresses the functionality of a shared culture for the effective operation of modern work organisations and bureaucracies. [123]

In Nations and Nationalism nationalism is still seen as distinctive to modernity, but it is now part of a philosophy of history that distinguishes three phases in human progress, the pre-agrarian, the agrarian, and the industrial. In a reworked and non-teleological form of historical materialism, Gellner maintained that each of the three key phases is associated with characteristic modes of production, coercion, culture and cognition. [124] Nationalism is distinctive to industrial society, and intimately connected to its mode of production. It would have made no sense in tribal societies because such societies were and are stateless, and the ambition to unify the national culture and the state would therefore have been incoherent. In the ‘agro-literate’ polity or the agrarian empire, nationalism also would have made no sense, because such empires did not need their elites and peasant masses to share a common culture. In the industrial society, by contrast, nationalism is an essential part of the cultural atmosphere — its ‘exo-socialisation’, i.e., educating persons in a culture that mostly frees them from familial and corporate ties, is a sine qua non of social cohesion. To these suppositions Gellner added a modified Durkheimian account of normative orientations through the ages. Whereas tribal societies worship themselves indirectly (as spirits), agrarian societies worship their rulers directly or indirectly (in monotheistic religions), while in industrial societies the participants directly worship themselves (nationalism). Nationalism is the functional equivalent for industrial societies of the world religions of agro-literate polities, and of the animistic cults of pre-agrarian bands, nomads and tribes.

Table 2.1 Gellner’s typology of the inducing and thwarting of nationalism

Type	P	-P
	-E	-E
1	A	B	typical prenationalist situation
2	A	A	untypical prenationalist situation
	E	-E
3	A	A	early industrialism without ethnic catalyst
4	A	B	ethnic nationalism
	E	E
5	A	A	mature homogeneous industrialism (established nationalism)
6	A	B	classical liberal western nationalism
	-E	E
7	A	B	diaspora or ‘middle-man’ nationalism
8	A	A	Decembrist revolutionary, but not nationalist, situation

Source: adapted from Nations and Nationalism, p. 94. (Nationalism-generating situations in italics)

Gellner also provided a typology of ‘nationalism-inducing and nationalism-thwarting situations’ which considerably amplified the crude ‘model’ sketched in Thought and Change. [125] There are three dimensions to the typology. Gellner differentiated

(i) power-holders from the rest: P and -P;

(ii) those who have had access to a modern education or a viable modern high culture from those who have not: E and -E; and

(iii) a polity in which the power-holders and the rest, and the educated or uneducated, share a homogeneous culture (A and A), from one in which they do not (A and B).

These three dimensions generate the eight possibilities in Table 2.1: a line containing A and A represents a culturally homogeneous territory, whereas a line containing A and B represents a bicultural territory.

The typology suggests four situations in which nationalism will be engendered, and four in which it will be absent or thwarted. Consider the latter. In types 1 and 2, where no one, power-holder or non-powerholder, has access to modern education, nationalism cannot exist, ex hypothesi. The typical agro-literate polity, type 1, is not culturally homogeneous, although a few such specimens might exist, type 2. [126] In the third scenario, type 8, the old ruling class of the agro-literate polity retains power, and is challenged by a politically weak, but educationally and economically privileged intelligentsia — a ‘Decembrist’ revolutionary situation, type 8. No nationalist problems and conflicts arise here, said Gellner. [127] In the last case, type 3, early industrialism within a culturally homogeneous society, the power-holders are differentiated from the non-power-holders by the former’s monopoly of modern high culture. This situation gives rise to class conflict, which may be moderately ferocious, but without the catalyst of ethnic differentiation is unlikely to be especially politically destabilising — contrary to the assumptions of classical Marxism.

The typology implies, by contrast, four nationalism-engendering situations:

(i) satisfied nationalism, type 5, characteristic of mature homogeneous industrialism in which the power-holders and non-power-holders share access to the same style of modern education, and are co-cultural conationals — in which case we can expect no [internal] nationalist conflicts and problems;[128]

(ii) classical liberal nationalism, type 6, characteristic of territories in which some have power and others do not, and this difference correlates with cultural differences, even though the relevant persons are both educationally equipped for modern society — a situation, Gellner suggested, which historically corresponds to the ‘unification nationalisms’ of nineteenth-century Italy and Germany;[129]

(iii) ethnic nationalism, type 4, characteristic of territories in which power-holders have privileged access to the central high culture, which is their own, while the powerless are also the educationally deprived, sunk in low cultures. The small intelligentsias of the powerless spearhead efforts to make their low culture into a high culture — a situation, Gellner suggested, which historically corresponds to the nationalisms of Eastern, Slavic and Balkan Europe;[130] and

(iv) Diaspora nationalism, type 7, better described as ‘middle-man’ nationalism, arises in societies in transit from Agraria to Industria, and is characteristic of groups that historically had access to commercial and educational high culture, often through their caste-roles as pariah ‘middle-men’ in the agrarian economy. These groups are economically better equipped for modernisation than those who historically lacked access to a high culture. They are also ethnically distinctive, but lack political and military power — and so are likely candidates for genocidal assaults or mass expulsions as economic competition grows within a modernising and nationalising polity; and in consequence, are likely to generate ‘diaspora nationalisms’. Gellner had in mind the Jews, Greeks, Armenians, overseas Indians in Africa, overseas Chinese in south-east Asia and the Ibos ofNigeria.[131]

This typology rested on a theory of social conflict, explicitly directed against Marxist propositions. Conflict is predicted to occur ‘where “ethnic” (cultural or other diacritical marks) are visible and accentuate the differences in educational access and power’, and above all, when they inhibit the ‘free flow of personnel across the loose lines of social stratification’.[132] In short: blockages in social mobility, when tied to ethnic or other diacritical markers, are at the heart of nationalist conflicts. Exclusionary control of cultural capital, or usurpationary attempts to capture it, rather than exclusionary control of propertied capital or usurpationary attempts to expropriate it, give rise to vigorous social wars, and nationalist conflicts.

This theory of conflict is tied, in deliberately provocative language, to a discussion of ‘social entropy’ and equality in industrial society. [133] An ideal-typical industrial society should have a systematic randomness, and thus be ‘entropic’: social origins should not matter in determining placement in the occupational and prestige hierarchies, and in this sense industrial society should be egalitarian. ‘Entropy-resistant traits’ constitute a very serious problem. They ‘have a marked tendency not to become, even with the passage of time ... evenly dispersed throughout the entire society’.[134] Such traits can be invented, Gellner suggests, to apply to a particular class of persons, but: ‘the entropy-resistance of a concept, in this sense, will normally be of interest only if it is a reasonably natural notion, one already in use in the society in question, rather than artificially invented for the present purpose’.[135]

He then discussed a range of entropy-resistant traits, physical or genetically transmitted, and religious-cultural habits which are often just as resistant to the industrial ‘melting pot’.

This illuminating discussion sits uneasily with the arguments in Thought and Change which had suggested the almost plasticine materials with which modern nation-builders could ‘invent’ their nations and nation-states. Nevertheless Gellner restated his conviction that we cannot predict which cultures will be blessed with success in their efforts to become nationalist cultures with political roofs.[136] He went further, and suggested that the ‘weakness of nationalism’ is much greater than it might appear at first glance. [137] The number of languages in the world may be some 8,000, and the number of other cultural or historical materials which might be used to mark potential national cultures is even higher. Yet there are at present about 200 states in existence — many of which are postage-stamp states that cannot be counted as aspirant nation-states. The potential number of nation-states may be higher given the existence of numerous unsatisfied nationalisms which may succeed, one day. Yet the ratio of effective to potential nationalisms is a small one — much less than nationalists might imagine. The implication is that a blind, unpredictable and evolutionary process selects which nationalisms shall succeed, and which shall not. There is an apparent paradox here. Nationalism is a very strong force in the modern world; in most cases it prevails, and it does set the standard for what constitutes a modern state. However, very few potential nations are strong enough to make it to modernity and statehood.

 Reviewing and reformulating the theory in Thought and Change and Nations and Nationalism

Gellner’s theory has been subject to diffuse criticisms, which I have grouped into five principal categories. The next section addresses how robust the theory remains in the light of these criticisms, and how it might be reformulated.

* The philosophical functionalism of the argument

Both in Thought and Change and Nations and Nationalism, Gellner’s argument seems to be explicitly, brazenly and unashamedly, functionalist. Functionalism is characteristic of historical materialism, [138] and forgivable in a social anthropologist, but less easily accepted by social scientists committed to causal explanations or methodological individualism. It is ironic that it is Perry Anderson, grandfather of the Marxist New Left, who complains that the ‘most arresting feature of [Gellner’s] theory of nationalism is its single-minded economic functionalism’.[139] He cites in support a passage from the conclusion to Nations and Nationalism:

So the economy needs both the new type of central culture and the central state; the culture needs the state; and the state probably needs the homogeneous cultural branding of its flock ... In brief, the mutual relationship of a modern culture and state is something quite new, and springs, inevitably, from the requirements of a modern economy.[140]

There is no denying the functionalist cast of these arguments. If one is sceptical about functionalist arguments in the social sciences the important question is whether Gellner's case can be reconstructed in a nonfunctionalist manner. It is clear that for him nationalism is explained by its beneficial consequences (functionality) for modern society.[141] A strongly functionalist version of his argument would go as follows:[142]

(i) Nationalism is an effect of modernisation.

(ii) Nationalism is beneficial for modernising states — because a highly specialised division of labour requires a unified high culture, which is underpinned by a highly developed and specialised educational system.

(iii) Nationalism (in Gellner's sense) is unintended by the actors producing modernisation.

(iv) The causal relationship between nationalism and modernisation is not recognised by the agents operating in modernising societies.

(v) Nationalism functionally maintains modernisation by a feedback loop operating through the actions of modernising states.

Formulated in this way Gellner's argument would display the vices of functionalist reasoning — in which events and processes occur wholly, or largely, beyond the understanding of human agents, in which consequences precede causes, and in which suspicions arise that supraindividual and holistic entities are tacitly invoked to do explanatory work.

One obvious way to reconstruct Gellner’s argument is to deny (iv), and replace a functionalist with a ‘filter explanation’.[143] It would take the following form: modernising elites believe that nationalism is essential for modernisation, precisely because it breaks down barriers to modernising success. Nation-building nationalists recognise the beneficial consequences of nationalism, and this fact helps explains its political diffusion. Nationalists believe that nation-building will break down traditionalist or religious inhibitions on economic growth, and political blockages — such as imperialist domination or caste-like barriers that prevent the liberation of productive economic, political and cultural energies.[144] It is not at all difficult to find wide-ranging support for this filter explanation. Prospective nation-builders, like Paidraig Pearse and Jawaharlal Nehru, embraced nationalism because they believed it would liberate the Irish and Indian nations, and free them to develop their educational, economic and political systems, and the Japanese reformers of the Meiji restoration deliberately imitated features of German and French nation-building in their efforts to build a modern Japan. The idea that nationalism could lead to a renewal — or revival — of social energies was implicit in the advice rendered by Rousseau in The Government of Poland, which commended a citizen’s army and a comprehensive state-controlled education system. [145]

Although this ‘filter explanation’ would avoid strong functionalism, it remains vulnerable on two grounds. First, the ‘real’ filter in explaining the actions of the first nation-builders and nationalists may have been the perception that nationalism was essential for military success or geopolitical security, rather than economic success. Therefore the historical relationship between nationalism, modernisation and industrialisation may have been more indirect and unintended than Gellnerian theory suggests[146] — and it may be that Gellner’s theory accounts better for the maintenance of nationalism than it does for its origins.

Secondly, the universal truth of the ‘filter explanation’ may be doubted, that is nationalism may not be essential for modernisation. Communist regimes in the USSR, China and North Korea did not primarily rely — although one might argue that they did rely tacitly (remember Stalin’s ‘socialism in one country’) — on nationalism for ‘first-stage industrialisation’, although one might argue, correctly, that none of them are exemplars of modernising success. There have been some highly successful industrial city-states, for example Hong Kong, which have not required nationalism to travel to their version of modernity. And, a point to which I shall return, Gellner himself appeared to suggest that Islam, unlike the other world religions, might be capable of performing modernisation’s necessary support functions — thereby making nationalism inessential for the breakthrough to modernisation. [147]

These qualifications, do not, however, imperil the general thesis that nationalism is beneficial, and even possibly optimal, for modernisation, providing we accept the qualification that this relationship is widely recognised by nationalists themselves. It is also tempting to draw a distinction between explaining the genesis of nationalism and explaining its diffusion. The genesis of nationalism may have been at least partially autonomous of modernisation and industrialisation, and its functionally beneficially consequences may only have been partially related to modern economic development. The diffusion of nationalism, its attractiveness to those who followed the first modern nations, may be more centrally linked to their belief in a Gellnerian-style filter explanation. Rather than being foolish victims of the contagious bad ideas, as Kedourie implied, nationalists believed that nationalism would assist modernisation in the way that it had the British, the Americans, the French and the Germans. [148] In short, it is possible to argue for the core Gellnerian thesis that there is a functional relationship between nationalism and modernity, but it does not have to be expressed in a strongly functionalist form.

* The place of nationalism in a philosophy of history

Delineating stages in history is partly a matter of taste. Some completely reject the idea of a philosophy of history; those who do not may dislike three-stage tales of human progress; and some prefer explicitly evolutionary to non-teleological and episodic conceptions of the transitions between stages in human history. My position, in this chapter, is that of a critical supporter of Gellner’s philosophy of history. But within that philosophy there are three potentially embarrassing questions about nations and nationalism:

(i) could there have been nations before nationalism, and, if so, can Gellner’s theory cope with such anomalies?

(ii) could there have been nations and nationalism before industrialism, and if so, can Gellner’s theory be reformulated to cope with this difficulty?

(iii) can there be post-industrial national conflicts, and if so, how do they fit in with Gellner’s general theory?

* Nations before nationalism, and nationalism before industrialism?

Gellner’s is a strongly ‘modernist’ theory. He informed his readers that nationalism only became an historical possibility from approximately the eighteenth century — indeed he cast the philosophers of the Enlightenment in the role of the first alienated intelligentsia, ‘the westernisers of the west’. Nationalism invents nations, rather than the other way around.

Yet a considerable number of specialists on nationalism, implicitly or explicitly, reject the stark modernism of Gellner. Thus historians write of the ‘old continuous European nations’, and compare them with the ‘new nations’ of eastern Europe and elsewhere in the world. [149] Historical sociologists write in a similar vein: John Armstrong’s Nations before Nationalism and Anthony Smith’s The Ethnic Origins of Nations are sustained criticisms of the (strong) modernist interpretation of nations and nationalism. [150] Smith, for example, argues that ethnic culture and social organisation were persistent, intensive, widespread and salient in much of Euro-Asian antiquity and the medieval era. Moreover, particular kingdoms were often based on ethnic communities: for Smith, nationalism represents ‘the transformation and universalisation of a preexisting political and social norm’.[151] Similarly, Liah Greenfeld’s Nationalism treats sixteenth-century England as the first nation and the site of the first nationalism, and her researches on England, France,

Russia, Germany and America extend back to the Renaissance. [152]

Can one defend Gellner’s theory against these arguments? He anticipated one possible line of defence in Thought and Change, the forces of modernisation have been at work since the Reformation, or before. This reply is not, however, convincing; it seems to operate against the placement of nationalism within Gellner’s triadic stages of history, and to suggest that Protestantism and vernacular print languages were more important than industrialism in spawning nationalism. Yet it seems empirically sensible to concede that ‘national consciousness’ developed in some territories before full-scale industrialisation: consider just the colonies of Latin America, North America and Ireland. [153] Moreover, it seems sensible to concede that protonationalist ideas existed, at least in embryonic forms, in commercial societies like early modern England and Holland.[154] This leaves Gellner with his other, and theoretically more consistent, line of defence — to refuse to classify the phenomena of pre-eighteenth-century ethnic or national consciousness with modern nationalism or nationalism proper. There are good grounds for doing so.

Many of the authors who survey the rise of ‘nations’ before nationalism are conceptually confused;[155] and, secondly, many of them concede that nationalism ‘both as an ideology and movement, is a wholly modern phenomenon’.[156] Gellner’s theory can not be embarrassed by the existence of the word nation in pre-eighteenth-century England, or indeed by the presence of national consciousness, especially of a religiously mediated kind. It would be embarrassed by explicitly nationalist doctrines of legitimacy, nationalist programmes and nationalist movements flourishing in the time of Henry VII. Most of those who discuss ‘nations’ before ‘nationalism’ are in fact establishing the existence of cultural precedents, and ethnic and other materials subsequently shaped and re-shaped by nation-builders. But it is a conceptual confusion, or so at least a Gellnerian must insist, to assimilate the materials upon which nationalists will draw, to nationalism itself. Consciousness of a shared cultural, religious or territorial identity is not of the essence of nationalism. Its essence is a theory of political legitimacy: the governed must be conational with and representative of the governed. That said, the work of Armstrong, Smith and Greenfeld may be used to qualify Gellner’s work in one respect: they furnish evidence that the first nations were innovations rather than inventions, and that predicting or ‘retrodicting’ which nations would emerge in the age of nationalism may be less difficult than Gellner declared.

Most of those who have written of nations before the age of nationalism, whether they be historians like Hugh Seton-Watson, or historical sociologists, like Armstrong, Greenfeld and Smith, concede the modernity of nationalist doctrine and political programmes. They recognise that the writers of the Enlightenment and their romantic critics, and the phenomena of the American and French revolutions, produced an explicitly novel set of doctrines, nationalism proper. Gellnerian theory can thus, in principle, be saved: there may have been talk about nations, and indeed national consciousness, before nationalism, but, so to speak, there was no nationalist talk of nations and national consciousness before nationalism. That said, Gellner was left the problem that the historical evidence does not suggest a neat causal or functional relationship between industrialisation and the onset of nationalism, and I will consider later how he sought to manage this little ‘local difficulty’ in his last writings.

* Nationalism after industrialisation?

Another possible embarrassment for Gellner’s philosophy of history would be evidence of revived or new nationalist secessionist movements emerging within a fully industrialised environment, after the ‘great transformation’ from Agraria to Industria has been completed. Do the phenomena of ‘ethnic revivalism’, ‘ethnonationalism’, ‘mininationalism’ or ‘neonationalism’ as they have been variously and sometimes misleadingly labelled, both in advanced OECD countries and among and within the post-Soviet successor states, constitute a problem for Gellner’s theory?

It is not transparent how exactly such evidence would refute the theory. The evidence would be consistent with some of the propositions in Nations and Nationalism, where Gellner differentiated between early nationalism and late nationalism — which occur respectively in the conditions of early and mature industrialisation.[157] In early industrialism there is ‘a terrible difference’ between the life-chances of the well-off and the starving poor, whereas in late industrialism there is not such acute objective social discontent — and, in consequence, although a late nationalism may be motivated by blocked social mobility and inequality, it will, on materialist assumptions, presumably, be less virulent. In short, on these premises, Gellner’s theory would be most embarrassed by violently virulent nationalist secessionisms within advanced ‘Industrias’, not by the existence of such movements themselves, which, after all, might be occasioned by ‘counter-entropic’ traits.

Gellner is presumed by many to have argued that the world is drifting towards advanced industrialised homogeneous nation-states in which secessionisms are less likely — and that is one possible reading of his obiter dicta on the ‘future of nationalism’.[158] A moment’s reflection, however, should make clear that an industrialised world characterised by divergent demographic growth rates across culturally differentiated communities, displaying counter-entropic traits of whatever kind, and large-scale migratory movements, in which migrants can retain their original high culture (if they have one), is not going to be free either of nationalist secessionist possibilities, or of ‘integral nationalisms’. Consequently, even if Gellner can be convicted of the view that nationalist secessionist movements are less likely after industrialisation — a view for which I think there is no explicit textual warrant — his theory itself is not deductively linked to such a view.

Another line of defence would be that the scale of virulent nationalist secessionism, or nationalist irredentism, at least within the OECD, has not been very substantial. There are no significant secessionist or irredentist movements in Austria, Australia, Denmark, Iceland, Luxembourg, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway, New Zealand, Sweden, Switzerland or the USA. There are significant Revolutionist’ movements in Wales within the United Kingdom, in Catalonia in Spain, in Brittany and Corsica in France, and amongst both linguistic communities in Belgium. There are also significant, but peaceful secessionist movements in Canada, amongst the Quebecois, and in Great Britain amongst the Scots — who seek independence ‘within’ the NAFTA and the EU respectively. There has also been a recent effervescence of what may become full-fledged secessionist sentiment in Italy, notably in ‘Lombardy’ or ‘Padania’ — though it seems likely to remain a form of regional resentment; and similar traits can be found in Belgium. Germany has been unified, but it has officially abandoned its other possible irredentist ambitions. Within ‘western Europe’ only Greece, the Republic of Ireland, and possibly Finland retain, in principle, ambitions to complete their nations, and in each case (apart, possibly, from Greece), the support for ‘reunification’ with the relevant conationals situated across recognised sovereign boundaries is generally peaceful, sentimental and inactive — which is not to say that it is finished. [159] Significant cases of protracted violent secessionism or unificationism in Europe have existed in the Basque country and Northern Ireland, but even here the relevant movements have smaller support-bases than their peaceful and regionally inclined conational competitors. The two Cypriot communities are, however, undoubtedly capable of further war.

Yet all in all there is not a great deal in the European Union, or the OECD, to embarrass Gellner’s theory. [160] Extensive armed violence and insurrection by aggrieved nationalist groups within the OECD is rare. Basque separatists in Spain; Irish republicans and loyalist paramilitaries in Northern Ireland; Israelis and Palestinians in and outside of Israel/ Palestine are responsible for the lion’s share. Sporadic activities by Corsicans, Tyrolese German-speakers and Bretons are small beer by comparison. In most regions of OECD states the aggrieved ethnic communities would appear to be capable of being satisfied by public policy changes and/or constitutional changes which recognise their national cultural claims. This may be so of the Quebecois in Canada, the Scots and Welsh in the UK, the Walloons in Belgium and the Catalans in Spain. A similar argument may be advanced for the bulk of Basques and Irish nationalists in Northern Ireland: Basques may be satisfied with extensive autonomy, northern Irish nationalists by the functional equivalent of shared sovereignty. [161] Indeed many of the actual or potential national and ethnic conflicts in advanced industrial countries may be remediable by accommodative political institutions, such as consociations, federalisms and condominiums, a point on which Gellner is weak, and to which I shall return.

If the scale of nationalist secessionism within advanced democratic capitalist societies seems exaggerated, the success of nationalist secessionism within the industrialised states of what were the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia is a fact. And there are further secessionist movements within the debris of these former communist systems: in Nagorno-Karabakh, Chechen-Ingushetia, Abkhazia, South Ossetia, Dniester, Gagauzia, Kaliningrad, Crimea, Krajina, Kosovo and the Vojvodina. These phenomena are, however, not an overt embarrassment for Gellner's theory — unlike some other theories.[162] The respective communist systems failed to invent durable Soviet and Yugoslav nationalisms or 'high cultures', but they did industrialise through adapting — and in some cases creating — national cultures, and, incidentally, national political units, which then, in most cases, became the bases of secessionist movements when the communists lost their grip on power — which in turn was connected to their failures in managing industrial performance. This said, not all of the conflicts which generated secession from these communist polities are fully explicable within Gellnerian theory, which, as presently formulated, cannot treat sensitively the importance of the state-system and political regime types in explaining what encourages or thwarts nationalist secessionisms.

A superfluous defence of the Gellnerian theory is also available: most other social and political theories are left in a much worse state by evidence of secessionism in industrialised societies. Marxists, who thought future statelessness was also to be nationlessness, when we were all expected to be class-less and culture-less (or perhaps monocultured in a multicultured way), have an embarrassing affinity with liberal functionalists, who anticipated that the outcome of modernisation would be an instrumental and cosmopolitan world-federal order rather than a world of nation-states, who thought that ideocracy would vanish beneath the benefits of affluence, and that the fate of the nation-state was to be undermined from above, by international organisations, and from below, by political decentralisation. [163]

* How predictionless or retrodictionless is the theory?

Gellner explicitly denied that one can predict which nations will acquire political roofs, and, by implication, just which phenotypically or culturally counter-entropic traits, or other materials, will provide the markers for the nations built by nationalists. There are at least two difficulties here. First, the selection process that determines which of the thousands of potential nations eventually become member states of the United Nations may not be as blind, or as unpredictable, as Gellner suggested. Secondly, if 'invented' or ‘designed’ nations are less stable than the ‘old’ or ‘continuous’ nations such evidence would suggest that ‘real’ ethnic or other foundations are more vital to the success of nation-building than Gellner suggested. I shall only elaborate the first point since the second point has been well made by Anthony Smith.

Historical evidence does suggest that while many may be called to be nations only a few are chosen — who now remembers the Burgundians? However, Gellner’s own theory, in principle, has greater retrodictive potential than he implies. His suppositions point towards a key selection mechanism: ceteris paribus, those possessed of a high culture, or on the verge of possessing one on the eve of modernisation, should be better endowed with nation-building potential than other potential nations. Those who have no ‘high culture’, or potential ‘high culture’, presumably are bereft of an intelligentsia, and lack the requisite quota of poets, balladeers, bibliophiles, engineers and officers for successful nationbuilding. For this reason Gellner’s casual citation of the nationalist potential implicit in the existence of 8,000 languages should not be accepted at face value. How many of these languages have the capacity for rapid transformation into a high culture, that is, one with an extensive vocabulary, a formal grammar, an alphabet, a literary tradition, a capacity for context-free communication, etc.? This question is open to empirical resolution but the number of feasible potential nations on the eve of modernity must have been less than a fundamentalist Gellnerian would imagine. A Gellnerian should also assume that viable candidates for nationhood must have a threshold population of around 250,000 (the population of Iceland which has successfully produced a national high culture) on the grounds, suggested in Thought and Change, that economies of scale are required to sustain a ‘non-parasitic’ and modern, education system. If so, then the numbers of potential nationalist ‘peoples’ on the eve of modernity was probably much less than 8,000. This question is capable of resolution through appropriate investigation of demographic and anthropological data.

Empirical appraisal of the selection mechanism implicit in Gellner’s theory need not, of course, be confined to the linguistic and demographic properties of potential nations. In Nations and Nationalism Gellner recognised that those communities which are tightly integrated into a literate world religion are more likely to be candidates for successful nation-building or secessionist movements than those which are not. On Gellner's own logic, one should therefore predict greater nation-building capacity in some premodern cultures than others, and expect the number of feasible nations on the eve of modernity to be less numerous and more predictable than he implies. This argument is one way of reconciling Gellner's general theory with the arguments advanced by the 'nations before nationalism' school. Moreover, nothing in this argument commits one to an objectivist definition of the nation in which one trait, say race, is given pre-eminence.

If one were to extract from the mechanism of possession of a proto-high culture possible retrodictions or predictions about which cultures are most likely to generate modern nations, and test them against the historical evidence, one would, however, run into the issue of rival 'selection mechanisms'. The most obvious alternative selection mechanism affecting which cultures become nations, or at least realised nation-states, is exogenous rather than endogenous. Power politics may best explain which states have the borders that they do, and therefore which nations get to win their own nation-states or stakes in a multinational state. Since the onset of modernity — whenever that was — the state-system and the great powers have been decisive arbiters of the prospects of nations' achieving statehood or autonomy. The four great waves of modern state-creation have accompanied the collapse or weakening of empires: the formation of the states of Latin America in the 1820s and after, the new European states recognised at Versailles, the new Asian, African, Caribbean and Pacific states established after 1945; and the new successor states established on the ruins of the former tsarist and Soviet empires after 1989.

Most politically realised nations owe their existence, or at least their territorial shape, to the calculations, decisions and indecisions of the extant great powers which watched another great power collapsing or caused it to collapse. Even if the Gellnerian ingredients of blocked social mobility and strong diacritical markers are present to fertilise nationalism a potentially secessionist nationalism may be prevented from being successful by its exogenous environment: the Irish, the Poles and the Eritreans, to name but a few, took a long time to win their freedom. 'Nation-state' formation frequently takes place, as it were, by permission, rather than as a by-product of the strength of indigenous mobilisation for nationhood. Thus the French helped the birth of the American nation; the British empire hastened the collapse of the Spanish empire; the victorious Allies decided the fate and shape of ‘nations’ at Versailles and presided over the redistribution of the debris of the Habsburg and Ottoman empires; and the departing colonial powers shaped the frontiers of the so-called new ‘nations’ (mostly multiethnic and multinational states) which they left behind. The best-known illustration of the salience of great states in determining the fate of nations is the fact that the principle of self-determination was widely ignored by the great powers after World War I, because they wanted to create economically and strategically (rather than nationally) viable states as checks and balances on Germany and the Soviet Union.[164] So the boundaries of Hungary, Poland, Romania and Yugoslavia in the interwar years were established with scant respect for ethnic boundaries. Plebiscites were used to establish local preferences in some frontier zones, but not in geopolitically significant territories like the Sudetenland or the South Tyrol. Subsequently, from 1948 until 1989, the superpower system preserved borders which make no sense on any reasonable construal of national ‘self-determination’.

Sadly, it also seems reasonable to suggest that within collapsing empires the proto-nations that enjoy strategic positions or resources — be they demographic, military or economic — are likely to do better than more marginal communities, which may face the threat of genocide, mass-population transfers or coercive assimilation. Better, in short, to be Tartarstan than Chechnya, or Croatia rather than Bosnia. There is no need to elaborate further: power politics, and power resources, provide an alternative (or at least a supplementary and overdetermining) selection mechanism to that implicit in Gellner’s theory. [165]

The typology andforms of nationalism

Gellner’s typology was an admirable effort at theoretical parsimony. Three dimensions are used to generate four types of nationalism (outside of or against satisfied nation-states): western liberal nationalism, ethnic nationalism, diaspora nationalism and mature homogeneous nationalism.

There are, however, problems with the typology, even if we leave aside the simplicity of the dimensions. First, its explanatory capacities are implicitly limited to nationalist conflicts within states; it has little to say about nationalist conflicts between states. Secondly, it is not clear that classical liberal western nationalism emerged from the conjunction of a clash between educated power-holders from one high culture facing educated non-power-holders from another high culture, whereas ethnic nationalism emerges from a clash between educated power-holders from one high culture facing uneducated non-power-holders from a low culture. Gellner cited as the classic exemplars of classical liberal western nationalism the ‘unification nationalisms’ of Italy and Germany, and suggested that ‘a few battles’ and ‘some diplomacy’ were all that were required to sort out the right political roofs for the previously subordinated high cultures. By contrast, in eastern Europe and the Balkans matters were much messier, because nationalism was mobilised behind ‘a high culture as yet not properly crystallised’ which made matters a great deal more ferociously ‘ethnic’ — population expulsions, liquidations, coercive assimilation and other horrors occurred. Gellner euphemistically recognises the ‘markedly un-benign’[166] forms German and Italian nationalisms took in the twentieth century but does so in a parenthesis that almost suggests that it is a problem for John Plamenatz, who developed one form of the contrast between western and eastern nationalisms, rather than for him! Yet, German and Italian nationalisms were markedly ‘un-benign’ in frontier zones. Indeed the German variety notoriously excelled Balkan nationalism in its bloodthirstiness.

This difficulty suggests that the important difference between ethnic (or what Gellner calls Habsburg) nationalism and classical liberal (or western) nationalism is not the availability of a high culture functional for modernity in the latter case but not in the former, but rather, amongst other things, the fact that in the Habsburg-type of nationalism there are multiple and roughly equal but intermixed and counter-entropic cultures (i.e., Bl, B2 ... Bn), whereas in the classical liberal case the B group can feasibly homogenise — or at least courteously control — all the possible other Bs in its nation-building ambitions. Alternatively, some nationalists can afford to be liberal — and choose to be so, while others fear that they cannot afford to be liberal — and choose to act accordingly.

The key complaint I am making here is that the typology was used by Gellner to classify actual historical ‘types’ which do not follow logically from it. The typology is only useful for considering ‘homogeneous’ and ‘bicultural’ situations; and it cannot, by definition, be used to explain ‘multicultural’ situations.[167] The typology is also a typology of cultural nationalisms, rather than one of political nationalisms, which have been far more common in the literature on the subject. [168] And precisely because the typology is bereft of political content — other than a very crude distinction between power-holders and non-power-holders — it is difficult to assent to Gellner’s illustrations of his ‘types’. For example, exclusionary and integral nationalisms (which normally have a strong ethnic content — although frequently denied in, e.g., the French case) have developed amongst peoples possessed of a high culture in combat with those who also have a high culture; while inclusive and civic assimilationist nationalisms have developed amongst peoples who have not historically had a crystallised high culture but have been engaged in combat with those who have had a high culture (e.g., the contemporary Eritreans).

The apolitical character of Gellner’s theory

Gellner’s theory of nationalism rests on cultural and materialist premises. What it appears to lack is a sustained and developed sense of the political — with the notable exception of Gellner’s perception of the precariousness of western liberal pluralism, and his preparedness to give retrospective thanks to nationalism for preserving it. The apolitical charge can be substantiated in several ways:

(i) his typology is geared towards explaining the development or thwarting of nationalist secessionism, but does not provide a politically sensitive account of what may dampen nationalist secessionism;

(ii) the theory appears to rely on culturally or materially reductionist accounts of political motivation;

(iii) as we have already claimed Gellner neglects the role of powerpolitics in explaining which cultures become nations, and the possibility that nation-builders explicitly see the functional relationship between nationalism and modernity which he posits;

(iv) although Gellner sees the connections between nationalism and egalitarianism in modern societies, he does not, strangely enough, see the mutually reinforcing relationships between nationalism, egalitarianism and democratisation;

(v) and lastly, but relatedly, he displays contempt for nationalist doctrines.

These points are elaborated below.

(i) Gellner did not provide a politically sensitive account of what may dampen nationalist secessionism. He appeared to assume that the range of possibilities in modern times is bifurcated: there is a simple choice between nationalist homogenisation through assimilation, and nationalist secessionism which produces another nationalist homogenisation: ‘Nowadays people can live only in units defined by a shared culture, and internally mobile and fluid. Genuine cultural pluralism ceases to be viable under current conditions.[169]

This argument is not empirically tenable, unless it is rephrased as an equilibrium theory, which asserts that homogeneous nationalism is the most stable outcome in modern times. In modern times states have frequently adopted what John McGarry and I call strategies for eliminating national and ethnic differences, through four principal devices: genocide, mass-population transfers, territorial restructuring through partitions/secessions, and cultural engineering through integration or assimilation.[170] Their widespread usage confirms the intuitive sense in Gellner’s idea of a nationalist homogenising tendency. Yet one initial qualification must be made: political integration of diverse peoples often occurs without full-scale cultural assimilation, which suggests that Gellner too easily assumed that a political nationalism must be a (high) cultural nationalism.

More importantly here, modern political entities have also developed strategies for managing national and ethnic differences that, prima facie, counteract the potency of nationalist homogenisation. There are four major ‘macro-methods’ through which genuine cultural pluralism (if not democracy) may operate: systems of control; arbitration; federation/ autonomy; and consociation. The last three of these are compatible with liberal and egalitarian pluralist principles. [171] Throughout modernity these methods have existed at various times, and in many parts of the world, and new versions of them are continually springing into being. Thus Belgium has recently federalised, South Africa is (or was?) temporarily consociationalised, and the European Union is increasingly embattled because of the ambitions offederalists.

All four of these systems of cultural pluralism, viz. control, arbitration, federation and consociation, may, as Gellner’s theory suggests, be less stable than homogeneous nation-states. Systems of control, like empires, communist dictatorships and majoritarian or ‘ethnic democracies’, as some prefer to call systems dominated by a Staatsvolk, have shattered in many places. An orthodox Gellnerian might, reasonably, classify some of these cases as imperial ‘hang-overs’ from ‘Agraria’, succumbing to modernising pressures — the break-up of Ethiopia might be an exemplary illustration. External and internal arbitrations of ethnic conflicts are also infrequently successful.[172] Democratic biethnic or multiethnic federations are few and in regular crises. Czechoslovakia broke up very quickly after democratisation. Consociations frequently break down, and when they are successful they can lead to integration, as some believe has occurred through ‘depillarisation’ in the Netherlands, or they can be transit mechanisms to record a shift in ethnic power, as may be happening before our eyes in South Africa.

Yet the persistence of such strategies, and regimes based upon them, are empirical embarrassments for Gellner’s theory. The equilibrium condition of one nation, one state, seems to be continually elusive. Switzerland is a real anomaly for Gellner’s theory. Multiethnic and multinational states in which there is a common sense of political (not cultural) nationhood exist. Some would even argue that Gellner lived in one — though as an Irishman I cannot be expected to be as generous as others might be on that point.[173] The key issue is that Gellner's theory too readily assumes that the general case, that the political nation and the cultural nation must be one, is the universal and, in the long run, the irresistible tendency. While Gellner admits that nationalism is 'occasionally defeated by some other force or interest, or by inertia', [174] he leaves little for the creative possibilities of political design and architecture. Constitutional and political engineers do not figure in this sociologically reductionist conception of modernity, in which all nationalisms must (eventually) be cultural nationalisms.

(ii) Although he denied it, Gellner appeared to rely on culturally or materially reductionist accounts of nationalists' political motivations. He defended himself against the thesis that he was economically reductionist, suggesting that it is a parody to claim that the nationalist footsoldier fights for his tobacco shop pension. Nevertheless the impression is conveyed in his writings that job-hunting and job-deprived intelligentsias and proletarians provide the nationalist personnel. Gellner recognised that a range of cultural humiliations and repressions may provoke nationalist protests and insurrections, but once experience of repression, as opposed to blocked social mobility, explains the propensity to engage in nationalist movements then we appear to have moved some distance from industrial society theory. A flexible and non-repressive regime, that has authentically egalitarian and pluralist characteristics, may be able to thwart secessionist pressures precisely because it gives the culturally and educationally differentiated a share in political institutions. In short, the political regime within which national minorities operate, rather than their material or cultural grievances, may best explain their predispositions to be secessionists, federalists or consociationalists, and that is not obvious in the texts Thought and Change or Nations and Nationalism.

(iii) We have seen that Gellner underplayed the role of power-politics in explaining which cultures become nations, and the possibility that nation-builders explicitly see the functional relationship between nationalism and modernity. In this respect he appears as a strict historical materialist: nationalist politics is the superstructural by-product of cultural fissures that are in turn shaped by the uneven diffusion of industrialism. Yet numerous scholars suggest that the genesis of nationalism, and its maintenance, owed much to the functional relationship between nationalism and military success rather than economic performance.

The education and cultural standardisation of troops in the European ancien regime preceded that of the general citizenry, and there is more than humour in the thesis that a language differs from a dialect in that the former has an army and a navy. The state bureaucracies of the old European regimes were mechanisms for the genesis of ‘official nationalism’, partly through the Gellnerian mechanisms of the development of literacy, the decay of sacred religious languages and their replacement with vernacular high cultures produced by a new clerisy, the meritocratic bourgeoisie. These elites, however, deliberately used protonationalism for military purposes that operated autonomously from the logic of industrial society.

(iv) The connections between nationalism and egalitarianism in modern societies were persuasively observed by Gellner, but he did not spell out the mutually reinforcing relationships between nationalism, egalitarianism and democratisation. The first political nationalisms in the USA and France were explicitly democratic in character,[175] and there are social structural arguments, congenial to Gellner’s philosophy of history, which explain why the wider distribution of power-resources in modernity has made democratic outcomes more likely than in agrarian societies.[176] Preoccupied with the miracle of western liberalism, and the virtues of its civil society, Gellner appeared to assume that democratisation has been a lucky accident in some industrialised societies, rather than a systemic trait. Yet it is odd to take the view that nationalism is no accidental by-product of modernisation, indeed to claim that it is intrinsic to its more egalitarian conditions, but not to notice that exactly the same arguments can be made about democratisation. Moreover, the relationships, politically and culturally, between nationalism and democratisation, at least at the doctrinal level are very clear, or, at least, so one can maintain.

(v) It was central to Gellner’s definition of nationalism that the doctrine holds that nations should be ruled by conationals. It is central to liberal nationalism that that should be the case with the express consent of the conationals. Nationalism, with qualifications, is therefore a defensible doctrine for modern liberals, and so there is no necessary reason why someone convinced of the explanatory merits of Gellner's account of the roots of nationalism must share his contempt for nationalist political doctrine. Consistent nationalists hold that all nations should be free, free to express themselves, culturally and politically, and, that this freedom is constrained by other nations' rights to the same cultural and political freedom. Nationalism can be a liberal political doctrine, one which emphasises freedom, with at least the following corollaries:

(i) that all people are or should be members of nations;

(ii) that membership of a nation is a beneficial good;

(iii) that nations are the most important cultural and political collectivities;

(iv) that all nations have the right to determine their form of selfgovernment and, relatedly, that all nations have the right to selfdetermination; and lastly

(v) that the activities of states should, in general, be subordinated to nationalist principles.

Gellner, like most postwar academic commentators on nationalism, refused to treat nationalism seriously as a political doctrine because he shared, understandably, the anti-nationalist animus of the European intelligentsia who matured during or after the Nazi holocaust (although he did so with greater intellectual detachment and hard-headedness). He happily conceded to cosmopolitan critics of nationalism that nationalist authors are either self-evidently vacuous or incoherent. His theory of nationalism is consequently vulnerable to the charge that it ignores the autonomous significance of political doctrine in shaping social life — which is not, be it noted, an argument that rescues Kedourie's approach to nationalism by the back door.

The claim can be made, but not fully defended here, that nationalist political doctrine is not merely not vacuous, but that all self-professedly modern political doctrines, liberal, socialist or conservative are parasitic upon nationalist assumptions; and that the political success of these doctrines in argument and political struggle rests on these assumptions. Gellner suggested that nationalism has received little attention from political philosophers because ‘there was not enough in the way of good doctrines and texts, which is the kind of material they used to like, for them to get their teeth into’. Even if they had, he maintained, nationalist thinkers could not really have made much difference: ‘If one of them had fallen, others would have stepped into their place.’ In any case ‘their precise doctrines are hardly worth analysing’ since nationalist ideology ‘suffers from a pervasive false consciousness ... we shall not learn too much about nationalism from the study of its own prophets’.[177]

This style of argument was characteristically provocative. [178] Gellner told his readers that nationalist thought is not worth examining in much the same manner that the philosophes and Marxists held that religious doctrine was not worth examining, because it represented an inchoate mixture of myth, superstition, error and false consciousness. Indeed Gellner’s criticism of Kedourie was just like Marx’s criticism of the philosophes: do not waste one’s breath examining the bad ideas, instead seek to explain their material roots. Gellner presumed not just that nationalist ideas are bad, or low-brow, as Kedourie complained, but that they are epiphenomenal. The message was that he had no wish to disturb the bad press which nationalists’ writings have received. This bad press holds nationalism responsible for many disasters and catastrophes, wars, forced mass-population transfers, imperialisms, fascisms and genocides. Depending on the particular intellectual’s account of the source of all evil, nationalism is held to be an expression of patriarchy, capitalism or socialism: feminists interpret nationalism as a by-product of patriarchal thought, penile aggression and other features of male malevolence; Marxists hold capitalism culpable for nationalism; while economic liberals generally see it as a species of collectivism because nationalists demand public regulation of capital and labour markets and are critical of the Ricardian theory of free trade.

One reason Gellner did not take nationalist doctrines seriously is that there have been few universalist theorists of nationalism, and those that have existed, like Rousseau and John Stuart Mill, have usually been read, criticised and admired for their nonnationalist writings. Moreover, universalist themes in nationalist authors, like Burke, Herder, Fichte and List, have generally been seen as motivated by the particularist concerns of their national cause. [179] The naturally parochial audience to whom exponents of nationalism have addressed themselves has meant that their writings and arguments are not treated with respect by cosmopolitan intellectuals addressing other cosmopolitan intellectuals. This cosmopolitan bias in the reading of nationalist writing is something one should never forget. However, rather than discuss Rousseau's Social Contract and Government of Poland, Burke's views of political obligation, Herder's theory of language or Fichte's Addresses to the Gennan Nation I shall simply note here that liberal nationalist doctrine may be no less coherent than liberalism, conservatism or socialism, [180] and that although nationalism often comes packaged with fairy-tales its myths are no less plausible than the myths of social contracts, of class struggles, of wars between the sexes, of immemorial traditions, of intimations or of natural harmony of interests.

Lest we forget the enemies of nationalism and national self-determination have been, and are, imperialists, cosmopolitans and the godly. And their professed fears about the exclusivism of some nationalisms, historically understandable, can be nicely answered: 'Particularistic nationalism bears the same relation to universal nationalism as selfishness does to individualism, selfishness being the pursuit of one's own interests without regard to the interests of others, and individualism being the doctrine that it is legitimate to pursue one's own interests on the same terms on which theirs are free to pursue others.'[181]

Nationalism is most famously associated with the doctrine of national self-determination, which it is fashionable to scorn as incoherent and destructively chaotic in its repercussions.[182] Yet the idea is simple enough: a nation must be free to establish its preferred form of government, whether that be as a constituent component of a multinational state or federation or as an independent state. (Gellner mistakenly implies that only separatist or irredentist nationalisms are properly nationalist.) The idea of national self-determination is attacked as dangerous because it spells chaos to the world's map-makers, threatens the permanent instability of frontiers,[183] and fails to specify who constitutes the 'self' with the right to self-determination, and how that self might be realised. Properly understood, however, national self-determination is a recursive principle of democratic consent: every nation should have the right to seek self-determination, including the right to secede to create its own state, providing the members of the nation consent to such self-determination, and providing they grant the same right to those who do not regard themselves as part of the nation concerned.[184] Imperialists, cosmopolitans and the godly riposte with searching questions: ‘who are the people?’, ‘what if there is more than one nation in a given region?’, and ‘how does one ensure that each nation is granted self-determination in territories where nations are intermingled?’ These are important questions, but they do not demonstrate the incoherence of national self-determination. All that they prove in the first place is that implementing the idea of self-determination may not be easy. Liberals, socialists, conservatives and feminists have difficulties with working out the implementation of their core ideas, so nationalists are not alone in their problems with their doctrines. Note, secondly, that there are ways in which multiple nations may grant one another free and equal self-determination — through consociational or federal arrangements, or even through genuinely agreed partitions and negotiated exchanges of populations. Indeed the liberal nationalist must agree with John Stuart Mill that there are cases where nationalities are so intermingled that the nations concerned must make a virtue of necessity by developing appropriately complex forms of political accommodation and respect, such as democratic condominia. [185]

Nationalism implies that loyalty to the nation should be the first virtue of a citizen. This idea has internal and external implications. It suggests that loyalty to the national community should transcend loyalty to more particular identifications, personal, cultural, economic, or political, and that members of one’s nation have higher moral claims than members of other nations. Whatever may be said of the merits of such thinking, and note carefully that I am not endorsing it without qualification, it is scarcely fair to say that it is incoherent. Nationalist moral doctrine is at odds with cosmopolitanism — the doctrine that one owes equal duties to all members of the human species — and with personalism — the doctrine that you owe first moral obligations to your personal friends;[186] and it is at odds with statism — that your first loyalty is to the state (except when one’s nation is a nation-state). Cosmopolitanism, personalism, statism and nationalism have all attracted rational arguments and exponents — and it is not credible to insist that nationalism is alone in its weaknesses. Nationalist thinking is not incompatible with the belief that nations may be duty-bound towards other nations; indeed it is internationalism proper to observe (genuine) international law and to provide charitable assistance to other nations. In brief, liberal nationalism does not deserve the contempt with which Gellner wishes to be associated.

Nationalism also has prescriptive public policy content, independently of particular political ideologies. Most obviously, nationalism suggests a doctrine of citizenship. Who should and who should not automatically be entitled to membership of the nation? Nationalists vary in their answer to the question, depending on the stress they give to ethnic or civic conceptions of the nation, but at least they provide an answer. Liberals, socialists and conservatives in practice accept the nationalist answer or debate its frontiers. The nationalist theory of citizenship is in turn closely bound to the development of the modern welfare state, in which, in principle, conationals are treated as members of a collectivity engaged in mutual insurance and assurance. Nationalism also has prescriptive implications for education — educating potential citizens in a national culture, in respect for nationally endorsed institutions, in prescribing the moral universe of rights and obligations, in preserving and developing distinctive cultural idiosyncrasies, and in freeing the educated from the prejudices, be they patriarchal or otherwise, of the home or the sect. Nationalism additionally limits the operation of free markets: nationalists rarely believe in the unrestrained movement of labour, though they may embrace the free movement of capital. [187] Nationalists are anti-Smithians — Adam not Anthony — who seek to inhibit particular consequences of homogenising capitalism, or for that matter of homogenising cosmopolitan socialism. They have, in the current parlance, some minimal communitarian values. These are core elements of coherent political reasoning endorsed tacitly by millions of people on this planet. They may, of course, be mistaken, but they are not obviously mistaken.

Nationalism should not be equated with fascism or racism, as Gellner recognised, although it may become infected by the latter notions. Nationalism, as a doctrine, from Herder onwards recognised the equality of nations. In both its romantic and instrumental-developmental versions it celebrates the diversity of national differences, and, therefore, in principle, is not genocidal or racist. Racism and religious creeds have arguably been more responsible for genocides than nationalism. Racism, by contrast with nationalism, ranks races in an evolutionary and moral hierarchy, and is therefore dispositionally genocidal; while religious believers, dogmatically convinced of their possession of the truth, may well be disposed to engage in mass killings of nonbelievers. The fusion of racism and religious chauvinism with illiberal nationalism is a dangerous and potentially murderous phenomenon but to suggest that the rise of nationalism is responsible for genocides in the modern world is contestable. The argument may seem plausible when nationalism is defined as the ethnocentric glorification of the in-group, as the religious deification of the nation, or in Conor Cruise O'Brien's characteristically inflammatory words as 'the most effective engine for the mobilisation of hatred and destruction that the world has ever known'.[188] The 'argument' is that from the ideal of the nation-state it is but a short step to putting people into cattle trucks to exterminate them. The implication is that nationalism cannot tolerate ethnic, racial or religious differences but must eliminate them. Such arguments are refuted, at least to my mind, by the existence of multiethnic, multiracial and multireligious nations, and by the fact of peaceful international relations between liberal democratic nations. Yet because Gellner treated nationalism as the doctrine of 'one culture, one state' he leaves it open to the charge that its central doctrine spells a simple choice between assimilation on the one hand, and genocide and forced expulsion or emigration on the other hand. But even vigorously nationalising nation-states have a range of intermediate strategies: their choices are not confined to either compulsory assimilation or genocide.

 Nationalism: Gellner's elaborations, responses to his critics and his last words

In the last two decades of his life Gellner re-engaged with his eastern European roots and with Marxist-Leninist scholarship in the Soviet Union, experiences that culminated in the establishment of a Centre for the Study of Nationalism at the Central European University. These activities helped generate a range of essays and books, in which Gellner elaborated his theory, modified it in places, and replied to his critics.

The most important is the posthumous book, Nationalism, which integrates material contained in essay form in Encounters with Nationalism and in other occasional contributions. The most important of the essays is his ‘Reply to my Critics’ — in which he responded directly to the arguments made above, as well as to those made by other critics.

* Nationalism

Nationalism is a typically fluent and witty Gellnerian long essay, or minibook. It maintains the key arguments of Nations and Nationalism, especially its philosophy of history and its industrial society theory; defends the theory against real and alleged misinterpretations; recognises, honestly, some of its real difficulties; and lastly, adds some novel perspectives.

Elaborations, qualifications and defence mechanisms

Three key elaborations and qualifications are made in defence of the theory against unnamed critics. First, Gellner denies that his theory is reductive in the sense that it neglects the psychological authenticity and depth of the emotional power of nationalism. Not so, he replies. The merit of his theory is that it seeks to explain why these emotions exist, why they are invested in nations and their fates, and why they feel (and are) authentic and powerful in the breasts of nationals.[189] Secondly, while insisting that he is a pure and proper paid-up modernist, Gellner recognises in multiple passages that some premodern cultures were better equipped than others to become modern national cultures. As he put it, intellectual modernists are anti-creationists on the schooling of children in biology, but they are the creationists in this debate, whereas their opponents are the Darwinians, emphasising slow evolutionary change with occasionally important discontinuities in the nature of ethnic communities. Gellner finally accepted that some nations have genuine and authentic navels, meaning that they have ancient roots (as Anthony Smith maintains); others have had navels invented for them (in Gellner’s view, the majority); whereas still others are ‘navel-less’. It is, however, an empirical question, to be resolved by research, which of the three types of nation is most common. This is a fair and reasonable concession on Gellner’s part, but he did not address whether states built on authentic ancient national pasts are more stable and durable than those that have had their national pasts invented — or which simply lack any past, authentic or invented.[190] Lastly, and importantly, Gellner partially downplayed the primacy of industrialisation in the aetiology of nationalism: bureaucratic centralisation (and its standardising implications), and ‘Protestant-type’ religions (with their egalitarian and high-culture diffusing properties) are granted their due as semi-independent agents in the generation of nationalism. Nevertheless, the functional link between industrialisation and nationalism is maintained, and its ‘last instance’ role in Gellner’s theory is apparent.

There is one important recognition of difficulty: Gellner recognises that Greek nationalism in the 1820s preceded industrialisation — ‘the Morea did not look like the Lancashire dales’[191] — a matter of no small import as he also believed that the first nationalist rising was that of the Greeks. Leave to one side whether the originality of the Greeks in this case is suspect: the United Irishmen of the 1790s, the North American revolutionaries of the 1770s, and Bolivar’s South American revolutionaries, arguably have prior claims.[192] Instead, let us focus on how Gellner seeks to finesse the difficulty. In an explicitly ad hoc argument he claimed that despite their peripheral agrarian location the ‘Balkan bandits’, i.e., the Greeks, were very susceptible to the diffusion of Enlightenment and Romantic ideas. Though no Balkan specialist, I suspect the argument is correct, but the trouble is that it does not solve Gellner’s problem. He has invoked the autonomous role of doctrine and ideas and their cultural resonance, rather than industrialisation, to account for the nationalists in the first nationalist uprising. Elsewhere he made a better response to Ken Minogue: industrialisation casts a long shadow over preindustrial peoples, enabling certain communities to anticipate its consequences and reorder their identities and actions accordingly. [193] That response is consistent with the filter explanation I discussed above.

Novelties

There are three novelties in Nationalism compared with Nations and Nationalism — though the first two were foreshadowed in essays published between 1984 and 1994. The first novelty is Gellner’s new preference for a more explicitly historical conception of the stages of nationalism, and the ‘time-zones’ of nationalism within Europe — and his apparent loss of interest in his own typology of nationalism-inducing situations. The five stages are the time of the Congress of Vienna, the age of Irredentism, the age of (Woodrow) Wilsonism, the era of ethnic cleansing and the age of attenuated and satisfied nationalism. I shall not quibble here with the historical details in this delineation of stages — though I could. What should be apparent to the reader is the absence of a neat link — or attempts to forge links — to either industrialisation or uneven economic development, in accounting for the transitfons between the stages. With the exception of the era of attenuated nationalism the sequence of stages seems to operate according to the rhythms and ruptures of the politics of the great powers rather than the functional logic of industrialism and the stresses of uneven development. By contrast, the great merit of the typology in Nations and Nationalism was that it attempted to link nationalist types to the variables emphasised in industrial society theory.

What of Gellner’s three (or is it four?) time-zones of nationalism in Europe? In the first zone, the Atlantic seaboard, nation and state cohabited in premodernity before the era of modern nationalism. From the cohabitation came Portugal, Spain, France and England. In the second zone, the nation existed but was stateless, and had to be forged though war and diplomacy. The bride was ready, but a groom had to be found: so shot-gun marriages occurred between Germany and Prussia, and between Italy and Piedmont. In the third zone, neither the nation nor the state existed, and ethnic cleansing was necessary to generate the nation-state form. Now we are in the lands of the Habsburg, Ottoman and Romanov empires. The fourth time-zone, was the area captured by the USSR (and Yugoslavia). The question there is: in which of the five stages and which of the three time-zones will the successor entities find themselves?[194] And so on. This tale and its question are not without interest, though the tale does read suspiciously like the potted story of nationalism of Hans Kohn, Alfred Cobban and others — in which nationalism, such a good thing in the west, becomes an increasingly venomous and murderous creature as it travels east. Gellner’s defence would be that he is seeking to explain the truth in that tale — why the sociology of central and eastern Europe meant that the repercussions of nationalism would be very different there to what happened around the Atlantic seaboard. Nevertheless his is a great-power centred account. In which time-zones or stages do we fit Ireland, the Low Countries or the Scandinavians?

[195] But at least the time-zones, unlike the stages, do have the merit of being linked to his wider theory: the equilibrium condition of modern politics and culture is the nation-state; its formation in particular locations will be a function of the preceding national, political, agrarian and industrial materials.

The second novelty in Nationalism is Gellner’s explicit consideration of the relationship between Islam and nationalism. This question married two fields in which he distinguished himself as an original scholar. The combination, however, seems unhappy. Some of the very traits that Gellner had sketched to argue that Islam is functional for modernisation[196] are the same as the cluster he associates with nationalism — egalitarianism, diffusion of a high culture, non-magicality, and unmediated relations between the individual and community. The traits which allegedly make Islam secularisation-resistant are then invoked to claim that Islam can, and may well trump nationalism as a legitimation formula, in a way that Christianity can no longer do in the west. Indeed, Gellner claims that fundamentalism is presently victorious over nationalism — though he did not make this a prediction for the future.[197] Though no Arabist or Islamicist I have great scepticism about the merits of these arguments — perhaps because I want to believe that Islam will not be secularisation-resistant, in the long run, and certainly because I do not want to accept that contemporary Algeria has this message for the Islamic world: de tefabula narratur.

Gellner applies his arguments almost wholly to Arabic lands — though he has interesting remarks to make about Kemalist Turkey and Khomenei’s Iran. But one does not need to be an Islamic specialist to see the difficulties with his case. Kemalist and post-Kemalist Turkey show that Islam can compete with nationalism, whether or not it controls the state, but Gellner himself noted the vitality of Kemalism as an institutionalised ‘Decembrism’ that controls Turkish Islam, and a more corrupt version of Decembrism still persists in Algeria. Elsewhere it is not evident that fundamentalist Islam has trumped nationalism in South-East Asia, South Asia, or indeed the Middle East. Has Islam triumphed over nationalism in Malaysia and Indonesia, or is it in alliance with it? The break-up of Pakistan in 1971 suggests that a polyethnic or multinational state in which Islam is the sole unifying cultural bond rests on brittle foundations. There have been wars between Islamic states with different dominant ethnonational groups, e.g. the Iran-Iraq war. The ethnonational instability of present-day Pakistan, Afghanistan, or of the successor states in former Soviet Central Asia, is a commonplace. The treatment of Muslim Kurds by Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria points, if anything, to the primacy of ethnonational conflict over pan-Islamic integration. Gellner, in my judgement, too readily concedes Islamist anomalies for his general theory of nationalism — anomalies that he would, I suspect, have sought to explain away if they had been presented by other area specialists or other comparative sociologists of religion.

The last novelty of Nationalism is that Gellner felt prompted into politics proper, into making political prescriptions, or drawing practical implications.[198] He describes these prescriptions as ‘banal’, perhaps because he may have been conscious of how far they support the conventional wisdom of Euro-liberals. He rejected the doctrine of national self-determination as ‘rubbish’, and maintained that there can be no just solutions to national conflicts[199] — though two pages later this had become an argument that there can be no solutions to national conflicts based on justice alone.[200] He expressed a preference for stability, i.e. the avoidance of the break-up of existing states without an orderly passage to successor regimes. He also hoped that the (shared?) affluence of industrial society would attenuate most conflicts, and that the ‘de-fetishisation’ of territory as a means to wealth would simultaneously entrench stability and economic growth. More significantly, he hoped that major order-maintenance functions could become supranational, while social functions could become cantonised, so that cultural pluralism could co-exist with the benefits of modernity.

* @@@‘Reply to My Critics’

In his lengthy, generous and funny ‘Reply to my Critics’[201] Gellner made two important replies to objections to his theory of nationalism. The first, already discussed above, was to reject the claim that his theory is ‘reductionist’, that it ignores the power of nationalist identity, for individuals and communities. This he argued, is unfair, though he conceded that this misinterpretation is widespread. Nationalism is explained as important both for people’s interests and their identities — which are, of course, partially interdependent. His final restatement of his position was unambiguous. Personally I find it convincing, and Table 2.2 is intended to provide a simple expression of Gellner’s views on this issue compared to what I take to be the position of some other theorists. Nevertheless, in Thought and Change and Nations and Nationalism, the stress is on the instrumentality of nations and nationalism rather than upon their expressive identifications — so, for me at any rate, late Gellner corrects early Gellner, or at least brings into sharper relief what young Gellner believed.

Secondly, Gellner responded to the charge of functionalism. He denied that his theory is teleological; avoided deciding whether it should be classified as a (non-teleological) functionalist argument; but instead insisted that it is causal. Industrial society, its diffusion, its discontents and its uneven impact upon existing ethnic and cultural terrains cause nationalism. His reply means that my labours above were not in vain. A filter explanation — e.g. nationalists realise that nationalism is beneficial for modernisation — can account for the self-conscious nation-builders, whose existence no one doubts. It can also account for the diffusion of nationalism — and indeed for the anomalies occasioned by Greek nationalism before Greece or its hinterland had experienced industrialisation. However, the much stronger functionalist claim, that nationalism is functionally explained (without intentionality) by its beneficial consequences for industrial society, or the straightforward causal claim that industrial society causes nationalism, are now brought into sharp relief as strong hypotheses open for empirical testing or modification. To treat the causal claim properly serious empirical research must establish the operational meaning of industrial society (or a range of its possible meanings) and its (alleged) most important nationalism-engendering traits, and proceed to test their interrelationships.[202]

Table 2.2 Gellner compared with other theorists of nationalism

| Nations are | primarily tools of manipulative elites or ideological masks for interests | primarily expressions of authentically felt identities | both tools of elites and authentic expressions of identities |

| perennial and permanent features of humankind | Pierre van den Berghe | Johann Gottfried Herder (& most nationalists) | Johan Gottlieb Fichte |

| (often) continuous with premodern ethnies |

| John Armstrong John Hutchinson Anthony Smith |

| (mostly) modern | Paul Brass
Eric Hobsbawm | | Ernest Gellner
Benedict Anderson
Walker Connor |

 Conclusion

* What is living in Gellner’s philosophy of nationalism?

With qualifications, Ernest Gellner’s arguments about the elective affinity between nationalism and modernity are plausible. His criticisms of naturality, wrong address, dark gods, and accidental-but-bad-ideas theories of the genesis and diffusion of nationalism are short, sharp and persuasive. Nationalism or nations have not been permanent features of human history — or so the evidence suggests. Nationalism has both expressive and instrumental dimensions that appear to be linked to modernisation, and its imperatives. Nationalism may be used to legitimate elites and counter-elites, it may be an ideology of mobilisation especially favoured by the disaffected intelligentsia — though that does not mean that it is specially embraced by ‘the lesser-examination passing classes’ in Hobsbawm’s inaccurate phrase. [203] Nationalist arguments may, of course, be manipulated for illiberal purposes: whether articulated by anti-colonial movements, or by established political elites, they may be used to obtain and exploit territorial, administrative and economic monopolies. Yet like Gellner we must accept that unless nationalist doctrine made some rough sense of the modern world, unless that world continually stimulated such identity formations, then it could not be tapped by manipulative elites: why else is nationalist manipulation so often more successful than many other kinds? Lastly, on his own logic his theory has greater retrodictive or predictive power than he initially thought, and it need not deny that successful nation-building may depend much more on successful innovation than on fabricationist invention.

* What is dead (or at least doubtful) in Gellnefs philosophy of nationalism?

The criticisms sketched here are not fatal to Gellner's theory; they are merely necessary qualifications or reformulations. What is dead (or at least doubtful) is his explicitly functionalist argumentation. What is also doubtful is the primacy he gives to industrialisation in explaining the genesis and maintenance of nationalism, unless industrialisation means something broadly synonymous with modernisation, commercialisation and democratisation. Other mechanisms have been conducive to the genesis and maintenance of nationalism — including explicitly political mechanisms, and it is hard to see how the primacy of one or another mechanism might be proven. Gellner's typology of nationalisms is deficient in its range, and defectively elaborated; while his later historical stages, and time-zones, are specifically European, problematic and disconnected from the central premises of his own theory.

Many of the dead or doubtful aspects of Gellner's philosophy of nationalism, in my view, stemmed from Gellner's almost Olympian apoliticism. His last words on the subject, his last political prescriptions, express anxieties about nationalism's destabilising properties, whilst his hopes were expressed, it seems to me, independently of his theoretical convictions. His theory holds that the nation-state is the equilibrium condition of modernity, so he had no good reason for his hopes of a different world-order in which power would be transferred both to supranational and sub-state levels. If however, the nation-state is just one political form amongst many capable of managing or eliminating ethnonational conflict, and if the nation-state can be structured in culturally pluralist ways (consociational, federal or through other modes of co-sovereignty), then the world may not be governed by the logic of the strong version of Gellner's theory.

In my judgement Gellner missed the interdependencies between nationalism and democratisation, and failed to treat nationalism as a political doctrine that, when suitably furbished, is consistent with most of the liberal values Gellner held dear. Almost intellectually uninterested in ethics, perhaps because he didn't believe in their power, he was tempted to assume that just resolutions of ethnonational conflicts are impossible. That remains to be proven. National self-determination is not a doctrine which inexorably points towards madness and murder; and I am not alone in thinking that, suitably dressed, it might offer some prospect of structuring our world with both authority and justice, but then I believe that nationalism is the major form in which democratic consciousness expresses itself in the modern world. It will be to Ernest Gellner's eternal credit that his wonderfully wide-ranging, clear and often hilarious thought helps us all understand why that is so, and why it must be so.

 Notes

The subtitle of this chapter is stolen from Benedetto Croce's W'hiat is Living and What is Dead in Hegel's Philosophy?, but whereas Croce's relationship with Hegel was purely intellectual, my relationship with Gellner was personal. He was the external examiner of my Ph.D., and a reliable and generous referee in my academic career. For critical comments I am grateful to Brian Barry, Alan Beattie, James Kellas, James Mayall, David Miller, Karin von Hippel, George Schopflin, Albert Weale, and to my students at LSE. I am especially grateful to John A. Hall for his guidance and patience. I am also grateful but sad to have received, posthumously, Ernest Gellner's warm-spirited response to a previous version of this chapter.

The first draft of this chapter was presented to the Seminar on International Political Economy held at LSE in December 1993, a second to the Political Economy Seminar at the University of Western Ontario in March 1994. Three variations on this second draft resulted in publications: 'On the Nature of Nationalism: An Appraisal of Ernest Gellner's Writings on Nationalism', Papers in Political Economy, University of Western Ontario, vol. 47, 1994; 'On the Nature of Nationalism: A Critical Appraisal of Ernest Gellner's Writings on Nationalism', British Journal of Political Science, vol. 27, 1997; and 'On the Nature of Nationalism: A Critical Appraisal of Ernest Gellner's Writings on Nationalism', in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, Amsterdam, 1996. This essay supersedes the preceding, not least because it alone considers all of Gellner's writings on nationalism, including those written after my first essay.

[94] E. Gellner, Thought and Change, London, 1965, p. 151.

[95] See especially ibid. Gellner, ‘Scale and Nation’, Philosophy of the Social Sciences, vol. 3, 1973; ‘Nationalism, or the New Confessions of a Justified Edinburgh Sinner’, Political Quarterly, vol. 49, 1978; Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983; ‘Nationalism and the Two Forms of Cohesion in Complex Societies’, in his Culture, Identity and Politics, Cambridge, 1987; ‘Nationalism and Politics in Eastern Europe’, New Left Review, no. 189, 1991; ‘The Coming of Nationalism and its Interpretation: The Myths of Nation and Class’, in G. Balakrishnan, ed., Mapping the Nation, London, 1996; Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford, 1994; ‘Reply to Critics’, in Hall and Jarvie, The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner; and Nationalism, London, 1997.

[96] A famous nineteenth-century illustration of a liberal criticism of nationalism is Lord Acton’s 1862 essay on ‘Nationality’ (reprinted in J. R. Fears, ed., Essays in the History of Liberty: Selected Writings of Lord Acton, Indianapolis, 1985). A recent illustration of socialist criticism is E. Hobsbawm, Nations and Nationalism since 1780, Cambridge, 1990.

[97] A later essay, presented in the Soviet Union, discussed further why both Marxism and liberalism have been wrong about nationalism, viz., ‘From Kinship to Ethnicity’, in Encounters with Nationalism.

[98] The contemporary version of ‘Dark Gods’ theory is socio-biological, see, e.g. P. van den Berghes, The Ethnic Phenomenon, New York, 1981.

[99] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 149 and Nations and Nationalism, p. 130.

[100] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 151.

[101] E. Kedourie, Nationalism, 4th edn, London, 1985. Kedourie mocked the quest for a general theory of nationalism as ‘the sociological temptation’, identified Gellner’s theory as ‘a species of economism’ and maintained that it did not ‘fit the chronology either of nationalism or of industrialisation’ (pp. 145, 147–8). The vicissitudes and political contradictions of Kedourie’s own position on nationalism went unremarked by Gellner: Kedourie, a religiously orthodox Iraqi-born Jew, and a victim of ethnic cleansing from Baghdad, was a tacit critic of Zionism in 1960, but at the end of his life was a supporter of the state oflsrael.

[102] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 152.

[103] Ibid., p. 153. Gellner was citing the famous conclusion to Kedourie’s Nationalism. Kedourie thought that his question was the only criterion of legitimacy capable of universal defence. Gellner replied in Nations and Nationalism (pp. 127–8) that:

